The glandelinians were pursued for sixteen miles in three hours, and lost besides the 25,000,000 more killed and wounded, between five and six million prisoners. The following day and night was made hellish by a vigorous and constant bombardment along the whole christian line, and at 4 A.M. the next following morning the most tremendous assault of the battle was made by the entire christian line which after all days desperate fighting was successful, and the glandelinians were driven on their left by canonry, and by Crawford on their right, were broken and in great confusion rushed in a panic-stricken mass westward by the main Mc-Hollister and Pandora railroad along the bank of the river by the latter name.

Violet and her sisters, were overwhelmed over the great success won by the various christian armies in calverinia, and calverinia, or the total breaking up of the worse glandelinian invasion of the war and in the world, and of such many headlong victories won in quick succession, Manley himself saw that all his plans were frustrated, for now all was lost, and his own country was threatened by a great invasion to be made by the christian armies, themselves. Violet and her sisters indeed were overjoyed, and Evans winning his latter victory itself was more to add to it all, and the whole world itself was apt to be surprised.

All depended on general Hanson, how quickly the invasion was to be accomplished. There were several armies in Angelinia as yet belonging to the foe, but they made no move whatever to check any advance on the part of the christians, and so all was now still for a while, and the war had again lulled. Evans during his rounds into the ruined cities caused by the frightful carnage at glorinia had checked in all the losses which he showed to little violet and her sisters, which ran as follows,;

It was the purpose of general Jack Evans of keeping these lists, of cities destroyed by the enemy during these battles, in order to know how much damage had been done, and to which the enemy would be compelled to repay. Hilde man's Glandelinian army still confronted Evans christian force, but nevertheless had remained a engagement, though Evans had tried to force him to fight once. So two lines of armies were facing each other, scowling, and growling but not striking at each other as yet. The vivian girls had done wonders in securing the plans and important papers which they had succeeded in getting during their spying exploit, and were marvelled at by all the christian officers in the Abbeaunian and Angelinian armies.
It was seen by all now that the war for the side of the foe was lost, and during all the excitement over these effects it was seen nevertheless that it would take a great invasion for the foe to be forced into submission.

A NEW FISHY WAR OF THE WORLDS. JOHN MANLEY'S ARMY IS CRUSHED AT PHELANTONBURG.

Though defeated once at Phelantonburg general John Manley had been reinforced by general Gadlin power to the strength of 100,000,000, and having 500,000 of the biggest cannon, besides 345,678 of smaller ones, he was confident of capturing that place and establishing a new invasion, in which he hoped he could hold. General Evans had learned of this intended invasion, and as the sorted armies were moving toward that direction to make a junction with Manley, and as all the other christian armies were too far away from the threatened region, Evans decided to stop Manley, and march for Phelantonburg right away. He notified general Hanson, and the christian governments of the threatening danger, and then leaving a large force to watch the movements of general Hilde man he started his advance as soon as possible.

It was already the month of march and it seemed as if the war was going to rage four years. As Evans sent orders for his army to advance swiftly for the north, Violet and her sisters apprehensive that was something was wrong, rode up to Evans head quarters and finding him asked the reason of his orders:

"Oh it's that gosh-darn skunk of a general John Manley!" Was his snappy answer. "He is taking the advantage of the absence of the other christian armies, and having received new divisions from glandelinia is advancing to make a new invasion and capture phelantonburg. He must be stopped, and as I'm nearer to that city than any of the others I'm going to make the race for the place and hold him off. He's got 150,000,000 men, but I have 300,000,000 and can beat him I'm sure!"

He notified generals Wionstien to come and join him, and telegraphing to general Vivian at Titanic Fair of his intention, and advising him not to allow any more foe armies cross the glandelinian border, and giving instructions of a similar character to all the other christian generals on the border Evans started his advance northward, Violet and her sisters with their boy scouts going on far ahead under a severely sent to watch the movements of the advancing army of glandelinians...

The people in Angolintia hearing the news of the threatening invasion fled from the vicinity of phelantonburg, and from other towns, towns and sent messengers begging the Angolintian and calverinian governments to send armies to stop Manley's advance.

The main problem of the whole situation, was that three glandelinian armies under general Woldemann was moving to make a union, and this Evans knew must be prevented at all hazards. If he did join John Manley there was no telling then of what would happen. Having too big an army any way Eva decided to sent three big divisions to oppose these three glandelinian forces, and so he ordered generals Henry and August pargor with Gustor Shoeman, to move their divisions separately to oppose these advancing glandelinian reinforcements.

Manley finally learned of these movements of the christians and so hastened his advance, and later on March 31st general Evans got this document secured by a spy written by Manley. It was an order written to general "Woldemann":

"Your excellency is it is dangerous to proceed in your direction as these fierce pargers and Shoeman are moving their forces to prevent your junction with me. Change your course and do not oppose them unnecessarily as it is fatal.

General John Manley

It was good information for general Evans and he immediately warned August pargor in main command of the information he found, and ordering him to intercept any movement on the part of Woldemann, and force him into an engagement. Then he resumed his own advance, but was startled later on to learn that Manley's forces had reached phelantonburg first, and was concentrating in their strongest to oppose him.

Evans was furious. He had strongly desired to get to phelantonburg first and his bitterest enemy had outwitted him. It was the heaviest blow that general Evans had ever suffered, and he vowed for revenge. He ordered that no quarter should be given for the glandelinians if they encountered any christians in the vicinity, and threatened severe punishment to the officers who disobeyed any command on that line.

"It is probable that the glandelinian slavers will massacre children!" He said and "And if they do and I hear of it I'll allow no quarter to be given to the glandelinians, even their wounded shall be sent to death and bayoneted." He even sent these warnings to general Manley himself, who replied that there were no inhabitants in which to massacre.

Evans decided to move against Manley immediately, as delay was disaster. And there is no telling, either, whether Woldemann would not outwit the other three christian generals either, and so Manley must be driven off before they come.

Three days later he arrived within sight of the enemy lines, and began to prepare for the struggle that was bound to come. He telegraphed for word of the other three commanders, and got answer quickly that despite all their efforts, Woldemann had outwitted them and was moving from the west to make a junction with Manley, and that these three glandelinian divisions had reached the town of Gardula.

Evans at this news, extended his right wing toward that town, and enclosed the region forming that wing in the shape of a giant V, or triangle, and decided to have these held back at all cost. Violet and her sisters knowing the location of the foe in that direction had no sooner reported strange movements among the enemy lines, when general Wionstien commander of the right startled Evans with this report:

"Your excellency general Evans;

My whole line of a is heavily assailed by the glandelinians under Woldemann, who is throwing his entire force against the right simultaneously. Vivian girls have told me it was his intention to force back my lines in order to get around and join Manley. The battle is horrible and my line is hard pressed. Hurry up aid. Need artillery more than anything else."

Wionstien.

At once there was excitement, and Evans Evans sitting up all his officers, told them what was wrong, and detailed three artillery officers to run up to the right with all their batteries, and not to stop one moment. Then he went out scouting and saw also suspicious movements among Manley's lines and decided not to wait to be attacked, sent wave after wave of Abbaamians forward to strike Manley's right and center, and soon Wionstien was startled by a tremendous uproar in that location. Manley seeing his two wings assaulted by too overwhelming numbers was apprehensive and ordered all his batteries upon the columns, whose fire tore the whole line like a tornado down the corn, but early in the engagement, Andreas Miller commander of the glandelinian center was dangerously wounded, and his men thrown into horrible confusion. Over the ranks swept the Abbaamians making one treasonous dash, driving all before them, and in the rout, the foe abandoned everything, for the moment, Manley's headquarters and outposts was captured, with all the generals in the building, Manley barely escaping as the roaring tidal wave of christians came up. And by God such yelling that the retreating Abbaamians set up as they were stormed with fire, rushing on and carrying all before them.

Ten glandelinian generals trying to rally their panic stricken troops fell mortally wounded, General Kenneth Gassey of the foe was killed, back Brooks coming up with reinforcements, was downed by a shell and terribly wounded, and his army cut to pieces.

The entire glandelinian center was broken to pieces, and the surviving glandelinians driven back from their two lines of positions for the distance of thirty six hundred miles in two hours time.

Wionstien from telegraph learned of this sudden turn in events, and within that time the three divisions of batteries arrived to his support with reinforcing columns of infantry, and he was able to hold out against twenty desperate onslaughts of Woldemann's army, mauling one entire division of those glandelinians, cutting to pieces the second division and capturing the third. General Woldemann was killed, and fourteen of his aiding generals severely and mortally wounded. Closed in and no chance of escape and as more christians came up and surrounded them the surviving glandelinians discouraged at the death of their leader surrendered.

Manley being notified of this tremendous disaster, and seeing his whole center threatened with annihilation, and worse of all learning that the two pargers who had surrounded Woldemann was now moving to surround his own right wing, made preparations to withdraw that wing out of the dangerous position and succeeded after fourteen hours of the most savage fighting at that section of the battle field. The commanders of the foe right, had been hurried to see division after division of their best men torn to pieces by the deadly christian artillery fire, and were not sorry when they managed to pull out of the threatened trap and get away with the blood covered survivors.

Leaving an uncountable number of their slain and wounded in the hands of the christians. Pargor and his brother in the main force, captured about 10,000,000 glandelinians as prisoners, and many officers of the highest rank. All day long Manley had tried to stem the tide of disaster at his center, but all his reserve forces were not able to stop the mighty christian tidal wave, and by toward night Manley withdrew his badly shattered army further south, but prepared to make a desperate stand on the morrow.

It had been a fearful and terrible battle, his losses were so heavy that he refused to report them openly though the christians after the battle buried 10,897,866 glandelinian dead, and captured 34,567,999 wounded.

Gardonia the beautiful town was battered to splinters during the battle by the horrible fire of the christian artillery itself, but this disaster could not be avoided. Winterton in receiving the surrender of the surviving forces of the glendalians army had reported the number of prisoners taken as 34,567,777 including over 11,937,354 wounded which also fell into his hands. On the narrow the enemy under general Manley resumed the terrific conflict with the most resolute fury ever imagined, and his onslaughts were shilly as crazy in their nature as crazy could be, and in the fury of their violence the christian line had been broken again and again. The artillery on both sides made the most tremendous din ever imagined, fiercer than even the cannonading at McWhirther and Glordina combined, and shook the ground for 10,000 miles and leveled another hundred score of cities and towns to the ground in Ange lina itself.

One bit ways after another of the glendalians swept forward, returning the christian artillery fire as violently as the christians themselves, both sides yelled their loudest, and the whole world seemed raked and havoiced by the fearful storm of bursting shells, which roared and fell like a million severe thunderstorms raging in one big storm.

Evans took note of the fearful assaults, tugging all along the line, which gave his troops no respite, was fairly torn at tormented by the hundreds of reports he received, concerning the addition of portions of the christian line, but nevertheless, he had again and again sent orders that they must stand ground to the last.

"He had all his field pieces in action against the assaults, while the bigger guns stormed with fire at the glendalian batteries, and so spirited was the battle that people from any not near by towns flooding from failing horses, being excited nevertheless came way out there on the fastest trains running in that location just to see the tremendous conflict.

Evans extending his right, massed his biggest columns and threw these fier ely upon the glendalian assaults, almost reducing three quarters of the glendalian wave at that portion of the field.

A great rushing wave of glendalians poured through the dense Graham's lanes, and through Choosotown, but coming upon the flank of general Evans left wing, fell into a bloody massacre and all were either cut or shot too down and taken prisoners, with the loss of all their commanders.

It was the most fearful battle in the war in southern Angolinda, both sides trying out each other with the greatest ferocity, and a no terrific was the artillery fire that it made a clamor as if a million planets were dash "dash" themselves against one another in a fiery war of the worlds. Three times general Manley gained the christian position on the main center and three times the christians had recaptured the works and poured in a fire that told most severely on the enemy.

All the while during the battle violet and her sisters, with their troop of boy scouts kept up signaling every situation they observed, told where the enemy assault was the strongest, where reinforcements, and more artillery was needed, and of the hottest part of the conflict. But they met disaster. The fire of the enemy in this location was terrific, and their boy friends, Starring, and Fredrick and Parger were severely wounded, Powell was killed, and Penrod mortally wounded, and three hundred of the brave lads killed and 2,345 wounded.

At this point the foe had made one tremendous onslaught, that if predicted for truth, would have startled this world. The glendalians came on in three divisions, under the main command of Federal Francis Johnston.

The christian columns here concentrating was under the command of Gallahan and they reserved their fire for the greatest emergency and then when the foe having crossing a mile in ten minutes so swift was their rush came to within three hundred yards, these christians let loose a fire with the roar of hell, violet and her sisters actually counted seventeen hundred great gaps in the enemy's lines, which closed not, a part of the wave, recoiled the left, halted and stormed with a return fire, and then with one accord rallied and came on once more, reached the christian works and swarmed over amid terrific yells that made the little girls ears ring, then there was a lively mixup a tumult of bayonets, and snare, and shots at close quarters, this lasted three minutes, and then they saw what was left of the gray line recoil and retreat in confusion, say men at all drop like flies then all as if in a dream became a fading view all being a shot from usketr msketry.

They felt the loss of their friends, but then these brave lads had done their duty, and none of the little girls could even say that they did not have wounds either. Violet had a bandaged leg, and handu jocks had been cut slightly by three bullets, and her sisters had been slightly wounded in many various ways. The fearful battle centered madly toward Phelantonburg where Manley threw his heaviest forces, and though he had great armies in reserve he did not use these as yet, though his officers had a n advised him that only these reserves thrown in at the sure time could insure success for him. But he did not take the advice, and held them back, a when if he had thrown these in at the proper moment as advised, he could have swept general Evans completely from the field, and won a battle that would have decided the cause right then and there.

But then the enemies of God never triumphs, and God saw to it that he would not throw in these reserves. Forces in at the proper moment.

So many was the losses among their force of boy scouts becoming that general Evans riding up to the scene begged the little girls pleadingly to leave the dangerous d g region for their own safety as the enemy were putting in a fire so severe at this point that it was a miracle that any one survived. After much coaxing the little girls withdrew their remnants of boy scouts the soldiers and red cross taking care of the many wounded, and dressing the slight injuries of the little girls.

"Evans" but this is certainly terrible." Said Gertrude Angeline to find what they withdrew to a safer place. "I never saw anything like this in the whole war itself. Why its worse or seems to be worse than anything except the glendalian onslaught at Glordina. Can't you throw in all your reserves and end this horrible battle? If you don't you'll have to report staggering losses."

"It seems the only thing that can be done," said Evans. "I'll have to crush Manley to do it though."

It was already noon, and despite all his maddest, and insane efforts Manley had not gained an inch of ground though he had broken the christian line at certain locations. He was nevertheless driven to desperation to finally decided to throw forward all his reserves and take the christian line in the rear at the same time. So without a full in the battle, he reloaded the terrific cannonading and sent these a perfectly overwhelming column to reinforce those already assaulting the christian line, while he occupied an entire section near by for his headquarters, and from there directed the battle. His officers were opposed to the effects of sending the reserves at this time when they seemed it too late, but Manley answered:

"That christian dog general Jack McWhirther Evans had carried all of my works and fortified positions yesterday and if I do not retake those positions, and drive him back all will be lost for sure. He it is true has a stronger force than I, but my artillery will reduce his army in a great deal, and then I'll have a chance of taking him."

"Yes," said the major from general Adolus Adolus-garbo. "But it seems very much to me as if in reducing our position the land. I'm telling you, especially your excellency, we'll never win this battle. For as in particular I refuse to sacrifice your forces further. So let me out for the remainder of the day."

Manley did not say anything to the effect, but reflected bitterly upon the situation. He knew the consequences of failure, and so was desperate enough to make the attempt at all hazards. His defensive artillery was brought up disabled guns were drawn out of the ditch and trench guns placed and now a whole line of thundering cannon was covering the most desperate glendalian charge in the whole battle.

The assault came with an unspontable violence, a storm of battle raging all along the line, but nevertheless the christian line held fire everywhere, and Manley seeing the reserves being horribly cut up and thrown out fruitlessly tore all his artillery upon the christian line while he sent orders for those detailed for the flank attack to hurry and strike. The messenger going off got lost and ran plump into a horse of on confusion surely shot at the down without mercy as he tried to convey the second the order which ran as follows:

"General Graydon!

My reserve forces are being andly depleted, and cannot force the christian line sidway at any point. Hurry and flank the christian rear before it is too late. A'll then take them as possible, a all to depend upon your quickness.

CRITICAL JOHN MAINZ.

"Good but we'll have to be quick," said the leader of the christian cavalry. Ad and off they raced for the nearest christian signal station, and quickly gave the warning. Graydon found the christian line flung on its guard but nevertheless he also made a general assault in double line, his men swept sweeping forward like a glacial flood. The aspect of the scene here was terrific, the glendalians went down like lawns, but nevertheless for a time they were successful and drove the christians into confusion.

As the battle began, growing stronger in violence, Violet and her sisters began to feel the peril. They did not wait for the gladiolus line to appear upon the flank of general Evans left wing, and maintaining the situation, and observing that the gladiolus was successful, they all came back for general Evans. It took them an hour to find. He was disheartened a little, but he had just arrived, and taking up the situation of the battle, he said to the gladiolus. "Thank goodness that the little girls have told me that." He said. "The little girls are a wonder. Violet and her sisters are very quick. Notify general Winston of the danger and he'll stop the assault on his left flank. All among them." "But he is so far," said Violet. "We could not reach him in time to give him the order. It is better that we could telegraph it to him."

"Good idea," said Evans. "And off they raced. Winston got the message, but he answered back:

"Good idea," said Evans. "And off they raced. Winston got the message, but he answered back:

"I have seen the flankers, and want to remark that they are now in successful. Tell general Evans not to worry. Battle is almost won. I have crushed the gladiolus left, and am in possession of his main line of works. A portion of my line is moving on the rear of Manley's center, and will strike a blow any minute now."

This very thing occurred just as the little girls received this message. The assault was still in confusion, the whole christian line was sweeping forward, Evans center was already clearing the gladiolus lines, were in possession of the center and were ready to turn Manley's right wing. To Manley the battle was lost. His army was already frightfully shattered, crushed and tangled, his second headquarters was in possession of the christian line, and a second time all the officers there had been captured, and he had a desperate two hours fight to get away, and after shooting down three hundred Angellians himself single handed, he had managed to escape, and was pursued for ten miles before he was rescued by a rallying column of gladiolusians.

Evans however said that to assault the army with two of position at this time with his army so disorganized, was madness, and so he recalled those sweeping forward, and strengthened his lines, and reformed his armies. Manley was obliged to the quick over his two bitter failures, but now the second main division of Hildebrand's army had arrived from the east, the third was well on the way and Manley had hopes of securing an advantage yet.

During the evening general Evans summoned the two generals before him and when they arrived, he said:

"Though you two have been also defeated by Hildebrand and just the same you have been able to recover. I'll detail you to carry Manley's central line of works to recover. Do you think you can do it?"

"If we can't who can?" was a just answer and answer. We ordered Hildebrand's first main division, yesterday, and Winston sent out his right wing, and cutting down the center, and capturing the left captured us christian generals to force the survivors to surrender or to be massacred. We got revenge alright. But then there the other two big divisions and they are relieving general Manley to night."

In the meantime, general Hildebrand had learned from his signal corps a capture of his two bitter defeats, and was enraged beyond words. When as he learned the Vivian girls who had caused his defeat, and he was bound to have them destroyed once and for good, and do it at once. What the cost. He held a council, and then sent out scouts to locate their whereabouts, or at least at which part of the christian line they were in, and then come back to report the matter to him. So Evans concentrated his main line of batteries to his center, learned toward eight o'clock that night, that the foe were either making a demonstration or throwing out heavy columns of scouts, for some reason that was not known, that nevertheless it looked very suspicious and menacing. Evans planned at this point out reconnoitering parties to watch these movements, and see what the trouble was. The christian scouts finally fell in with a party of these gladiolusians, capturing 34, of them and bringing them within the lines as a loss of war. They were brought before general Evans who forced out of them the truth of the whole affair.....

When it was withdrawn the Vivian girls out of the point of danger, and threatened terrible punishment on any of the soldiers who would desert them in case of arising danger. It was evident that it was Manley's purpose to locate the portion of the christian line where Violet and her sisters were located, and then to try and capture them by making a sudden and heavy assault upon that point of the christian line. Evans dreaded to leave the little girls within the danger zone, and after some short deliberation placed them under the guardianship of the big gladiolusian foreman who were instructed to guard them as they would their own children, in case they were in danger.... It was not known where or when the attack was expected to be at its fiercest in case it came, but nevertheless, Evans decided to have his whole army well guarded, and receive the gladiolusians with a hotter fury than before.

He did not know whether the enemy if they had learned about the Vivian girls and their position would attack immediately at that night, or wait until morning, but nevertheless Evans did not want to take any chances and so he saw to it that his lines were well prepared...

Evans then also decided to have the Vivian girls moved from point to point, during the night to baffle the enemy of god, which he did, transferring them to various parts of the central wing, and indeed this kept the gladiolusian scouts so baffled, and flabbergasted that they did not at least know what to say, but they finally held the opinion that the little Vivian girls were kept mainly in the christian center, though transferred from point to point, and decided to inform Manley of it, and report that his intentions are discovered.

So they returned, all with different reports, but nevertheless Manley realized that general Evans his adversary was tricking him, and decided upon a more desperate purpose. Not to try and capture the Vivian girls, but to make a most treacherous onslaught against the whole christian center simultaneously as well as the right and left, but to direct the main force of the assault in the location of Evans headquarters, and try with light and main to capture him instead.

But again God intervened. Christian spies had overheard this plot, and informed Evans as quickly as possible to look out for Manley as he was the chief object and not Violet and her sisters!... "So it's his purpose to capture me oh!" said Evans. "Well he'd better get a strong net first, and not a torn one to buy a lion like me. I'll guard against his surprises never fear."

It happened to be a dark pitchy night, the weather was hot and close, and the sky overcast with heavy storm clouds, while in the distant horizon lightning was visible. Manley had decided to take advantage of the darkness, and assault the christian line while it was off its guard, but again he was frustrated, for his spies informed him that Evans learned all of his intentions and that to attack the christian line in such darkness was like throwing himself into a mass of fire.

Discouraged at being outwitted so many times general Manley decided to retreat and abandon the invasion, and defend the boundary line, but this his officers would not hear of. He had fresh forces at hand and these they advised him would win the contest for him the next day. Nevertheless general Manley was apprehensive. He knew the strength of his adversary, the fury of such a christian general, and did not like the idea of assaulting such a christian line again. He held a council during the night, turning over plan after plan of how to smite the christian army, but none of these was agreed to, and finally he decided to retreat and do so no matter what his officers said or protested.

His losses had been so appalling that he desired most for a retreat, and did not want to sacrifice his two new divisions. He felt too that the whole war was lost, for the christian armies were now too numerous, and that a terrific invasion was expected at any moment. Finally at eleven o'clock he notified all of his officers that he intended to retreat, and that they must obey his orders, when during a wild thunderstorm, he was surprised to learn that the christians had come on in a heavy assault against his whole right wing and was driving it back from its whole position in the wildest confusion, and that all the artillery, and munitions, besides materials, wagon train and artillery was captured by the christian soldiers.

This indeed was terrible news, and not anything exaggerated either. Learning that it was all too true Manley withdrew his center and left, and started a retreat as fast as possible, and learning of the retreat Evans sent his forces forward, and pressed Manley so hard, that early in the morning he was forced to halt a portion of his army and make a desperate stand. He blamed his officers for his failures in getting off without another bloody engagement, but nevertheless there was nothing else to do, so he stood his ground, and waited for the christian onslaught that was sure to come.

Evans seeing that general Manley prepared to take a stand, halted his own army, and at six o'clock in the morning opened on Manleys line a terrific artillery fire. Manleys batteries quickly responded, but could not silence the christian fire, and two assaults already had broken in his lines so terribly that if he stood his ground all that day his army would meet complete destruction.

It was indeed a disastrous invasion for Manley. His whole army was crushed to fragments, cut to pieces, and still standing its ground on the third day of the battle was threatened with annihilation. After desperate fighting all that morning, Manley seeing it in vain to check the christian onslaught decided to retreat, and so at two thirty, while the battle raged for a while he started the retreat, leaving a great force to make a show front so as to deceive Evans and hold him from advancing too soon. Evans discovered the ruse however, and advanced as soon as Manley started his retreat, and so in the afternoon at about four o'clock Manley again was compelled to stand his ground, but this time enraged over his failures he himself made a tremendous assault on the christian line, and in the frightful storm of battle Evans received reports that violet and her sisters had been captured by the glandelinians and cruelly murdered. Searching for evidence so as he found them safe and sound in the midst of the strong cavalry escort, at which location however the assault of the enemy was the heaviest. All the rest of the day the battle raged with frightful fury, the enemy making in quick succession over sixteen onslaughts, of the most terrible violence, the firing on both sides roared like thrills of cannon, and though time and again the christian line was driven and broken up, it could not be forced at any point and toward night fall the enemy withdrew from the assault and retired to the high hills, which they deemed impregnable.

Fortunately for violet and her sisters starring and his two companions had only been wounded during the battle, and they had received reports of great and encouraging reinforcements, and soon as the slaughter again began ceased and all was quiet violet and her sisters went to see their wounded friends. They were lying in cots in the army tent hastily as erected during the general halt, and were indeed glad to see violet and her sisters.

"You three little boys are indeed heroes," said violet. "So have we nevertheless come off safer than many hundreds of other poor unfortunate boys and girls. But I'm afraid you boys did too much. I may have been for our sake but then it was needless to have exposed yourselves so recklessly." "We forgot ourselves in the excitement," said Fredrick. "And we tried to rescue so many of our wounded comrades. But how did the battle turn out to day?"

"The same as the first two days," said violet. "But I hope it is really over and that Manley will retreat. It seems to be winning battle that's all but there is no sign of the most desirable occurrence coming yet. And that is the end."

"It's looking bad at that," said Marger. "When the invasion starts, there is no doubt that the wicked glandelinian nation will not rise like ten million armies, and we'll receive the greatest resistance ever imagined. All is lost for glandelinian it is true, but I fear the war will last another year or so yet before we'll gain the end of it. It's looking that way anyhow."

"We believe it," said violet and her sisters. "And what we think more of is about the strong positions of Titanic pair. There are so many forts and it'll take a long time to capture them all, even if a long christian line would act simultaneously against all the fortifications."

"We have the plans of these fortifications, and though we gave them to Evans we do not believe it will do much good just now," said Jennie. "There is no telling that when we begin the invasion, that the biggest armies of the for will flock to these fortifications, to defend them at all costs. Nevertheless we are glad to see all this excitement, but then oh what a terrible number of men it'll cost us and then combined."

"The best way we can reduce the fortifications is to blow them up with our cannons," said general Winstien who was with them. "I for one would not lead an assault against any of those fortifications for any reason as it would be a mad sacrifice of troops and officers combined, and a fearful cost in money too. What an assault will not accomplish a cowardly of the greatest force will accomplish....."

"Maybe so," said Jennie. "But then those fortifications are also teeming with the worst kind of cannon, and can return a fire that would let the world know what it sounds like. It's best to use stratagem or besiege the fortifications, and starve them out. It's the only way that we can see."

"Who is the main commander of the glandelinian armies?" asked the fortifications at Titanic pair. "Asked in Winstien." "I do not know," said the little girls. "And the commanders have changed several times, as some had not been in favor of the war, and have either received their fair share or resigned their commands....."

".... Do you think that general Manley will resume the battle tomorrow morning general?" asked Angeline. "...."

"It is hard to say," answered general Winstien. "But I do not think he will."

"But he does not seem to have the desire to retreat since he took position on those high hills," said Gertrude Angeline. "I'm sure he'll resume the fighting again."

"Well if he does it'll cost him his army," said Winstien. "His army is crushed badly now as it is and if he expects success just because he is in possession of those hills well then he will soon find out that he is in the wrong."

A AN EXPERIMENT FOR VO VIOLET AND HER SISTERS!!....

During the night violet and her sisters had desires to go out and see what was doing, which they could not resist. So notifying general Evans of their intentions, they set off with their friend general starring and several other men, and some of their boy scouts. They had been advised by starring that it was a risky undertaking, but nevertheless violet and her sisters, were undaunted and decided to penetrate the very lines of the enemy and learn all the information they could. As Manleys lines were on the hills, this gave to the little girls reasons of for greater caution but nevertheless they reached their destination without any adventure, and soon were within the enemy's lines.

As soon as we reach general Manleys headquarters, I want you three little boys and girls to hid among the trees nearest to the building, and we'll signal to you what we have learned," said violet to the three boy scouts. "Starring will proceed with us and help us in all that is needed. We'll show Manley and his glandelinians, that we still are in the way, and not only that but are not afraid of him and never intend to be either."

The boys took the hint, and soon the spies were crouching before general Manleys headquarters. However violet and her sisters had forgotten to disguise themselves, but nevertheless hiding in the shrubbery, they saw eight glandelinian boy scouts approaching, and as soon as they were near enough the little girls themselves pounced on them and then with the help of starring, quickly overpowered them, taking off their outer clothing and hats, and then try tying them hand and foot, and gagging them hid them in the shrubbery and called forth.

Starring was instructed to remain in his hiding in the shrubbery, and he did so but he warned them for God's sakes to be careful for they were going into a hornets nest..... Not recognized by the guards at the main entrance, violet and her sisters were admitted into the building, the little girls having shown the flag fine passes.

As soon as they were inside the building, they saw the three main leaders in one of the larger rooms, with Manley at their head sitting at a table with a large sheet of paper laid out on the table. To get these plans by their old time means the little girls realized was utterly impossible. The only way to seize them was to force the generals to give it up so in they went to the surprise of Manley having discarded their disguises in defiance.

The glandelinian generals were about to draw their guns when violet said: "If you do so your comrades will find you dead in the morning. Don't look at us so. We are children it is true, but only in size and not in ways. We want your plans and if you know what is good for you you'll hand them over to us."

"Why you impudent little--" "Butted in one of the little girls. "We are not in a hurry, and that is in shooting you down general Manley. There was a time when we felt for you like we would our father but now we have changed you unrepentant enemy of God. Hand over those plans I tell you or we'll shoot you down right where you stand. And give us your weapons too." These generals were indeed desperate fellows, but then they realized it was suicide to resist the vivid girls children though they be, and they complied with their every demand.

"How what do you want us to do?" Asked Manley with an surly an expression as he could assume.

"To insure our ready escape, we wish to tie you up and leave you here till we get away." Said violet. "We want to hinder as much pursuit as possible. My sisters will do the tying with your waist bands."

The glandelinian generals stared to protest but violet and her sisters became more threatening and the generals sullenly submitted though they looked like if they would like to eat the little girls at one meal. As soon as all the generals were all fasted to the table the little girls put their disguises back on and immediately left the building. As soon as violet and her sisters were gone one of the guards having passed the room saw the three generals tied up and immediately released them.

"WHY IN THE HELL DID YOU FOOLS LET IN THOSE LITTLE DEVILS FOR?" He demanded in a rage.

"Let in who?" Asked the guard. "We had nothing to do with the intrance. I'm one of the hall guards."

"Well the vivian girls have stolen my plans and have tied us up this way." Growled Manley. "And they must be taken. Hurry sound the alarm for they have not gone far as yet."

The sentry went out to do so and soon the alarm was sounded, and the little girls hiding in the shrubbery, saw the glandelinians swimming out of the tents and start looking every where for the little girls.

We have to watch out now." Said starring as he observed the glandelinians swimming about, many with lanterns. "They are searching for you little girls and they are bound to get you."

They waited until the first of the columns of the pursuers were gone and then they sailed forth from their hiding places, and were unfortunately detected. Starring however created a commotion, by seizing one of the rifles of the glandelinian soldiers and striking down ten of them in a minutes time and creating such confusion that violet and her sisters were quite a distance before pursuit could begin.

The glandelinians yelling like demons rushed upon the little girls with braided muskets, but starring shot a number of them down, the little girls also opened opening fire and it seemed as if a battle was raging right then and there, the surviving glandelinians were thrown into confusion and edged away from their desperate fig fugitives.

In the hall the little girls with starring, and the boyscouts reached a small bridge over which they went, and then starring with swinging blows of the musket butt crashed in the floor of the bridge in order to hinder the pursuit.

"Quick now before it is too late." Cried starring, when a shot hit him in the shoulder.

"Good god I'm wounded by those skunks." He cried. He was however able to follow them, and on they went. The enemy were trying to mend the bridge, while now it was seen that the cavally was preparing to cross the stream at another point near a ford, in order to intercept the pursuers.

It happened to be a bright moonlight night, in which fugitives and pursuers could see plainly, and the little girls saw that the leader of the cavally was general poobhead. They felt sure he did not know when he was pursuing and so did not make anything of it. The cavally was rapidly gaining on the little girls, but starring opened fire first, bringing down poobheads horse and ten or other glandelinian soldiers fell. The little girls at once awaited the opportunity and jumped on the horses as they came upon their hiding place, and poobhead seeing them shouted:

"It's the vivian girls." After the man and the three boys fellows, but harm not the little girls or I'll shoot down every one of you in cold blood."

But to catch the man and three boys was out of the question, and as the little girls were mainly the fugitives poobhead refused to continue the chase, and later on resigned his command for reloading cian from Mal Manley.

The other pursuers continued on after the fugitives, and a squad of fleet glandelinian infantry men opened such a vigorous fire that every one of the fugitives horses were brought down, and before the little girls could rise to their feet, the glandelinians were upon them with fixed bayonet bayonets intending to run them through right there.

Starring and the three boyscouts alone had escaped the enemys withering fire and came suddenly upon the squad of glandelinians opening fire, shooting down three of them and disabling the rest.

Three of the little girls managed to get on starring's horse when a shot entered the horses flank, and he reared and plunged to the ground, throwing the four riders headlong. The glandelinians thought sure they had the fugitive christians that time but starring and the little girls having recovered took defense on a ledge of rocks, and opening a vigorous fire for several minutes checked their pursuers, with great loss and then resumed their flight across the plateau and soon started down the side of the hill, leaping from tree to tree.

They saw that glandelinians were swarming everywhere, but nevertheless the fugitives were soon out of range of the pursuers, and hurried toward the christians line.

It was the most exciting time violet and her sisters had in their lives, and as they were proceeding on three glandelinian soldiers rushed them, but starring brought them down with blows from his musket, breaking it over a mans skull. Again a score of glandelinians rushed him, and the little girls, but while starring struck right and left with his fist downing them like ten line, violet and her sisters shot many of the others down and got away.

They then proceeded on their flight, and no sooner had reached a thick line of bushes when in upon them rushed a glandelinian squad.

Starring handled these in good old style and took all their era cartridge bolts and a munition, and took their clothes all off and hung them on a scarecrow standing in a cornfield near by.

Seeing no more glandelinians in sight the fugitives proceeded on their way and after an hours traveling, they were startled by a sharp challenge "HALT WHO GOES THERE."

Suddenly again gray uniforms appeared, and starring grabbing three of the little girls and the rest following dived into a steep ravine, and ascended to the other side, with a swarm of yelling gray demons after them and firing volleys after volley, in an effort to bring down the three boys and violet and her sisters.

One of the boys received a bullet in the eye and dropped dead, but the rest just now were untouched. But the glandelinians were speedily gaining on them, and one of them rushing up ran to the second boy through the body with his bayonet, and tore him open alive. Starring enraged struggled frantically with him grasped the gun and ran the bayonet through him leaving the glandelinian soldier in the same condition he left the dying boy. Three other glandelinians rushed up, and straddled one of them had the other boy in his grasp strangling him till he was dead, but starring had shot down these glandelinians and then by creating confusion by the wildest firing they had ever put in violet and her sisters with starring got further away from their desperate pursuers.

Violet then recloved a bull in the leg and fell.

Damn those glandelinians." Hissed starring as he kicked her up in his arms and carried her with him. "He had seen the man who fired the shot and dropped him dead right on the spot."

"We are not far from the christian lines now, and can arouse them by keeping up a spirited fire for several minutes." Said starring. "We can hold our ground behind those ledge of rocks at the top of this ravine, and it is my purpose to shoot to kill."

They took shelter behind these rocks and awaited for the glandelinians to make the assault. But they did not do so. They knew violet and her sisters as well as they knew their A.B. and C. and so did not make an attack but instead started to make a maneuver firing heavily at the same time to prevent the little girls and their guardian from rising or from getting a chance to return their fire. Realizing that the pursuers were endeavoring to flank them starring and the little girls deserted their post cautiously and went to another section where it was evident they could surprise their flankers instead.

"We'll have to fight for it now." Said starring. "If those glandelinians succeed in capturing you little girls they'll murder you in the cruelest way possible to think of."

"They'll not get us alive." Said violet and her sisters with great determination. "We have plenty of ammunition and I can hold off any great number of assailants at this point."

"How many of them are there?" Asked violet who was reloading her pistols while alone had been on duty.

"There seems to be about a hundred of the glandelinians." Said starring. "And they are the fiercest glandelinian soldiers that I have ever seen in my life. Now they are children get ready and receive them."

The glandelinian soldiers unconscious that their fugitives had discovered their ruse, and changed their place were coming on cautiously but at leaps and rushes. Violet and her sisters kept cool and waited until the nearest squad was almost upon them, then opened fire bringing them all down at one volley.

The other glandelinians coming on behind were demoralized at this unexpected resistance, and retired as fast as they could, then after a lull of several minutes a man was seen looking around and he bore a white flag.

"Fire on him too if he comes too near," growled Starring.

"No-no let's see what he has to say," exclaimed violet. "We'd like to know just for curiosity."

The man came within hailing distance and Starring demanded;

"What do you want you dirty glandelinian skin skunk?"

"We demand you and the children to surrender," came back the answer.

"You have shown great resistance, but we have your escape cut off, and though you may have enough ammunition to down all of us, the rest of our comrades will hear the firing and come to our aid. So there is no escape for you spies and it's better to surrender immediately, than to have to pay the serious penalty for the loss you may inflict upon us glandelinians."

"You can go plumb to hell with your surrender demand," shouted Starring furiously. "It's fortunately you are not within range, or we would have fired on you in spite of your darn white flag."

"But you are fools," shouted the man in answer. "The vivian girls have held up Manley and robbed him of the most important plans, and are wanted as spies. There is no escape and you know it."

Starring realized this, but he also saw what the Glandelinians did not, a swarm of black objects approaching from the direction of the christian lines.

"I repeat that you can go to hell," shouted Starring. "You may overcome us and you may not. Bring on your whole army if you want to but we'll fight to the last and never surrender to an enemy of God. Go back to your dirty snakes and tell them I said so."

The flag bearer is retired and the firing was again resumed.

Desperate assaults were made, but without success, and it was realized that without reinforcements nothing could be done.

"Send for reinforcements," cried the Glandelinian leader.

"More reinforcements would do no good," said a sergeant. "Bring artillery and shell them out of their position."

"They will surely shell us," said Jennie. "If y those christian soldiers do not reach o us in time we are done for."

Starring calculated the distance and laughed.

"They'll be here before the reinforcements arrive," he said. "Just a keep on firing whether you hit a man or not." The more we fire, the more our situation will seem to be desperate and it will hasten them on."

As one of the glandelinians went off to get the reinforcements and artillery the glandelinians decided to make a desperate assault in force, and soon they came up swarming everywhere. Violet and her sisters kept up an incessant fire, bringing down man after man, but on came the survivors, leaping from tree to tree, from rock to rock, firing heavily in return, and though repulsed twice they went at it again, and indeed so furious was the firing that Starring was surprised to see indeed a large swarm of black objects drawing nearer and nearer, and still kept on coming, while a swarm was already near the besieged position.

During the next repulse or repulse there was a considerable lull and now the reinforcements arrived quicker than Starring thought, with six field pieces.

These guns were quickly primed and aimed, and then fired. Six shells exploded above the defense but the fugitives were unhurt. The glandelinians added by the reinforcements, then started another assault, while the artillery opened again, and this time the shells exploded dangerously near.

But this was the last. Below there started a wild pandemonium of firing, the Glandelinians retreated in haste, and up the hill swam a division of Abbeannians.

"By God its Starring and the vivian girls," gasped the Abbeannian leader.

"We thought it was a force of our men trapped by those glandelinians.

How came you to be trapped this way?"

Starring told the whole truth. He had also learned information and declared that it was Manley's purpose to hold the ridge as long as possible, and by putting in an imposing appearance make Evans believe his position was unassailable.

"But said Starring; 'An assault would in no time free those hills of Manley's whole glandelinian army. He has for fact receiving heavy reinforcements during the night, more troops are still coming to night and he expects more artillery. But a good hard attack would quickly displace his whole army. Violet and her sisters have also held up Manley and three of his chief generals and forced them to give up an important plan.'"

"You little vivian girls are certainly a marvel," said the Abbeannian general whose name was Francis Hendrie. "We Abbeannians have heard a great deal about your experiences and know what you can do. Would you allow me to see the plans or is it for Evans alone?"

"It's for Evans himself," said violet. "But we'll let you see it. Here it is." And she produced the plans.

The general and Starring looked at it by means of a strong flash light.

"Good God," cried Starring. "It's the worse plot that I have seen during the war: Violet and her sisters if it had not been for you this plans would have went into effect alright. You little girls have saved us from a defeat."

Violet and her sisters themselves had not soon the contents of the plans, and at their request they got it back and glanced over it."

As they studied it their faces almost blanched.

"Why it is lucky that we did this," said Jennie. "If we had not got this we could not have warned Evans. Starring will take it to him right away. We'll follow as soon as possible."

"Starring took the sheet of paper and started off, while violet and her sisters followed the Abbeannians back toward the lines. Starring reached general Evans headquarters in the pickiest time and was ushered into his presence, and immediately showed him the plans that the little girls had captured."

Evans examined it. It was a mad plan indeed indeed though in a code, and though he did not understand it, the Abbeannian general and Starring and the little girls had picked it out at the first glimpse, and Starring revealed the facts of the plans.

"Your excellency it was Manley's purpose as it is revealed on this map to hold these hills, and make a harassing front to deceive you so that you thinking the hills were impregnable would not attack. In the delay he could receive heavy reinforcements, under Pittens Riecherts, and then he would deceler by the rear way and made an assault upon your flank that would cause destruction to your army. General those positions are not one half as strong as they look, and if you don't get ahead of him you'll wish you had. He will I know attempt it no matter whether you discovered it or not, for he believes he'll never fail under any conditions."

"I see," said Evans. "I'll attack him to-morrow morning, and either make the fool retreat or destroy his whole army. I'd give anything thing to capture him anyway."

Fifteen minutes later violet and her sisters arrived, and were ushered before the great general.

"You little girls are certainly great children," said Evans taking three of them into his arms and hugging them tight. "It's too bad you little girls are not men. I'd have you promoted as generals for this night's deed. You have saved my army from being surprised."

"Yes and be my attempt it anyway," said violet. "He can succeed too Evans dear uncle as you attack him first. It's foolish to wait until it is too narrow too, for it may come too soon."

Evans held a short deliberation, examined the map and codeplans more carefully, and all his officers felt sure that the little girls were right. A desperate night attack on those hills and fortified positions would prevent the threatened disaster.

"There are lots of ravines for your men to take defense in in case of a repulse," said Hettie. "One of these saved us from capture, and she told of th her experience, and that of her sisters."

"I'll do it," said Evans. "Get the divisions formed for the attack." He added to his officers. "We'll make an attack on every possible position simultaneously."

Indeed Manley was so terribly furious over the capture of his important plans but nevertheless he was confident that the vivian girls could not get away and so decided to hold onto his position. But believing also that they would probably escape at that, he would at least expect an attack, and so massed his artillery on the crests of the hills, in their strongest numbers, and when the christian troops started forward, it was discovered that the hill crest teemed with cannons.

Word of this sudden discovery was sent back to general Evans who was then discovering the fact himself. To attack these batteries, without an artillery support was complete insanity, and so he ordered them not to attack until he could see further what could be done. He examined the positions with his field glasses, the situation of the enemy's position, and his own. He could not train any guns at these batteries, because his army was on low plains and the enemy had possession of hills.

Evans realized that Manley was wiser than it was supposed, that he had been outwitted again, and at first did not know what to do. Finally he hit upon a plan. Why not make a strong demonstration in front, and in the meanwhile send a large force around to the rear of the hills and take Manley in the flank? This he proposed to do. General Johnston was detailed to move to the rear of the hills under cover of the darkness, while Evans instructed the other officers to make a demonstration against the front of the batteries.

These commands were soon put in order, and unseen by the enemy Johnston was marching around the hills, to take him in flank.

Manley really had an impregnable position, and this made him overconfident that he could stop the mightiest armies with the fire of his parks of artillery. He boasted to his officers, that God himself with all the hosts in heaven could never drive him from his positions on the hills, and let alone the christian army under general Jack Evans.

Evans finally learning further orders, started the demonstration and this drew the attention of the enemy, and they depressed their artillery and started some incessant but disillory cannonading. Three hours passed and he was surprised, for no direct attack came from any point. In the meanwhile Johnston's army was marching nearer and nearer, and toward midnight had gone entirely around the hills, and were reforming into lines for the surprise attack they were to make. It took two hours for this formation, but finally they swept forward quietly, and crept like quiet mice up the hills. Up and up they went, and soon reached the crest.

"Johnston issued the command 'Charge' all the officers signalling it among their men, and in one big wave, and with terrific yells loud enough to arouse the dead the Abbleannians swept upon the rear of the infantry lines defending the batteries pouring in a murderous fire, that galled the whole line.

All at once there ensued a scene of lively confusion, another minute the Angolindians themselves were in possession of the guns, and within an hour's time the whole of Manley's army was driven from the hills, again his headquarters was captured, but no officers this time. So complete had been the surprise that Manley was bewildered. But learning that it was only Johnston's men who had taken possession of the hills, and that Evans was a mile off yet he decided to risk retake the hills.

He reformed his panic stricken army, and then as the expected reinforcements came up deployed his columns into three divisions and led them in person to the charge.

Johnston saw them coming and massed the captured artillery upon them while the infantry took position in the rear.

"Wait until they come within close range," was the order all along the line to the infantry men. The light artillery was also under the same instructions, but now the bigger guns opened up and tore gaps in the enemy's lines. But on and on came the survivors, and though they were galled, with their columns ripped to pieces, they reached the very summit.

The light artillery then let loose, followed by a terrific fire from the infantry. This was the finish. The first portion of the gray line melted away completely, the remainder, torn and tattered, recoiled and fled down in the greatest confusion. Manley deemed it proper to try another assault, but by the time he prepared fresh divisions for the attack the whole of Evans' army had reached the crest, and now it was already daylight. But in desperation Manley decided to recapture the position, and soon greater columns than before came sweeping up the hill firing furiously as they advanced. But it was in vain. Evans' whole line was unalike, ten charges the glandolindians made, but the whole line was swept with the most terrible carnage, for every charge, and finally Manley desisted the following evening, and the battle was over entirely.

Manley under cover of the darkness, and leaving a force to cover his retreat, started away toward the south. Such resistance did the covering party give that Evans was delayed for some time in his advance but by the next morning, he was able to follow, and the whole christian army started after Manley.

This battle had indeed been a desperate one raging four days, in five serious conflicts, with the enemy disastrously beaten in every battle. Manley's whole army had been crushed five times, and now with what he had of his army he was compelled to retreat. He saw that it was folly to attempt to invade the christian country, that he must do all in his power to repel the coming invasion of his own country. So southward he recoiled, and Evans followed hard after him.

The entire total losses of both sides in this battle was never less than horrible numbers of slain glandolindians had been left unburied by the Angolindians who deemed it an insult to bury such child like

The glandolindian invasion now was broken forever, the whole two countries were under submission, all glandolindian armies were fast being driven out and the world was rejoicing over the fact, that soon the whole storm of war will soon be put down, and the glandolindians placed completely under submission. Violet and her sisters felt happier over the results of the battle and were glad to know that once again the attempts of the enemy had been frustrated.

THE BATTLE OF DROPHIA.....

Simultaneously to this a fearful battle raged at Drophia between the Manley's armies, who were attacking general Hanson's army went along the boundary line. Throughout the phase of the battle fighting went on with various successes all along the line, from the Drophia end to the McWhirther Rain. The McWhirther wood near the city of Drophia itself was the scene of many violent engagements. The sixth division of Abbleannians, and the ninth corps were constantly at deadly grips with the enemy who made the most violent onslaughts that they could muster. All along the line the enemy was incessantly active, hurling one tremendous onslaught after another with all their might and main, and what at first worried the christian li generals was the gap made between the 1th Abbleannian, and the 16th goncentinian and Angolindian corps at the creek to the north of Drophia where the firing made a scene like some terrific inferno. It is not too much to say that only by the display of the greatest gallantry, and endurance on the part of the three divisions of Angolindians and other christian troops engaged at that point against uneven odds, was the enemy prevented from getting dangerously near Hanson's communications, and that they were prevented from carrying the christian line at that point.

During one of the greatest phases of the battle came the arrest of the frightful glandolindian onslaught on the chiall gun, and the brilliant repulse of the enemy along the extreme right, by the cowardly under Jennings and artillery and infantry under Good Heart. The greatest features of this part of the battle was the desperate assaults made against the main christian center, in which the flower of the glandolindian army participated, having received Manley's command to make certain of finally breaking the christian line. An attack on a great scale had been in duration, on the part of Hanson's center had been heavily pressed and was losing ground, that the position was heavily swelled and that a most powerful attack was going on all along the line.

In short during this battle Abraham Manley had delivered his final desperate blow, which Hanson met with the same grim determination, steadfast courage and skillful forethought, which had characterized his handlings of the operations throughout the war. A volume could be written to describe this battle in all its detail.

During the afternoon of the battle and upon the christian left came the first main tremendous onslaught, and at the first clash of arms the glandolindians pierced the christian lines with a headlong rush, but finally this position was splendidly disputed by the Abbleannians under Hanson's devoted and gallant leader who was killed, while the division was almost annihilated. Reserves however quickly came up, desperate counter attacks were made in full force, and the line was reestablished. About three o'clock the critical point changed to the right of the christian wing, where a portion of the Abbleannian force after most desperate fighting were driven out of their trenches, and fell back to the north.

General Pillow, called on the first corps for support which arrived. The heavy fighting all along this point had used up most of his reserves and the enemy were still clinging to the woods in that a part of the christian line, and directing renewed successes during their continued attacks, but in spite of this general Hanson was able to render the Abbleannians sufficient to enable them to make a little headway, though for a time the situation at this point of the line, was doubtful and caused anxiety all day.

About half past three in the afternoon the attacks had subsided to great violence, and though it was thrown back mainly by the artillery and cavalry fire of the Christians, the severe fighting went on until midnight and then through portions of the Christian line was broken. It held, and finally the army, who had been heavily killed with million men.

In this battle the Christian losses were about 5,078,733. The Christian losses were, 7,234,567.

THE DRAFT AND ROUT.

In the month the address of general Evans army was very swift and with the greatest energy. It was Evans for good to press Stanley down across the boundary line of Glandelinian and Antheidia, and begin the invasion himself, and to be the first one to do so. Stanley was the purpose of Evans however, and resisted him in series of skirmishes all the time of the retreat but all his desperate efforts could not stop Evans. Then he sent out troops may arrest the Christian race to the Antheidia side, but it did not and even when during a Glandelinian raid, one of Evans' men was captured, it was taken during a great skirmish. Stanley was a Glandelinian and did not know what to do. He nevertheless sent word by notes and telegraph to the Glandelinian king that the army had lost that the Christians were pressing him hard, and that Evans was closer to the boundary line than any of the other Christian armies.

Then King Glandelin heard this unfortunate news, he decided to start a draft of men to fill the vacant ranks of the army. The king indeed found it necessary to pass a law authorizing the government to recruit the army from a draft of all able-bodied adult citizens, of all ages outside of children. In consequence of this order, a frightful number of men did not await the draft, but because many of them were refused in enlistment, out on account of defects started the worst kind of a riot in the Glandelinian history, which lasted three days in every city of Glandelinia, but which was finally put down by the police and with the aid of armed citizens and soldiers, but after it was quieted, about 234,578 persons were killed in the country, mostly among the rioters. The latter began by burning the houses where the provincial marshals had their offices. The fire often extended much further. Great numbers of rioters were arrested, tried and sentenced to years of imprisonment.

The king had a famous proclamation ordering into the field all men between the ages of seventeen to any old age as long as they could fight, to serve if the king ordered that four years, and if they refused to report the lawless they were to be treated as traitors and deserters, from the Glandelinian army, and to suffer the penalty of being shot, according to military law, and was the contents of the papers as in that when willing to go they were collected for night defense, and then the cause of the rioting.

Evans had heard of the rioting on account of the relations from the draft and at first was worried, for this indeed showed the serious disposition of the Glandelinians to rise in for fearfully and he felt all the Christian armies should on invasion start. He knew of all the Christian generals with their various armies heard of the middle of draft law, and the number of the army of Evans stayed at home all this time looking against the Christian invasion which was threatening, and that he decided to obtain information of how many were Glandelinian.

Violent and her sisters volunteered for this dangerous duty. But Evans would not allow them to do so under any conditions, and sent the best selected an secret army to the Glandelinian coast, where the Glandelinians were also watching every movement of the Christian army, ready to predict a warning to the king or the first Glandelinian armies as soon as the Christian army started across the boundary line. The Angolitan coast service saw many of the navy returned, but there were none of them successful in obtaining the information desired, and these came back a week after the rioting in Glandelinia had been suppressed, and gave Jack Evans all the information they had learned. It was known that millions of men from every city and town, no matter what their age as long as they could fight, had either volunteered themselves to the draft, or had enlisted, and that the French army numbered about 500,000,000. These armies of numbers though not yet completely in their full were already organized in many separate units, the majority going to the defense of the fortifications of Tlanta Fair, and the former garrison was numbered 31,567,777 now numbered 100,000,000.

Evans received more information than expected, and finally learned that general Federal of the Florida Battle, with black troops were withdrawn from their command of the field armies, and put in command of the garrison of the Tlanta Fair fortifications. Evans at once forwarded the warning by wireless telegraph to all the Christian generals in those areas in the location, and then sent in his final warning to general Hanson, himself, and requested advice about the movements of all the Christian divisions under his personal command.

Evans then turned general King Cannon of the uprising of Glandelinia stating this:

"It is the purpose your excellency of the Glandelinian king to throw to all the men he can to suppress the intended invasion, even draft the men of any age as long as they are able to fight, from the ages of twelve, to men of ninety years old if able to fight. His call was for an army of five hundred million, but it seems from reports that I have received that it will be three times that number of a few months. Even fools as they are Glandelinians would be sacrificing the nation as well by cutting off their hair and joining the Glandelinian ranks as soldiers, and there is a cloud of bloody resistance starting up in the face. The garrison of Tlanta Fair was over 30,000,000 now it is increasing from 100,000,000 to 234,567,666 men and additional artillery of long range guns, and series upon series of batteries of every make. The whole Glandelinian navy is also concentrating at the place too. It is my purpose at Hanson's desire to start the invasion only after our divisional armies are reinforced. The Angolitan congress must issue a call for more additional reinforcements, and if the inhabitants are not drawing troops quick enough we'll pass a draft law ourselves.

Yours truly, General Jack
Ambrose Evans."

THE BATTLE OF TIENTIA

In the month while Evans was sending in these reports, a strong force of Glandelinians under general Bruno Angle had arrived within his long distance of general Evans army which had halted at Tientia after pursuing Stanley's broken army for over a week, and after contracting his lines the Glandelinian general surprised Evans' army completely by making a desperate assault upon his whole line. Violent and her sisters had observed the advances of these fiercest of Glandelinians, the Zibner brothers, and have had warned the nearest Christian generals just before the storm broke. Evans who had been been sending the report to King Cannon was surprised first by hearing queer whistle like noises, and then the loud prolonged roar of cannon and the crash of musketry, and within a few minutes he realized that a fearful assault was made upon his lines.

However so fearful was the driving onslaught of the fierce Zibner brothers that the left grand division of Evans right wing was rolled up for ten miles in two hours, and the foe were about to carry the work and position of the entire wing, when he became apprised of the disaster. He had been warning all of the Christian generals to watch out that new forces of Glandelinians did not strike them a sudden blow, and he was struck suddenly himself and without warning.

Howe however he was not unprepared and learning where Glandelinians, they were not a new force, but a division of Evans' army that had been separated by the Florida disaster he decided to show Bruno Angle something of the line of fighting. Evans had heavy reserve forces at hand and these were thrown upon the assailant Glandelinians who after marvellous fighting of four hours was finally driven back but general Winnetta in this horrible slaughter was killed dangerously wounded, and ten of his best generals were killed. The Zibner brothers left a horrible number of their slain within and outside the Christian works after they were pressed back into an open and distant.

In the months along the Christian Center the assault still went on with the most frightful fury that I could never relate and only to imagine it or realize it would be to witness it. The gladiolians came on like a howling warrending mob, moving in a terrific fire of musketry as they advanced, but in that and charge, they exacted a fearful toll of officers and men, and only when their lines were almost torn to shreds did a portion of it give way. At the first sign of the enemy fire receding, the Christian line swept forward, under cover of the fire of their cannons, and pressed to the charge with the fury of an avalanche almost destroying the gladiolian center before the firing ceased.

The left wing of general Evans line was more heavily assaulted, and though repulsed with the heaviest losses, the glandairians returned to the attack ten times with night and rain, and though their whole line was torn ripped up and ploughed through and through with the heaviest storm of shells bullets and canister, they carried the whole position and drove the christians back for the distance of thirty miles.

On the left wing. The battle on that day ended with the advantage of the enemy. On the next morning the enemy concentrated three quarters of his reserve forces again against those excellent gladiators. "The battle here that full morning was frightful. Both sides, charged back and forth, tearing each other fairly to pieces with their merciless fire of artillery, but finally toward noon the enemy were forced back all along the line to their own works which was assaulted, and resulted in the bloody remnant of the Christians.

At the other two wings there was no engagement as yet.

Evans now edgewise Hanson of the affair at Messina decided to strike a final blow and at two o'clock he sent forward the greatest waves of men to storm the whole Albanian line. The battle was renewed with the most terrific terrific fury, the reinforced glandellian center was again almost destroyed, and the whole line badly jeopardized. But for a time it seemed to Evans as if the works could not be forced.

3 But he saw a way to do it. By concentrating attack after attack along the three wings without cessation, Evans sent a large force around to the rear of the enemy who struck str ck their flank at about half past five in the eve evening.

The battle now was over. The whole gladiolinian army was fairly cut to pieces and scattered in all directions Bruno Anglemas killed, and thirty three generals with him with fairly eight were wounded many mortally. Evans knew it had been the purpose of Bruno Angle to cover the retreat of general general John Manley thus the reason of the attack. General Mendro, a civilian who took Bruno's place rallied the scattered forces at night, and commenced an orderly retreat. The battle was a christian victory, but nevertheless it did not benefit Evans any as the delay had enabled general John Manley to escape and enraged Evans decided to destroy Bruno's army and so pressed the gladiolinians hard, the christian cavalry racing in three directions and covering two hundred miles in a days time, that noon Mendro, a civilian army was surrounded, and three days after the battle he decided the best thing of all was to surrender of the maddened christians would annihilate his armies.

As Evans prepared to attack, he saw a white flag approaching, and finding out the cause, inquired the reason of the concentration of Glandelinian troops. He was told by the flag bearer that Hendrovirian wishes to surrender his army to save the remainder of the troops. As these glandelinians had taken a great share in the horrible gintergarden massacre, Evans was on the point of refusing a surrender as it had been his purpose of destroying the army, but the little girls who were with him begged him not to massacre the survivors, and so he did not, and there surrendered to him over 14,000,000 glandelinians, while the same number had fallen in the two days battle itself. The other 56,000,000 had gotten away, during the night and was safely across the Glandelinian boundary, having deserted Hendro before he got surrounded. But they were in a jeopardized condition as they were leaderless and so were sought by the advance of general John Pantagon army so they could join him. he whole glandelinian loss thus in fallen and prisoners was 34,719,999 while the christina loss in killed and wounded and prisoners was 10,000,000.

Yuma knew of the violation of the glandelinian arm which had encamped and as such as possible, furnished his delar orders, located a group after the night capturing the all, and as without number, to the surprise of the glandelinian command, he was across the border in full pursuit.
Violat and her advisors realized him of his previous and orders, but he said:

"It's good of you little girls to have told me of our date, but now to me you would mean disaster. I'll sent to orders for 'a luncheon to begin and before Henry of ... later to me."

In the month of the conquest of Angaitza, Abidennaba, and galvarita had issued a call for more troops, and within a week after the battle of "Guanajuato" in a Mexican restored word that no draft was needed, and that he could start the formation any time he wished. He had not as yet restored from his rest but soon he did which was as follows:

"Your excellency" general Dumont

I have had a struggle of democratic character with Bruno Augier, "landlordism" at Maudslayi, and defeated the foe with the loss of their main leader, and the surrender of general Mervin vladim with over 10,000,000 men. The remainder of the gladiolitus army must have occupied by deserting Mervin, and crossing the border, and though I gave orders that the invasion must be delayed for reinforcements, and no have forgotten myself and desiring to emphasize this force before it began (must have started) the invasion without short notice. To return back now is disastrous and so I have signalled all the generals of the various other christian armies to follow as fast as they can. If it is probable I would like you to make a function with me at Kinet, and we will begin a move on Twa Tawakirango. The invasion now is on and the names we wish the instruments of gladiolitus the better.

General Jack Ambrose Evans. " " " " "

Evans is deeply impressed on his advance and invasion heading in particular for the town of Elkhart but not out to general Evans' large glacially-borne force under general Theodore VanLueven was always to intercept him. Evans soon however learned of the threatening atom in that location and as soon as he reached the town he concentrated his whole army and admitted the approach of this new force of glacially-borne guns.

They came on the day of ~~the~~^{the} sixteenth, and even drawing a detachment as well all along the line prepared to meet it.
"Farrington Vanhooker" made the idea of the Christian army under General Jack Ashmore "You all not dare attack" but, but even grow impatient of waiting and decided to attack the Christians himself.

THE FOLLOWING, CARRIAGE AT KIDNEY.
PAVING TO BEHOLD.

Ferns started the battle by throwing his colonial forces forward in a tremendous onslaught against the left wing of the Lundinlinian army, and though he could once be viewed as finally throwing the Lundinlinian troops into the wildest confusion by taking a vigorous turn about. A serious disaster occurred to the Lundinlinian along this section despite the arrival of Hunsdon's Lundinlinian division, which tried frantically to halt the Christian advance in this direction, but this Lundinlinian division after the most savage fighting of four hours was thrown back crushed to pieces, and with the death of their commander Hunsdon.

When their concentration his heaviest forces made fourteen desperate attacks on the gladiolusian center, and seventeen forces under Jiminas attacked the right, throwing their Abideamun forces forward, in one column a far smaller one immediately on the storm waves of the sea behind the broken breakwaters.

As the gladiolians concentrated in the front numbers the battle became very very severe all along the line, and panasonic gladiolians clashing against the christians under panasonic federal suffered such terrible loss that they had to give way and in the end as the christians rushed over the works, the commanders of both sides fell dead simultaneously.

The left grand center of the glandelinian right wing was radically cut up and thrown into a pandemonium of confusion, the Angolinites sweeping forward like a tidal wave, and hundreds of generals in that end charge on the christian side fell dead and wounded, while the glandelinian generals the soldiers fell in great numbers, wounded and bleeding, in their efforts to rally their panic-stricken columns. Van Duron sent large columns under Federal Johnston, to the rescue, and these after serious resistance managed to check a portion of the christian line, but where the christians were halted their whole front dissolved into flame and smoke the christians pouring upon the glandelinians a simultaneous barrage fire of musketry, and thus they continued steadily for four hours, and though Johnston's force was torn to pieces, their shattered columns rallied again and again, and would have won the field and recovered their lost position had not Johnston fallen mortally wounded, his horse being blown to atoms by three shell explosion simultaneously at the same spot, and as the Angolinites reforming their line made a tremendous rush yelling like demons toward the salvage, the whole of Johnston's line, with the loss of all their general officers, was cut to pieces and routed in the worse confusion ever, and scattered very widely, and hundreds of thousands of these glandelinians fell into the hands of the christians as prisoners.....

Horrible was the firing on both sides along the left of the glandelinian army which being reinforced by Van Duron gave the fiercest resistance Evans ever witnessed. The battle had now extended over a front of four hundred miles, and the firing of cannons within an hour had spread worse desolation over a space of four hundred miles, than the firing had committed during the great battle of Francis-Atlanta.

Whole columns of Angolinites and Angolinites were laid low by the curtain storm of glandelinian artillery and shell fire, and the din could be heard throughout the whole country of Angolinites, the battle being fought fifty miles away from the boundary line of Angolinites and glandelinians, and Hanson who was advancing with his army hearing it wondered what was going on.

After a short lull in the frightful strife, the Abbieannians entered for the desperate effort on the left, which had repulsed them, and again went to it with might and main, the desperate christian onslaught this time being covered by all of the available christian batteries, to which the enemy replied with titan threes, making a third fiery world of ammunition, and half of the glandelinian batteries were mowed with horrible effect upon the christian assailants.

Incappable damage was done by the glandelinian cannon fire division after division of the christians being fairly shot to pieces, and columns after columns were torn into flying fragments, and even mangled whole armies thrown against the left. Finally as the firing was added by musketry the whole assaulting christian line was torn through and through, and as the christians returned a musketry fire of the greatest intensity of a battle before, the glandelinians screaming, and raising their "Devil Yell" came rushing forward with the most tremendous fury to make a terrible counter charge.

On they came with fearful violence, the left grand division of the christian right being banded and buckled back, but it held, and Evans concentrating heavier columns, cut the glandelinian wave to pieces, threw the surviving columns into confusion, and resulting the desperate dash in which millions were shot down, the christians were in possession of the glandelinian works and artillery, and general Van Duron's headquarters.

Evans center however on account of the smashing up of general Granthorpe and Francis Johnston's armies of christians had failed to continue their advance the enemy line all along the line at this point had held as firm as a rock, the right and center of the extreme christian center was soon turned and exposed to a blasting artillery and musketry inflame inflame, and the two wings threatened with annihilation were compelled to withdraw from the assault, the glandelinians followed in a terrific charge, and rolled them back to their own works in the greatest confusion.

This charge of the glandelinians was the maddest of all, and took four hours of heavy shelling, and musketry firing to even check it and then two hours more to haul the survivors back.

Then to make it worse the glandelinians came on once more with redoubled fury, the christian center was forced from the works with great loss, and Stanley's main division came up with a part of Evans reserves all in his power to star this second glandelinian onslaught which was more silder than the first, but in the seething storm of carnage he fell mortally wounded all of his officers were dead or wounded, and his depleted forces after standing ground and repulsing thirteen savage onslaughts, a million glandelinians being killed and wounded in each onslaught, this christian force finally donep compelled the enemy to give way, and only managed to press them back slowly. It took another four hours to repulse this most tremendous onslaught of any battle in the war. It was more violent than any one of the worse onslaughts at Glorinda. The uproar of firing during this part of the struggle had been something terrible, sounding like thrills of cannon all that time, the glandelinian and Angolinites on country vibrating with the din and concussion for the distance of two thousand miles.

In the meantime the battle had lulled along the glandelinian center after a repulse suffered by the christians, and then again the Abbieannians yelling their loudest came sweeping forward with a speed of men racers on the track. This charge was covered by artillery fire of greater fury than ever, the shell shells bounding seemingly everything to pieces, but the glandelinians concentrated at their works kept side by side in the greatest masses, hurling back the christian onslaught with stupendous loss, shattering their columns by the score, but though men died by thousands per minute the remainder of the christian assaulting wave continued to rush on, the glandelinians at this point fighting to the last in this fiery storm of battle, but finally their line was swept and torn to pieces, and the christians carried the war whole position and drove them back. The glandelinians then swept forward in a desperate counter assault only to be swept back and vanquished with the most terrific slaughter. Millions of glandelinian horsemen rode against the glandelinian assailants, the christian cannon mowing down soldiers in the most frightful numbers, and they lay in monstrous windrows. The whole glandelinian right wing was compelled to give way before the tremendous christian onslaught the very heavens appearing to burst into flames, from the fury of the firing. As the glandelinians returned to the assault with redoubled fury, and fighting with all their might, the christian infantry was galled beyond repairs and thrown back, but the christians who had the artillery in their possession poured a storm of death and destruction upon the assailants as they came within range, the firing went on to be ablaze the whole christian line was hidden in clouds of smoke, the woods seemed to be on fire, the explosions tearing the living garments into the air, seeming to whither everything, and so terrific became the din that many of the soldiers lost their hearing for life.

Again and again, and still again, the glandelinians pressed forward to the counter charge like a series of shattering storm waves, but the Angolinites were reinforced by other portions of the main body, and these not the assailants bravely, the Abbieannian horsemen making a tremendous dash in which within four hours they had captured and killed and injured over 10,000,000 glandelinians, horrible losses indeed. The main body of the glandelinians however still remained firm, headless of the storm of christian artillery which cut down multitudes of their comrades as the harvester would the wheat, and despite their repulses returned to the charge with such fury that it was evident to the christian commanders that they would not be able to hold the captured positions under any conditions.

General Van Duron being bound to force back the christian troops started a general concentration which was in full swing late in the afternoon. But this gigantic attack though it drove the christians from the works, and rolled them up back to their own positions was useless in the efforts to force the main christian line. Fourteen onslaughts were made in quick succession only to be cut down, and the foe were compelled to withdraw.

THE CONCLUSION OF THE TERRIBLE BATTLE.

It seemed as if the next great glandelinian onslaught had the power of the oceanic fury after lashed by a million hurricanes, sweeping on like a gigantic surging tide. The main right wing of Evans extreme center was wiped out, by the torrent of glandelinian onslaughts, Stanley Smith who came up with fresh divisions was killed, and his army disorganized, Granthorpe the main commander fell mortally wounded, McWhirther Hanson was killed and a hundred other generals were killed or wounded. A great portion of the right wing was also shattered and swept back in confusion.

General Evans having the remainder of his reserve forces close at hand ordered them forward, and crashed the right of this great tidal wave of glandelinians after being in titan threes with it for four hours. At seven other points of the christian line during the frightful onslaught the glandelinians about 70,000,000 in number crushed themselves badly against Evans whole line the result of a horrible maelstrom of men down, and general generals Gallitide, McWhirther Hanson, Colledge and Stanley, on the side of

Christianians were mortally wounded, the Glandelinians killed were soon swept into a sea of death and destruction, and were only rescued with the last frightful losses after the onslaught which was fiercer than that of the greatest tidal wave, and swept the Christian line like the wind does in tearing up a town in a tornado-storm. Another man standing Christian general Sedwick Hanson was killed, for a time the field had been in the possession of the enemy, and it was all that general Evans could do to restore the line of battle, where these series of terrible tragedies occurred. It was the coolness of general Evans and his commanders that enabled the Christians to hold their ground against such great odds, until the reserves came to the support and repulsed the assailants at every point toward nightfall.

It had been a terrible punishment to general Evans, for he had expected to vanquish general Tamerline Van Guren with difficulty and the battle had really ended as a draw with a slight advantage to the enemy. To risk another engagement with such a strong force of the old time Glandelinians would be fatal and in the night Evans withdrew his army from Kibbet and retreated to the ridges of Santa Anna plains, where he threw up such an impenetrable position that the enemy did not dare to attack on the morrow. They made some destruction, and that was all.

General Van Guren in his reports to King Glandelin stated thus:

"Your excellency;

Have had a severe engagement with the Christians under Evans at Kibbet and won some advantage than checking his headlong advance into Glawie. Many losses are heavy but I dare not predict them though I lost over 30,755,000 men in prisoners. Have hope as I'm sure to beat him again.

General Tamerline Van Guren."

The Christian losses in killed and wounded during this one days engagement was 13,755,999 in killed and wounded, and 13,375,594 in prisoners. Evans was bitterly disappointed over his failure in crushing the enemy, and so was Violet and her sisters who had not expected this at all. This was however only a forewarning how seriously the Christian invasion was going to be resisted. Any battles would have to be forced yet before even Titanic Fair could be reached.

Later on Evans had learned that Van Guren having been reinforced by a new army twice his size, and that these were being sent to intercept Hanson immediately sent him a warning by this report:

"Your excellency, general Hanson given;

"I have had a very serious engagement at Kibbet and have been worsted. Tamerline Van Guren is sending heavy forces to intercept you. Do not proceed toward my location as yet and be on your guard. We expect the fiercest resistance for our invasion as the battle at Kibbet testified. I lost very heavy, and the enemy are ever increasing in force. So be on your guard. I will notify the other Christian armies to hurry on and not delay a minute.

General Jack Ambrose Evans."

This he did, and Evans daily strengthened by his position on the hills and the developments. But the enemy made no move toward him, but kept his distance and Evans was worried that some traitor or treacherous was at hand. Violet and her sisters were given the best place in his headquarters on the highest and most elevated of the hills, and heavy guards placed all around, to prevent any surprises. Fortunately however, Violet and her sisters had not witnessed any of the battle, but they had heard a good deal about its horrible horror, and for the enemy it had almost become another grandis-Atlanta in their losses. His losses were heavier than the Glandelinian losses at Logan Zoo Race, being 30,756,998 in total in killed wounded alone. The Christian losses were trifling to this indeed.

In accounts about the battle to the Christian generals of the other armies which he warned Evans layed the blame of his defeat to the terrible loss of so many Christian generals whose fall every the three large divisions of Christian troops into such confusion that they could not be rallied in time to prevent a disaster which occurred so many times.

The despair of all the enemy did not do them it prudent to retreat and so they kept themselves strongly entrenched in front of the fortified ridges expecting in vain for Evans to renew the fighting. General Evans did not do so it wise to do so, and he wondered what was to do to be done anyhow.... Violet and her sisters had proposed to go and spy on the Glandelinians, and find out their full intentions, but general Evans knew the character of the Glandelinian general whose name was Tamerline, Van Guren and did not allow them to do anything of the kind....

They begged and intreated but in vain he refused. However Evans realized that something must be done to find out the intentions of the enemy and so after much argument, he decided to send the little girls in the most perfect disguise possible, and did so.... As soon as the little girls started out, he warned them to be especially careful telling them to avoid capture under any conditions, for Tamerline was worse than any of the three Tanleys, and would be glad to bear them in pieces.

Violet and her sisters were escorted down the hill by a large troop of boy scout soldiers, and then they started off in the direction of the enemy lines. Violet and her sisters proposed to have a fake prisoner with them, and so as one of the soldiers volunteered to act as one, they accepted him, and after an hours riding they reached the first entry line of the large Glandelinian camp. They were challenged by the sentries but as they had a purple coat with them, it was believed that the children were Glandelinian boy scouts who had captured an Angelindian and so they were admitted into the lines.

Some of the soldiers had proposed to take some of the first prisoner with them but Violet and her sisters refused saying that they had captured him, and that it was their purpose to bring him to general Van Guren himself. As soon as the coast was clear Violet said to the prisoner or supposed prisoner:

"Did you bring some wire along with you for a wireless signal station which I intended to have you make."

"I have just the very thing little girls." Whispered the man spy. "I will climb this nearest tree, and what you learn you can signal to me and I'll send it to the general by wireless."

The little girls gave him some directions as to where he would see their signal, and then they proceeded toward the headquarters of this ferocious Glandelinian general.

They were not known by the guards fortunately, and were readily admitted, but now they had to make sure that the Glandelinian general did not know or see them for he had read the cleverest disguises of any spy, and may betray them also. They crept from room to room, and soon reached a large dining room, where they saw the general with his staff grouped among other officers, and all standing or sitting, and smoking cigarettes....

After some difficulty they managed to crawl under the table and prepared to listen to the information, which they knew must have been in conversation for some time.

"This is what they heard first from Tamerline;

"I tell you all I was indeed surprised by the way I won that tremendous battle at Kibbet. I did not know that I could have done it, and don't see how I could have done it. It was my main purpose to stand in the way of the Christian army and general Jack Ambrose A Evans and check its advance so that John Tanley could get entirely away, and be joined by the forces which had been leaderless. But I would a smart victory at that. But the question is how to remove him out of his strong position on those Santa Anna plains hills. It seems impossible."

"It is impossible and the only way to do it would be by besieging him." Answered general Wellington. "We could do it by assault probably but all depends on the advance of Hanson, and as it would take a weeks fight to force him out of the position we could not do it in time before Hanson arrived."

"But you're mistaken in that line." A glad general Van Guren. "My spy secured the code of telegraphing which told that Evans had told Hanson not to advance his way. Why boys it's easy as Hanson will never come and we would have a fine chance to break up Evans who whole time and drive him out of Glandelinia or force him to surrender."

And he went into long details of how he captured the code. Thus Hanson unfortunately to the Glandelinians did not receive Evans message at all and was advancing for Kibbet at full double time, and was already within three miles of Evans army.

"If we could capture the two children called Violet and her sisters or what?" Said general Gandonom....

"But it's pretty difficult to capture them," said general Garnet. "They are perfect wildcats when cornered, and know how to shoot like the devil. They can shoot down every man they aim at and never miss a hit."

"But if we could draw them into an ambush it would be all right," said Van Buren. "Then we could shoot them all down. If the Yvian girls are done away with Evans would be so heart broken that he would abandon the invasion."

"We'd receive no quarter you mean," said general Frank Percy. "It would make Evans so furious that in case he surrounded us he'd butcher us all. We indeed for my part I'll not molest the children no matter what reason. Not for pity or mercy but for our own safety. It's as dangerous as diving into a lake of molten lava."

Violet and her sisters deciding that they had heard enough of the plot crept out of their hiding places, and leaving the room unobserved, managed also to leave the building undiscovered, and finally reaching the tree nearest to the one the man had ascended, signalled to him what they had learned, and he finally got within communication with the Christian line, and reported the whole thing to Evans. Then the little girls and the man descended the trees and the soldier having disguised himself as a lieutenant proceeded to leave the lines, having a fake pass with him.

It was the most daring interprise, and they effected it without discovery or discovery; and even left the lines without questioning, and crept it and safely reached the Christian lines. Evans having received the warning at once started to sin la to Hanson not to delay but to come to his aid right away, telling of his order which had been discovered by the enemy. Evans soon was surprised by this answer:

"My loving Friend Jack Evans.

Have received no advice from you or any report of any battle at Kibnet and so have not continued my advance and am still in the hills of your own lines and have double tried my army hourly the full march. It's fortunate for you Dear Evans that your report at that time did not reach me as I would have forthwith delayed in my advance, and you probably would have been or shed and driven out of Glandolain. Will reach you tomorrow morning."

GENERAL HANSON.

Ele. Evans was indeed surprised at this news, and advised Hanson to join him as soon as possible giving full directions to where he was entrenched, and that the little girls were expecting him. Little Francis Smith and Lillian had been with Evans when he received the surprising news, and hastened themselves to tell Violet and her sisters.

"It is good of you two little girls to tell us," said Violet. "And we are very thankful but in fact we forgot to tell Evans ourselves. We learned this first when spying on the enemy. We had intentions to go and meet him but were warned by the Christian generals not to do so as it is dangerous to leave the lines for a great distance while in the enemy's country. So we expect him tomorrow. But how did you two little girls learn of this?"

"From Evans," said Lillian. "Hanson stated that he expects to join him tomorrow and is already three miles away, having halted to rest his weary troops. If not needing to tell he could have reached us sooner."

If he is that near we'll take the chance to go and see him," said Violet defiantly. "We will not leave just for no dirty Glandolain butcher."

Violet and her sisters readily told Evans of their purpose, requesting a strong cavalry escort. Evans readily granted the request sending with them 23,456 cavalry men armed to the teeth.

At nine o'clock at night the little girls and themselves started out with the strong escort. They learned at where the new Christian force was but were not so headed in that direction. However nothing serious happened and after while for several miles, Violet and her sisters and the very cavalry troops were surrounded by a considerable force of men in strange and forms and demanded to surrender.

"You will never take an Angelinian alive with those little girls," said the Christian leader. "You draw your swords and prepare to fight."

"Oh excuse me," said Van Buren with sudden interjection. "We thought you were Glandolians as you are wearing their uniforms. We thought you had captured the Yvian girls." "We are sure of Hanson now. You have literally passed the sentries and rode right into the heart of the Christian lines. Did you not encounter any action on the way?"

It was realized now as the moon came out that the words he captured were Abdonianians in criminal uniforms and soon there was a hearty conversation among them all while Violet and her sisters were led toward general Hanson's headquarters tent.

One of the men going in and saluting said: "Your excellency we have captured a large swarm of prisoners, eight of whom are the prettiest children seen. Come out and see them." Hanson not knowing what the joke was came out. There stood before him his best of friends.

"Why they are my nation," he cried. "You men made a mistake." "Yes at first we did," said the spokesman as Hanson folded them one by one in his strong arms. "We mistook their escorts for Glandolians who had captured them, and surrounding them had decided their surrender when they revealed who they really were. No doubt they intended to bring the children to Kibnet and having to pass through a treacherous region disguised themselves as Glandolians. So we have loved them so."

Violet and her sisters told general Hanson of Evans' great fight at Kibnet and how it turned out.

"Van Buren is a fierce fighter," said Hanson. "I'll have you little girls to telegraph to Evans that he is to descend from the hills tomorrow and take Tuerline. Van Buren enjoys his furiously. And I'll in the meantime join in with a part of my forces and strike Tuerline in the rear with the rest."

Violet and her sisters telegraphed this order, and receiving an answer told Hanson that the order would be carried out.

THE BATTLE OF SANTA ANA CLAUSE RIDGE.....

Evans decided to follow out Hanson's advice and orders as soon as possible but in the meantime general Tuerline Van Buren did not know of Hanson's near approach and decided to attack Evans right away. So as soon as the first dawn of day appeared he sent his forces forward, and for four long hours Evans' whole line had been heavily assaulted, but without success and then when a general repulse came Evans moved on to assault the enemy himself when Hanson sent him a warning that on account of the enemy attacking him he did not see it wise to take a move of that sort as yet as he was not able to cross into the enemy's country quick enough on account of bad roads. So Evans had been fighting the enemy himself all day long, a portion of his line was once almost driven from the hill, and Evans had suffered the capture of and burning of his grand headquarters. During the wild onrush of the enemy, Violet and her sisters who had remained Evans had been at the headquarters at the time and narrowly escaped assassination.

At the moment the enemy swarmed over the Christian works at this section Violet and her sisters had observed the wild approach of the Glandolain storm and fled but as they reached a wood the enemy gaining nearer had opened a withering fire and the little girls had darted behind the trees just in time and after the repulse Violet and her sisters counted three hundred holes of mine in each of three trees stood behind. What a narrow escape indeed. Indeed they had witnessed the burning of Evans' headquarters, and had watched the battles fury with awestruck eyes, but were exultant when it turned out finally with a repulse of the enemy. Toward eight o'clock the enemy renewed the assault in greater numbers. It was a perfect war storm indeed. The fire along the Abdonian line was so terrific that the Glandolians could not reach the summit this time, column after column being mangled and driven back.

It was expected that night time would put an end to the scene but at nine thirty o'clock a new assault came with tremendous fury, and raged five hours in succession of bloody onslaughts, that raged an hours duration and in which a frightful number fell on both sides. The ridges blazed like infernos and looked like hell itself. So terrific was the roar of cannon and musketry that it seemed as if the ridges were on a great rampage the scene reminding one forcibly to a foreboding of Dante's Inferno, and the shrieking punishments of the wicked on the side or far side of the Styx. The night scene of the conflict seemed to the little girls a certain awful majestic fear, and they could scarcely suppress the desire to scream with terror, as they would see the enemy surge over the works and a million crash like roar of masonry, they experienced every thrill known to human awe, terror, ecstasy, dread, and a thousand other poignant sensations would tumble over themselves to find expression on their trembling lips.

After five hours of incessant a savage fighting the gladiolindians were finally repulsed at all points, and finally the whole gray line gave way once more and again started another desperate failure. Nevertheless general Tamerline was confident that any charges would win the ridge. So during the night he concentrated his long range guns on the neighboring hills and then after two hours quiet started a vigorous artillery duel, to which the christian battle batteries quickly replied and the rest of the night was made hellish by a tremendous cannonade of the greatest intensity. Shells burst in the air in perfect salutes, and a long the opposing lines creating horrible havoc, and Hanson now realized that the gladiolindian generals meant business and having already reached within half a mile of the region after getting over the difficult country finally started forward his reinforcements, and artillery, the artillery being sent on ahead, and toward morning was reinforced by fresh cannon increased the fire of artillery to the surprise of the enemy. Finally driven to desperation the enemy came on in a fearful tearing assault. As it was the wildest raging assault that was ever witnessed by pyans fiercer than any of the assaults during the battle of Kilmet, and lasted five hours from three in the morning till seven. Various advantages were gained by the enemy, and lost, but at one point the foe had gained possession of the main line of christian trenches, and held them firmly against thirteen great and desperate counter assaults.

Finally pyans concentrated a new battery of 1,000 machine guns at that threatened point, and this committed such terrific havoc among the enemy that the position became untenable and another desperate assault made by the christians sent them out of the works and down the hill with the loss of three great quarters of their numbers.

After this great repulse the assault was renewed with greater violence, but notwithstanding all the difficulty of it all the christians held their positions with more utter determination and gave the enemy such a furious resistance, that they could never carry the position. General Tamerline learned of the arrival of general Hanson and was worried. Seeing the repeated repulses and learning that Hanson was sending a force around his rear the gladiolindian commander determined to abandon the attack and commence a retreat southward. This he wisely did having lost 10,000,000 in killed and wounded during this battle to that of the christians, 3,455,000. As soon as he started to retreat Evans heard a decided ridge with his forces and in one tremendous charge scattered the enemy and carried all before him ending the conflict entirely.

With the arrival of jansons army it was safe for pyans to proceed once again, and two days later the advance was resumed without any further opposition.

So after all the gladiolindian victory at Kilmet did not benefit them any as they met a great defeat at the battle of Sta Santa Anna plains ridge and which proved that nothing now could stop the intended christian invasion.

Violet and her sisters had no sleep during all of the battle, as their peril during the strife had been great but now during the christian march they slept in one of the army wagons undisturbed by the motion of the vehicle.

Hanson superintended his own divisions and pyans his and soon a christian army of many scores of miles in extent was advancing into the christian gladiolindian country. It was Hansons evident purpose to start devastating the enemys country, but as yet Evans wished to delay until they got further from the northern boundary line for fear that fires made would spread too far and cause more havoc in Angolinda.

Just now only before Evans and Hanson were gladiolindian armies retreating, and that was those under Tamerline, and John Manley. The series of other armies though confronted by the same number of christian armies were held in ground, though yet inactive.

The march continued incessantly for three days, and then a halt was made when they reached a portion of the great Angolinda river which also ran through gladiolinda. It was impossible to cross it at many points without pontoon bridges, the enemy having wrecked the great railroad bridges and others crossing the river with high explosive explosives, bridges of their own too each singly worth $45,578,000.

During the halt, and while the pontoon bridges were in construction, violet and her sisters, as usual amused themselves by watching the men at work, and also watched the men who were cutting down hundreds of trees, construction roads, and filling in others. Mostly all the christian generals in pyans army were now strangers to violet and her sisters, but nevertheless they spoke kindly to the children, answered all their questions, told them what the purpose of some construction board roads, and the reason of felling so many or a myriad myriads of trees. It was the purpose of making abatis and so forth for new intrusions in case the enemy should try to appear too suddenly and make a headlong attack.

The defeated gladiolindian armies though being reinforced were quite a distance off now, and though violet and her sisters had climbed high hills in order to view the country, they could not see any signs of the enemy even when fifty miles of country was in view of them. They saw fires here and there probably set by the enemy during their retreat, and the christian engineers and others at work at many locations and wooded country stretching to great distances, but that was all. It was a relief to them too that the foe was so far off, and they felt so silent that they could leave the christian lines every day and then hear then something within the lines warned them that it was dangerous to do so and so they did not do it.

So quiet was it at this time that it seemed as if there was only a great silence instead of a war, the scenery was beautiful, the weather hot but pleasant, and the air clear, and any birds of all colors flew here and there, and still a calm with their singing. Indeed so affected were violet and her sisters that they felt like singing the selves and so they started down the ridge, they wondered how it would be when the whole army would be over the ridge.

And violet and her sisters were really considering adventure at this time. They had experienced of danger before, and they almost enjoyed the war now, that their worse perils seemed to be over. But they wished it could have been fought before the killing and wounding of so many soldiers. They remembered their rear and their harrowing experiences during the frightful campaign at Santa Vitoria or Santa Cruz, and wondered if they would see any more such adventures.

all was still and....

CHAPTER FIVE...
THE ROUT OF THE GLANDELINIAN ARMIES.

Violet and her sisters a about a week later heard that all the various Glandelinian armies were retreating in a panic stricken rout, abandoning all the positions along the boundary line, and that the cause of the rout and headlong retreating was not known, and that no christian army had forced them back in such a panic, and that also for a while there had been any more battles..... Violet and her sisters were the first to receive this report from some friendly christian generals who knew them and they decided to give the news to general Evans or Hanson, the first they met. As they were heading toward the headquarters of general Evans, they saw soldiers with papers telling of the same thing, papers written in Glandelinia, but which had been seized by the christians during a raid. Violet and her sisters, asked for a look at one of the papers, which was handed to them. The report which the little children, that is Violet and her sisters read ran as follows:..:

GLANDELINIAN ARMIES ARE RETREATING IN THE GREATEST CONFUSION.... CAUSE OF RETREAT UNKNOWN.....

Twenty six Glandelinian armies under the generals known as: Aut Auction, Anfá Angelio Angelonica, Agoncillio, Alexander, Angelic Angelonia, August Broke, Accountontine, Aronburg Nummer, Agollia, Aronburg, another by the name of Alexander, Aron, Alex-los-gox, Apyloonia, Apyloonia, Angelonia, Ao Antonio Costellio, Alá Alackthander, Adele-de-gardinia, Accountinia, Accountants Manley, Aldelede-gardinia, Antone, Allenberger, and Antonio Gogaminia, are retreating southward, with the greatest speed in fact it is a conglomerate of routs, and the cause is unknown. There has not as far as known any battles fought in these quarters, but it is believed that it is and has been brought on by the overwhelming concentration of the various christian armies along the boundary line. The Glandelinian armies are flying fairly in all directions, as if all the demons of hell were after them, and that they saw no other chance to escape than fleeing wildly for their lives. The only Glandelinian armies not retreating just now is those under the Manleys and general Tamerline van Uren. If the King does not reinforce our armies with the drafted men sooner than it is proposed the war is lost for invasion is already beginning.....

Violet and her sisters followed out the news, and then taking the paper went straight for general Evans headquarters. Evans indeed was surprised at this news and at first believed that some cause like the appearance of the Abbeaunians had something to do with it. But it was not so. There had been a blunder in orders from general "ohn" Manley to the various commanders of the Glandelinian armies. He had sent orders to these commanders, to them in order to advise them to hold their ground against the christian invaders with the fiercest determination, but through some mishap the note never reached any of these commanders, and as rumors came that they had been ordered to retreat, that some unseen danger terrible in its consequences threatened them, and so thus this wildest of Glandelinian retreats began.

It terrorized the whole entire Glandelinian nation and aroused the government, to hurry up the draft, and enlistments.

All of the christian generals were astonished at this news, and looking into the matter saw the cause as well, and considered it as the greatest blunder that ever struck the Glandelinian armies in the entire war itself. General Vivian not knowing it sent the news to general Hanson and Evans who already realized the facts, and Evans told general Vivian that truly he was the first one to have discovered it among the generals at least, and through the Vivian girls at that.

"You little girls are certainly wonders at that." He said to Violet and her sisters after he had received the reports from general Vivian. "And this is also a sign that the war to the Glandelinian cause is really lost."

"But us little girls were not the first ones that knew of it." said Jennie. "We heard the rumors ourselves, among your troops, and taking one of the newspapers read the facts and brought it to you. That's how we came to know about it."

"Yes but you little girls brought it to me so quickly." said general Evans "And I praise you all the more for it too."

Violet and her sisters were flabbergasted and at first were paralyzed with amaze amazement but finally Violet said:

"It is d evidently that what you said is true. We seem to be too great in the eyes of the world, and yet through some reason we make nothing of our doings. Are we really as dangerous to the foe as the Manley's declare?"

"Yes." said Evans. "But then that makes no difference to us. Your wonderful ways, and great bravery is what counts."

"But that is not what we were thinking of." said Jennie. "You misunderstood us. We mean about our periling the Glandelinians. Are there not any better and more dangerous christian spies than us? How about the Geminian Secret Service Societies?"

"They are terrorizing to the enemy alright I must admit it." said Evans. "But they themselves admit that you have them beat a thousand times. Many of their exploits had met with rushing failures, you little girls have failed never. You children have admitted to us in confessions that your stunts are so hazardous that you made that demons would not dare perform, you have leaped chasms thousands of feet in depth to escape your pursuers, and did many things of great bravery when pursued with me that I myself thought suicide to attempt. So all this proves to us and the Glandelinians as well that you eight little girls are the most dangerous of all the Angelinian spies combined. You we held responsible for the loss or winning of the cause, and all your brave work has placed us Abbeaunians and Angelinians where we are to day. So where can you say that you were and are not wonderful children. There are many Glandelinian prisoners among us who can testify what you little girls did when pursued, as many of them with us now were your pursuers."

Violet and her sisters were thunderstruck indeed. They gasped at Evans words and did not find means to speak.

"It is all too true and we cannot deny it." said Evangeline Vivian. "We have done more than we thought we could do. We do not know what to make of it but just the same we believe what the Manleys think. We know that two of us did a deed that aroused the whole world as we saw it in the papers ourselves. We killed general Raymond Richardson federal, and the doers got the names of themselves in the papers. We were then so flabbergasted that we felt like flying to pieces. But the tragedy to federal ought to be a good lesson to all of the rascals and make them leave us alone in the future."

"And what it is doing." said Evans smiling. "I witnessed a scene that you did not to this morning. They did the batch of prisoners rush away from their guards, and seek shelter behind the largest pen house when you little girls approached them."

"We don't know anything about it." said Angeline. "We did not see them or see them running away."

"But they did not at your approach. Having learned the fate of federal and as they were some of your pursuers at that sametime, they feared you would recognize them and shoot them down like dogs also."

"But they were greatly mistaken, and were cowards to act so." said Nettie. "We shoot no body down in death unless we absolutely have to for our own personal safty. They were indeed cowards and I would tell them so."

Evans said no more for a few minutes and looked over the paper. It was a Glandelinian newspaper paper, giving details of the situation of the war as it was now, blaming violet and her sisters all for it, and raising Cain with many of the generals for their hasty retreats from Angelinia and Calverinia. It also reported that P. Pugatorian had lost his command for allowing himself to be beaten at Julo Callio and at Norma, McAllister also for his defeat during the long struggle at Crowley, and Richardson Tamerline had resigned his command, and when asked to resume command had left Glandelinia for unknown parts, stating that he is a Glandelinian, but a christian in heart, does not believe in warring for a cause that god himself condemns and would sooner turn traitor than be compelled to fight against God again. It was indeed surprising news, for adding to it was that the good picknell, Shoemannia, himself, the good Adele-de-Carbo and several others, besides smash-in-the-head had all resigned their commands, but because they could not lead their armies the way they knew best, and that the remaining wicked Tamerlines had been placed in their respective commands.

"The whole nation is wild in confusion, both over these disasters, and on account of the threatening christian invasion. It is also rumored that Tamerline Van Buren shall be relieved of his command for his defeat at Santa Anna Claus ridge, and Phillineia Tamerline to succeed him. Indeed so many generals of course have resigned their respective commands that no wonder the dirty christian dogs have progressed as far as that d they did in their many successes. And many important generals have been ruthlessly slain by those vivian children, called violet and her sisters..... It has been the offerings of many of our generals a great reward for their capture dead or alive, or their total destruction whatever it may be termed, but now it is seeming to the world whole world that these dangerous christian spies, the most greatest peril of glandelinia cannot even be killed, and all attempts fair or even dastardly have utterly failed, and now many of the generals are planning to leave them alone in the future from any sheer terror and nothing else.

All the "Lamelandin" officers who fear these little devils are God-lo God-favored cowards, and ought to be punished with the loss of their commands. Other reasons we find is treachery among many of the men and even officers who had secretly favored these spies, and dep defended them when captured. Bicknell was one of these, and added to the insult w by resigning his respective command when he was needed most. Francis McHollister Johnston will have to succeed him and other officers succeed those who have been relieved of their commands.

As soon as the dfrated men are prepared entirely we'll show the christian dogs what it is to invade a country unknown to them!

Had this been intirely too true of the latter statement it would be evident despited all things that the Angelinians and Abbiearnins would have never crusied down the war for over ten years at that. But the last statement was a mistake. King Gannon, general Ivian and his brother, general ivians to two faithful sons, general Jack Evans and many of the other christian generals, even the new ones in command of the Abbiearnian armies knew the whole country of glandolinia as we know the A.B.A and G's. Evans indeed laughed at the last statement of the news for he knew what fools they were to make this saun sauney remark.

How far the series of glandelinian armies were retreating, or how far they were going to retreat, was not known and yet no orders from general Hannon had reached the christ ian generals commanding their own armies to follow the retreating glandelinian soldiers, and so when a unbridled pursuit would have caused a severe serious disaster to glandelinia and shortened the war, there was an imprudent delay, just because the orders sent by Hannon never reached them on account of the secret service of the wicked glandelinian spies.....!!!!

 "Among the Abbeccannans the christian spies who founded the 19011111 1911 C luster of the black Brothers spies lodges called the Gemini4 had chosen from twenty one possible candidates, in particular all who had in mind the possibility of becoming wearers of the Pin of the Twins of the black Brot o Brothers who had decided to enter the lodge, to be sent to find out if the special direction of the retreating glandelinian armies and find out what the main purpose of their retreat was. As in the case many of these dangerous Abbeccannan spies represented some of the most prodigious families in the world. Eventually every one of them would and did come into enough of this great warpe perdition as to place them as the greatest of solder spies.
 With two exceptions the Persons were Easterners, and the generals of the society whose names appeared in the book of Personality, written in the order of their initiations were as follows;

General Vyvian Marshall, Aldrich pond, Henry Rich Littleton,, putler Noble Martindale, Simeon;;; Simeon Binckney Woodring,, Wm Henry Walker Yeaman Gerard Chambers, and HENRY JOSEPH DANGER.

By virtue of precedent chiefly Darger and Johnstona Fox, the first two to be clothed with Personality were elected Supreme persons, with general Darger as the main Supreme Person. Monday the third Person to be initiated is known as the Third Person, and so on down to Gerard Chambers,, who is officially designated at the twentieth Person. This is known as the Cluster Geminiid of the Abbeccianian place Brothers Spying Togie Lodge. On the day of the news of the surprising retreat and rout of the glandelinian armies the Supreme Person with Solemn formality notice notified the other persons that on the following night a meeting will be held in the darkness of the chamber of the Chamber. No details was necessary to convey the purpose of the main gathering.

A few minutes before the time set for the Destiny meeting, as the final Convention of the Chamber had come to be called---"Ti! 30 o-o-o o'clock the Sup some Person entered the Chamber. For a long time he is alone, the poetic doctrine of general Rodney Graves and Concordian Aronburg the main founder ordained that he should be alone--- and make the main r preparations.

From the vault he took the Constitutions and the laws of the Confederacy and the Black Sack of Destiny. These he placed on a long black table which stood at the side of the first chair. After donning his official regalia, a long black robe with hood attached, he turned off the gas, and lighted a stub of candle, which he placed on the table. Precisely at 11 o'clock he opened the door leading to the room of rest, and standing on the threshold in the full and solemn dignity of his office, spoke in subdued tones, slowly and impressively;

"Persons of the Gemini it is the command of the Supreme person that ye enter into the Chamber. There ye shall know more."

In measured threads he reached the first chair. The others so slowly filed to their allotted seats, arranged in a semi-circle around the first chair. For a moment there was a long silence, then the leader slowly lifting his shrouded head until the dim candle-touched it said:

"Ye Believers in the Catholic doctrines of the Geminii, yethat are clothed with the "Personality, inspired by our beloved Brother Rodney Graves, ye are here for a very grave pur pose.

ness of this Sacred Chamber ye shall take into hand that which the mighty and beloved Supreme Person in general Mansons army consentina Aronburg has deemed wise that ye should have. Thus far your Brothers ye have during this whole bloody war borne your honors well and ye all deserve in fullest measures the approval of your Main supreme Person of all and that is in general parger. It is the night of destiny. Who among us shall be the first of all Geminiid Persons to be branded publicly as an unworthy wearer of the Pin of the Twins, as a weakling in character, as a coward, a traitor to our beloved and honourable, fraternity and to the most loved of all God!!

With an earnest expression of con confidence in the course that each would follow he arose to your feet and took the black sack of destiny into his hand and cotn continued;

low he tore away the seal and opened the sack--

low he tore away the seal and opened the sack--
"Now before your eyes, you will see something new, but just now we must wait."

"The eyes of all turned to the candle. The tallow was now but little more than a smudge, and the light was beginning to sputter. Gradually it burned away, until it was only a dying spark of wick. When the room was in total darkness, the supreme person in more solemn tones went on:

"On account of dangerous 'landelindan spies it is the command of all gemmini that I your main supreme person now place my hand into the Black Sack of Destiny and take out an envelope, fo for my own separte eyes alone'"

Slowly and impressively he followed and drew out his instructions."

"Mine is drawn." He adds. "And may the Spirit of good God inspire me to do all that is true and worthy a Person should do."

The Sack was then passed to the second person, who after drawing out an envelope handed it to the third person. There was one envelope left when the sack reached the steady hand of hen general gerard chambers the last person.

"The line is drawn," said Gerard. "Any man, God and the spirit of Rodney Graves guide me well."

"Now let light be given," said the ruler. "Let each know what destiny be his right away."

The gas was lighted, and a big black screen was placed directly behind the first chair. A lamp is hooked on the wall behind the screen above the portrait of general Rodney Graves. The supreme person, now the first person devoted of his official regalia, was the first to go behind the screen, there to read the contents of his envelope. He is gone less than a minute and when he came into view of the wondering persons, there is a soft sinister smile on his lips, and an expression of mystery in his eyes.

In turn the others read their instructions behind the screen. The twentieth person is out of view for fully five minutes. His long absence from the Semi-cis semi-circle created unusual wonder in the minds of the others when he finally reached his chair, subjecting him to most searching glances. There is just a suggestion of uncertainty in his eyes tempered no doubt by the gaze of others.

Then Darger said:

"As we all know our Gemini is a synonym for courage, loyalty, and firmness. It has no place for the weakling. The faithfulness of a member can never be doubted, not even by the bitterest rivals, and enemies of God. The Constitution of the Gemini never has been subjected to the slightest change or amendment from the time of its framing by Rodney Graves, and the sixty hundred other men who with him composed the Original Cluster. Safe in the Vault of the chamber it rests being destroyed only once a year. Laws essential to the purpose of the Gemini are as follows:

"A possible Person must be born under the full influence of the Sign of the Gemini of the black Brothers Zodiac, that is between May 31st and June the 21st. His Father must have been born under the full influence of this sign, that is between May 11th and June 21st. His mother must have been born under the full influence of the sign of the great Aquarius Planet, that is between January 20th and February 19th. The Gemini of one separate lodge are sixty, they will never be more than sixty. There are the more dangerous spies, called the Spades, another called the Greeks, and Thirteen and the innumerable other fraternities, whose looks but few keys fits, but they I always remain in the shadow cast by the Gemini. Should the possible candidates exceed the number of Persons allowed by law the active Persons shall exercise their discretion and best judgement in selecting new leaders in activity, and form new congregations from the extra Persons. At the beginning of this Gemini society the Persons elected one of their numbers to the office of supreme Person, and the incumbent of that office, shall be the only one with that authority. His word shall be law; none shall question it; none shall deny it's Majesty. The foremost purpose of the Gemini is to test the strength of its members. In view of this no one could become a member without the consent of the Main Supreme Persons, without knowledge of the Secret Service work spy duties, the duties of a soldier, and without being a catholic, and none could be invited to be a wearer of the Pin of the Twins without first being apprised of the possibilities of membership. And only commissioned officers could belong to the membership. Every member is expected to perform any mission that might be terminated, even which tests his strength and loyalty and it is a rule that at the end of the year the supreme Person should put a basis of tests, to which the new members of the following year should be put. These instructions are placed in sealed black envelopes uniform in size and shape, and then into a black cloth bag- the black pack of tests from which they are drawn by the new members in the order of their initiation and admittance. For instance the Person first ordained, makes the initial selection, the next to put the T Pin of the Twins is the second to take out the envelope, and so on down to the last person. The law ordains the instructions shall not be made known to the other member, than the individual holder until they had been carried out in their entirety on account of the facts being learned by Glandelinian spies. This is the last article as drawn by Rodney Graves, and the others who had formed the original cluster. The Persons shall be placed wholly upon their honor at all times. They shall be granted four and twenty four hours in which to decide whether or not they will attempt to the best of their ability to carry out the instructions making known their decisions within that time to the supreme Person. Should a Person decline to following the instructions, it shall be the unalterable duty of the supreme Person to devast him rudely of his Personality, and caused to be placed carded in all public places of the great christian camps and towns all around in possession of the christians sheets of paper, branding him as a coward, weakling in character and purpose and as a traitor to the black Brothers Gemini and to his beloved God. And further more if the offense be extremely serious he shall forthwith be sentenced to death. An agreement to submit to the test, based upon an oath of honor shall be received with warm encouragement, and ever thereafter his name shall suggest a flawless honour, loyalty, and never drying grace, and will receive promotion from time to time in the ranks of the armies, by the orders of the supreme christian generals."

While he was giving instructions it was discovered indeed that a sneaking spy was in their midst, and he was seized within short notice, and quite a number of letters found on him. These were examined and the first ran as follows:;;;;

"It was the will of the Supreme Person and therefore the pleasure of all Gemini that your strength and loyalty and love be subjected to seven tests. As a disciple of our beloved Rodney Graves and as a believer in the Catholic doctrine of the Gemini, ye cannot, be ye faithful and true, fail to establish beyond all question and doubt your enduring right to the honor and glory of your Priceless Personality. That ye may always wear the pin of the Twins, that ye always may merit the trust of your brothers, that you may always carry your head high in the knowledge of duty well performed ye have acted as follows dear general, concentina, Ironburg

For four years or almost almost from the last day of the influence of the sign of the Gemini of the Gemini in the year 1911 ye have been absent from Lincoln Ill. and at one time within that period had ye communicated by letter or telegraph, with members of your Lincoln friends or with any body else of blood relationship. The first three months of the first year of your absence had been spent as a trap in spying on the Glandelinians at Easter starring with evident success bringing in all information desired..... When the period had begun you had on your person not exceeding fifty cents, or one dollar, as it was the will of the supreme Person whom ye love, that you pretended that you were earning your way as a Glandelinian subject and earning your living and sustenance. After being a tramp of pretending to be one for three months ye pretended to find work in the city of St. Easter starring having choosed any city at that or in what capacity ye may have elected so long as ye depended solely upon the influence and fruits of your own ability. Within three months after ye had pretended to go to farm work in the vicinity of Glandelinian camps having learned great information conveyed it to the christian armies as we requested and then placed your feet on Glandelinian hospital floors for further information.

At all times thereafter ye had nothing more than that which ye have earned by your own hand and mind bringing great honor upon yourself. So promptly at three thirty on the last day of your four years of absence that is on August 2, 1916 ye appeared at the office of Thomas Wentworth Evanston Angelina. There ye required for an envelope bearing the name of general Rodney Graves. The contents of this letter was to be read within forty eight hours after ye received it giving ye further instructions. Well ye Person of the Gemini ye have performed well, it was a plan of the enemy captured by him which you took to general Hanson, the spirit of Rodney Graves knows that ye have performed well and saved the christians from defeat that threatened them, and when victory trembled in the balance for them during the battle of Sunbeam Creek. Ye have earned an enduring right to your full Personality. Ye have also been told to show your self in other towns in Angelina, for one year be beginning at Lincoln Ill, and ending from Binghampton to Chicago Abbieanna.

That ye may know that the spirit of Rodney Graves and your beloved Gemini to be magnificent, ye may have with ye one companion, whom ever you may choose, but who whatever may arise, shall not know the true purpose of your mission. Ye make the trips to these towns in order to prove your ability to stand the spying tests, but no railroading outside of Chicago Abbieanna can be done on account of the Abbieannian governments stopping the running of all their trains to prevent damage to the handsome coaches by the ravaging war and the enemy. Ye must keep inviolably secret these instructions, and all instructions to follow from any one not a Gemini or for any one not known as he or she may be a Glandelinian spy. May the spirit of Rodney Graves guide ye well. And the wishes of all Gemini give ye unbound courage.

May the spirit of Rodney Graves and the love, trust and confidence of all Gemini in spirit ye and one day may ye say with hand uplifted;

"By my manhood, by all that I love and honor, by all that honour and love me, I have earned the enduring right to my Priceless Personality, and the priceless glories that it contains.

GENERAL THOMAS
FRANCIS NEWSOME.

This is important indeed "Said general Darger looking at the prisoner furiously and who astonishing them all was a Glandelinian woman. This proves indeed that she is a spy, and man or woman they are punished alike. The penalty is death. What have you to say to your self mad'am. Speak up."

"Nothing was the sarcastic answer.
Darger looked over the second letter which was a shorter.

Darger looked through each letter he had not understanding at all, however that these important letters ever got into press session of this glandelinian spy. And a woman too. Think of it. He looked over the smaller letter which ran as follows::

With love
Yours in our Lord.
Sister Camilla.

MARTIN LUTHER STUART
NOTHMAN ABBEY, ILL.

There were four letters altogether which had been addressed to little Annie Aroburg by her friends, two of which had been predicted already, and which had been in the possession of the woman spy. What good these were to her is or was now known just then but the leader of the Geminiis was suspicious that she knew something about the little girl who had been so cruelly murdered by her assassin and decided to hold her for a rigid investigation and force any information out of her that was possible. He said to her:

"Do you know anything about this little girl called Annie Aroburg who was murdered by her three assassins."

"I do know the child, but you'll never get any information out of me about her if you shot me down right here in this room." She answered with as much sarcasm as she could assume. "We glandelinians are free masons and it is the death penalty for us to reveal the intentions of the cause."

June 19th 1911.
My Dear Friend Annie Aronburg,

Your friend:
F. J. P. Perry.

"The little Heroine who lost her life during the frightful carnage at Erwinia run is not the original Annie Aronburg child as first believed but a little girls girl with the proper name of Gertrude Angelina, though she being a spy assumed the name of Angelina Aronburg. The real dead body of the murdered Aronburg child was found in Albans Ravi Ravine at Aronburgs run by general Starring, and violet and her sisters.

Yours truly general denation.
344TH division.
Army of Abbeannians.
At Franklin Pierce..''

The woman saw that she was in a trap, but stated that her first words was true would not change the subject. She was sent off under strong guard to general Jack Evans who would deal with her accordingly with his own will.

As Darger was giving further instructions to the members of his personality an orderly came in handing him a letter. Darger took it and dismissing the order he went into a secret room and proceeded to read the contents of the letter which he had just received. It was a long one and ran as follows:!!!!

344th Infantry Army of Abbeonania.....

March 10th 1915.....

Your excellency general Henry Darger.....

I received your last note, and glad to know that you are looking for Glandelinia with your armies to morrow to begin an invasion of the country of the enemy of God. So general Vivian told me. That will be a fine trip for you and I hope you will have the pleasure of crossing the whole country, in helping to conquer the enemy for our grand Abbeonania, and Angelinia, and of coming back again soon with a wreath of victory on your brow, after squelching the Manley's and the Glandelinian cause..... Every true Abbeonanian and Angelinian, or Galvordinian is working faithfully for the holy cause of our nation and working hard for this victory. Our country was at stake fourteen months ago, our lives and homes were at stake, and even now God help us if the war would change and go against us, now.

But I hope it won't. If our invasion is broken now all is lost, as this is our last chance to crush Glandelinia. We are in the right however and we don't believe we'll be chased out now. God is with us as he always was. Our great Cardinals, Archbishops, and Clergy are with us. We must and shall be victorious.

Our four fathers in the great Glandico-Abbeonanian war of 1841 have set us a good example. Each and every one of us should place his hand on his heart, and cry with that great Abbeonanian Patriot Johnstonia Hero in eighteen eighteen forty one during that war in his great speech before the Abbeonanian Congress:

"Over the child assassination on our picnic ship let others choose to say and think what they will, as for me give me revenge or give me death." Again and again I say to you "Stand by your colors" "Uphold the flag".

It has been your word that your assistant general August Darger wanted to resign his command and return home. Don't let him disgrace himself by doing any such thing at this critical time, tell him to be a man. General Hanson Vivian and even his brother, and general Jack Evans had also ordered and advised him to stay where he is and "Uphold the flag".

"Look at the great General Jack Evans, what he is doing to uphold it. If it was not for him the Christian armies would not be where they are to day. Look at your great gr general Hanson Vivian in this great war, who when wounded in the battle of Pig-girl-moel cried out:

"For God's sake damn me, lay me down and save the flag. I'm only slightly wounded."

These words are written in gold and placecared all over the world. Look at the many wealthy young men your brother has in the army with him, all his staff general officers, General Cordery, Field Marshallton, and a host of others who had not only done their share, and leaving all behind most dear to them but have proved themselves a terror to the enemies of God. This ought to inspire general August Darger with more courage, and he is getting a nice salary of 1,567 dollars a month for his self services, and when at the end of the war or his time expires he will come home from this war with an honour beyond description, and will be welcomed by his friends with exclamations of joy and praises. And let him remember that he was just as dashing an Abbeonanian general as you or Evans, and had never lost a fight in all his service of the war.

I am sending you some paper clippings, and pictures, of the Vivian Iris, and of their heroic doings which I would like you to give to your brother when you meet him again. I know when you come home after the war if you do you will be also hailed with exclamations of joy as a true citizen a Christian far Patriot of Abbeonanian countries, and will have a nice big bank account placed to your credit. And tell your officers to put up with the few inconveniences which they complained about, like the other generals that you have at present, they will soon disappear. As I said before, our three great Cardinals and Archbishops, and Bishops are backing up our cause and governments, heart and soul, in this great war, and you know yourself three of them are staff generals of yours.

Were the Christian generals to lose courage now, and beat a retreat when the invasion in just freshly started the three Manley's and the King of Glandelinia, would soon be over here again with his wild hordes, a great storm of child massacres would begin again, and pick out any of you generals to black his boots.

I had been sorry also to have seen the little Vivian girls who are so dear to us all, so often but I hope they won't be injured further by the wicked Glandelinians and that their persecutions are over. Their friend Sister Camilla told me that general Evans intended to keep them as his little step sisters, and be a step son of their father. This she learned from a cousin here who has a brother in the same division with you and who is general plantation Aronburg. I was glad to hear this, and I now say to you by all means for their sake have your brother August Darger strike it out, he will be doing something more for his country, and for them as well. In invading Glandelinia, he will see more of life, he will be earning new wages for every promotion, and when this bloody war is over, you and he will come home with Honor and also have a great bank account. So tell him your self to strike it out no matter how fierce the work will be in attacking the foe nor no matter how fierce the battles rage and roar. I sent you a pair of socks captured during the battle of Clinton from Manley's headquarters, no doubt belonging to him, and a Whistle from general Ambrose Fuller. Did you get them? They are great spoils as those are worth $45,678. Single pair. If you have a loose $1 about you you might slip it into the next letter you send me to pay for those Scauplers, Badge of the Sacred Heart and for your Dues in the League of the Sacred Heart.

I had also learned that general plantation in Evans' army was severely wounded recently and so had desired to come home for a while on a furlough or visit, and I hope they will let him come. He has done his duty and service to God and country for a long time and is as great a general as his friend Jack Evans who told me without plantation he would be jeopardized indeed. There is also good news from Glandelinia for us. On four of their battle ships in the north portion of the Angelinian seas the sailors through some unknown reason mutinied, threw their captains overboard, and surrendered their ships to the Abbeonanian fleet guarding Wickey Bay for revenge. This may be the beginning of the end, and will be hailed by us all with Thanksgiving.

Your friend general
Thomas Phelan.
Commander of army in Glandelinia.
Under Hanson Vivian.

A week later just before Evans' great engagement at Pegasus, Darger had received back all his Members who had went on the dangerous mission to find out the cause of the rout of the foe, and came back indeed with stunning reports. They declared the foe armies were rallying on receiving reinforcements but that the sudden approach of the Abbeonanians had unnerved their general commanders who had been panic stricken themselves and ordered the retreat which had become a rout indeed. Evans is confronted by John Manley at Pegasus or Pegasus, while the armies recently panic stricken are rallying with preparations to make a stand, at Polydeoties, Pickford and Germaine Fielding. Hubert Manley who alone did not retreat and who received reinforcements is in strong force at Marousian on the Angelinian and Glandelinian boundary line. He above all means must be watched as no one likes his actions. Darger was surprised at these reports, and notified general August Darger by wireless who sent back the answer:

"It's best for me, to take my army and maneuver him away from Marousian until general Vivian who will be notified in the meantime can come and bring on a battle that will put him where he belongs. I have changed my mind about resigning and will not do so until the close of war. My threat of resignation was way before the invasion began. To resign now would be my death of mortification, as it would be the greatest delight to the enemy. They believe without me the Christian armies can do nothing. The foe can expect me to resign in command in vain as now I'll not do so until the war closes.

AUGUST DARGER.

Henry Darger reported Manley's action to general Vivian who immediately reported to Darger that he will follow his brother as fast as possible and strike Menley a blow before he can start a new invasion. All these rumors which were too true at that was exciting enough for Violet and her sisters and they realized that instead of moderating the fury of the war was growing stronger, for with an invasion started the glandelinians was preparing for a pugna and terrible resistance, that would cause the spilling of oceans of blood, before the war would be ended. They wished that something could be done that would avert it. Reports had also come in that a great crush of christian crusades under general Jimmie Jivian their brother had been made against the northern fortifications of Atlands Fair and which was a terrific contest, and in which the christians were beaten. The battle had indeed raged and was known as the battle of Wrigley's Run. The report ran as follows:

THE BATTLE OF WRIGLEY'S RUN!!

General Jimmie army began the battle with a terrific cannonading of 500,000 cannon. And neither Cholera nor any horrible Pestilence, or earthquake and typhoon combined into one had more reason to be dreaded, than one of those wild sudden glandelinian onslaughts that struck against Viviana christian line without warning, and which during the hand to hand fight hurled immense multitudes of human beings out of the world. The cannon fire of both sides was so unpeppably terrific that it demolished the most massive and fairest buildings in the air city of Union. This was one of the most terrific storms of battle ever raging in glandelinia yet. Even reports that three thousand five hundred glandelinian ships big or small all armed with better guns than the christian land batteries, steamed up the Easter Starring river to join in the fray and not a ship returned, all being set on fire and torn to pieces by a hurricane of shell fire. The battle had started only like a ten days skirmishing and on the eleventh day the foe had come on in a charge like a hell ocean of human beings gone mad, and so terrific was the christian fire that the whole battle field was torn up by the explosions of shells. It is reported that the biggest and longest waves of glandelinians assaulting the christian line was three hundred ninety deep in mass and extended three miles in succession of waves, and these series of waves made an assault that was without an intermission of a moment a duration of a whole day, and the roaring of the musketry of both sides drowned out the crash of the greatest artillery duel in glandelinia. Never before had any glandelinian army assaulted the christian line on such a maddened screaming fury, and general Aronburgs central christian line had been torn to pieces by the wildest of the glandelinian assaults, where the firing all that live long day had been reported to have roared and crashed like a hundred trillion cannon.

The very Glandelinian surges also swept southwest of the main christian line in weltering tidal waves, but had encountered a fire along the christian line so furious that over 500,000 lives had been destroyed in the attack. The glandelinian columns under generals Boy King, Mc-Hollister, and Aronburg were fairly cannonaded by the christian artillery, and the frightful gaps appalled these divisions whose men were so fast being swept away.... Along the left wing of the christian line under B. Kauffmann waves of glandelinians considered too long to be observed their full length almost carried all before them during the attack, before they were finally crushed and driven back.

There were however scenes of a wild and more horrible description during the next day when the christians made assaults upon the fortifications scenes so wild which neither pen nor imagination could ever adequately depict. General Mc-Hollister on his private ship had not been far from the region and as he had landed troops troops and joined in the strife his experiences of the most terrible of battles on glandelinian soil was described by him as thus:

"My army was launched in one of the most terrific charges than ever known or what I have ever seen or heard of in the whole Glandoo-Angelinian war. Say I'll never forget those sixty minutes during that charge. As my men went forward, the glandelinians with terrific yells heard above the firing charged as wildly as they knew how, fairly screeching their horrible Devil Yell and for an hour my troops was almost in the midst of a deluge of perfect surges of yelling cursing and screaming men maddened by rage fury, and hatred and as these wild assailant fairly buried themselves into my confined lines I feared that the Angelinians would be overwhelmed, but my reserves came in time and made one tremendous roaring charge, and soon the field was swept clean of every glandelinian, and my own fresh wave of men that seemed to be as long as the longest dragon in a fairy story threatened to engulf the retreating glandelinians who firmly stood their ground and after most desperate fighting for five hours repulsed my men and drove them back under cover. I cannot conceive how the christian line survived the disastrous storm of glandelinian musketry and artillery fire, but our whole line held firmly against all further sea assaults made by the enemy that day though divisions of men had been swept back time and again and the works were fairly buried under their own dead and wounded. I can now witnessing the horrible suffering of the wounded of both sides in the ruined battle fields where nothing has escaped destruction."

After the battle though the last assault was repulsed general Jimmie Jivian had realized that it was too soon to make any attempt on these fortifications and so later on he abandoned the enterprise for a while being too appalled at his frightful losses. The battle was equal in fury as Logan Zoo Rae Run for the losses on both sides in killed wounded and prisoners combined was 160,000,000.

Violet and her sisters told general Evans of this great battle and also of the great work of the Glandoo-Angelinian and he was surprised. You little girls will soon see great and stirring times. He said that evening when he troops reached Paganus, and we'll know why too beyond by. The foe is preparing for sterner resistance than ever, greater armies are gathering, and the defeat of the christians at the battle of Wrigley's Run proves it too. We are invading glandelinia a third time now, our invasion is more serious and threatening, and the whole of glandelinia is aroused as she never had been aroused before. So now as we are in the enemy's country, you little girls had better stay more within the christian lines, and do not go strolling around around without guardians. You may fall into an ambush and be shot down. You know how treacherous the glandelinians are when they are aroused."

Violet and her sisters admitted that they knew and also that they would obey this advice as they had no desire to run into any such danger as they had heretofore done recently in the war.

"We have also heard that a great army of glandelinians all drafted men are concentrating in very heavy forces at Fountain of Pireni-De-la-Croce under general Mc-Allister Stanok. Said Joice. "Many of the glandelinian armies who had been retreating in such a rout are also joining him. It seems that that place is our first goal."

"It is," said Evans. "And if we do not force the foe back from there we'll never progress any further, and so serious would be our check that the enemy would gain time to gather stronger, and stronger in force and fury and not break up the invasion we are making, but destroy so many of us that when we reach the Angelinian boarder there would only be remnants left. We must avoid such disaster and be mighty careful that we know the positions there well also before we make any serious attack on them. You little girls I will depend on to find out about them when we reach there." "And we will," said little Jennie vehemently. "We are not afraid of those new Glandelinian either, though drafted men are worse sometimes than inflated men."

During the night Violet and her sisters with a party of men, mostly all officers went a little beyond the christian lines to scout a little and observed strange flashes in the direction of the south, like a grand display of fireworks, and series of queer and strange noises. Violet and her sisters were puzzled and even felt a little creep, for no matter where the far distant noise came from it sounded like millions of mad dogs barking howling and moaning. Violet placed her poor powerful field glasses to her eyes in the hopes in observing what it was, but the darkness was too intense for anything to be revealed at that great direction and it seemed also that the peculiar noises, and flashes was not far from where the enemy lines were situated. Violet and her sisters had an idea that something was wrong, and wished to reconnoitre closer to the scene but the soldiers' fearsome of some coming dreaded event did not like the idea of doing so and hung back.

"What are you fellows afraid of?" Asked violet. "We don't intend to go right into them. There is no danger of just going a mile further or so. We are too many anyhow for the foe if they did lay ambushes. We are all crack shots and can shoot down ten of them for our one if they are even in hiding. Move on."

"The party then slowly and cautiously rode on and violet saw suddenly a bush move cautiously.

"Wait boys" She whispered. The soldiers had also observed the movements of the bushes further on and realized a trap. But they had went into it and were immediately surrounded. But fortunately for them it was a mistake. They were Angolians who had been lying in wait, having at first suspected that the approaching party were some of the enemy, and so instead of anything serious they only added to the number of the party.

"You need not fear of a glandelinian ambush," said the leader of the new party. "We have cleared the way of the glandelinians for several miles down. We were wondering what that queer noise was and came out here to observe it. We had several skirmishes with scouting parties of the enemy, and cleared a well formed ambush routing the would be trappers and shot many down. We also set fire to a village where the inhabitants started to snip our soldiers. So now the space it is clear of foes for several miles."

"We were on observing the strange noise also," said violet. "We are wondering what it can be."

"That's what we were trying to locate," answered the officer. "It was a like so many mad dogs in an uproar, and saw all those peculiar white flashes. It may be the enemy or something."

They continued for some distance and soon reached a large glen. As they were passing through, a man in purple stepped out suddenly and cried: "Advance any further you fellows and all of you will be captured. A large force of glandelinians under general Pollywolly are advancing. There are 10,000 of them."

"Wait lay in ambush," cried the leader in answer. "All of you dash off to hide. Violet and your sisters come and hide with me. If you wish you can join in the fighting or what?"

"We do not care to join frays," said violet. "So we'll just stay in hiding and watch the conflict between the trees and at a safe location."

All of the soldiers were in hiding in no time, and the officer scouting a certain distance saw that the man had been of one of another party of christians also in hiding. He saw that a large force of Gargolian cavarly were approaching at a gallop, and straining his eyes, he saw to his horror that they had five hundred little girls and boys with them all child slaves being led to a place no doubt where the christians could get rescue the poor children. They could be heard weeping and imploring the glandelinians not to take them away.

"Then he said when he returned. "They have a large number of child slaves with them. So when you open fire don't hit the children if you possibly can help it, and as there is a bright moon shining you can see them plainly. And the children are on separate horses."

The soldiers receiving these instructions from their officers after he conveyed this order watched and waited. Soon they heard the wails of the children and the galloping of horses. The glandelinians indeed were riding fast into the waiting ambush. There were fully ten thousand of the glandelinians and five hundred and fifty children on separate horses, but there was no chance of their getting away. And worse of all neither boy or girl had a stitch of clothes on, and such cruelty and immodesty infuriated the Abbie women who whispered among themselves:

"We'll not give those brutal slunks in gray no quarter. We'll shoot a 1 of the dogs down and kill the pris prisoners. We'll show them what we do to such."

Soon the party was in the whole trap, and as the command of the officers the Angolians placed their muskets on their shoulders, and suddenly to the surprise of the glandelinians the whole field and bushes seemed to blaze with uskestry fire, and horses and men went down by scores. The glandelinians were driven into a panic and confusion, but by strategy they managed to fight their way out of the ambush and escape, but they left all the children behind in possession of the victors. Think of it only three hundred Angolians and Abbie women routing 10,000 Gargolians without a single loss, and the foe suffered the loss of 1,000 in dead and 3,456 in wounded. Only in half an hour fighting in the ambush. The glandelinians retreated southward and reaching the glandelinian camp raised the alarm with the report that the christian army was advancing, and that they had been ambushed by the advance guard and the child slaves taken from them.

Knowing that the escaped fugitives would raise the alarm the party of soldiers with violet and her sisters decided to return back to the lines, before a strong force would be sent in pursuit. They even believed that probably the whole Glandelinian army would come after them. But there was nothing doing of the sort. Having the impression that the whole christian army was advancing itself the glandelinian officers reported the fact to the main commander himself and Mc-Allister Stancklin rode up to his left wing and ordered it to withdraw further to its main position, and sent scouts out to watch and see which direction the christian army was moving.

Violet and her sisters themselves soon realized the truth, and decided not to return to the christian lines right away and so they proceeded further but more cautiously. Violet and her sisters, for the moment had went on ahead of the column and were suddenly surrounded by six ugly looking men in gray.

"Surrender ye little she devils," cried the leader. "We have got you now." "Yes indeed you have," cried violet and her sisters in answer and drawing their guns suddenly to the surprise of the glandelinians. "If you men your selves don't surrender to us we'll shoot you down like dogs. Go hand over your weapons."

The glandelinians were flabbergasted but they had not drawn their own weapons quick enough, and realized that to resist these little sharpshooters was like resisting the true devils themselves, and they surrendered themselves to the little girls, though it was a mortification enough to have killed them.

"You see," said violet with a laugh. "We were prepared for you men and allowed you purposely to surround us, so that you would not take us by too sudden a surprise. We were too quick for you at that. Are there any more of you men lurking in ambush?"

The party of christians had come up by this time and were surprised to see that the little girls had prisoners in their midst, and had actually seen these very glandelinians rush out and so surround the little girls.

"Why violet and your sisters," cried the leader in amazement. "Where do you little girls inherit such bravery. Take six strong well armed men prisoners after they have surrounded you. Why we are astonished." "Oh it is nothing," said violet. "We saw them before they rushed out and rushed out and trapped them. They forgot to draw their weapons and by that forbearance saved themselves from a sudden disaster. We surprised them instead."

Ten of the christians were detailed to take the prisoners to the camp and the remainder with violet and her sisters, proceeded nearer and nearer to the enemy's lines and unconsciously were within a mile of them when a large cavarly force in gray was seen approaching, with another batch of child slaves. The children recently rescued by the christians were or had been sent back toward the camp and so the numbers of christian soldiers were quite fewer than they had been before.

But they stood their ground, realizing that the children must be rescued if possible, and when the cavarly came near enough, Violet and her sisters were advised to go to some shelter, and then the christians made a terrific charge. The glandelinians fortunately however were fewer than the christians were, and retreated in the wildest confusion with the same impression on their minds that it was the advance of the christian army. The child slaves were abandoned, the christians seizing the horses the children were riding on and leading them off with them. Two times the glandelinian troopers had been frustrated in this endeavor to take the children were the christians could not rescue them, and now the news of this aroused the whole camp. The christian troopers returned to the lines with their charges and reported the affair to Evans.

It was Evans's realization that the region was a whole slave region, and so during the night contracted his lines, and extended them everywhere, and sending out large forces of cavarly he gave orders that the enemy must be hindered in transporting the slaves to other locations. Hearing of this Mc-Allister Stanck threatened to massacre all the child slaves he had, and Evans warned him that if this is done, he'll receive no quarter for his army is surrounded, and cannot escape.

"Massacre the remaining children if you dare," he wrote to the glandelinian general. "And I'll commit a massacre myself that will awaken the world. If even one child is slain, out of all you have your army will meet complete destruction. And I'll give you three days to surrender your army too."

McAllister Stanck however had a secret passage in which to withdraw his army through, but nevertheless in his retreat he was forced to abandon all the child slaves in the region, and when Evans advanced the next morning and found the enemy had escaped him, he nevertheless had over 10,000 child slave plantations and factories in his possession and over 1,000,000 child slaves all little girls and boys of the ages of nine and ten years of age and no older or younger. In trying to capture the enemy he had been outwitted, but nevertheless he had rescued all these children, and these were in due time carefully transferred from army to army and sent into Angolonia where they were safe.

Evans continued his advance toward the town of Pegnusa, and during another halt sent out more scouting parties to learn what he could. While his main right wing was settling down for its encampment, a troop of its men suddenly stumbled upon a mine underground, and exploring it found hundreds of children working hard, driven by their cruel masters under the lash. The glandelinians indeed were surprised at their entrance, but they realized that the jig, as it is called was up, and they surrendered the children to the christian soldiers, and allowed themselves to be taken prisoners.

"We'll clean up this child slave business if we have to go down into the uttermost depths of hell to do so." Said the leader of the captors. "You men thought you could hide your slaves in this secret coal mine but you found out different. This was an act of treachery, and you ought to be shot for it."

The prisoners were lead out, and the children following with the Angolonian soldiers.

These children were all little girls, and we were as dirty as black little lumps. They were transferred toward the location of general Evans headquarters, Violet and her sisters seeing these children, and the soldiers with their prisoners approaching and riding up to the leader inquired where they got them.

"In a coal mine." Answered the leader. "It's right in the middle of our camp. We stumbled upon the mine accidentally. We investigated the interior and surprised the rascals and made them surrender themselves and the children. We claim that they ought to be shot for their treacherous treachery as it was a hiding place indeed."

There was quite a number of the children but Violet and her sisters went on volunteered to have them cleaned up, which they did and soon within several hours you would not have recognized the dirty and besmeared faces and hands.

They were also covered with bruises, which was attended to by the red-cross nurses, and then the children were led off to the transportation camp. It was evident to the glandelinian alright that the christians were now carrying the war with the greatest intensity to their very doors, and at every village or town that the christians approached at the people fled in such hurry that they left all their belongings behind. All of the children who had been rescued had observed Violet and her sisters but great admiration and wonder, and hated to go away they loved these dear little girls so. But to remain here was dangerous and they had been assured that some day when the war was over they would be able to see the Vivian Girls again, and perhaps play with them.

News soon came in that the armies under the two pargers had reached the vicinity of Marcucian near Angoline on the boundary line of Angolonia and Glandelinia, and that general Vivian was following fast, and that all attempts on the Glandelinians to advance into Angolonia had been frustrated. The whole of general Evans' army was elated over this news and Evans told Violet and her sisters.....

When Evans was preparing to resume his advance he learned that the enemy was concentrating in the vicinity of Pegnusa in great force, and so he did not resume his advance but awaited developments..... Violet and her sisters observed movements along the enemy's lines that indicated the approach of a battle, but though they gave all the information they could the enemy remained quiet nevertheless, and the christian army was undisturbed.

Evans was anxious to press his advance but could not do it without sweeping away this glandelinian army, but then he did not think it wise to make an attack in particular. Hanson himself had warned him not to do so until an opportunity presented itself. Hanson's army was one day behind, and so Evans decided to await until he came up and re-joined him.

This was indeed pleasing news to Violet and her sisters, general Jack Evans having told them himself. More things that made the little girls still happier was that their boy friends Gerald starring and even Powell and Perrod who had been reported mortally wounded during the recent frightful battle at Gilmet or what ever it was called were now on the road of recovery were able to walk about a good deal and Violet and her sisters were almost always with them during the days they did not go out scouting. Their three little girls friends also were with them and only Evans who had been unable to stay for a long time had hardly seen them but once or twice a day. But now during the halt Hanson for the sake of Violet and her sisters relieved Evans of his most extreme duty by sending him many assistant generals to help him in all the emergencyS.....

So again Violet and her sisters were with Evans frequently and enjoyed their spare time with him more than ever.

"Terrible things are going to happen to old Glandelinia soon." Said Evans to them that morning. "Then it is going to start I do not know but it's coming. The wicked glandelinian armies had committed the most terrible havoc to our Angolonian and Calverinian towns and cities, laid so many of our beautiful forests in ashes, and God knows what. The troops in my army are almost murmuring against me because I do not allow them to destroy. Do you little girls think it is right for me to refuse their request. You know best."

Violet and her sisters remained silent for a few moments pondering on the horrible scenes they had witnessed, and then Jennie said:

"It's right to prevent it as long as Hanson or papa had not ordered it to be done. But to do so would be perfectly just. The wicked glandelinians have committed the most shocking sacrilegious thing that Satan would not dare commit, have murdered children in such ways that no one would be allowed to picture, and have committed what wanton destruction. If papa or uncle permits it we would be glad to see it. We feared and dreaded the great fires raging in our beloved countries, here we would truly enjoy it as something great. If you desire to do so Evans, talk to Hanson about it, and tell him of the murmurs of your troops."

"I have sent a notice to Hanson this morning and expect an answer when he comes." Answered Evans. "It is indeed my almost irresistible desire to tear Glandelinia to pieces for many reasons. For the sufferings you little girls have unjustly gone through, for the cruelties of the foe to the helpless and for my own affairs as well. All the Abbeannians who have observed the starved conditions in northern Calverinia are clamoring for revenge, they want to desolate but we all have to await word."

"At this moment an orderly came dashing up and saluting handed a note to Evans saying:

"It's from Hanson."

Evans opened it and read;

"Your excellency general Evans;

My officers tell me that the Abbeannians in rushing through northern Calverinia have witnessed scenes that I or they could not bear to tell any one. They have observed the starved conditions of fugitives, have tried in vain to save little ones who fall overcome from hunger on the wayside during the fleeing of fugitives, and are furious at the sight they witnessed, the heartbroken mothers, and the panics, and desolations, and weepings of children. I have ordered that nothing in Glandelinia no matter what is it shall be spared. I'll damnate the whole of Glandelinia. Evans you start the devastation yourself yourself and the others will follow. Satisfy the desires of your men. They done much to our property and the lives of helpless children and so shall we repay telfold. Children even belonging to the enemy shall be seized, but not slain, but to take the place of those lost in our own countries. Spare nothing. Burn everything. Abbeannian Abbeannia, Calverinia, and Angolonia shall be avenged."

GENERAL HANSON
VIVIAN COMMANDER IN CHIEF."

Evans read the letter and then showed it to Violet and her sisters.

"My men will be joyous when they know this." He said. "I'll lecture this to all my officers." And he sent his orderly to summon all the officers of every rank.

Violet and her sisters went immediately to general Evans Headquarters and awaited developments. In half an hour's time all christian officers of every rank were present, and Evans standing on a high platform said;

"You men have children of your own I presume who have been massacred by the foe!" He asked.

"The men answered in a furious ascent "Yes, Yes."

"Well," said Evans with a fierce gleam in his eyes. "Your losses shall be avenged." "Tell all your men to stop their mumbling. Their wishes shall be granted to the utmost. It's Hanson's orders to be devoured by Glandelinia as furiously as we can to tear her to pieces." Then Evans read the letter sent by Hanson. Then continuing he said;

"You all know how the poor starving peoples of northern California have made heartbreaking sights for the Abbeismians who came marching in to our aid. Now boys they want to be revenged against Glandelinia and as you are all Angelinians don't let them think we are foolish enough to be too easy on Glandelinia. We first shall start ruin and go to it like hell. Spare nothing. Even if the inhabitants snip our soldiers in going through their damned towns surround the town and burn it with them together. Spare nothing. We'll win the worse desolation ever, a desolation that will surprise and even horrify the world. And we'll capture Tatini's fair boys if we have to blow it to Kingdom come."

There was a loud ring of cheers from the officers, at this and then Evans ordered Violet and her sisters to step into full view. Then he said, "Boys you all know how these poor little girls have suffered at the hands of the cruel brutal Glandelinians. You all know the pang of sorrow of poor King Cannon of over his loss in that tragedy of eighteen forty one. And you all know how the poor little girl Annie Aronburg was assassinated by the Glandelinians, and how the original Gertrude Angelina was shot down in cold blood at the battle of Eranis creek. Well this will also give us a perfect right to do all we can to repay Glandelinia. Show the Abbeismians that as we were the first to suffer on account of their dirty Glandelinian skinks it's we who will be revenged first. We'll begin desolation to morrow. Burn pegans and every darn village you get. Burn the forests even spare nothing. Make Glandelinia a fiery inferno of an inferno. Chock up all the rivers she uses for navigation, make a horrible scene of it all. Now go and tell your comrades my orders. We begin to morrow. Down with Glandelinia and her kin kingdom. To hell with her and all her wicked kings and general officers. Desolate her likeshe desolated us."

A louder cheer followed this, and then the officers went to do their bidding. The news was soon spread along the whole line, Evans had even placecards put up in every tree repeating his orders, and then sent orders to every christian general commanding the separate armies, that the moment they poured into Glandelinia to wing a wide wide storm of desolation.

"To general Williamsburger Zimmermann who was to direct the invasion in person at that quarter Evans wrote;

"Desolate Glandelinia without mercy spare none rich or poor. All shall suffer alike. They did the same to us. They murdered millions of our children, caused many others to the tortures of hell, starvation, slavery, rendered millions homeless without food, made them fugitives, ruined hundreds of our fairest cities, and destroyed without reason many hundreds of miles of our best forests. Glandelinia must be payed, and if this order is not complied with in every detail every offender will be held resp onsible for it.

GENERAL JACK AMBROSE EVANS.

Indeed this order of general Evans excited the whole troop of soldiers and they cheered from sheer gladness. Many of the poor soldiers were childless on account of the Glandelinians and were glad to get their satisfaction for their losses. Evans himself said to Violet and her sisters;

"I myself am an orphan on account of the foe, not from the loss of parents for parents not alone counts though they had been ruthlessly murdered by the foe just to steal me and make a drudging child slave out of me as they have done. But because my own home was burned to the ground, with my sisters very dear little girls like you burned alive. I have never forgotten that scene their dying cries for aid and mercy and then see them devoured by the searching flames and the vilest laughter ringing in my ears from kidnappers. That is also the reason I desire this. They soon find out what it is to drive me into fury like they have done."

Later in the evening as general Hanson was arriving a portion of his troops had been passing through a large village, and general Hanson was at the head. Snipers started firing on the troops and Hanson fell severely wounded, with many of the men. The snipers however were readily overpowered lined up and without mercy shot down in one volley. The village was sacked and burned, the fleeing fugitives, it being reported in some instances being fired upon by the enraged Angelinians and many of the men shot down. Children by great numbers had been seized, and those belonging to the snipers were detained, and the remainder sent to the rear, and all those captured of a one the fugitives held on the charge of sniping or encouraging their friends to snip the christian soldiers.

So that very night came the first brand that was to start the most horrible scene of desolation that the world ever experienced, a scene that resembled the world afire when the christian troops started on their work of devastation. During the night many near by Glandelinian farms were raided, horses, chickens, pigs, and cattle being driven off into the christian lines and all the haystacks were taken possession of and as much of it as possible taken to feed the captured horses, their own caviary horses, and those pulling the artillery. The rest which could not be carried off or retained was set on fire, and Violet and her sisters soon were surprised by discovering three hundred big fires at one location. Farm houses were even set on fire, and the farmer for striking down an officer flogged.

"Revenge indeed was started, and the first Abbeismian army to hear of it was surprised.

All the railroad tracks were torn up for scores of miles, and every car wrecked or burned. A big oil field larger than any owned by the Vanderbilts or other rich men in this country were set on fire by the Angelinians, and even great grain elevators, and thus is the reason that Violet and her sisters observed three hundred fierce fires, which threw a glare that brought Evans out of his headquarters in short notice. And all on account of the snipping. Evans beheld the many fires with great surprise and awe, and worse of all new fires were adding. Far in the distance vast fountains of fire was seen rising the skies was blackened with smoke/ the fire seeming to sear and roar upward to where the clouds extended, a thousand feet seeming ingly above a diabolical oil cauldron. Hissing like 10,000 devils and snakes together the mass of flames swirled and flared in many locations, shooting tongues of fire and flame into the air with the pitiless venom venom of many malignant spirits. There was a roaring sound everywhere in that direction like a million Niagara and Evans indeed was surprised at the terrific findings of fire where hundreds of places glowed and glowed in moulders like mammoth overheated furnaces or stoves, with one of or more of the openings exposed. It gave the impression of "Hell" with the lids off. It indeed was a sight for the gods.

Violet and her sisters watched the terrific fire in awe for a long while and wondered what had happened that had started the scene so soon when a messenger came up to general Evans telling him that Hanson is severely wounded, and that he must take the main command until he recovers.

"He had been shot down by snipers in the first village our vanguard passed through." Said the messenger. "That's the reason of the havoc you see starting now. It has begun before your time that was ordered."

"I thought something was up." Said Evans. "For otherwise it would not have happened so quick. Well let it be."

Evans then finding Violet and her sisters told them of Hanson's misfortune and they went to see him. He was lying in his tent, and Evans finding that he could be moved had him taken to his headquarters.

"Your men have revenged your being shot." Your excellency. "Said Evans. "And it is well that they did so. There are over three hundred big fires burning, and from the terrible noise I hear there something else go on going on besides. Thousands of cows and other animals besides horses have already been driven within our lines. This testifies that farms have been raided."

Later on Violet and her sisters in person just before retiring for the night were presented by some of the raiders with eight or 10 golden vases which the raiders had taken from a public building in the burning village and two large turkeys. Indeed the raid had been terrific and lasted all night. By morning, property and a mounting to $4,577,777 had been ruined and over $6,678,999 carried off.

before Violet and her sisters met and general Jael Evans told them in full detail of his experiences during his childhood. The little girls were very attentive as he told his story which ran as follows:

"When I was a little boy, my parents had been horrified over the news of the horrible child slavery then going on in Calvernia in which we lived, but though Abbaananna did not believe that the raciality of the Glandelinians would ever strike us and them. We had been warned many times by friends that the Glandelinians would do something, in particular they were warned, and several times they decided to flee, but relayed a volume warning by the Glandelinian tribune that it was too late, and that to flee my parents would be charged with desertion, as they claimed we were descendants of Glandelinia.

One fine morning when I was playing in my garden three strange men had entered my home, and I felt suspicious as I did not know them, and did not like their faces. They were repulsive looking men, and fearsome as I was I foolishly followed them into the house, instead of running off and looking for help.

There in one room lay my mother dead on the floor with her eyes shut and a gulp, and one of the brutal men stooping over her with an axe. I realized that he had murdered my mother, and running from the room I screamed for help, and just then there was other screams outside and my sisters who had been playing out in the street had been cut down in cold blood by the Glandelinians. My father was not at home, and he was not murdered at home either. I had him when I served in the war, as and he was one of our general's generals who fell mortally wounded at Cederline. The rascals carried me off despite my vehement screams and struggles, and to quiet my struggles and screams they strangled me into insensibility. For all the rest of my life I had been a living drudge for the cruel Glandelinians, had stood without murmuring terrible lacerations every day, but instead of killing me or lowering me down into bad health, my sufferings and hardships made me the toughest man I am today.

What I observed during my older days of a slavery was enough to arouse any one and it was I who really started the insurrection among the child slaves. I in person knew Anna Kronburg, whose sister one of you little girls were and still are. She was my main assistant in the plot, and she arranged everything so nicely that before long there was the most peculiar rebellion going on that the world ever heard of. First the child slaves took up the rebellion by refusing to work without pay, any more came what may, and boldly went before the Glandelinian chief masters with their complaints. They refused to listen to us, and so what was first something like a general strike, turned into a rebellion of furious character. Anna Kronburg and her sister Gertrude Angelina as you call yourself were the first to show those Glandelinian skinks that you little child slaves meant to obtain your freedom, and soon as I witnessed myself, though at that time I took no part, was the burning of ten big child slave buildings, set on fire by the little insurgents.

This put in mind that there was something serious starting, and I warned all those who were taking part in the rebellion, but who had not yet started it to begin right away before it is too late.

As you my dear little girls know the rebellion grew worse during the proceeding months, so fierce that thou children as they were, they had the upper hand in no time and the Glandelinians had to appeal to the tribuna tribunals for aid, and they themselves could not do anything, and appealed to King Proclie. Jolce's killing King Proclie, ended all help for a long time for the Glandelinians, and as the rebellion spread, among every child who had sense to stand up and fight for their freedom, and I loyal Calvernian men and even women joined in starting real battles that were bloody, and caused the loss of thousands killed wounded and so on.

This insurrection was so wide spread and threatening, as you little girls know that the tribuna tribunals appealed to the king, and he forthwith sent a large army of militia to put the rebellion down.

Now it is not confirmed which way general Hemda Shoemanna was given orders to march, but we all know that he marched through Angelina and found himself opposed by citizens of towns and country, who warned the Glandelinians to go another way, for their route to Calvernia, that trouble would be brewing if they did not, as they were invading and trespassing Angelina. D Hemda Shoemanna truthfully went back to the king to find out which way to go leaving another general in his place until he returned. During his absence it is true that a part of his force moved through the town of Crowley and another part through Jennie-Wien town, and enraged over the invasion the inhabitants sniped the soldiers.

This is the cause of the Crowley massacre. Many of the soldiers had been killed or wounded by the snipers, and the Glandelinians losing their temper threw in all their fury and committed a deed, which surprised and horrified the world and plunged both the two nations, Angelina and Glandelinia into this terrible, cruel, and bloodiest of wars. The number of children massacred in both places, was never given, though over 13,445 were found in Crowley and its streets by witnesses who saw the scene and reported it to the governments of Abbaananna itself. The Crowley massacre had caused a great condemnation throughout the world, many of the nations had their eyes on Angelina wondering what she would do over the affair. Angelina had protested so often over the cruel child slavery in Calvernia that it was believed that a single protest would be made over the massacre. Yes Angelina made a protest, with an iron hail of cannon. Just before the struggle commenced as you little girls know yourselves, Hanson and the government only made an investigation of the affair, found Glandelinian guilty of a terrible crime, and declared war against her. To now we have been at war for over three years, and when we win Glandelinia shall know what it is to trifle with the wrath of a Christian people, and all the sufferings of you little girls shall also be made atone for."

On the 21th of May, Hanson's armies were again in titan throes in a battle nearly as severe as the recent fighting with his brother, against John Manley. Shoemanna Logan glandelinian army endeavored to take possession of Omomondsonia (Glandelinia) before general Hanson arrived there in his new attempts to capture Bristol-Town-station, but were attacked furiously by Bichmells and the first part of Hanson's army. This part of the battle resulted very much in favor of the enemy, his knells came and being entirely dislodged, and the few survivors routed, and Hanson's right wing cut to pieces and rolled up with his left threatened with annihilation. Other big reserve armies were then thrown against Logan with disastrous results to the Christians whose divisions were cut to pieces one after another. Believing himself now successful, he lunged against Hanson's lines which was stationed along the Francis Marias Run the heaviest assaults and though almost successful Hanson brought up his heavy reserves and bent back the terrific assault with terrific despatch. Six times general Logan tried with utmost madness to force Hanson's army from its position but six times his assaulting columns were dislodged, and disheartened or he retreated having suffered mutual loss. Another frightful battle also occurred at Francis Anna Smith or Martaria Lieghburgling landing. It was fiercer than the battle of Omomondsonia and resulted in a glandelinian success. General Vivian having received the remainder of his army which had been behind during his last battle was soon again in vigorous action at Josephine Smith, another one of the bloodiest battles of the entire war, in which the glandelinian generals Manley, the new Federal, Shoemanna Jensen, and Bicknell Tamerline were engaged. Hanson's Christian armies suffered losses during the frightful engagement by the wholesale in officers and men and had to be withdrawn, and still greater was the losses of the enemy, whose army attacked the Christian line, with the utmost steadiness and fury of storm waves, breaking themselves against an inviolable barrier. The glandelinians under Manley in single force, suffered the losses of 10,000,000 in killed and wounded, but at other quarters the pugnacious fury of Federals wild series of onslaughts, soon told heavily on the Christian lines, and they finally gave way, the glandelinians winning a complete victory. This battle raged on April 24th. There were other battles also of very sanguinary and equal fury. The attacks on the fortifications of Titanic Fair, April 1th Christian failure, Christian victory at Vivian Jennie Francesanna, the same date, the usual unsuccessful attempts to capture the fortifications of Jarming Tess, another battle at Vivian Jennie Francesanna with Christian victorious in all of that terrible battle, April 8th, Christian victory at Ophelia St Clare, and another unsuccessful attempt on the fortifications of Titanic Fair. The Christians were victorious at Logan Zoo Rao Torrington, April 30th and were defeated at Illinda (Glandelinia) in two desperate battles, again at Francis Aurandecallio, and Logan Rosanna Hogantown, all frightful battles, which showed the fury of the glandelinian resistance against the Christian invasion.....

At the time of May 10th a local battle of exceedingly violence raged at Logannia Catherine. The enemy advanced against the Christian line with the fury of a hurricane lashing wave after wave before it, and though the Glandelinians penetrated far into the Christian lines, a fierce and deadly fire tore their main line to pieces, at every onslaught, and sent them retreating in the wildest confusion. It was second to the frightful battle of Jennie Turner (Calverina) and extended the same length, thirty six miles. The losses were equally the same on both sides though not readily given. Terrific storms of shell fire ruined towns and villages. Losses on both sides was considered over 30,000,000. The terrible battle raged fully over sixteen hours and was the fiercest along the center. The Christians won. At the same time another frightful battle occurred along the banks of the Erminia Run River in Glandelinia. It also lasted sixteen hours, was exceedingly local in character, and losses on both sides was beyond the extreme for a such short duration and was termed a second Francis Atlanta. It was readily called the battle of October Hill. It ended as a sort of Christian victory. The Christians were also victorious at Woolia Poundee Pouncee, sweeping all before them, the battle occurring on April the last, but in a second battle at the same place May 1th the glandelinian army was completely destroyed.

On April the 12th general Robert Madge Evans army of Glandelinians suffered a staggering defeat at Swamvondonia-Cassallian, but at the battle of Brohia-Hotinnia were somewhat victorious and held the Christian advance at bay for some time, until after a battle of still greater violence which took place at Ohnybillio-Journell, in which a whole Christian command the left grand division of general Vivian's army under Richard Kindernine was practically wiped out after a most cruel sanguinary fight, the first glandelinian army was destroyed, and the second cut up and thrown into confusion, the Christians finally carrying all before them and almost destroying this division

Nero and Viviania were both successful almost instantly the enemy fleeing in utmost precipitation. Next to the great battle of Cedernine Run this conflict was the bloodiest, and the greatest victory ever won yet during the invasion. So great was the losses of both sides that it was prohibitive. Viviania one of the main commanders was wounded at the highest fury of the great battle. Even before this occurred the Christians under general Butler had failed in their attacks during the battle of Margret Forde Run June 1th. There had also been a five weeks water battle on the Erminia dit being the bombardment of the Titanic fortifications by water but the Christians suffered a serious defeat. Encouraged by his great victory at Julia general Nero continued his campaign southward, and was finally held at bay at St Clare Evangeline Francis. But in the terrible battle there June 15 one of the most sanguinary of the war itself, the enemy's main line fourteen to fifteen times made a driving onslaught only to have their entire line of assault withered each time. It however was an advantage to the enemy however as they checked general Mercos advance. And to add to this at the same date, the Christian armies fought two severe and sanguinary battles of still greater intensity at Chester Francis Run, the slaughter being so great that the battle flags were covered with the blood of the fallen and torn in shreds by the storm of bullets and shot and shell. In the first battle the Christians were victorious, but in the second the wounding of their general pike Bicknell caused the defeat of the Christian armies. Another action occurred before this on June 1th at Wickey Run ending as some sort of Christian victory, and again a third bloody battle was waged at Chester Francis Run ending as a Christian victory. Also on April 24th a Christian success was won at Ledger Run, and another at Christie Wilson on the same date in which the Christians were defeated. Another defeat occurred at Seledors Barn the whole region being burned by the Christians however. Simultaneously a Christian victory was won at Mollows Marsh.

In the meantime during March 19 general August Darger endeavoring to maneuver Huebman Manley's armies out of the region of Mary Stancks Run by making a severe and bloody concentration all along the line, under support of the heaviest artillery fire met a disastrous repulse. And alarmed by this great concentration Huebman Manley shelled the whole Christian line, and launched fourteen of the wildest assaults he ever mustered before in the entire war, covering the attacks with a fire from all his batteries, committing exceedingly terrible damage among the Christian troops. General August Darger did not have good ground in which to place his own batteries of the biggest guns in effective range, and so being unable to answer, he again concentrated as heavily as he could, drove back the glandelinian assailants with terrible dislodgement, and delivered a furious attack, the Abbiannians sweeping over the whole region like a great tidal wave, vanquishing general Manley's army with the most frightful slaughter. It was a disgraceful defeat for the enemy at Mary Stancks Run, and had general Darger's army been in a condition to follow up his victory the Christians could have completely destroyed Manley's army. During the same time other Christian armies were being defeated at Erminia Creek in Glandelinia worsted the enemy at Radcliffeor Millian, and at Rodcliffe, were slightly victorious at Vandallia-Pandora, were again beaten at Wickey Vivian Resurrection Creek, and at Genitori, the Glandelinians also defeating them at the Twigs fortifications, Big Hedda Olivia and at Cromwell Olivia, and at Turner Ridge. All these battles were extremely sanguinary. The greatest excitement of the invasion was the glandelinian surrender to the Christian general Tenebre at the battle of Los Angeles, in which the city was almost totally destroyed. From April 28th to May 1th a long battle of inconceivable fury raged at Weeping Willow Oakling Swamp, where thousands of furious glandelinian onslaughts were steadily cut down like grass. A remarkable feature of this most bloodiest of battles in this part of the war was of the checking of the hurricane attack made by a force of Concentration and Abbiannian cavalry 67,000,000 strong in an all day furious onslaught there being three hundred and fifty desperate cavalry duels in that one bloody day. The losses on both sides was extremely horrible indeed. Indeed. Another great feature was of the many artillery duels which made a roar that shook the country for thousands of miles around and reverberated with the commanding thunders as to be heard two thousand miles. Horrible explosions tore up the earth in havoc beyond describing. It ended as a sort of slight Christian victory, but their advance at this location was checked. The losses were too severe to be accounted for. Simultaneously at another portion the Christians were also victorious at Pandora Glandelinia also. The battle though a christian victory cost them heavy. At the same time there was another battle at Evangelina - Glorinda but the decision was not known though reports stating over where that the battle had a horror that was beyond any ones imagination.

From Bristol-Tee-Station, to Easter Starring, and Heeda Junction to the junction of the Mc-Hollester and Francis Clammon run raged one of the real first bloodiest battles of the invasion; the battle of Madge-Evans in glandelinia or Mc-Hollester Run Junction. The enemy began with a onrushing tidal wave of men at the vicinity of Bristol-Tee-Station, capturing the whole christian position there after a scene of hellish damnation for five hours duration, with the most frightful loss in men, and even in great general officers. Later on it was finally retaken in a frightful inferno of horror the christian lines swept on, the whole glandelinian front 10,000,000 strong at this portion withered before the daminating christian cannon and musker musketry fire, Zimmermann Evans their chief commander falling mortally wounded, brigades on the christian sides were completely annihilated, and Hansons right wing was smashed to atoms and rolled up simultaneously for twenty eight hofs miles in one hours time. Christian troops were cut to pieces all along the line and Hanson withdr withdrawing the ragged portions of his lines to better cover sent fresh forces forward to recover the lost positions, these making onslaughts with the fury of tidal waves, but of no avail. Though gray lines many miles long gradually crumbled and melted away heavy reinforcements arived, and the struggle was renewed with redoubled fury, the foe pouring across the Easter Starring, Heeda Junction, and the junction of the Mc-Hollester and Francis Clammon Run in one big simultaneous wave of assault, this tremendous counter attack checking the christian attack with bloody losses to both sides, and with the loss of eighty one generals to the christian side, and ninety to the enemy of high rank.

Emergitic counter charges crushed the christian line under general Hendro Sardinia, while the center of Hansons main line was simultaneously resist ing titanic sledge hammer blows of Federal and Manley, who caused such frantic firing of both sides, that the whole world seemed to become an inferno of destruction. Hendro Sardinias whole line was cut to pieces and routed, but the glandelinian general Francis Mc-Hollester Johnston in command here was killed, and Federal Doubleday Francis arived with his great army of Abbeasunnians who covered the retreat of Hansons and general Hendro Sardinias shattered forces which rallied and gave fierce resistance untill the foe appalled at their exorciating losses desisted of their own accord. It is probable that this could be called a christian victory, though Double day was at first believed the only one who could claim the victory. The cause of the glandelinian defeat was a blinder but nature of blunder was unknown. The christian losses were withheld, and Hanson himself was wounded. Double day was also severely wounded, hundreds of christian generals having fallen in that mad battle horror. The ground and woods were desolated for the whole length of the battle line by the fury of the terrific firing of both sides.

Following an attempted massacre of helpless children at Julianna all child slaves general Bicknell Teonia Meldonia was requested to repel the advance of general Hansons army in that location who had stopped the attempt to assassinate the children, but he was in a huff over the attempted massacre himself, was not in favor of the war and not only refused to do so but resigned his command. Another glandelinian army was sent to retake Juliania but though successful in stopping Hansons advance it arived too late to retake the city, and in the terrible battle there on June 1th the whole Glandelinian army there was cut to pieces, though its right wing did carry all before it in attacking Hansons right routing it in the wildest confusion. It was again one of the bloodiest battles of the invasion, the foe resisting the following christian onsets with the most frightful fury, repulsing charge after charge, and though the whole Glandelinian army was shattered they managed to hold their own ground, and later on Hanson was forced to fall back himself on account of the rout of his right wing which had been driven into the greatest confusion ever seen among them, since the war began. The result of the battle was the burning of the city of Julianna.

Simultaneous to this came several bloody campaigns, devastating raids, and three hundred and sixty bloody skirmishes, and on June 2th general Noro got into a clash with the main Glandelinian armies at Cedernine Julia and it was impossible to descri describe the almost preternatural fury of the battle which raged here. It was another Cedernine. The grounds and lanes of Daprola Run was a regular inferno of battle, dead and wounded of both sides fairly carpeted the sides of these small mounds of foothills, and so devastating was the destruction caused by this conflict, that it was called the "Battle of Hell."

Another one occurred at Costello Melby, a grater -j one at corinth, a severe one at St Clare Evangelina a fiercer ne at Meldonia, Calvin Gallianin, all christian defeats, but simultaneously at different points the christians were slightly victorious at the sanguinary battle of Roseanna town another victory at the Junction of p v river mouth, and again victorious at Eternal Run, victorious again at plankt purg Crossroads victorious again at Angeline Run River, victorious at Mouths, Island number -j victorious at Big Ben, fought an undecided battle at Ben Logan and Meldonia, worsted again at Agathia Angolinia, fought still another battle at the same place, and again beaten, and again fought an undecided battle at the same place. These three battles of Agathia Angolinia were terrific in the extreme, but the third one was more serious the two opposing armies fighting with all their might. It was equally as severe as Cedernine and phelantonburg put into one three great christian onslaughts being repulsed with their main columns millions strong fairly crushed to atoms. An artillery duel even followed.

AA A long siege of Puggsy had also been on, and after some very savage fighting ending with the surrender of the glandelinians there it seemed evident that better success would be assured for the christians. Simultaneous to this there was sharp fighting for the possession of the fortifications of Tommyrot and parter on the Angeline run the christians were unsuccessful. This was followed in the quickest time possible with the surrender of the glandelinians at the fortifications of power, a severe glandelinian defeat at Butler at Bondonia quass, and undecided battle at Francis Farwell. All these battles were savage in their horrible fury. Simultaneously a severe engagement raged at a place called Solorodia but the outcome could not be known at all and so it was called a drawn battle.

Also at the same time a severe glandelinian defeat occurred at Melullia a severe christian defeat at Logan Andenia, a christian success at Hansonia Chirillie, and there were also severe battles at Canderlinglancoo, Moltee burn Junct on, and Goo-goo-goo-goo, all glandelinian victories. At other points there were christian victories at Kroothellio vararah, and Seollie evangeline-run, with also the wild battle of James of Saten, followed by a disastrous glandelinian defeat at Pow Povertytown, which caused the abandonment of the foe in that reason. At the same time battles were also fought and ending as glandelinian defeats, at Calvinia Finger Mountain, Jelliesania creek, Hendonburg, another at Melknigurg fortifications. Snowline vivian, the latter at which the glandelinian army surrendered. The only victory won by the glandelinians among this section as section was at Pitts a Pittsburging Island. Here during this great battle, came another of the severest fights of the great war. Both sides fairly impaired their strength in the fury of the battle, the losses of both sides being fearful, but the wicked glandelinians finally won, breaking the whole christian line all to pieces, with almost disastrous consequences. to the christian line. An expansion of the christian line prevented any serious disaster however. Simultaneously from March 31 to May 31 opetinate fighting took place in which the christians captured the city of Ignorance, Chillioe Run, collonia, the fortifications of Henrysonia, and a drive of glandelinian reinforcements was stopped at Francis Padley by a desperate onset of the christians who also won this latter battle. In the not month of April the glandelinians were temporary successful at Gelrission forks, and Bonsullinasean Five Forklings, and simultaneously a great Abbeasunnian advance on Friedlanding Run was opposed for ten days with great success by the foe. There was a drawn battle fought at the lanes of Proclio Run, Woods of the Palms, and Angeline Junction and at Meldon parger and the latter was only a christian victory. Simultaneously the foe were defeated at Povertytown, peoplaines Hills, and Thunder-mountain. They won however at peclinnia, and were worsted at gatheningburg Ferry.

A fiercer battle than any ever raged yet during the invasion was at Menagerie run the glandelinians winning a sweeping victory, and defeating the christians with the greatest loss yet, but suffering still greater losses to themselves. They however were beaten simultaneously in two bloody battles at Hansoniaburg, and in the frightful battle of Halfacowington. The latter battle lasted a fully month. Then the first surprise of the watching world came at the battle of Puggy Mullinda, the mightiest struggle ever since the invasion began, raging forty eight hours, with varying fortunes on both sides, veritably another terrible Logan-Zoe-nae-run. The losses were fearful on the christian side, more fearful than the enemy suffered but they succeeded in holding the foe at bay untill they could extricate their torn up armies out of the region and get away before it was too late. Simultaneously a ten days battle raged at Puler Clamburg, but the glandelinians were finally forced to surrender.

fought an undecided battle at Coehorn, Agathia Angelinia, were worsted at Francis Mc-Whirther, and Stancklin Aronburg, all separate battles raging on the same date, were victorious also at Logan Clybourne, another undecided battle at Agathia Angelinia, Maxmillania, were defeated at Jennie-Wren Town at Glandelinia, suffered a disastrous defeat at Knool-girl, ig, was also defeated at Parobe ck Wilkerson, suffered a defeat at Beppo London, another at Big Betschel, and Lamsinia Violette. During the same time a great christian victory was won at Glan Glandelinia-gorozane, raging three days, another christian victory was won at Judge Evans, at Mendon, and Ophelia all also on the same date. During the month of April had been also fought at western Glandelinia the battles of Steadmann, Wickey Viviania, another at Running Crowley, and patria all christian victories, but the Glandelinians were victorious at Emainie Town, but fought an undecided action at Francis Agathia. Christians were also victorious at Riches Jennie, defeated in attempt to take the Zacary fortifications, fought a drawn battle at Marrocellice Run, got defeated at Aurandehondonia, defeated at Aurandescallio, Bonhon, Vanity Pair, and at Donald Aurandehondonia. An undecided battle was also fought at cattanineta, christians were defeated at Belly, and again at Annia Aronburgs Run, where soldiers of both sides fell in too great numbers to be estimated. On the same date the christians were defeated at Chamberlane and again at Gretchen Run, and another battle on the Mc-Hollester Run. Another struggle also raged along the Mc-Whirther Run in Glandelinia. By outwitting Federalton at Albrahambra the christians not only won this severe battle but captured the Glandelinian army as well. This occurred on May 14th. On May 18th Donohues christian army won a great battle called the battle of Stanes/ll Staneslaw or panamtion. It was a victory for the foe that surprised the world for Donohue was killed and his whole army massacred. Again in the meantime from April 10 to May were fought the battles of Clocking, Convent of the Child slave Mills, two severe battles at Easter Starring agi again, one at Gerononian River, Gandonian Idols, Glen, and Dell, Norma Furkie, Ford Jackson, Francis Abbleamnia, Crossroads of the Empire, and Mc-Calle Fords all Glandelinian victories. At Maxwell Annistown the christians were slightly victorious, but were repulsed in three desperate battles at Johnstontown. Donohue was also a Glandelinian victory which raged seven days, but during another battle also on the grounds of Mc-Hollester Run, which starting March 31 and lasting till June in fighting of the greatest intensity every day terminated as another one of the bloodiest battles of the war the Glandelinians however being crushed and three quarters of the army destroyed. At pig Betty Tess a christian defeat occurred, yline Pines Bridge, and Zoe Ras Callens meadows, and along the Aronburgs Run. A christian victory was won at Hossana, Vletia guneia, and Helcoe where the christian commander Hansonia by clever maneuvers saved his army every time from disaster though he was not able to advance as the foe armies were ten times larger than his own. Another undecided battle occurred at Maria-Anna Pragenia. which was also very severe raging on the 5th of June.

During the ninth of April in the meantime a most severe and sanguinary battle raged at the Camunion of rivers but all the attempts made by the christiansa christians desperate as they were were horribly unsuccessful and ended in frightful d s disaster. Three battles also raged at Marie julia-ama on the very same date for the start another on the first of May, and the third on the last. On the last of May the christians were victorious at November Run, also victorious at the second battle of the camunion of Rivers, and on May 14th a serious christian defeat occurred at Jansinia E Wic key. This was severer than the recent ones. Early in June Johnston Jacken Manley the chief commander of a ll the Glandelinian armies next to his son, started a vigorous campaign with the intention of making his goal at Easter Starring and resume the effort to prevent his success there and this campaign commenced with the battle of Catherine norma Francemna which was again one of the fiercest battles of the war far surpassing even Big-girl-knool in fury but despite all their desperate efforts the christians were worsted. The fearful advance of Manleys Glandelinians continued but gionations great force of christians again finally barred his way under God Godfrey Wintonson and in the fearful two days battle at postery the Glandelinians were beaten and having of a serious christian defeat at another battle at Agathia Angelinia Wionstien however was finally forced to abandon his purpose, and it looked indeed as if the Glandelinians would soon end this invasion also by breaking it up like they did the others.

On the same day while this fierce battle was in progress, a fierce attempt was made by the christian naval fleets to capture richmondonia but despite the vigorous efforts the attempt was unsuccessful. Way before this battle there had been battles at Cecelia, one at Viviananna Run, another at St Michael, St Alkum and at Costellio. Helby corinth all occurring on the date of April 15th all one day battles.....

From April 1 to May 20th the enemy fought obstinately against the christian besieges for a month before they surrendered the city of panna violet. Both sides suffered woeful losses in this long and bloody engagement and the region was shaken by the frightful dia of the cannonading, of the many active batteries of both sides. The christian losses were believed to be heavier but it was much dispute by the christian authorities. From March 21th to June 11th a strong battle of long duration raged at Francis Aurandescallio resulting in the severe thrashing of the foe. This long battle was very sanguinary and despite the length and duration of the horrible battle many millions fell on both sides. The Glandelinians began the battle, the christians ending it. From May 11th to June 14th a battle raged at Violette Run a battle of extreme fury, and though at first the results were not stated or known, it was found to be a slight christian success. Another severe one raged at Gallioce Run a battle equally as violent as Jennie Turner, starting May 24th and ending June 30th with a christian victory. From April 4th to June 19th a long obstinate battle raged at Plummons. This battle was also extremely sanguinary, the losses on both sides were shocking, but the christians just the same won the victory.

During the same month a siege of Mala began followed by a bloody battle and a tremendous christian victory, but simultaneously the Glandelinians were just as tremendously victorious at Hilltown, and also at all different points of the invasion the wicked Glandelinians were victorious at Gallen flopp Forked roads, Pale Violette, two battles at Mala Renderton, render being the severest, but simultaneously the christians were victorious at Turner, at hurricane Rowe, Jainsburg, and also beaten at colonia, disgracefully beante beaten at Hoppondonia Run by the Glandelinians, this christian army being forced to surrender, being defeated also at the second battle of Hoppondon, with great loss and main commander wounded, but fortunately were victorious in the third battle, but at the cost of another main commander, and the christians were also wounded at poniaFranciana, while attempting to make a raid which was disastrously unsuccessful. In June the christians fought and won a terrific battle at Francis conia, and after ten days desperate fighting won another at Jansinn, while at the same time a two weeks fighting raged at Boonia-Scania, the city being blown into ruins by the biggest cannonading of the entire war.

In a frightful one days battle at Logan on the right of the christian lines under Godfrey, and at Mellballian Run on the extreme christian center, in which hundreds of columns of men on both sides were fairly torn to pieces and oceans of blood shed in that frightful battle inferno, the christian forces at both sections were disastrously beaten, and the whole line by this fierce Glandelinian storm seriously handicapped for many hours. Not satisfied with the christian defeat at flammington tables at the same time but elsewhere, the Glandelinians revengeful that the christians should have the i impudence to invade their country, seriously jeopardized the whole christian line in the battle of bloody battle of Jan Lawndale Run. It was another of the bloodiest battles ever witnessed during the invasion and though for four hours the victory for the Glandelinians trembled in the balance it finally ended as a calamity and disastrous defeat for the christians, and a serious gap was exposed in the main line of the christians and the enemy learning it rest reestablished the gap themselves and won a complete victory. In fury this battle came next to Francis-Atlanta.

Other engagements in the month of May occurred at Pric Princess pona, with a bloody christian reverse, and at Forrestville with a seriously storm of failures which again seriously handicapped the christian line also also on aged. In one other battle on the gridine creek between two fleets of the opposin side, ninety ships were destroyed on both sides combined, and fifty thousand men were drowned on the side of the christians alone. There were no land attacks reported during this later latter battle. Simultaneously a fearful engagement serious in its consequences occurred at Santa Claus Pilowena resulting in another disastrous christian defeat and seriously handicapping the main christian army who fought this battle handicapping this christian army still worse than the other two this occurring in May 14 and ending on the 15th. Another serious engagement took place at Graifonola, with the Glandelinians victorious here also, but the next day when the battle was resumed with redoubled fury the christians managed to stand with utmost firmness their ground and worse worsted the Glandelinians in a most disgraceful manner, driving the foe from their main line of works for the distance of three hundred miles in a months retreat.

The glandelinians were also worsted disastrously at the battle of Rushville along the Angeline Run river a whole line of fortifications north of itanic pair being taken by the christians the foe escaping capture however though it was also a disgraceful defeat. At other point along the Angeline Run river the glandelinians had engaged the christians during the battle of Columbia but were shamefully beaten and routed with the most exorbitating losses ever heard of before. This battle another nearly as severe as Francis-Atlanta, was equalled by the battle of of jorman another storm of the most frightful carnage. This battle was equally as violent lasting a full day, and ended as another glandelinian defeat. Before this there had been a severe battle at preno castletown and another at salvoe Evansville, both equal to the other two in fury, and countless were the violent storming onslaughts during these terrific battles. The glandelinians were also beaten in these terrific conflicts and simultaneously general Gandonca surrendered his glandelinian army after a serious battle beginning on the 19th of May and ending on June 3 24th. This was known as the battle of Goldenrod run.

After a fearful inhuman merciless battle at jasmun in which both sides fought with all their might, the glandelinians were victorious carrying all before them, bending and badly handicapping the whole entire christian line destroy millions of tents, and huge military stores, massacring thousands of the rescued child slave and religious in the most shocking and barbaric manner, and capturing all the christian artillery, and waging the most terrific explosions the world had ever been shocked by. It was a tragic battle to have ended so badly, but as the luck would make turns it happened to be that new christian forces came up and on the morning the battle was resumed with terrible violence a line of fortifications was speedily captured with all these glandelinian defenders, and though the battle again turned out slightly in favor of the enemy all these glandelinian prisoners were massacred for the lives of the children and religious so cruelly taken during the first day of the battle. Simultaneously the christians were victorious at the battles of Boon-Powder, and ichardson Run, and at simultaneously captured a new line of fortifications along the Easter Starring river, defeating the glandelinians also at the sanguinary battle of Aberdeensia Junction which lasted two days, and also at Ah-Omies -Waa.

Beginning on May 1th and ending on the second day was the most extreme /ly frightful battle of the western part of invasion, the battle of A al Al Amalgator. The battle was one of the bloodiest of all the invasion up to this time excepting florinia itself, and fortunately ended as a slight christian victory. On the first day after the most stubborn fighting, the enemy held a glorious glorious advantage, but on the second day they were disgracefully beaten. During the rest of the same month the christians were victorious in their attack on the stanoklin westminister fortifications, also captured the Cedeninia fortifications, during another severe battle, and took the Calmamrinia fortifications these three different desperate battles having occurred on May 5th at three far different locations. A frightful battle of the most savage description, and a tragic one raged at Homogeneo, between the christian army under general jivian, and the Glandelinian armies under his wicked son general germania jivian. The battle raged for three days with inconceivable violence, the battle field appearing like a hellish inferno. The tragedy of the battle was the almost fatal injuries of general jivian himself, who with his few officers ran unexpectedly into an ambuscade. The christians however were victorious, and germania's army was routed.

On April 24th there came again between jansons army and juebaum Manleys a desperate battle at Primary owens. It was a battle of the most frightful violence, and many times amid the frightful slaughter, the safety of the christian lines was hanging as it were on a precipice, but finally reinforcements being thrown upon the points that were weakening, the bloody battle was finally won and the whole glandelinian army was driven from the field in a total rout and wild confusion. At the same time the christians of another army was beaten at Anna-Francisanna, and again at jinnen. In two frightful battles at Rhymes one on May 16, and another June 4th the most sanguinary carnage occurred. The christians won the first battle, but were worsted during the second. The christians were also victorious during the battle of Shelys farm on the same date, victorious at the same time at Normal and worsted at Sawkill Run. A victory was also won by the glandelinians May 8th at White Rose Plains:

One of the bloodiest battles next to Iatruva in galverinia raged at circus Colly, for two days. At first during the frightful melee general janson jivians whole line was crushed and thrown back in confusion for miles, by Manleys furious onslaughts but finally jansons arrival and stand enabled janson jivian to rally and even beat the foe on the first day. During the second second day the enemys violent onslaughts were desperately renewed, but without success. A greater success occurred at Gandonline, when Williams burger Zimmermann and Aronburg with the help of Abbioannian allied fleets - of warships, compelled the glandelinians after a two months bombardment to surrender. The battle started April first and ended on the last of May. Another great victory was the sudden fall of jcanlin and the surrender of the great glandelinian army there. Simultaneously a battle beginning May 22, and ending on the 27th raged at Primary town. The one great spectacle of this battle was the seizure and frightful carnage of franklins bridge and its immediate vicinity. There were many frightful onslaughts during this horrible battle, many great retreats, and advances, and herculean onslaughts. The christians were victorious thrashing Manleys army through outly. Other battles occurred throughout the month of May and June, being the undecided battles of Appleton-Atlanta, a christian victory at Mollidell Atlanta-Run, Crowlay Callio, Padula Smithsonia Run, and Greenburg Mildredson Run. Simultaneously the glandelinians fought against the christians at zoe Rae Run, another one of the bloodiest battles of the war, but was beaten on every hand, their main commander killed, and the army seriously handicapped. Simultaneous to this came a battle almost as severe as zoe Rae Run, at Zimmermann virginia Run, which also was a christian victory. This was followed by a battle of equal violence but of disastrous consequences to the glandelinians at Mint pannaanna, it being a fearful struggle indeed almost worse than Logan zoe Rae Run, and only of one days duration. It ended as a brilliant christian victory.

Another frightful battle raged at Mildren Greenburg but finally ended as another christian victory.

On May 21th a battle of severe character raged at Andrean Gromer and at the beginning of this terrible battle the christians finally carried all before them, but at the moment when success seemed certain a serious blunder occurred, and the christian armies were disastrously beaten. On May 30th another battle raged at Childs Iatruvia ending as a christian victory. A christian victory was also won at Frandonia, this battle was very severe and sanguinary, and so was the bloodiest fighting at the great fortifications of zangustopliana which was also a christian victory. In June the christians were defeated at the sanguinary battle of Davidsonia, and after a twenty six twenty eight weeks bombardment the christian navies captured the navy in glandelinia, crippling it senseless for good and all the power-power of glandelinia.

Throughout the same months of May and June the christians were victorious at Phillips Ford, Mountain of the red cross, Americano, garzize Ford, Garnefexington, Garthage Beverly, Lexington Wilson, and annihilated a whole glandelinian army at Richard Logan. The christians were also victorious at pannon, Francis Barbara, Gandonia Margrate Run, Joan, Kerr, Marys Run, David's Run, plains junction, Kerrigan Francisanna, Francis Run, laid siege to Flipping, whipped the enemy at Atlanta gutler, but lost the battles of glandelinia Bethel, Beth Bethel carloine, and mayflower creek all very severe and sanguinary battles. Following another disastrous glandelinian defeat at Hedge Evans on June 1th came the frightful glandelinian victories at Greenburg Lexington, Torrington Schloeder all in that one month, while at garvasse-Protestant, Alranh, Yourklung, Padulieg came christian victories again. At Greenland Run in the month of June the glandelinians were worsted and during the remainder of the month of June followed another battle of pittsburg landing, Daisy Run, Gubania Stanek, and Collyer all won by the foe. At other points during May and June were the battles of Catherine Tanelion, Catherine jormatow, Jenning Lee Raymondson, and Jane Lee all glandelinian victories. Before that April 19th the glandelinians were victorious at Droner, and from that time until June were the severe christian defeats at Mollie greenina, and Aronburg jermania, another again along the Erudin, and the battle of glandelinian Run, but despite all these christian defeats a force of glandelinians surrendered at glandelinia in Flar, Zimmermann run Mills, and Chrillicandia, and Logan zoe Rae Roch, Tenobre Flapper, Hemington frankford, pattaria run and the surrender of the glandelinians at Catherine the greatest christian victories in the war. On April 1th an undecided battle was fought at Lenlandia, another at Ruh path glais, a glandelinian victory at Gattilla, and throughout June were the battles of Andersonia with a glandelinian surrender, undecided battle at Meldonia parcelio, the junction of the Aronburgs run, christian defeat at Logan Marcoellio, another defeat at Beldonia Angelina, christian victory at Nwangelina, another battle at Beldonia Angelina, with christians victi victorious, christian victories at Bichee Angelina, and Gunner Run, another defeat at the Brando Run, a vict victory at Gedenia, defeats at Francis Angelina, and Adrian Angelina Francis, undecided battle at Josephine Francis Smith, christian defeat at Pyrobenia, Sacramento California Run, and another at Zimmerman Run. Another christian victory was won along the Mc-Holleston Run, the capture of the whole glandelinian army followed with the remainder of navy, with the surrending of a glandelinian army at Dupondia, undecided battle at pil/William glandelinian victory at Callie, Mildredsonia Maxwellian, glandelinian victory at Robertsonia Andean and at St Anna Run, victory at Cattacab Grandburg, drawn battle at Mc-Farrania, a very severe battle and defeat for christians at winnow Run, undecided battle at the crossing of the Angelina and pandora, glandelinian victory at collons right of way, another battle at paster starring, and one in glandellina called Jennio Wren town.

Indeed the situation was pretty serious, for during all these desperate battles the christians though suffering defeats or winning victories had progressed no further during their invasion and all seemed lost as the christian armies pouring into glandellina had been resisted truthfully with the best of success, which encouraged the glandelinians to fight to their utmost. Though not broken the christian advance was held at bay and all depended on Evans to make headway. If he failed like the rest who fought all these most sanguinary battles that the world had ever seen the invasion would be totally broken and swept back, and the war lost.

..... D.D.....DESOLATION.....

What an occurrence since the christian armies poured into the country of glandellina and overran the whole region in one three limited sides. The enemy had showed the sternest resistance that was ever expected or experienced during the entire war, and it was during only this invasion at that. All of the christian armies whether they won battles or lost were checked, with serious consequences, the invasion was threatened with the most serious disaster and it seemed probable that after all there would never be any chance of wiping such a huge haughty country as Glandellina. As far as the war had raged up to now, there had nearly been many serious battles, and during these three months or four months there had been about 484 battles or over a thousand battles in the whole war entirely.

All eyes were turned upon Darger and Evans. If either one of these two were checked there would be no hopes of conquest, and the war would be lost.

Evans who had remained inactive all these months, had heard all about these many battles and of the results and was completely surprised, and so was Violet and her sisters. Evans however decided to show all these fellow generals that no foe of God could do this to him. He felt mortified that he had been forced to remain inactive so long and so decided to move on against against Pegasus immediately. The advance began but so strong a force opposed every line of his march that he made little headway, and during this long advancing battle called the fighting of Etna Run and which lasted thirteen days. Evans was still more mortified by this, for it seemed as if all his comrades could make fun of him and he made a sudden move on a Sunday, upon a strong wooded region near the retreating glandelinians called Sicily's woods. He threw one half of his force upon the glandelinians in a violent attack but was repulsed with frightful slaughter, and poor general pionetian the best friend of the Adrian Girls was killed.

This made Evans lose his temper, and forgetting himself he threw all precautions to the winds and raged the frightfullest battle he ever raged before, hurling four fourteen hundred onslaughts against the enemy for the duration of fourty eight hours, and repulsing himself over twenty eight onslaughts made by the enemy. The conflict was terrible to behold more terrible than any of the battles fought by the other commanders, and who were surprised when they heard of it. After two days fighting in such close quarters, and fighting with merciless fury, Evans still found himself checked, with the loss of three hundred of his best generals in that wooded inferno of hellish battle.

Violet and her sisters had witnessed the entire battle, and believed that there was no end to the stream of christian wounded being taken to the rear, and so terrific was the roar of the battle that it was simply a shocking. Evans however finally desisted in his onslaught, and acknowledged himself beaten, but to satisfy his mortification, over his horrible thrashing Evans gave a cruel and grim order.

"Set fire to the damn woods."

"But how about the glandelinian wounded?" Asked one of his officers.

"To hell with the damn glandelinian wounded, let their own comrades take care of them." He answered. "I won't leave this spot until I see those woods aflame."

This was thus the starting goal of the worse scene of desolation that the whole world ever dreamed of. Not only were these woods set afire, and thousand upon thousands of glandelinian wounded burned to death, but during his retreat Evans laid waste to everything, in his path of retreat, dammed up the rivers to flood the country, burned vil villages and town for the distance of a hundred miles, laid to waste every farm, and so on, and so terrific was the scene of desolation that the glandelinians who had been fighting the other battles were horrified when they heard of it. He even sent stern orders to every commander who were defeated or victorious to havoc the country themselves like he himself done, and soon a spread of the worse desolation, covered the glandelinian country for the distance of one thousand five hundred miles. Evans army however committed the wildest destruction, ever experienced by any correspondent who took in the scenes of the horrible war. General Darger as it is surr surprisingly to say had waged his storm of desolation at the same time that Evans had done.

DISASTEROUSLY beaten at the battle of Hodges and Owen, general Darger's army had passed through glens and farms and over plains in their retreat, and during a lull in the confusion a large portion of the troops passing through the town of Powsen Lotter with a large number of children rescued from slavery, they were fired upon by snipers, many of the soldiers were killed, hundreds of the poor children, and their main leader general Franklin Darghina.

The surviving soldiers were enraged, and after some desperate fighting they managed to oust all of the snipers from their hiding places, and they were all lined up with their wives and children even, the enraged Abbeinnians about to shoot them all down when the pleas of the officers restrained them, and only the men were killed, and the wives and children sent off southward, being forced to leave their belongings behind.

Darger heard of this occurrence and was furious. He ordered his troops to commence the destruction and to go at it to their own hearts content too and to do anything they willed no matter how mean it was. So the desolation beginning at these two locations, gradually spread everywhere, and within four weeks time it was estimated that about $56,789,999 damage was done by the enraged Abbeinnians.

In an endeavor to check the terrible scene of desolation caused by Evans armies general John Manley sent Black Brooks with a big force of Mc-Hollestonians to stop his wild progress of destruction. Black Brooks came up with his army at Stern, moving down toward the rear of Evans retreating army, while another force of glandelinians under Happy Hooligan was moving in an opposite direction to cut him off. Evans realizing these movements sent large forces around about the way which soon fell upon the rear of Hooligan's army itself, and scattered it to the four winds after desperate fighting all day. Evans was equally as successful and crushed Black Brooks army and the two being seriously handicapped withdrew their shap shattered armies and retreated southward their attempt being a crushing failure.

Manley learning that the city of Stern was burning became alarm alarmed and stopped his advance against Evans who had now started to move forward himself, defeated a portion of Manley's armies at the three battles of Mackentire, Mackenarrow, and paggot, and then was slightly checked again at the battle of Jackuires, and Goodnow. He however managed to press forward again defeating the enemy in quick succession at the battles of Locknow, Marchton, Meldin, Wallentonburg, Colinda, Ogletorp, Ogle, Strassen, Phanter, Corcodan, Atthvy Arthur, Hindle St clare, Bellens, Mc-Glurge, Banluahor, Malverins, Wentworth, Head, Kerfoot, Petition, Brookland, and Philomon, defeating Manley all these times within one month.

But by all this stormier activity his army was well worn out and was forced to rest, and so he halted near Tantomargo, preparatory to await the advance of the remainder of his army which had remained so far behind.

Evans himself had declared that the number of battles was already frightful and he could not see how it was possible for the enemy to keep up the extraordinary war so long.....

Having perceived that general Evans had halted his half worn out army at Tano Tantermergo-sacramento, general John Manley halted his army which was still fresh, also and being determined to halt the destruction which was still going on as now Tantermergo was also set on fire by the Abbeonians Manley decided to hurl a most desperate onslaught against Evans and drive his whole line into confusion before the other portion came up.

THE BATTLE OF TANTMERGO.

However in the severest battle that Evans had ever fought, the glandelinians were shamefully beaten. Manley succeeded in crushing the whole christian line annihilating the right wing of Vivianias division, and killing Hansonia Francis the highest and best commander that Evans ever had. This battle was one of the most bloody of the iv invasion entirely, especially for the size of the armies engaged, and next to Glorinia and Francis-Atlanta in frightfulness. This terrible battle started along the Erminie run, where the firing seemed to rive the world from the din. Simultaneously overwhelming waves of glandelinians swept upon the main christian line under Hansonia Vivian, whose lines stretched across the northern portion of the Easter Starring, a regular regular drama of hellish horror ensuing, and after making a storming assault of four hours duration, during which the firing of both sides roared like a thrillion cannon, the glandelinian onslaught became so irresistible, that the whole christian line not being able to withstand the shock, could not hold, and was forced back from the works, and only when almost annihilated annihilated and outflanked, did the few survivors give way, only to be also be shot down. Fortunately for Evans he had large reserve forces at hand, and the timely arrival of these reinforcements sent into this series of infernos, checked the frightful glandelinian tempest, and the battle raged at this point for the rest of the day in the most titan throes, the new force of christians holding their ground to the very last, and hurling the enemys assault back with galling slaughter. Along the center of general Evans lines the glandelinians assaulted with such stupendous fury, that he had to concentrate all his available guns to stop their maddened hammering on slaughts.

Hundreds of thousands of cannon of every make was concentrated, upon the assaulting glandelinians, and such havoc was never witnessed before, as now followed.

Whole portions of the main line of the enemy again, like at Glorinia was torn to fragments by the confetti like torrent of shot shells, and explosives but on came the survivors and only recoiled when threatened with annihilation. General Vivian himself was the fiercest engaged of the whole battle, he commanding Evans center, and it was he though his best and largest divisions were driven back all torn to pieces, and in the wildest confusion, many times, stayed that inrolling tide of success for the wicked enemy of God, and sent their main line, ten times, back crushed to fragments. General Calahan who blundered at Glorinia was killed. General federal and Tamerlines glandelinians had annihilated Vivianias right wing, with the death of Hansonia Vivian, and the cause of the outbreak of the battle was believed to be on account of glandelinian concentration toward Manleys extreme left, and along Kinderlunas front the battle had started first. The sound of the conflict along his lines at the very start had been terrific, and was heard for many hundreds of miles. Some of the marvellous events occurred also along the Easter Starring, and Erminie run, where the worse of the struggle raged. Galilias lines was also torn up during the frightful struggle by a violent glandelinian onslaught, and the whole battle line extended for over forty miles. The great battle was believed to have started at about six o'clock in the morning though it started along Evans center at eight eight o'clock. It is not stated when that large division of Vivianian force was wiped out but however it was late in the morning when the disaster occurred and one of the most bloody scenes of the whole battle was when over 10,000,000 Glandelinians bravely faced a terrific drum drum fire of christian artillery, and were torn to fragments, but quickly another ten million had rushed forward to make another desperate assault, but was also frightfully decimated and driven back in the wildest confusion. A third time a column of the same number of glandelinians rushed furiously to the storming, but more than three hundred thousand cannon were opened upon them, whole lines of them more than twenty miles long were literally blown into the air, and the rest of the main line of assault though it got in close quarters with the christian line, could not force the position, and the hundreds of thousands of survivors withdrew in a prodigious confusion. But these scenes were not the only worse as bloodier ones occurred elsewhere, especially along the Erminie run, where general Evans right wing was in action. The battle had raged all the time without any intermission, the cannonading being inconceivably terrific, and the din seemed to fairly blast the air.

In fact the battle was a literal massacre, as divisions, brigades, and corps had been crushed to fragments, or wiped out by scores. Shell bursts pierced the air in thousands of ear-splitting explosions per minute, and destruction to towns and cities almost equaled that of the Glorinia calamity. Seventy six known christian generals had been killed, in this frightful battle, in the morning alone, twenty one had been mortally wounded, forty eight wounded, thirteen captured, one fell wounded inside the enemys lines and three other wounded generals were murdered in cold blood because they would not surrender, making one hundred and seventy seven the greatest toll of generals ever seen before during the invasion. The mornings portion ended as a glorious victory for the christians, and a crushing defeat for the glandelinians who lost one hundred eighty two generals. But Evans knew that this was not all, and knowing that soon the battle would be resumed by the desperate John Manley he sent a number of messengers with orders to hurry on the other portion of his great army.

THE BATTLE IS RESUMED WITH REDOUBLED FURY.

The Battle of Tantermergo though won early in the morning by the christians had no effect whatever in stopping General John Manleys intentions, and at 130 One Thirty O'clock the armies again threw all their fury in the most extreme savage, battle of the entire war, next to Francis Atlanta. The battle first was renewed, at Iansin Beppo Run, near the Judge Evans Creek, and soon the whole country was again shaken by the titanic battle. The enemy crushed the main assaulting christian line, seven times, before yielding up the Inferno of the Shelby's woods, counter charging with might and main, every time they repulsed the mighty onslaughts. Again the general generals on the christian side fell in terrible numbers, in their desperate efforts to check the terrible confusion among their men, every time the enemy charged. Fiercer fighting occurred simultaneously for the possession of the Beppo Run, and for the occupation of the Angeline Run River, where hell and all its damnation seemed to break loose a thousand fold. Here the slaughter was unspeakably terrific in the extreme, generals fell by the score on both sides, within one hour, and men covered the field of battle in seas of dead and wounded. The main tragedy of this battle was the wounding of the main general Vivian who commanded the christian center. It was indeed a frightful day and more frightful was the consequences of the battle. The enemy carried the positions at Gatherlins Run at all costs, defeated several of the most sanguinary attacks against their own positions on the Tantermergo Sacramento Run, cannonaded the christian line with their guns on the ridges, and sustained fiercer attacks at this point but were unsuccessful in trying to drive back these storming assaults where fearful numbers fell on both sides. The horrors of these portions of the battle field offered no parallel, and against the wicked glandelinians at this point the christian commanders at times led the fiercest assaults, and fourteen assaults actually terminated into wholesale massacres. Many times a force of over 10,000,000 men were led against these positions of the enemy, only to be reduced to nearly less than three quarters of their number and driven back in the wildest confusion.

For a long while it seemed a that all hopes for the enemy to win this terrible terrible afternoons fighting seemed lost. Countless already were the frightful losses on both sides, it being again another of the most stubbornly fought battles of the war. It was the approaching climax of the christian invasion. Hundreds of towns and scores of cities had been reduced into ruins by the concussion of this battle, almost like at Glorinia, and by the shell fire of the christians with terrific slaughter among the unfortunate inhabitants. Threetimes that afternoon the enemy seemed on the point of gaining the advantage. Three disasters almost as severe as at Aronburge Run-Glorinia occurred when the enemy all along the front of Peppos lines swept upon the whole christian front sweeping it back right and left. But even here the tide finally turned after a most cruel sanguinary conflict and the enemy lost all the ground, they had taken and retaken as so many times before.....

The fall of one of the main glandelinian egnerals Ophellia was a tragedy and the whole of the enemys line at that section, was crushed to fragments after a most heavy storm of battle. One of the great features of the battle at that point, was the avalanche charge of the Abbeannian tidal wave under Augustine ST. Clare, who cut wide gaps in the enemys lines, and carried all before them capturing a field of artillery, but in this mad medium Augustine St Clare was killed. Baldwin's stand against a tidal wave of glandelinians, was also magnificent, and though he received a severer punishment than he had experienced at Glorinda, he knew how he to resent his spanking, and not only recaptured his batteries, and reestablished his broken and shattered lines, but also annihilated every glandelinian wave that attacked his lines.

Many charges equally as fierce as the worse glandelinian onslaughts at Glorinda Zoe Run, against yiviania, was made by both sides during this battle, and the whole world seemed to be torn in chaos so fierce was the murderous carnage, and one murderous drama of inconceivable horror, proceeded another in succession after succession, in particular raging for the possession of the positions along the Easter Starring, where twenty times the glandelinian assaulting waves paid the cost of three-quarter of their number for their successes, and then losses. The din of the eruptions of My Mt Calverine could have been drowned out completely by the din of the battle raging along this portion of the firing line alone. General Evans left wing was finally crushed and their works taken by the desperate pounding of the violent glandelinian onslaughts, but to hold this region of the christian line was impossible, as the christian artillery on Jennie Turner Run ridges annihilated every glandelinian who did not retreat from this untenable region.

So the glandelinians were forced to capitulate and the christians crushed upon them like a mighty storm wave crushing the line to pieces and driving them into a wild rout. Six to seventeen assaults of the most wild character and titanic violence, worse than that made by the ten million glandelinians at Aronburgs run was made against the christian left wing but failed disastrously every time. A christian force surrounded on the Erbine Run beat their assailants to pieces and a massacre of carnage, the foe was worsted on a long stretch at Glorinda Run, and many of the extreme glandelinian generals fell killed or wounded.

TH April 24th 90.000 000

THE CAUSE OF THE GLANDELINIAN DEFEAT

The cause of the glandelinian defeat during this days battle was from Manleys inability to follow up his crushing advantage at Ophellia Run, and being delayed by violent christian counter charges, until the christians there became heavily reinforced, and cut their assailants all to pieces. General Manleys rash onslaughts on the main christian center, and his inability to turn Zimmerman's extreme right, and committing the folly of annihilating his own left grand division in his own unsuccessful attempts to carry them by storm. The loss of his own central positions, after his frightful sacrifice in taking the christian center earlier in the battle and the destruction of Federals army along the Erbine Run had also something to do with it. The annihilation of Eastro patricks two main divisions during the engagement along the Easter Starring, and the forced withdrawals of one of Manleys main shattered wings, and the retreat of John Manleys disastrous onslaught against Zimmerman's line led, by picknell, Tamerline, Federa/son and Shoemanna Francis Johnston. The afternoon portion of the battle was the hardest, and Manley having attempted to force the christian center, had made final and desperate assaults, upon the whole christian central lines, and for a number of hours at this time since the left grand division of the christian center was crushed in, victory for the christians seemed to tremble in the balance, but by the arrival of reserves under Yens Hanson, and yivian Manley the glandelinian assau assaults was finally thrown back after most terrific slaughter, and so impaired in strength, that general Evans himself was soon able to throw back the whole glandelinian army. The first part of the afternoon had been an appalling disaster for the christians. One fourth of Evans entire force was not only defeated but routed and destroyed in that engagement, the chief commanding officer killed, and the demoralized christian forces driven across the Easter Starring, where they were rescued and rallied by general Kindermann and McHollister tank.

This was the fiercest conflict the world had ever seen since Francis Atlanta altogether together, the whole battle field being a regular sea of dead many weeks after the fighting. The fury of the whole battle was in describable. The losses on both sides appalling. The christian forces had surged back and forth with the enemy in the mightiest throes ever seen in the war since that time. General Evans right and left wings had been rolled up six times in confusion, with one half of their number killed and wounded, only to rally and crush their assailants. Loud thunder of hundreds of thousands of cannons on both sides was terrific, the heavens was in tumult from the din, and after the day was over the glandelinians that afternoon had lost 366 generals in killed, wounded or captured. This afterwards fighting cost the christians the toll of four hundred eleven generals killed and wounded. The losses in privates on both sides was more extremely heavy than in any battle known outside Francis Atlanta and Glorinda and was known accurately known for more than a year. However the enemys losses far surpassed the christians, and so of their highest chieftains fell in the terrible battle.

THE SECOND DAY OF THE BLOODY BATTLE

The next day the battle was renewed along Manleys left grand division the combined forces of Hansons army making a most desperate assault ever mustered before and finally throwing the whole glandelinian force into the greatest confusion that could be imagined, and a vigorous turning movement, drove the glandelinians into a wild stampede, and despite the arrival of a reserve force of glandelinians a serious disaster occurred it being the annihilation of the right of Manleys left wing, with the death of general Black Brooks. However such a strong concentration was made that the attack of the christians in that location was checked, but Evans mustered reinforcements, having received the second division of the army during the night, and this soon threw back the shattered glandelinian forces with the utmost fatally wounding of their chief commander Logan Francis Federal. Starring also delivered about fourteen desperate assaults on the main glandelinian center with terrific fury, and Shoemanna Cannon attacked the right, and these christian troops were thrown forward so incessantly and like storm waves of the sea, that despite the furious resistance, the pugnacious and ferocious Angelinian and Abbeannian assaults cut up the whole glandelinian left wing and threw the survivors in a pandemonium of wildest confusion and while another hundred generals fell dead or wounded, in trying to rally their shattered divisions, another portion of Evans army arrived to the rescue of the victorious assailants, and the whole christian line being established moved forward, though a simultaneous fire was opened along the whole foe line. This furious engagement had already continued steadily for four hours, the whole main left wing of the glandelinian army was torn to pieces, though their columns rallied again and again to the counter charge, and they could not hold their position and the whole left wing was cut to pieces and routed, with hundreds of thousands of glandelinians falling into the hands of the christians as prisoners. The firing was exceedingly severe, and within an hour had spread the same desolation witnessed at Glorinda. Whole forests were burning or laid low within the space of fifty miles, and the din could be heard far into Angelinia.

Along the glandelinian center the struggle was still more severe the christian attacking here also, and they went to it with all the force and energy they could muster, the desperate christian onslaughts being covered by a deadly fire of all the christian batteries, to which the enemy responded with tenfold fury, the glandelinian cannon committing such incalculable damage among the attackers, and tearing every division that encountered it into remnants, and mangled whole lines that the leaders were horrified, but though the main line was ploughed through and through by the fire of 100,000 cannon and which was added by the greatest fire of musketry, the right grand division of the Glandelinian center was bended back so far by the pressure of the wild christian battle storm, that it got caught in an infillade, and being annihilated, the whole central wing was thrown into great panic, and in this desperate dash the christians were soon in possession of the glandelinian artillery also. On account of the smashing up of the Glandelinian center, the foe were unable to hold firm, their own right and left was turned, and exposed to a blasting artillery fire, and the whole center withdrew and was rolled up in great confusion. General Manley did all in his power to stay the christian advance, the center having stood his ground against thirteen desperate onslaughts, the uproar of the battle being something terrible, and the whole nation seemed to vibrate from the concussion.

The attack was more terrific along the right wing of the glandelinian army. The glandelinians despite the riving fury of 300,000 Abbeannian artillery which roared with a din to stun the creatures of heaven, and which pounded the whole region into a blasting chaos, stood firmer than the other two wings did, returning a fiercer fire and adding to the frightful din, and with the most stupendous loss the christian attackers were hurled back with many shattered columns, but the foe received no respite as more and more christian waves swept forward again and again, and though shot down in thousands per minute, the survivors rushed on in that fiery storm of battle, and though ten waves were vanquished with great slaughter, tens of millions of horsemen rode against the glandelinians, and though men and horses were mowed down in frightful numbers they rode over the works.

The glandelinians suffered from a withering storm of death and desolation and destruction, the christians like a storm wave that shatters a frail ship pressing on with irresistible fury, and the foremost portion of the glandelinian wing fighting bravely suffered dissolution, sixteen million were shot down, and though the main body of the glandelinians remained firm headless of the battering storm of christian assaults and artillery fire, they found it impossible to stand ground, for the whole christian line closed with them in a wild rush and fell upon the glandelinians with the greatest slaughter. General Evans had made a general onslaught which had been in full swing that bloody morning, and toward noon the foe saw that all was lost, and Hanley was compelled to withdraw leaving the field in the possession of the christians. Thus ended the great and furious battle of Tantermergo-Sacramento where scores of millions fell, nearly equal equal to the bloody battle of Francis Atlanta and where really 700 christian generals fell, and over 1798 generals of the foe fell. It was believed to be the greatest battle next to Glorinda but there was to truth in these beliefs, as this battle lasted only a day and a half and could be termed for facts a worse battle than Francis Atlanta itself. Just as at Francis Atlanta long after this battle war correspondents could see the desolate fields, woods and country for three hundred miles the countless materilas littered everywhere, and miles upon miles of shattered forest, and burned villages and towns. The battle having had a days and a half duration lasted for fully thirty two hours.

THE BATTLE OF PEGASUS....

A little after Evans engaged at Tantermergo general Henry Dr Darger had made a junction with his uncle's army and came into a severe clash at Pegasus not far from the point where Evans himself had been concentrated before he began his advance for Tantermergo. This struggle was also very terrific, though not so severe as Tantermergo, but nevertheless the enemy under Dannon had been prepared for his advance, and struck against August pargers armies first, almost destroying it and carrying all before them. The glandelinian army was then so terrified and almost annihilated August Dargers armies, and it seemed toward night fall that the battle was lost for general pargers armies had been driven from the region for the distance of thirty miles.

Toward that time however Henry pargers armies had come upon the fields, and learning of the disaster did not wait until morning to do anything but sent general Francis George Sparr with his forces with the instruction to recover the lost ground in under any conditions..... He advanced his divisions over the fields in deployed columns and placed his artillery in one long chain, and as soon as these opened up threw his forces forward and made a desperate attack upon the glandelinian army. Not expecting an attack, especially from new divisions, the glandelinians were taken wholly by surprise but nevertheless recovered from the confusion and resisted the assailants bravely. They would have probably won, even then, but Henry parger in the meantime had sent Charles parger around to strike the enemy's rear, and these Abbeannian columns came upon the flank of the foe like a roaring avalanche, and tearing through the whole of the enemy's lines like a withering tornado carried all before them, and drove the whole main in line into panic and confusion. The battle was won, and the glandelinians retreated giving up the attempt to check the christian advance in that location.....

Darger pressed on in his advance, and for two weeks had regained recruits from many christian prisoners escaping from the glandelinian armies, and also reinforcements coming down into glandelinia from the north, and soon had such an abundance that it stretched in the longest line of men ever known before and these separated, each commander taking command of each division. Concentrating at Polydeoties or Polydeoties, was Germania's vitian army who had recently engaged his father and then brother in several severe conflicts, and who now was throwing his arms forward in this location to endeavor to check Dargers advance. It was Charles pargers armies that were confronted by the glandelinians under that desperate glandelinian general, and who were all those fierce Mo-Jollastinians.

At the same time that Evans Johnston's glandelinians were moving on to reinforce Germania Francis Stanek of the glandelinians opened fire upon pargers forces with three long chains of cannon, and then made a charge so wild and furious that it seemed as if it would tear the whole christian line in pieces. A column of 67,899,000 glandelinians had within thirteen hours made series of horrible onslaughts against the whole christian line and though they had been supported by all the artillery that could be placed into action, the christian line could not be forced an inch from their works and night closed the conflict as a christian advantage.

On the following morning the battle was resumed with redoubled fury, Germania hurling the heaviest masses against the christian line, under the support of the same heavy artillery fire. This day of the battle was extremely terrific, losses horrible but nevertheless just the same as before the whole christian line remained as inviolable as a rock, and one desperate and wild flank attack was repulsed with annihilation by the Abbeannians. However Germania was not discouraged, and the next following morning, hurled a double number of assaults, and from three directions. All day long the battle raged with still greater fury, and though the christian line was terribly thinned, and though reinforcements arrived steadily it resulted the same as the day before, and disgusted as his repeated failures Germania finally gave it up and retreated under cover if the night.

Another great conflict raged simultaneously at the battle of Marie Pickford Junction.

It raged between the christian and glandelinians in a storm of the most savage fighting of any battle next to Tantermergo. The glandelinians under William Schloeder, attacked Henry Dargers armies with such savage fury that a good part of his lines was routed, but parger annihilated the assailants at that point with his terrific cannon fire, and destroyed entirely the main right wing of Schloeder's army, and crushed his center to pieces. This battle raged for four days. Being horribly defeated on the first day with the great destruction of his one grand division Schloeder being reinforced at night time by Henry Schloeder, and Charles Mo-Farran prepared to resume the conflict the next day, and did so striking so heavily against the christian line, that it seemed that all hell could not stop them and the central portion of the christian line was driven back with exorbitant losses, and severely jeopardized by the fall of their main commander Francis Glandelin. This ended the second days bloody conflict, and in the full the christians were able to reinforce the center, and in the morning after desperate fighting recapture the abandoned positions.

Later in the morning the enemy resumed the attack and raged the battle with frightful fury all day long, but of no avail and were beaten back every time. During the evening before the fourth day of the engagement, the enemy received reinforcements, but on that day the christian attacked with herculean violence, and routed the foe who were unable to resist the frightful attack. Schloeder's army was scattered and routed, and Henry Darger was able to press on.

Since the great city of Mo-whirther fortifications, guarding vivian wickoy had fallen after three years series of bombardments, questions had been asked among the other christian nations what did the good come that was brought about all about. All do know what the horror was that the blockade of this whole region by the wicked glandelinians had brought about for those whole three years before it finally fell. During the time it was in possession of the early nothing of any kind was able to go from that airport to the other countries, and despite all the other airports it was the only one that could transfer provisions across that ten years a d breacher Louis Galvathan and McWhirther sons, stormed with typhoons of the most wildest fury every month by the score.

Thus the reason that every nation that was christian, failed to obtain christmas presents for the millions of children, and other very pleasant things given a army every year on that gloomed day.

This had caused sorrow among the children, brought on the fiery hatred of the nations against glandelinia, and all the nations who thus suffered in this manner had sacrificed millions and thrillions of dollars in their efforts to help Abbieanna and Angelina reduce the fortifications of McWhirther. In the early fall of the third year of the bloody and most sanguinary wars ever imagined, McWhirther, and Aronburg had finally reduced the fortifications into one submission, captured all the adjoining areas, and islands, annihilated three quarters of the defenders, and secured in their possession the whole glandelinia navy and submarine base consisting of over 20,000 ships, torpedos, boat destroyers, transports, and battleships and submarines besides 3,395,000 cannons. Also millions of rounds of heavy explosive shells, ammunition, firearms countless in numbers, and long lines of ammunition facie factories. This suddenly ended the sorrow of the children, and so during that following Christmas, all they suffered during the preceding years was fully made up and my how the nations did rejoice when they heard the news of how the christians poured into the country of the event in a desperate invasion, and of the widespread destruction now being wrought among the glandelinians, and of the tremendous number of battles that occurred from March 31st to June 28th.

All now fully depended upon the capture of Germaine, Jelding, Varcusian, and Fountain of Perona - de-la-greece. If these three nighties strongholds ever seen falls into possession of the christians, it is through out fully for the foe to continue their resistance against the christian invaders, but if they are not captured, and the enemy win successfully god help both Angelina and the whole christian world beside Abbieanna. As general Jack Emrose Evans had proved himself to be what he threatened to be King Cannon advised Hanson to have Evans take these three places if possible with General Jivian making a junction with him at Varcusian.

During the evening after Evans had advanced his armies for three days after the action at Tantenmorgo Violet and her sisters were sitting in a room in the sweetest recollections that children of their nature could have, when they began to feel that curious distractions that come over one who is being watched or is dead upon. The shades of the windows were not pulled down all the way, and the curtains were pushed back on the rods so that a square of each window was uncovered, they being in Evans headquarters. They glanced out several times but saw nothing. Nevertheless being suspicious that they were being watched they kept looking out, and once thought they saw something move on the porch. They concentrated on their prayer books for a while and then realized that whoever, or whatever was watching them, was at the window, and they looked up.

A fierce and sanguinary face pressed against the pane was staring in at them gloatingly---and it was an old mans face, with a dr dark black hat large as a cowboy but taller in the peak pulled over his burning old eyes, and a big black uniform color muffling the lower part. The little girls had never observed such a devouring passion of hatred and desire of revenge on any face before or since. It was poisonous, horrible. And as they stared at him at him too frozen with horror to move they felt certain it was the Geminid Geminid society of the glandelinians. It seemed as age that the little girls and the man stared at each other, and then after a furious tearing expression the face was gone, and the little girls were looking at the blank square of glass. Violet and her sisters could not move. They couldn't take off their eyes from the window it being night. When they thought of Lillian and Francis and of their safety, and they flew, kicking over a chair that was in their way, and it was a relief to hear it bang on the floor. Those two little girls were soon heard screaming in an agony of terror. Again the little girls saw a man at the next window and another at a window adjoining, and looking at every window of the place saw a man looking in, making out dimly a face peering in, and several of the figures pressed slightly against the window nearest the entrance and they heard the knob turn. Violet and her sisters hearing Francis and Lillian screaming rushed into their room, and saw three men hovering over the little girls with the intention of striking them through with a long knife. It was dark in the room but the brave Jivian girls could see them nevertheless crouching like wildcats for their prey and without hesitation drew their guns. The men had observed the presence of the girls and drew their own guns, there was a flash of revolvers from Lillian and Violet, but the aim of the prowlers was unaccustomed and they themselves dropped with loud yells. The loud crash of the eleven shots was deafening in that hollow bedroom, and added by the yells of those shot in a terrifying din. At once Violet turned on the light which was burning low, and saw that they had mortally wounded three glandelinians. The faces at the windows had disappeared. In another moment in came Evans and several officers, with poswell master Johnston.

They took in the situation at a glance and poswell said sharply: "I told you Evans that something would occur. I was not wrong when I said that I observed men looking in at the lower windows. They were prowlers looking for Lillian and Francis no doubt. How did you little girls discover the three glandelinians?"

"Why we saw the faces at the windows, and then heard them poor little girls scream," said Joice. "We saw the rascals trying to murder Lillian and Francis and shot them down without hesitation. They fired at us but did not hit us."

"This looks suspicious," said Evans. "And there are the sentries who are to watch the place. To see if anything happened to them." General Padula. "I'll give the alarm and have the other boats headed down."

The officer named at once left, while Evans going to his room started his telegraph going. General Padula soon came back with the statement that no sentries were about the building, and that footprints and blood was seen in streaks on the ground.

"Then the sentries have been murdered," said Evans. "Those men must not escape. I'll send in the morning to the sentries along the outskirts of the camp to let no one pass and to shoot any one who attempts to show fight."

He did so while poswell summoning several men had the wounded glandelinians carried out.

Violet and her sisters were somewhat shaken over their experience, but did not show it, and remained perfectly cool answering all questions promptly and without blunder. It was evident that some glandelinian Geminid Society men had been sent by some glandelinian general with the purpose to make another attempt on the Jivian girls, and three of them probably mistook Lillian and Francis for two of Violet's sisters. The three wounded men died while on the way to the hospital camp, one of them having three bullet wounds in his back. Another was shot in the chest, another the third had a bullet wound in the shoulder, another in the abdomen, leg, and throat. They even died before anything information could have been taken from them. All the lights in the house was put in full blaze, and sentries were being placed in every room and cell and corridor of the building with orders to shoot all on sight who did not give a satisfactory appearance.

General Johnston after the excitement was over questioned Violet and her sisters, about the experience they had, and they told of the faces at the window, the first horrible face, and then of the two little girls screaming, and how they shot the three glandelinians down when they were trying to murder Lillian and Francis. In the meantime the search for the other prowlers was on in full swing while the sentries at all parts of the christian lines, front and rear had received the full instructions, and all those who had wished to leave the camp were searched and questioned and given advice not to do so as no one for a while was allowed to leave the camp and that it was the general orders of general Jack Evans himself.....

Violet and her sisters had proposed to help in the search but general poswell master Johnston did not think it safe to do so, and so did not allow them to go and entertained them with a amusement and so forth until general Evans should return. Finally several of the prowlers had been captured, but the others had escaped, but nevertheless it was evident that from the confession of the captured glandelinians, that there had been no evident attempt on the lives of Violet and her sisters, or neither Lillian and Francis, and that the three who were killed by the Jivian girls had not been with this bunch. The confession of these three captured glandelinians was a revelation to all the christian generals in the camp, and all eyes were turned upon Evans when he learned the information himself. It was the purpose of these glandelinian Geminid members to enter the christian lines, in the disguise of peasants not with the purpose of assassination to the children, but with the purpose of finding whether general Jack Evans had intended to give a move to on Germaine Jelding or not, and as the red leader had gotten away, these men were now able to hold an successful spy, and sentenced by the court martial to be shot within an hour's time.

Evans had the three spies brought before him as soon as he learned of the execution of his officers, but the rascals were sullen and would not answer to any of his questions no matter what he threatened to do to them.

"In Evans said

"Whatever your intention was, or your comrades who sat away, you are now the most dangerous spies, and as your comrades succeeded in getting away with the desired information to your lines and bring an attack upon me, or something suspicious I'll hold you myself as successful spies, and confirm the degree of the Court Marshall. There he tries that you had no intention to assassinate Violet and her sisters, but that does not hold you innocent, you are spies and deserve to be shot. But what makes us all suspicious, is of your lining your faces against the windows of the room where Violet and her sisters sleep or sit. This reason you must tell under any conditions and if you refuse I'll change the punishment, and send you to the gallows if you are turned at the state. Either choose this horrible fate or die if you don't want to give me the desired information. I'll make you know Mr Evans." Said the glandelinians that no matter what you do to me, no matter how horrible, we'll reveal no secrets, no, even if you would throw me into the depths of hell. So there's no use in asking us for information any further."

"There will be a worse fate in store for you than I predicted before." Said Evans with a grim smile. These vivian girls suffered so much misery that I do not know what to make of it and you glandelinians are responsible for it. It may be true that I cannot make you tell anything, and will not request you for information any further, but mark my words, your refusal to reveal your intention of looking into those windows faces bad with your whole nation. I'll not give any quarter to your amies hereafter every time I surround them, until this secret is found out or revealed. I'll find out the reason a all right or I'll ruin and destroy the nations property till they have nothing to depend on, and will not show any mercy when glandelinia is conquered either. I'll show you glandelinia, glandelinian cobra snakes that are worse than any snake going. Get out of here and mighty damn quick or I'll kill you myself."

The three cullen prisoners were led out of the building, and Evans knowing the distance of the enemy lines from his, set out a complete dragnet for the other prisoners, and by morning all those were readily caught and brought within the lines. These were questioned the same as the others, but it was evident that no information whatever could be gotten out of them, and as the main leader of the spies alone had escaped by causing confusion and shooting down a reliable number of Angellinians and mortally wounding general Rudolph Rasmendale, these glandelinians were also burned at the state, and then charged over his failure to learn the cause of the spying Evans reserved his advance, toward Germane yielding.

He knew alright that some unseen peril threatened Violet and her sisters, and decided to have them guarded more closely than ever and decided to see to it that no harm befell them if he had to sleep with them himself. At the first halt that evening, Evans seized a large farm house for his headquarters, after his army had looted and destroyed for the distance of their whole days march, and this was found to have only one bad room with one bed in it. There was one large room in the place, and into this he had cots brought for Violet and her sisters, and then selecting the bed for any of the two vivian girls who may not like for it he had his own cot brought in, to the same room.

"There is probably an unseen danger threatening you little girls." He said as he placed a screen around his bed, and "And though I am going to sleep in the same room with you I do not fully depend on my guards, and so you little girls must see to it that all of your revolvers are perfectly loaded, and have them within easy reach under your pillows. I have placed in here a secret secret alarm alarm that when any suspicious person tries to get in here, the slow or quick opening of any of the doors will throw a pail of cold water on my head and arouse me. But des it's all my caution be prepared yourselves as there is no telling what the rascals may do."

Violet and her sisters took his hint, and finding their guns loaded with every chamber, placed them under the pillows where they could reach them without much movement. As it was not night yet Evans went out to see to the erection of his camp, and placed a number of guards around the house. Supper time came and then darkness. At that time strange noises were heard far to the left of general Evans lines, and wondering what it could mean, Violet and her sisters listened carefully, having good hearing and being able to detect any sound. They suspected something suspicious and at once one of them went to find Evans and tell him that something was wrong along his left wing. While she was gone and looking for him, he came into the place, the other little girls greeting him, and drawing his attention to the strange noise. Evans listened for several minutes, and then cautioned Roswell Foster Johnston.....

In a few minutes the great general came and Evans drew his attention to the strange noise that was heard along his left wing.

"Roswell listened and then said:

"It does sound queer but I don't know what to make of it. The noise is an investigation. It sounds like the din of a far away battle but surely there is no glandelinian army within fifty miles of us just now that I know of unless we are advancing while we were pressing on."

"I'll have an investigation by telegraph." Said Evans.

And he was off, ordering Roswell to stay there and watch the children until he returned.

While Evans was gone Violet and her sister sisters listening to the sound all the while declared that it was growing more solemn, and Roswell became more suspicious than ever. There was many peculiar sounds ten of which were more audible, something indicating the far off roar of about a thousands of lions, wolves, strange screaming noises, whistling, booming and thousand different rattling sounds, a cry as of millions of mad dogs approaching from that location, a strange dull thudding sound, a hissing roar, and a still stranger sound as of hosts crying and moaning in the air. All the solid soldiers were aroused by this peculiar sound, and incessantly far in that direction there was a storm of flashes like lightning piercing through the air and clouds.

"Maybe it's a distant typhoon." Said Villan who had come in at this moment and who heard it as well as they.

"Cannot be and it is not a typhoon." Said Roswell. "It sounds more horrible than an approaching typhoon. Evans will find out soon enough."

THE BATTLE OF GERMANE FORTIFIED POSITIONS.....

While they were listening there suddenly came another sound but which though startling was more familiar, the rolling of thousands of drums, thousands of excited cannons and the call of many bugles, making a commingled of sounds. Then in came general Johnston or all excited.

"Your excellency." He cried saluting Roswell. "Evans told me to tell you to have your lines concentrated toward Germane, making an quickly as possible. The enemy under Pemberton had and is making a desperate assault upon his left wing. The carnage is terrible. Mr. Yelle's coming to our change his lines in this quarter, as the foe are moving from all quarters to engage his whole lines."

"The battle is on then." cried Roswell. "That accounts for the strange noises." And he issued orders for his lines to be concentrated and started the reformation of the lines at the quarter mentioned. Violet and her sisters were indeed excited over this startling news, and believed now that more trouble would start out of all this. They were to move from the place also, as it was feared that if the enemy made a desperate assault along this portion of the christian line they would be in lined into danger. The cots were removed, and the house set on fire by the Angellinians. Batteries were being placed into position, and the christian troops took up their own positions.

You little girls will have to go to the rear for a while until Evans arrives to find compliance for you." Said Roswell. "You cannot remain in this region in case the enemy makes an assault for it is dangerous."

"It is true though they refused to reveal the reason of their looking in our windows that they are spies." Said Violet. "I know from the reason that this occurs so soon after."

"There is two reasons about this." Said Roswell. "Spying on us christians and trying to get at you little girls at the same time. That's the main point of it. But hurry before the firing starts. I see great waves of the glandelinians coming and we must be under shelter."

It was true. Great divisions of glandelinians were moving forward to make an assault upon this portion of the christian line, and they were coming on like some series of solid thunder clouds, which were but now grim and silent. As a soon as the glandelinians came nearer, and the little girls reached the desired place, there arose a series of the most tremendous yells that fairly shook the air, followed by a tremendous rolling roar of glandelinian musketry, but as yet the christian line did not respond.....

"Who says those glandelinians are advancing? I'm afraid that they'll force the line," said Violet. "Shouldn't Evans be warned that an attack is being made at this portion of the line also?"

Roswell thought it was to do so and sent an orderly to bring Evans the warning, and to find out what was to be done for Violet and her sisters. . . . Was this a battle? No. It was a massacre pure and simple. . . . Violet and her sisters saw one desperate assault after another repulsed with true and so complete annihilation, and then the christian columns would rush forward in the face of that terrific storm and be repulsed themselves with the most horrible loss. Shell fire tore up everything desecrable, shivered the fields with debris and flashes and the din was so loud that Violet and her sisters could hardly stand it.

At the time that fresh lines of the enemy were coming on to renew the bloody assault, general Jack Evans came up and finding Roswell Ruster Johnston, said:

"The glandelinians are making a most fearful assault along my left, and it is evident that it is impossible to hold our position in this uneven ground. I decide to withdraw, to better cover after we can repulse the enemy assault all along the line."

"I believe it would be suicide to withdraw just now," said Roswell. "It's best and more safer now to stay and fight it out."

"What do you say about it little girls?" asked Evans of Violet and her sisters.

"I think general Roswell is right," said Violet. "It's suicide to withdraw just now."

The next assault had struck the christian line with terrific force, and now as the firing grew in intensity, Evans surveyed the situation, and decided it was best to support the infantry with a strong chain of artillery and ordered Baldwin to bring up his artillery and open upon the enemy from the rear. The artillery was somewhat delayed, which worried Evans, and as the assault of the enemy was redoubled in fury it seemed impossible for the line to hold against such odds. The enemy drove like a wedge against the christian line, and as the chaos it was seen that the christian officers were soon rushing this way and that, and getting a closer view it was also observed that this portion of the christian line was in terrible confusion. However just at this moment Baldwin's artillery arrived and within half an hour the line was placed into position, while meanwhile the christian generals had rallied the demoralized christians who were fighting the enemy fiercer than before.

The enemy fairly screamed their devil yells, and launched again and again to the assault, their biggest columns were torn to shreds by the christian infantry fire, but again and again, and still again they rallied and resumed the onslaught with all their might and main. Twice they had possession of the christian works, and twice they were beaten back before the artillery was unlimbered. The more they were repulsed the more heavier became the concentration of troops and it was just fortunate that just at this critical time the artillery was ready, and now as the glandelinians, yelling like millions of insane fiends poured over the works in perfect tortuous torrents at that the artillery let loose with a tremendous roar and tore the whole line in gray to pieces. The survivors faltered, rallied and came on again but again and again the artillery opened upon them, sending their columns back torn and mangled. It was frightful but still the glandelinians with shouts of "Down with the christian dogs" rallied to the charge, and though meeting the same horrible fire made a tremendous rush, and reached their artillery and would have even captured this had not the second division of infantry just arrived in time and opened an annihilating fire upon the wild half crazed assailants. With a pandemonium of wild yells, as if the whole world had become insane the glandelinians closed with the infantry, the slaughter was terrific, and back were thrown the infantry in confusion.

Officers dashed back and forth rallying them, and pushing on until the Abbeismians broke the line in gray, poured through the gaps simultaneously, and drove the glandelinians into confusion. They withdrew, but from the signs observed it was seen that they were rallying again still undaunted and twice more desperate than ever.

The new shock came with tremendous force, the christian opening fire with the roar of a thirteen cannon, withering the whole gray line entirely but the second line poured on like a tidal wave, and general Baldwin being killed the Angelbians themselves were thrown into panic and confusion and recoiled upon the Abbeismian line in the rear.

The Abbeismians seeing it in vain to rally them allowed them through their lines, and then with a fierce yell of "Kill the ones of God, give them quarter!" rushed forward in a big wave upon the assailants and again the two armies closed and the slaughter was redoubled, men falling fairly in columns.

For fully fifteen minutes it seemed as if the Abbeismians themselves were getting the worse of it, but in the meantime general A. Antoninian had arrived with the big force of concentinians and these were thrown upon the glandelinian assailants, who were now checked, but it seemed impossible to stop the terrific onslaught. Indeed the battle was terrific and horrible along the whole christian line. Then and there it appeared as under Joshua's hand, as it was his glandelinians who were making the desperate assault, and only his glandelinians would attack with such frightful fury.

Toward 11 O'clock Evans observed that general Tanley was sending again against his right wing a column of 56,000,000 glandelinians no doubt to not only assault its front but to make a desperate turning movement as well. The din of the battle at this time was terrific and universal, and it shook the ground for hundreds of miles like an earthquake, and Evans was still more worried. He however warned the commanders of the right wing of what he had observed, and so they were prepared. The struggle along the right was more frightful and this desperate assault lasted without a moment's pause all the rest of the night, in a series of attacks that offer no parallel and fifteen times the glandelinian columns were repulsed and torn up or annihilated, and fifteen times the assault was repulsed all along the line, and driven back by furious counter charges.

Violet and her sisters not able to sleep on account of the din of the bloody fray, took up their signal work, and warned the christian officers every time that they observed anything suspicious.

Along the center during the meanwhile Evans had been directing the planing of his main battery of artillery, and while he was preparing to meet the new assault along this quarter he saw an appalling sight.

It seemed as if Tanley was throwing forward his entire center against the christian line. The artillery opened before the infantry started firing, and tore thousands of gaps in the enemy lines, but still they came on, but silently this time. Soon it was the wildest storm of battle ever seen since the battle of Tantenmargo and was now becoming a worse conflict than that one.

When within one hundred yards of the christian line, the enemy suddenly filled the air with their deafening yells, and then rushed forward in one simultaneous wave firing a furious storm of musketry as they did so.

Still the christian infantry was silent, then came the order fire, and for a moment there was nothing but a regular inferno of flashes, and a volcano of flame and din, and when the smoke faded away, groups of what had been the gray line was retiring, some still advancing, others kneeling and firing, and soon melting away. It was a horrible slaughter, but the main part of the gray wave came on, and reached the infantry line itself.

A panorama of terrific horror again prevailed land to land, and now the second line of infantry prepared for the struggle. The first line was broken and cut to pieces, and driven back, but the enemy met such determined resistance from the second line of infantry that they could not progress any further, and being galled by the Abbeismian fire, and appalled by the fury of the Abbeismian roll, they recoiled in panic, and then the Abbeismians with fixed bayonets rushed then like hunts men at a terrific fox chase, and drove the glandelinians before them in a total rout.

Nevertheless they had the second wave of glandelinians to deal with yet. Evans riding up to Roswell Ruster Johnston said:

"I don't believe I ever saw the enemy attack with such wild fury as they are doing. It seems as if they mean to force me out of my position alright. If anything happens that is suspicious notify me."

At other portions of the line the glandelinians were advancing in a long line rushing forward an avalanche of musketry fire before them and the Angelbians at this point were driven forward like sheep, and though hundreds of thousands tried to force themselves through the line, they suffered the most terrific losses, and the survivors driven forward and shot or cut and bayoneted to death as they retreated. Columns of Abbeismians rushed upon portions of the gray line in that seething inferno but could not check them, the glandelinian column being a regular gigantic dragon which fairly drew in the inferno of christian musketry fire, but notwithstanding the glandelinians carried the Abbeismians forward toward the rear, and one line after another was caught in the dragon's mouth and were driven forward with terrific loss.

"We are sweeping the region clean of the dirty christian dogs," Tag laughed general noblin of the foe.

"And it's the kind of a brood these Abbeismian fellows don't like," added general Mark. On went the Abbeismians hurrying forward so as to get at around the gray line but failing to do so, were being taken prisoners, but fortunately columns did not get around the line by using their horses forward full speed and fighting desperately like demons. On went the desperate glandelinians driving the christians before them, the end of the gray line pressing on faster than the center, this preventing the casual escape of many christians who might have gotten away. But this driving success of the enemy at this point did not last long. Evans had heard of it and sent large reinforcements, which arrived in time to place the glandelinian assailants between two fires, and tearing their line to pieces, rallied the panic stricken christians, who then counter charged and routed the glandelinians worse than they had been routed themselves retaking all the men who had been captured, and taking one million glandelinians as prisoners.

Turning soon toward Manley had not hardly made any impression on the christian line. "He was almost discouraged, for now he realized who his adversary was in person, not having known before, having expected that it was either general Hanson or Evans' army that was moving on Germano fielding. But it was general Jack Malrose Evans, the fiercest of all the christian generals of all the armies surviving under him. He was most dreaded by all the glandelinian generals, who knew him especially, and many had did their best to avoid collision with him or his army. But though discovering the truth, Manley still having two large fresh armies to his credit, decided to force Evans back or be thrashed himself. "We must crush Evans," he said "Or be crushed ourselves. He is the worse of all those christian dogs, and if nothing can be done to stop his advance for Fountain Of Fresno De La Grèce our cause is lost. We must fight it out to the last, and suffer the consequent consequences."

Most of his best officers were disagreeable about his plans and intentions of resuming the battle against such a large Abbeoninian army, soldiers more dreaded than the Angelinians, as about as desperate a set of fighting men as us Americans ourselves.

The battle in after having raged with most frightful fury all night long, had lulled at the dawn of day, and the lull gave Evans an ample time to reestablish his lines, and place fresh troops in the position, to relieve those worn out by the nights desperate fighting. Violet and her sisters had not slept a wink that night but nevertheless they did not say anything and hoped that the battle would not be of long duration. But the battle was soon resumed with redoubled fury along Evans central wing. Without sending forward a single skirmisher the glandelinian generals threw forward over 71,000,000 men against the christian center, in a tremendous headlong assault that surprised the christian officers. Such was the violence of the titanic conflict, that Evans was kept busy concentrating fresh artillery and in lantern hour by hour, withdrawing those fatigued and suffering intolerable losses, and general powell master Johnston himself, kept on bring up reserve forces in a desperate effort to stop the enemy's wild head long on rush.

The attack was something terrible however, and though ten waves of glandelinian Glandelinians twenty miles long were blown to pieces, and galled by the severest masonry fire the survivors were impossible to be stopped and soon the whole christian center was driven from their position and thrown back upon their own rear in uncontrollable confusion. Ten christian generals fell mortally wounded, and powell master Johnston was disabled, and thirty generals were killed. The whole christian center was rolled up, and driven from the field, a situation which jeopardized the other two wings. Even the glandelinians had captured all the christian artillery, and Evans headquarters also, but violet and her sisters had escaped, though glandelinians had pursued them and tried with utmost desperation to bring them down with well aimed shots.

Evans who had been at a different portion of the line at this critical time discovered through the signal corps this disaster, and learning that the main general commanding the center was seriously wounded, sent general Kindernine and Richardson Halated to recover the lost ground. Kindernine arrived first, with 1,000,000 cavalry, and 56,799,999 infantry, and soon tested the field with his frightful preternatural fury, but the glandelinians after a desperate conflict of three hours annihilated his cavalry and artillery corps, destroyed Kindernine's left wing, and closed with the remainder of the christian line in a clash at close quarters that was too terrible to describe. Amid the dreadful carnage Kindernine fell dangerously wounded, and general Richardson Halated was ten miles away from the point yet. He however arrived in time to check the confusion, and made a brave stand, but sent in word to Evans that more troops must be sent as he was not able to hold his ground, not even for an hour. The enemy made a fearful titanic assault along Richardsons whole line, a storming assault of the most indescribable violence, and though repulsed after ten minutes fighting had succeeded in tearing Kindernine's army to pieces. Kindernine's chief commander, Hatbroth Harry was killed, and general Walteson mortally wounded by the explosion of a shell. Kindernine had wisely held his artillery for the main emergency, and these were now unlimbered during the short lull, and were ready when the enemy resumed the assault against his lines. The glandelinians soon came on again with fierce yells, the infantry held their fire until the enemy were within ten rods off and then let loose loose with such a withering fire that the glandelinian column was staggered. But the survivors rallied at the yelling commands of their officers, and came on with a wild rush. The artillery then opened with shells, cannon balls, and double charges of canister, the guns being loaded to the muzzle, and the glandelinian wave was shattered to fragments. But still still on came the survivors until a second discharge tore them down in hundreds of thousands at every discharge, and then panic stricken and demoralized, they gave way and retreated in confused confusion. Kindernine's army by this time had been considerably reduced by this time, but rallied pressing forward during his second success reunited with them and thus added to their number were able to repulse a third onslaught on onslaught with better success.

General Charles Brown having been sent to Kindernine's aid by Evans reached the scene just as the enemy was making a fourth assault, covered by a tremendous drum-fire of glandelinian artillery, a chain of active batteries which extended for the distance of thirty miles, with a gun placed at the space of ten or twenty yards apart. This cannon fire was horrible and threatened Kindernine's army with annihilation, and so unendurable was the shell storm that the whole line torn and galled frightfully from front to rear had to recoil toward the northern banks of the Delibellies gun.

Charles Brown's artillery however was being unlimbered and as the glandelinians were coming on yelling and opening a storming fire of masonry that brought the christian soldiers down like falling leaves in a hurricane Charles Brown cried:

"Stop those yelling devils in gray. They must not progress any further."

On came the glandelinians screaming and yelling like millions of gorgons and demons put together. The fresh christian artillery opened fire with a withering roar, huge columns of glandelinians were blown to pieces, annihilated, the whole line was shattered so terribly that the gaps could not be closed, but still the huge portions of the torn line came on, and like a series of huge waves, swarmed among the artillery and came to close quarters with Brown's first line of men. But they really could not progress any further, and the survivors with their tattered flags fluttering in the breeze gave way, and the whole three divisions of christians uniting moved forward in a long line, again opening fire all along the front, and pressing the foe back step by step.

Shells were tearing up the christian line everywhere, bursting in the air, and making a tremendous roaring din, but the onrush of the christians was completely successful, the lost ground was regained and the whole shattered line of assailants driven clean back to their own lines. Charles Brown wanted to make an immediate assault on the enemy's lines to pay back for the reduction of the christian center, but Evans did not think it wise to sacrifice too many men just then, and wisely refused to have it done. He knew Manley's intentions well. It was his purpose to reduce his army beyond repair, whether he won or not, and then when opportunity presented itself to cut him off from all supports and crush him so that he could be able to break up the christian invasion. To repel and not attack was the best motto, and so Evans refused to allow any serious attacks to be made on the enemy's lines.

As far as matters goes, no attacks as yet had been made on either the right of the christian line, or the left. It had been Manley's purpose to storm the christian center with all his might, reduce it, keep it reduced, and roll it up from the field. He had been temporarily successful in this, but then failed utterly in the end, and was now expecting every instant that the christians would rush forward and storm his own lines. Though not expecting the outcome of an attack, should it be made, Manley did truly dread it and hoped within his heart that the christians would remain on the defensive.

Over his failure to force the christian center Manley decided to withdraw his lines to stronger positions and then try and induce Evans to attack him and in this reduce his army so terribly that he would have to retreat. Evans however was informed of this movement, and to prevent it started at once a tremendous bombardment with all his artillery and for two more hours that morning two hundred thousand christian cannon pounded the foe's lines with ten fold destruction, and though the glandelinian batteries all along the line responded with great stubbornness, it was of no avail and Manley was losing cannons by the dozens.

Evans himself was driven to rally the broken christianian ranks under the various standards along the shattered christianian center. On this horror-stricken field, not on this day of warriors, but afterwards, he displayed not only cool courage, but the reckless daring of a champion on a battlefield. He so exposed himself during the fearful evening that hundreds of bullets passed through his coat and armor, and also his hat, and the Mc-Hollensteinian, and girier or him who tried furiously to bring him down thought he bore a charmed life.

During the whole battle along this point, the christianians of the wild Mc-Hollensteinian gladiolians strove with such will and valour, that afterwards this position was to be called, the dark and bloody rounds of catons inferno.

Indeed it was almost a fatal battle for both the Abbeismians and Angolians, in which the whole christianian center had three times been beaten with terrific slaughter, by the great forces of girier mundans, and Mc-Hollensteinians. Under the having of his men pushed back, finally and overthrew the strong force opposed to him, but meanwhile the gladiolians destroyed the main right wing and center, and got round his rear, so that there was nothing left to do for the remainder of gladiolians men except to flee with all possible speed.

However Evans saw a way to crush back the Mc-Hollensteinian assailants and so sent large forces of men under generals Nichols, and Horvick Johnson to get to the rear of the desperate gladiolians assailants. Within twenty minutes Evans was heading 5,678,400 men to the rear of the assailant column of Mc-Hollensteinians, and driving the gladiolians by a wild flight. Evans also moved about 3,456,780 men to the right, and having thus brought his forces into position he ordered a general assault on the flank, and the Abbeismians proceeded to storm the whole gladiolians force on its sides. The fighting was now a hotter one than ever, the Mc-Hollensteinian regulars stubbornly holding their ground. The gladiolians attackers were now cut unnumbered three to one. Nevertheless the advantage of the fight was entirely with the foe for they as said before stood their ground stubbornly, and Evans himself who was in the midst of the frightful fray with his soldiers within five minutes this was so blackened with powder and smoke that he could hardly be recognized. One desperate assault succeeded another with frightful fury, while the firing on both sides was now so incessant as to make a continuous roar. At the end of an hour's fighting the Abbeismians finally swarmed among the desperate gladiolians, bayoneting shooting and beating down the gladiolians soldiers right and left in as many a number as never could be counted, many of the foe ordered his infantry charge, and the dragons with their sabres and lances to force their way through the flanking christianian line, and though they were successful in this charge Evans himself fell mortally wounded.

The flanking christianian line was averting, but Evans rallied his line and putting in general Mc Warner with one million one hundred thousand men who had just come up, stopped the gladiolians success for some minutes and forced a portion of the tremendous gladiolians wave back with the loss of half of their number.

The christianian attack had been so quick and terrific, that the foe commanders did not know what to make of it. Every body of gladiolians in turn when charged and counter charged by the gladiolians regulars was forced to give way, but the Angolians only retreated through that blasting inferno only as long as the charge lasted, and the minute that it stopped, they stopped too, and came back even closer to the seething gladiolians forces and over with a deadlier fire. They rushed the foe with tremendous fury opening a heavier fire to which the Angolians who were advancing with the Abbeismian columns opened in their own turn, and a no sooner had the christians opened fire, than the charging column broke into a run, and in a moment a tidal wave of purple and red center plunged into the solid gray wave, roughly handling the whole line, so less than seventy of two hundred twenty christianian officers being either killed or wounded at the outset of this terrific charge, but as the other columns came up, both burst through them through the solid gray wave, and swarmed among them as before. The gladiolians fought well yelling and cheering loudly as their volleys rang of their bayonets clashed, but the ferocious Abbeismians would not be denied, and rushed silently on to try and end the contest with that bayonets, and volley firing. A bullet struck Evans in the head. He fell but struggled to his feet and forward, two of his officers supporting him. A spear went among the men that he was dead, but it only pulled them to charge more one fiercely than ever. With a wild rush the troops swept upon the furiously fighting gladiolians soldiery. The Angolians had run bodily into close quarters they fought hand to hand with their foes but were speedily overthrown, the bayonets of the foe flashing fiercer than ever, then the christianian line broke as their assailants charged against them and recoiled on a run.

No attack of any kind was ever delivered with greater boldness, skill and success, as had been done by these ferocious Mc-Hollensteinians, and Zimmermanians. All of the well known grinning gladiolians victories, showed that the fierce gladiolians of these sorts were to be feared when they took the offensive or defensive. The gladiolians even now had showed the christianians that they could hold the point they had gained in their victorians assault with the bayonet against the Abbeismian regulars, who held a fortified place of impregnable strength, and no other army of soldiers in America of other countries has ever displayed greater energy and daring, a more resolute courage, or bolder resource, than these mad Mc-Hollensteinians, and Zimmermanians. Evans learning that his aid by his own name was killed and that his flanking assault had been unavailing, and that ten divisions assembling the enemy on the front to recover the lost ground was unsuccessful did not know what to do. In this bloody contact, no man can imagine whether he was or not, what yelling and hideous roaring of screams, and devil cries the gladiolians soldiers made all the time during the frightful evenings. All the yelling and roaring of Apoll Apollon, who was fighting christianian in the Pilgrimage progress, or all the horrid noises that christianian or even his families witnessed and heard in the Valley of the shadow of death, was only compared to the screaming and outcries of happy children while at play. And only God alone could tell you how horribly and he liked the firing of the opposing sides did rage, and so terrific was the gladiolians devil yell, that not even all the demons in hell could have stood it, no not even the heavenly beings, may all the dragons in fairy stories or other books, would have dared to face these ferocious Mc-Hollensteinians and Zimmermanians when they set up their resounding universal "Devil yell!"

The scores of thousands of guns loomed up thundered on the grim gladiolians gladiolians fired and loaded, working like demons. The cannonading and infantry charges of both sides was tremendous, and no one could have hardly observed the scene for the wreck of flying skeletons of trees, and wild yards of earth and dust and smoke. Cloning once again the opposing forces bowed, backed, bayoneted, shot and thrust at one another with the savage ferocity of fiends, and the Abbeismians the soldiers were suffering terribly. General Manners of the foe himself was severely wounded, and realizing how that he was doomed to defeat unless by some most desperate effort he could avert it, he threw forward the heavy Mc-Hollensteinian supports. The first rush of Angolians perished by shot and steel. The combatants slashed and stabbed and fired at point blank with the most savage fury that could be ever described, and the Abbeismian assailants were driven back once more. Wounded general Manners sprang to the head of his division to lead them again himself, when a ball fired by one of the Abbeismian soldiers crashed through his skull, and he fell sword in hand with his face to the stalwart christianian foe, dying as honorable a death as ever a brave man died in fighting against tremendous odds for the flag of his wicked country. Wicked and unkind of God as the gladiolians were, there were found not even in our nation in this real world braver men.

The hand to hand struggle was indeed more terrible than any with which writer could describe. The Abbeismians backed at the gladiolians soldiery and strove with right and main, and with reckless bravery and fury to force their way through the solid Mc-Hollensteinian lines, stabbing the gladiolians with their long pikes, slashing at them with their sabres, and striking them with bayonets and water cannons. The scene was an inferno of flashes, flames, smoke and a howling savage slaughter, and the air was rent by the universal yell of the gladiolians, the heavy tramping on the ground, the roars of the wounded, the din of weapon meeting weapon, the crash of musketry and pistols at point blank, and all the most savage to wit of a desperate hunt to hand fight. At one portion the reckless Abbeismians burst with terrific fury through a portion of the captured position line and forced their way through to a portion of the captured position killing and wounding thirteen gladiolians generals, but elsewhere the christianian assailants had now been beaten back, and had rallying his great gladiolians bull dogs, led them forward with a rush, and the foremost Abbeismians were all killed, killed or wounded, and many others made prisoners. The most terrible a million deal of the battle elsewhere along the center was still carried with redoubled fury, and all this while the result had seemed to be in doubt but the gladiolians numbers showed themselves to be far more skillful than their christianian antagonists, and gradually getting the upper hand they finally silenced every piece of Abbeismian artillery. All of the those Abbeismian troops were fresh from victorious victories won over the most renowned marshalls of Manley earlier in the war, and over soldiers that had proved themselves on a hundred stricken fields of battle infernos the masters of all others during the whole gladiolians-Angolian war.

At Francisco - Atlanta they had driven "niggers" from a position fortified around or then that were captured and held by the Forcecious "Mc-Hollsteinians" and not this time in a way but under the same kind of "Glorious glandallianism".
At Acapulanga Run, Logan Zoo Two Run, and Francisco Saltwater Run they had carried by open assaults fortified positions and hills and plains, whose strength made the intrusions of the Glandallians very in possession open life and walls built by children, though these fortified places were held by the best glandallian soldiers. With such troops to follow him and with such victories behind him it did not seem possible to any of the Abidennians to imagine that the assault of the terrible Abidennian Infantry, and Glandallian Intimations could be so successfully met by more Mc-Hollen tinnian Forcecious as they were, but they had found out that the Mc-Hollsteinians were a new kind of Glandallians, fiercer fighters than the Abidennians the selves, and all the might and most desperate efforts to retake the lost positions had not with fruitful slaughter.

The Abbotians moved forward, were swept down in whole columns, the survivors still pressed steadily forward, three fourths of the distance was again covered, and the eager Abbotian soldiers broke into a run but shots of flame burst from the breastworks in position of the foe, as the wild frenzied Landoltian military fire line upon the incessantly added by the tremendous slaughter by fire of 20,000 guns. Under this sweeping fire the word of the Abbotian was shattered beyond repair, but the whole column did not stop but surged forward about to the foot of the breastworks, but not a man for a while lived to reach them, but the surviving troops did not break, waver or run back but halted and poured in a most fierce storm of masonry fire. And with shouts and rage fainting, and Pearson and Kindersine rode along then to lead the forward ones were wounded as the three commanders were, and many officers sprang around them cheering on the men who never wavered. The assault was tremendous and shook the Abbotians again coming forward to the charge, despite the hail storm of shells, and hurricane of bullets from the Landoltians. One shot struck Frederickson Pearson himself, and he reeled and fell from the saddle and was carried off the field. Halted and Kindersine fell severely wounded also.

and was carried off the field. Alcala and Caballero were obviously wounded also, but the assault of the Abbaominians was continued with redoubled fury, the charging Abbaominian soldiers rushing to the very top of the breastworks in a fearful torrent, but they were all killed or driven back. It was a terrible terrible slaughter, almost equal to that of Francis Atlanta, and a lot of of Abbaominian troops, 1,000,000 strong crossing the Bedford river were ordered a division of Condorcinian "e-Molletinians" were in turn annihilated by a slaughterer's fire of artillery from the right of the "e-Molletinian line." The claudolians had accomplished what no other claudolians force had accomplished throughout the long war in the Angellian Peninsula called Calaveria. They had won in a fair fight a far larger force of the best of King Camous Abbaominian troops, and indeed it seemed evident for a state that the christian victory was still.

The heroic and dignified character of the gallant leaders and the tenacity of the men, who lost one hundred and thirty six flag-bearers out of three hundred, who led the army making the flag-bearers out fourth, and who were brave Gladiators, earned officers. Just as on the late great African war effort, forces were met, the first tremendous charge the last color-bearer of the gladiolus ten tenacity corps was shot, when the christian the crown a withering, searching fire of the men set intensity.

Thus the glauclimian flag fell in the open. A glauclimian general by the name of Perry instantly ran out into that area firing something in form of firing to rescue it, and as he reached it was riddled with bullets and had his heart torn out by a shell, another general Francis Murray made the same attempt, and was also killed being riddled with a thousand bullets, and so was a third general Moore late Col. Twenty private soldiers met a like fate. The Abbaconian fire was so terrific that it seemed as if God's holy angels could not have lived in it themselves. Each of these brave glauclimians were killed close to the glauclimian flag, and their dead bodies fell over an across its another. Taking advantage of this breastwork Lieutenant general Mattelton, world's wise "an escaped felon" behind the body covered intrenchments to the colors, seized them, out under a screaming typhoon of Abbaconian snubbery fire, and then mortally wounded himself here back the blood was trophy. Another horror like this simultaneously took place at another point of the Maconic lines where general Froggess division of Zamar manians formed a part of the attacking force who were or striving to drive back the counter attacking Abbaconian tion. The resistance and fighting was too desperate to describe in any detail and the story of the Abkhazian fight was uncomprised. At one point it fell to the lot of this division to bear the brunt of the attack back the wildly attacking christian life under Kanderudine. Moving forward to counter charge the Zibermanian force was swept by the fiercest searching and measuring; fire ever experienced, but for a thin line won the bloodiest of charges the war had ever seen itself. Young general James Taylor ignored a man of sixteen years old at that, was carrying the flag, and was killed after being shot down thirteen times, as many times rising and struggling onward with the torn and tattered colors. The last time he fell in that bloody inferno the flag was seized by private George Grotched Schilder and when he in turn fell riddled by bullets, by Hayniea Shmirkler.

The fighting along the whole line was very heavy, and in the charges that was made predicted before both sides had passed over nothing but a sea of dead and wounded. Evans in trying to restore a part of his line when the center had first been forced back and the position captured, by the foe passed over what had been a gladiolus division. The gray coated soldiers were lying, both ranks, privates and officers, as they fell, for so many had been killed or disabled that it seemed as if the whole population of the world was prone in death. It indeed seemed as if the whole army had lain down hugging the ground in death, and Evans was almost horrified at the sight of the immovable, losses of the gladiolus alone. One of his privates named John Francis had been a wonderful shot and having received permission to use his own rifle as a weapon accurately adjusted for very long range, had while charging and halting under the typhoon of shot and shell and musketry firing, driven away every man from a gladiolus battery, killed the owner a few yards as they came forward to fire. At the end of an hour or so a piece of shell took off a piece of his rifle and killed him. A tri hit at one time of the battle Evans himself had been almost caught in a trap. Opposite the Abbiannian lines at this point were some haystacks near a group of large farm buildings, both right in the center of the "collethian position where the enemy slaughter fire was the hottest and sharpshooters stationed a long time ago. Evans thinking that they were gle held by a few skirmishers who to where the seventh corn corps was fighting, directed along the snow and sent to General Hyde.

"General Pitt take your division and drive the enemy from those trees and buildings."

Evans started and said that he had seen a large force of Neo-Hollsteinians go in among the buildings, probably ten divisions in all. Evans answered "Do you think you and I can make 'em afraid to go sir?"

The general answered:

The general answered, "As you will sir, and the order was given and at the word "Attention" The force sprang forward on horseback. With the division were two young officers who carried the Bibles of Angelina and Emma ordered them to the rear, and Violet and her sisters also who were bound to go with him. They pretended to go but as soon as the division charged, came along with it. One of the boys lost his arm, and the other was killed on the field. Evans gave the orders to left face and forward and the men marched on in front of a fresh Confederate division which moved beside them at the command, then facing to the front under a merciless withering fire, they crossed a series of wooden roads which were so filled with dead and wounded Confederates that all the men and Evans' horse had to stop or they would get over. Once across this crushing smoking inferno, they stopped for a moment in the track soon to straighten the line, and then charged forward to the right of the barns, where so many baskets were strung like millions of tin firecrackers. On they went at the double quick, fifteen thousand Confederates ahead under General Butler, Evans on the right of the column and General Haskell to the left on a hill horse. The latter was shot down at once and was hit horse, pierced by a frightful number of bullets, and Evans rode out in front of the division just in time to see a long line of men in the gray line from behind a long stone wall and wooden fence of low built houses in a valley. That showed another column of the finest leaders in a storm. Appreciative he then ordered his men to turn to both flanks. Just as they were about to start to the right of the barns of which seemed to be the first line of men, Evans' horse from a battery, Evans being some twenty feet ahead looked over his top and saw several divisions of "Confederates" just close behind him, all riding at the head, and so he gave the order "left flank," and still at the double quick, took his column past the buildings and barns, turned a long corner on the little side, kept that in front of the back before they were cut off for they were forced to cently then their order to get; there the order to expect to be able to take advantage of a fellow, and partially to escape the destructive flank fire on his column. To hope to take the horse and in vain for the single division found it opposed to portions of more than fourteen independent divisions of the Confederates, at least a dozen divisions of the Confederates. Then got to the orchard fence general Pomeroy advanced upon the tall pines to let through Evans horse. While he was doing this a shell fragment struck Evans in the back, and the men all laughed at the attack of the Confederates. Getting into the orchard there was a slight rise of ground, and the Confederates fired volley after volley at the Abbeismian and then charged them with greater savage fury than any learned man could ever describe and a second threatened the firing and so fierce and so close that Evans horse was wounded twice but was still able to go on. No sooner were they on in red beyond the fence, leaving any of their fallen behind than they got into line and met the Confederates as they came crawling forward rolling like demons, with a fierce slaughter; fire, and then counter charged with tremendous fury driving the Confederates, with three columns annihilated. The color corporal was still carrying the colors though one of his arms had been broken, but when half way through the orchard Evans heard his call out as he fell:

"For God's sake somebody come and save the colors as the foe are making with such force and fury as if all hell will not stop them. There was a frightful pandemonium of yell and racket shots, and Evans turned back to save the colors if possible. The apple trees were short and thick and he could not see much, as the Confederates got between him and his men. Immediately with the cry of "Hail to the colors, back surged the already shattered division and a series of frightful volleys and arms length destroyed all the foremost three scores of thousands of men, so they rescued their flag which was carried off by several men who killed suddenly with the frightful surprise was seized by Evans himself just as the crucifix on the top of the pole was hit by the fragment of a shell and thrown into his face. Evans with all this confusion and chaos, despite not being able to see anything on account of the smoke pall formed the remainder of the division on the ragged colors two hundred and fifty men told all of ten thousand two hundred and forty, who led again the charge, and they slowly worked back to their place in the Abbeismian line whole while the men the firing and loading at the double quick cheered and waved their hats as the first girls appeared with torn clothes, and carrying eight shattered and torn colors of Angels who they had rescued from the air. After this there were no more colors, who first had these flags were found in the orchard dead, dropped up against trees all having a half a dead eye in their sockets.

As was stated before, the Confederates had moved over the main center of the whole Abbeismian line, and after the whole section had been a border of smoke and fire. Some of the Confederates had reached the last wall annihilated, and for a while it had seemed as if the whole army would have been lost. Evans, by coming forward his subordinates had been every desperate effort to save the colors but had found it impossible to reach them. The broken lines of men were in a lost position and hand quarters, and then the uttermost columns of the army faced across the line of the whole Confederates' advance, all efforts to drive the foe back was found to be unavailing, and even a desperate flank attack only ended in disaster. Even when Pomeroy's divisions of cavalry forty millionaires strong were accordingly sent against the front of the 24,000,000 victorious Confederates they had been practically disabled. Pomeroy's divisions fell covered by Pomeroy's, and the army was separated at once, but a few miles away had been saved and General Pleasanton and General Barlow had been seen the day the great attempt on the enemy's flank to cost twenty-two thousand men of all ranks loaded with shot and shell and blood and sweat, where they would have been the enemy. The foe had still advanced in the most dense of masses, yelling and cheering, and the discharge of the guns fairly blew them back to the water they had just taken. A man and a man they had shot at, and a man and a man were driven back, and when the battle became a first of inferno of men were too horrible for the best heart to try to describe the other portion of the main Abbeismian line on the center was reached by the deadly charge, in the Confederates. It was about this time that the other Pomeroy's divisions Federal were actually repulsed. He had been killed and crying on the shore of the sea, shouting them with voice and action, his pale face flushed with his own blood, still from time to time called out on his horse he took off his hat and showed his victorious Confederates. He was at the head of the Confederates, and he was at the head of the Confederates.

confusion's and his staff were fired at at close range by Abbeismian troops and Federal fell struck in many places. He was put in a litter and carried back through that fiery inferno, but he never regained consciousness and before the terrible battle of Gettysburg was over he died. Thus perished another well renowned Confederates general one of the ablest of soldiers next to any of the Marleys and another of the wisest men in the land of his many triumphs and defeats.

This great charge marked the zenith of the Confederates' good fortune in the war indeed. All of the Confederates' forces who had made the fearful charge were composed mainly of seasoned veterans trained to the highest point by campaign after campaign, and battle after battle, and there was nothing to choose between them as to the fighting power of the rank and file. The Abbeismian army was larger, the center itself quite a larger than the attacking forces, yet most of the time though an invader it stood on the defensive, and for nearly two days already the bloody battle of Gettysburg had raged. No other battle of recent times of the war itself outside of Gettysburg, Francis Atlanta, and Vicksburg had been so obstinate, so bloody. The Confederates' army during this charge lost a greater number in killed and wounded than all the allied armies of England, Germany, and the other nations lost in all the wars that raged in the old country. Fourteen of its seventeen corps suffered each a greater loss than befell the world renowned German Empire in the war just past. The Abbeismian army lost the center itself relatively no more men than the defeated Germans, and Allies during the long four years of war, but whereas the German army became a mere rabble, Evans had withdrawn his formidable center with their cannon unbroken, and their fighting power only diminished by their actual losses in the field. The most decisive moment of the battle and probably in all the war was when this tremendous onslaught was made by the fierce Confederates, when the foe rushed forward like a roaring cyclone in the most desperate effort ever made to break the middle of the Christian line. The center of the attacking forces was under the good flower of the Confederates' infantry, but many other divisions took part in the assault, and the column of Confederates all told numbered about 50,000,000 men. At the same time the assault had raged along the center the Confederates simultaneously had attacked the Christian left wing to create a diversion, the attack at this point being added by the most terrific cannonade of any land battle in the world at that time, the foe having gathered one hundred and fifteen thousand guns, opening fire on the left wing and for all the duration of the battle the bloody cannonade lasted, and the batteries on both sides suffered severely. In both the Christian and enemy lines, hundreds of cannons were blown up by shell fire, thousands of riderless horses dashed hither and thither, the dead lay in mounds and heaps, and through of wounded stragglers and men only to the rear horrible shapes indeed worse than the victims of leprosy.

Every man had laid down to sought what cover they could but in vain. The assault of the foe was beautiful and terrible in appearance along the Christian center and they had advanced in three long lines coming on to the assault each line over ten miles long, and these Confederates' columns were the only ones during the battle who were able to press its charge home.

The Christian cannon had first opened a terrific fire upon them first with shot then shells and canister. Great gaps were made in the foe's lines by the cannon fire itself, but the gray clad soldiers had closed up to the center, the color bearers leaping to the front and waving the flags. The Abbeismian infantry had reserved their fire until the Confederates' confederates were within easy range when the musketry crashed out with a roar annihilating the whole first line of graycoats, the big men adding a rain and a rain with grape and canister. On had come the shattered remnants of the remainder columns the men and color bearers falling by scores of hundreds per step the colors fluttering in front like a little forest, for as fast as a color bearer had been shot one also seized the flag from his hand before it fell. The first division of the advanced line had been more exposed to the sudden fire than any other portion of the attacking force, and they were broken before they reached the line, and so not annihilated before the second line of charge had come up. There had however been a gap between two sections of the second line of Abbeismians and this was taken advantage of by the charging second line who reached the line before the Christians could fire again, and two divisions had been thrust forward into it with great fury. Stannard Franklin Strick of the foe charged front with his ten divisions, and fell upon the standing Abbeismian line in flank and got on Federal continued the attack.

When these strick struck in the flank, the Abbeismians could not defend themselves, and they crowded off toward the center to avoid the irresistible pressure. Many hundreds of thousands of them were killed or wounded and captured, many thousands were driven back crushed and broken, but two of the remaining brigades of Christians headed by General Strick 3102. Arndtson had forced their way through the shattered column of the foe, their guns being fired to the last moment until the three batteries immediately in front of the charging battalions of the Abbeismians every officer but one had been killed, no of the mortally christian wounded christian officers was yet general Gushington. He was almost cut in two but holding his body together with one hand with the other he had fired his last gun and fell dead, but now the strength of the Abbeismians was spent. The glandolinian troops were moving forward with the bayonet, and the remnant of the christian line attached on all sides, either fell or retreated toward the rear down the hill again. The gallant general Arndtson fell dying by the body of the dead gushington. Both gibbison and Webb Francis had been wounded, and every brigade commander of the Abbeismians, and every field officer save one fell. The Abbeismians had tried to rally time and again but were driven and broken again by Gates, while Stanward repeated at the expense of the Abbeismians the movement he had made before and now reversing his front attacked them in flank. Their main lines were torn by the captured batteries in front and rear, and they fell back in confusion before the attack of the wicked glandolinians, and Stanward reaped a harvest of prisoners and battle flags. The charge had been won until Kindersine and the three others checked it only to find it impossible to regain the lost ground. It was the greatest charge in any battle of this war, and the defense against it had failed. It would be impossible to surpass the gallantry of those brave glandolinians that made it or the gallantry of those that withstood it in that bloody inferno of horror. As the 10,000 10,000,000 christian caviary had been first sent to stop the foe advance it caused a terrific caviary struggle, for these Concentinians had met Gustorings Omarians caviary and there followed the fiercest contest of caviary that was ever waged in any battle on Abbeismian soil. It closed with a most desperate and sanguinary melee, in which the Omarians charging the christians met in wild chaos, at last the christian christians were almost annihilated and the few survivors beaten shamefully back and they could not come forward again even when reinforced, and all the desperate at at tempts of Kindersine, Richardson, Halsted, and Person had like wise failed, and within that one sweeping success over 34,567,777 christian soldiers lay dead or wounded strewn all over the battlefield through woods and meadows on field and hill, and trees were shattered so frightfully that it was a sadder scene worse than any ever witnessed before in all the war.

When Kindersine's forces had been defeated and driven into confusion under the hottest fire, he did not stop to think of orders, but rode rapidly from point to point rallying company after company by the mere force and power of his words example and look, checking the rout, while the hurricane storm of bullets swept all around him. His horse was shot from under him a ball passed through his coat, another broke his sword hilt, but for the moment he had come off unscathed. He had met even persons columns then retreating in wild confusion with the enemy at their heels, and his sharp words of command, the presence of the man himself and the magic of desecrated discipline itself for a time prevailed. The men rallied sprang into line received the enemy with the heaviest fire, and though not checking the assault, were able to recoil in good order. Kindersine's counter attack had prevented a disaster on his left wing which fell upon the surprised army. He had moved forward to cover the retreat, and around to the extreme left where he held his position against repeated assaults and in thirteen minutes had as many horses shot under him. Early in the day his last horse was shot under him and a little later he was struck in the breast by a spent ball which embedded itself in the muscles of the chest. A voice and strength left him. It's only my lung. He announced and they urged him to go to the rear, but he retained his command though his lung had collapsed and started an internal hemorrhage, and gave the order to counter advance along the whole line, and leading the charge he dashed forward and just when the fight was hottest a sudden cry went up:

"The general is hit again."

He fell from the saddle struck in the neck, thigh, again in the lung and arm, and was borne off from the field by his officers where clear in mind and spirit he remained until he could be removed from the region and be taken care of as he was not fatally wounded, though his injuries were extremely dangerous.

"I do not think there was a puller," said general Evans. "Which I could have added to my poor friend Kindersine." He was the perfection of a great man and a soldier. When he recovered full consciousness a fair general interloper."

Now

For now before I proceed to further details of the battle I will state that the fight along the main christian left wing. At about eight o'clock the christian army was reported to Evans who had been in another location but having no other plan but to plan for a general attack of the main left wing, but nevertheless as the sound was at first stated to be in the rear and that Evans at first thought it was only a retreat, at last he overcame his hesitations at once, and proceeded on at a wily ward that direction then another officer rode up and reported that the firing was in the rear of the main left wing, but that it did not sound like a general battle. Still Evans was uneasy, and proceeded more swiftly toward that direction, and when he came nearer he halted for a moment, and then heard the firing of artillery in an even roar and a tremendous at rising roll of musketry that was more incessant, and feeling confident that a general battle was in progress, and convinced by the rapid increase of the sound had given the order to the christian army to follow him, and thus saved himself from disaster during the night.

But now as to observed himself his whole center was in a terrible condition and though the last of Parsons lines had still stood firm against the foe onslaughts there had been upon Evans view the spectacle of a panic stricken army. Hundreds of thousands of christian wounded men, with hundreds of thousands more captured and immobilized together with baggage wagons and trains were all packed in the rear of the christian army. There was no doubt now that a great disaster had occurred, as a fugitive told Evans that the whole army of the christian army was in full retreat and that all was lost.

But Evans at once sent word to general Evans ordering a brigade at Germaine fielding to stretch his long force of troops across the valley and stop all fugitives, his first idea being to make a stand there but as he rode along, a different plan flashed into his mind. He believed that his troops could be rallied by the presence of a pilot and her sisters and he determined to try and restore their broken ranks, and instead of merely holding his ground at Germaine fielding like he had been doing so long to rally his army, and lead them forward again and crush the foe. He had hardly rode up his mind to this course when news was brought to him that his headquarters was captured and the troops dispersed. He started at once with about four hundred men as an escort and rode rapidly to the front. As he passed along the unhurt men who thickly lined the road and sawed the fields recognized him, and as they did so, threw up their hats shouldered their muskets, and followed him as fast as they could on foot. His officers rode out on either side to tell the stragglers that the general was fully bound to retake the lost position and as the news spread, the retreating christian army every direction rallied, and the christian army toward the battle field they had left. Thus Evans galloped over thirty miles with the men rallying behind him and meeting the most desperate resistance of the bloody battle yet, and following him in ever increasing numbers. As he went on the panic of retreat was replaced by the order of battle and the enemy met the fiercest resistance that they ever faced before in any battle up to this time. Evans pressed steadily on to the front, until at last he came up to Parsons big divisions which with his caviary were the only Abbeismian troops who had held their line to the last and resistance resisted the enemy while confusion and panic reigned all around them. Parsons' divisions were about two miles north of Germaine fielding where they were still holding ground, and were now resisting the enemy. It is impossible to follow in detail the actions of Evans from that point, but he first brought to the ninth corps, and two fresh divisions of Concentinians to the front of the christian army. General Joseph Carey, who was fighting with Parsons at Germaine fielding, and asked him and Parsons if they could hold on where they were, to which they replied that they could not give any until the last man fell. All this and a still further order from Evans caused a great deal of confusion, but still the men were getting back into line and at last seeing that the christian army had won the bloody attack Evans rode along the front portion of the line so that he could see it. He was welcomed with the wildest enthusiasm as he and other officers rode by and the spirit of the christian army was restored. The attack was repulsed and after noon, but it was repulsed. By half past three Evans himself was ready to attack. The fighting of the christian center in the evening was a hotly fought battle was again in the hands of the christian army, and the different divisions were all in their proper positions.

With the order to advance the christian army pressed forward. The christian army at first resisted most stubbornly, and then began to retreat and as they were being driven back by the christian army the christian army began to retreat and broken up the valley. The christian army had begun to retreat and defeat the christian army.

How near Evans' army had been to a most terrible disaster in the war can be realized by again recalling what happened before the three generals tried to recover the lost ground. The violence of the bayonet attack of this great column of Mc-Hollatinians on the Christian center had taken the Abbeennians by complete surprise, and after desperate resistance the main line had given way in all directions, and a panic had set in. Even with the arrival of the three divisions under Kindersling, Halsted, and Parson the rout had not been complete and Parsons' force alone had held on amid all the dreadful storm of confusion and carnage. When Evans had learned, learned of the disaster in full detail he had an advanced new force to the rescue and met an already beaten army.

His first thought had been the natural one, of making a desperate stand at Germaine fielding, and rally those troops about him there! His second thought was the inspiration of the greatest of all the Christian commanders, and he believed his men would rally as soon as they saw him. He believed that their enthusiasm was one of the greatest weapons of war and that this was the movement of all others, when it might be used with decisive advantage. With this thought in his mind he abandoned the idea of forming his men at Germaine fielding, and so rode bareheaded through the wild multitude of fugitives, swinging his hat, straight for the front, and calling on his men as he passed to follow him..... He had not calculated in vain upon the power of personal enthusiasm, but at the same time he did not rely upon any wild rush to save and win the day.... The moment he reached the field of battle, he set to work with the coolness of a great Christian soldier to make all the dispositions, first to repel the enemy, and then to deliver an attack which could not be resisted, and to recover all the lost positions. One division after another was rapidly brought into line amid the dread and dreadful carnage, and placed into position in front of the wildly charging enemy, the thin ranks filling fast with the Christian soldiers who had recovered from their panic, and followed General Evans all the way down from the region of the main rear a distance of thirty-three miles forcing all before them and shooting down all the Glandelinians within their effective range which had already been two hours on the bloody field when at noon he rode along the line again for battle and steadily resisting ten desperate assaults of the enemy and killing and wounding every wave of Glandelinians that came within range of their musketry or cannon.

First the line was reformed, then the series assault of the enemy repeated and it was made impossible for them to take the offensive. But Evans undazzled by his brilliant success up to this glorious point did not relax his work by overhaste. Two more hours passed before he was ready, and then when all was prepared, with his lines established, and his army ranged into position he moved his whole line forward, and won one of the most brilliant battles of the invasion and of the war, having by his personal power over his troops and his genius in action snatched a victory from a bloody day, which began in surprise, disaster, and defeat. His left and center had been equally as heavily assaulted simultaneously, but it accomplished the enemy nothing but excruciating losses, and so it ended totally in the evening with a crushing and complete Christian victory.

In no part of the war since the close of the Galverinian and Angolinian struggles, and the breaking of the Angolinian, and Galverinian invasion has the fighting been so obstinate and bloody as during this invasion of Glandelinian by the Abbeennians and Angolinians together, except the battles of Francis Atlanta and Gloria. Much had been written of the resolute courage of the fierce Conventinian cavalry at Mc-Whirther Run, of the charge of the Christian troops against the Carnation ridges at Gloria and of the terrible fighting and loss of the Glandelinian losses at Logan Zoo Rae Run and Mildred Greenburg. The praise bestowed upon the Abbeennians and Angolinians for their valor, for the bloody loss that proved their valor was well deserved, but there were over one hundred and twenty divisions, Abbeennian and Glandelinian-Confederate, each of which in many of the recent battles of the invasion suffered a greater loss than any Christian division at Mc-Whirther Run, or any other bloody battle in Angolinia and Galverinia except the three bloodiest battles of the war, a greater loss than was suffered by any Christian or Glandelinian division at Logan Zoo Rae Run or any other battle in the frightful Galverinian and Angolinian campaigns. No Abbeennian or Angolinian division in any recent struggle has suffered such losses as at Germaine fielding. This great Mc-Hollatinian force when 889 one half per cent of the officers, and men were killed or wounded, of the Glandelinians which lost 766 per cent, of the 26th division of Gargolians which lost 728 per cent, such as at the battle of Depery Perophia before the Christian seventh corps which lost 744 per cent, and the 21th division of Conventinianians which lost 799 per cent.

At the battle of Sacramento the Conventinianians lost 700 per cent, and the 10th division of Abbeennians at Easter Starring 530 per cent, while at Shiloh the 9th division of Abyssinians lost 765 per cent, and the 6th division of Gargolians 1789, per cent, and at Mc-Hollater Run (Glandelinia the Mc-Hollatinians lost 867 per cent. These horrible figures show the horrible punishment endured by the Christian divisions and the divisions chosen at random from the head of the list which shows the slaughter roll of the great Glandelinian-Angolinian war. Yet the shattered remnants of each division preserved their organization, and many of the severest losses were incurred in the hour of victory and triumph and not of disaster and defeat. Thus the 1th division of Conventinianians suffered its appalling loss while counter charging a great superior char force at Aronburgs Run or Gloria which it drove before it, and the little huddle of wounded and unwounded men who survived their victorious charge actually kept both the flag, they had captured and the ground from which they had driven their wicked foes.

A number of the Abbeennian divisions did valiant fighting, and endured the most heavy punishment of the bloody war. Even during many battles the very wicked Glandelinians themselves had showed that they were able to meet the best troops of great Abbeennia on equal terms out in the open, and even to overwhelm them in fair fight with the bayonet, which surprised all the world indeed. The division of Glandelinians which during the first battle of this new invasion under the lead of Marley managed to beat back the Abbeennians and proved their ability to bear the most terrible loss though losing the whole battle as it was, to at times worst victory from overwhelming numbers, and to carry by open assault positions of formidable strength held by a veteran army of Abbeennians. But in some of the Galverinian and Angolinian campaigns except the battles of Gloria and Francis Atlanta was the fighting so resolute, and bloody as in this terrible invasion.

For over three years the Glandelinians had been the invader, not the invaded, and its head heart had beat proudly with hopes of success; but these hopes had went down in frightful bloody wreck on All Saint All Saints day November 1th when it was evident that the high valor of Glandelinia had failed at 1th when on the bloodiest fields of the war at Aronburgs Run, or Gloria, and that in the far west Vivian wiskey had been taken by the Abbeennian fleets, and that now the Glandelinian nation was invaded by both the Abbeennian and Angolinian forces.....

THE A APPALING POWER OF THE AN AUGUSTINIAN AND A ABBEENNIAN INVASION.

Another great story of dread disaster reveals to the reader the story of the Abbeennians to rack the Glandelinian country with storm of wars devastations, floods of crushing panic stricken men and series upon series of fires beyond anything surpassing, sweeping away whole towns and cities, like in Galverinia, destroying hundreds of thousands of human lives and rendering millions of families homeless. It is a story of thousands of farms laid in waste, railroads and dams destroyed, and hundreds of millions of dollars of property wiped out by the invaders. But while it tells of the fury of the Glandelinians in efforts beyond surpassing to check the ravages of the invading Abbeennians, it tells of the bravery of Violet and her sisters in their self denying human pity and sympathy for the helpless child victims rescued from the foe by the Christian troops. The thrilling incidents of terrible tragedies are mingled with tales of the most remarkable heroism of the Vivian girls, who braved hazards of bursting shells, and floods of destruction and perils from the foe in their efforts to rescue child slaves, their loving flags and so on. So my dear readers if the terrible loss of life and property among the Glandelinians caused by the rushing Christian soldiery, shall result in the ending of this hellish wars, the Christian dead and that of the enemy themselves shall not have died in vain.

Like a states wide sweep of raging waters across the continent, overturning our own fragile works, and in the light of the vast event just passed so the Abbeennian waves and armies sweep on in the invasion of the foe's country.....

Hardly had Manley's armies recovered from the first shock of horror at the results of the battle of Gormaine fielding, which had waste to an important section of the bloody battle field, when Felson's war was piled upon Ossa's frightful horror upon horror, disaster upon disaster, upon Gormaine's, in the frightful floods of the surging Abbeismian armies at every point of the invasion. The eye symbol 8

The sympathy of the allied nations of glandolinia was pouring out in full measure to the stricken country of glandolinia. Only forty eight hours had elapsed since the raging demons like battle of Gormaine fielding had made its terrifying appearance in that section, and had poured off a great christian victory, but leaving death and destruction all along its path. In the little field, King glandin had just been informed of the full extent of the christian success, his condolences and offers of government aid for the glandolinian armies and sufferers were still fresh on the wire. Committees and armies of relief were being organized, the Glandolinian Red Cross Society had barely begun its helpful work, in fact the fury of the battle of Gormaine fielding was scarcely spent--when the news of fresh christian disaster poured from the whole region of the christian invasion and turned all eyes in that direction. What was this fresh horror that thus dwarfed the devastation wrought by the battles fury, what mighty forces of disaster had been unleashed for the purpose of destruction. The quaking of the earth, caused by battles of extreme fury, the fury of flames, the giant sweep of the forest fires, all these have already found their victims in Glandolinian and Angolinian homes & during the early parts of the struggle, have a laid waste to Glandolinian and Angolinian cities and taken heavy toll of human lives, but neither all these battle prod of a earthquake and forest fires, nor storms of rushing typhoon winds had been the main agent of destruction in glandolinia. The Abbeismians' let loose from their mother country in a faithful invasion had done the work.

Of course the telegraph and telephone soon told their tales of woe. Crippled as means of communications were in the regions were death had stalked abroad for never to be forgotten weeks, working its ruthless will and reaping its greatest harvest, sparing neither age, sex nor condition, from this center of wide spread destruction, there came faintly on a single wire, of an overwhelming flood of christianity, that had left morn mourning and risen misery in their wake.

City after city, town after town lay prostrate beneath the crushing weight and fury of christian cannons, suffering the fate of the house built upon the sand. "The floods descended, and the rains came, and beat upon that house, and great was the fall thereof." Despite the efforts of the glandolinians that had been most desperate and energetic in those many recent bloodiest of battles already written in which the foe had contrived to hold them in check, the maddened Abbeismians had demanded more victims, and so odiously had found them in abundance. A mighty deluge of Abbeismian armies, an avalanche of armies, had suddenly stricken a wonderfully prosperous section of the glandolinian nation, transforming the fertile fields, and many thriving cities into a vast scene of death and destruction. Well the verse

"WHEN WAR WINGS IT'S WIDE DESOLATION."

It was just as if rivers of humanity had burst their dam, dams had ceased to do their duty, reservoirs had scattered their contents broadcast over the land, like death dealing waters that were sweeping everything before them. All this because of what the incoming Abbeismians had witnessed in California. Oh Wicked Glandolinia, what thou art paying for thy wickedness and cruelty to Gods most loving creatures. Ye wanted war, and got more than war.

Human lives by the hundreds of thousands had been wiped out in the recent terrific battles, the bloodiest battles the world had ever seen outside the Glandolinian conflict and for two rates, houses had been torn from their foundations by explosions of shells, swept away as if in a relentless flood by fire, killing and maiming their glandolinian defenders or inmates like rats in a trap, property to an extent of untold millions had been destroyed by the Angolinians and Abbeismians, scores upon scores of millions were rendered homeless, and danger of death, famine, and pestilence threatened on every hand. It was more horrible than the scenes of desolation in California. The work of maddened Abbeismians. Picture the horror of the raging battles just battle pace passed, the frightful carnage at Gormaine fielding, the advance of the Abbeismian armies, as resisted step by step desperately day after day, but threatened to overwhelm all but the most substantial and largest glandolinian armies in utter ruin and annihilation. Glandolinian armies adrift as if in an ocean of rushing element, disappearing from sight during the many conflicts. Across all open spaces, through parks, or down the streets, there came the wreckage of war, and the ruins of what had been but an hour before happy and prosperous homes. Not one house here and but whole blocks of houses, whole neighborhoods, being engulfed by raging flames set by the Abbeismians, and burned away. Oh the horrors of the long invasion, the cruel maddened war, and demonic conflicts. Here a village under shell fire, there a city full of soldiers, the people having fled, struggling to keep alive and resist the oncoming Abbeismians, through the hours of fierce fighting and hardships in which shells fell like confetti, without light, without provisions, without water. Hellish destruction all around, a scene as of the infernal regions, no food for the besieged Glandolinian soldiers, no means of which to get away, or a by means of which relief and reinforcements might approach. Only the bare hopes of rescue or yielding up to their christian foes, and the better chance that the war might soon end and recede from the face of the earth. No friendly gleam of lights in neighbors houses, telling of human proximity and power to aid.

And goodness what is that now? The frightful shock of high explosives everywhere, that threaten destruction to all within range of the christian guns. The bodies of horses, oxen, sheep and pigs are seized and carried away by the Abbeismians, bullets spatter against the trembling flames swept houses in which Glandolinian soldiers are defending themselves, and each shock racks the nerves of the glandolinians. And then much more significant property is borne along by the whirling current of Abbeismian soldiers, and glimpsed in untold horror by those whose whitened faces stare in agony through the upper windows of rocking buildings. Human beings are blown to pieces poor torn tabernacles of human beings sacrificed to the topographical situation of their wrecked defenses, victims perhaps of a state of intolerable wickedness for which they must atone for in this horrible way.

Here burns all that is left of a Glandolinian father, who but yesterday had gathered his children about his knee in a cozy home a mile upstream and told them that the christians would never come and invade the country. Now what had he left? Yon floating masses with trailing hair and men lineaments a whitish blur in the yellow flu blur of the fire floods but was yesterday happy and loving mothers until the rushing flames overwhelmed her their homes as they were going contentedly about domestic duties.

A more gloriously there hundreds of little children carried off from burning child slave factories and towns free at last from the dark and turbulent horrors of bondage and misery. But the mind refuses to dwell upon the horrors of the scenes of desolation though well deserved, as it was seen overfelt-aye-felt- through the dark days of bloody war, by suffering millions. All the harrowing details of death and damage cannot be told within the space of a single volume, but enough to give a graphic idea of the conditions that followed the Abbeismian flood in the countie country of glandolinia, which was the chief sufferer, which will be found in the chapters that follow. May the lessons they teach to be laid to heart and acted upon so that war disasters of this kind may be forested, and prevented by not trying to massacre a world of children hereafter by any wicked nations that may start wars or bring on wars with christian nations.

Indeed a calamity which for the time being could only be measured in death and destruction by the horrors and devastations of this great war overlook in a very few months a goodly portion of the northern section of glandolinia, and the Abbeismians even let loose by breaking great dams and letting loose the greatest water floods that swept practically all the northern towns and fire added its ravages even in the flooded cities, besides forests and grassy plains. The chief arena of desolation noted in the first reports was the beautiful pater and vanity fair regions, where several millions were at first reported slain in the battle of Vanity fair which had raged for thirteen days. Scores of millions were said to be homeless throughout the whole region of invasion, and the dead soldiers of both sides in the entire region of invasion according to early estimates reached such appalling figures that it horrified the world itself. All those many days of horror, panic stricken refugees were reported to be fleeing from the approach of the christian invaders to places of greater comparative safety. The property loss was estimated fully to be more than $100,000,000, and at least $5,000,000 $5,000,000 was required hurriedly to succor the homeless. An appeal to the outside world for aid was useless as none would come on account of the stricken christian blockade of all Glandolinian ports.

These reports greeting the eye of the great Glandolinian general John Manley effectually roused him, and then there came a nation wide quest for the facts of the great Abbeismian flood, and within a few hours the crippled telegraph and telephone services brought messages of confirm confirmation from the city of Titanic fair which is as follows:

"Our country at its northern section is in the grasp of the worse storm of war ever experienced, following in the wake of the terrific invasion which in the past two months has swept practically the entire northern part of the nation from the boundary line to vanity fair. The whole region from

The Easter Starring is even practically a vast inland lake as the Christian forces burst our dams, and the wildest rumors concerning the fate of our grand armies one of the shot planes of the country are afloat. The invasion started from the location of Easter Starring and soon the whole country for the distance south of three hundred miles was in the hands of our foes. Many of our armies having collapsed, and the final link of communication with the outside world--first telephone wires--second blockades--and civilian life was lost. Since the beginning of the invasion reliable reports placed the number of slain Glandelinians at the battles there at 35,789,999 killed, but from that hour rumors of greater and almost unbelievable disasters began to trickle in from remote sources.

The main line of our armies to the westward was reported to be broken after series of bloody conflict, and was forced to allow the Abbeismian flood to progress further through our stricken country. Another report was to the effect that 9,000,000 Glandelinian soldiers lost their lives in these battles, and that the whole region was fairly engulfed by the Angelinians who also burst a reservoir and engulfed the region with water to a depth of forty feet.

Another rumor equally confirmed was that the bodies of dead Glandelinian soldiers could be seen in the floods. Also during the battle of October Hill the region had been engulfed when the Christians broke the Great Reservoir, and that the loss of life during that battle will total more than 5,500,000. This reservoir was a great lake, ten miles in extent which was located just east of the October Hill, and its waters were held in check by a huge dam. The breaking of this dam by the Abbeismians who used explosives caused waters to sweep the whole region, just as Johnston was swept when the dam broke there.

From Easter Starring, came a report that the bloody battle had taken a toll of 10,000,000 lives. From this it could not be confirmed.

From Bristolos Station came another report, that the loss of lives among the Glandelinian soldiers at this battle would reach 6,507,777.

From another conflict at Easter Starring had come a midnight message that 6,234,444 soldiers had been killed in the battle there.

All these reports were entirely without confirmation. From every city and town in Northern Glandelinia, with which some communication was still possible a tale of death and disaster was reported.

A large part of the Glandelinian army at October Hill had been overwhelmed by the rushing Abbeismians, all were in the grip of the human avalanche or deluge and so many fell on both sides that the losses were not accurately known, but hundreds of child slaves were rescued, and many persons living in the town near by were rendered homeless, and enormous damage had been done.

Death and damage dealing war conditions also prevailed in Eastern Glandelinia, and other regions which reported loss of life or great damage to property. In the middle sections similar conditions were reported, and in all the cities and towns the conditions of many homeless refugees was reported to be pitiable in the extreme, and prompt measures were taken to rush relief to them including food, clothing and medical supplies, with doctors and nurses to care for the sick and injured, in which it was a surprise that the Abbeismians did not hinder.

As the Abbeismian invasion had progressed, the streams of red coated men poured over the region for many miles, and many positions of the enemy had been rendered so insecure, by the irresistible rush of the Abbeismians and Angelinians that they left their positions within an hour after the outbreak struck them after offering serious resistance. In one district of the northern part of the country where battles had raged with terrible fury, wheat had been fields of wheat and corn occupied by farmers of great numbers.

Had been at the mercy of the horrible struggles, and these whole fields were smashed in bodies of the slain of both sides, and all the farm houses had been torn from their foundations, and heaps of ruins and bodies of gray and purple coats, and shattered lumber were left to tell the tale of the fury of these titanic battles. During the course of the Abbeismian invasion not less than fifteen to sixteen battles the heaviest kind on record of war had raged at one time. Reports showed this condition prevailed not only at the beginning of the invasion, but at all portions, and later on scores of harder conflicts had been reported in Eastern Glandelinia, and even that conditions had been ripe for the Christians to break up the dams and levees to flood the country. Four armies of Abbeismians fairly draining the Glandelinian armies of their blood in terrific battles, contributed their numbers to the Abbeismian torrents that rushed over the doomed sections of Glandelinia in a weeks time, and a great wave of Abbeismians came suddenly tearing along carrying all before it driving back every foe army in its path and crushing greater Glandelinian armies as it swept on in a resistless torrent.

The Glandelinians had never dreamed of such an Abbeismian invasion, and the many Glandelinian armies opposing the way were considered by the government to be among the strongest and finest in the country, and it was incredible to all that they should give way. It was just as if a great mountain of human beings armed to the teeth, with cannons and arms of all kinds had been hurled from the clouds upon Glandelinia. As if a sea of armies had been emptied upon Glandelinia. The weight of the Abbeismian onslaughts during the many recent battles was monstrous, and the advance of the Abbeismians had come with tremendous and terrible suddenness destroying many armies almost before they had realized their peril.

A NIGHT OF TERROR.

A night of suffering and of terror followed the rushing of the waters, and floods of Abbeismian soldiery, throughout the invaded parts of the country of Glandelinia. Communication with many of the principal cities of Glandelinia was practically cut off, and only for a while the most meagre reports leaked out from the Jackson cities. Hundreds of thousands of persons unable to reach places of shelter after being forced to flee before the Christian advance took refuge among the Glandelinian armies or were harried at many places when the Christian tide overwhelmed them. The lighting facilities of many of the cities were cut off, heating plants were put out of commission and all through the long hours and nights and days, in home homes, stores, office buildings, and business blocks there was intense suffering by Glandelinian soldiers who had retreated there with the intention to make a desperate stand against the Abbeismian tide. Indeed the deepest dismay prevailed on every hand. All anxiously waited for the coming of the dawn of peace, and the reading of the doctrine of the Christian religion. The news of the harm done to Glandelinia in every hand. But day after day passed, there was little to encourage the weary, hungry, and suffering soldiers of the Glandelinian nations. The region of Glandelinia was like a valley of the shadow of death. Thousands of fires, forest fires, office buildings, places of watery wastes, and prospects of any relief from the southern parts of the country seemed slim indeed.

The single telephone wire in service brought slight encouragement in the news that their king was at work doing his best to hurry forward the drafted armies, and hurrying his best men to get news of peace and relief for the stricken country. So the long days passed in terror, destruction and strife of war, and night after night passed and came with every prospect of a repetition of the terrors of the day before. Indeed more than half of the country was in possession of the fierce Abbeismians, one great district was under water, and indeed the general situation was deplorable. Early estimates of the number of dead resulting from the series of battles were far too high, but death had taken toll at many stages of the country, and the suffering and anxieties of the overthrown armies cannot be overestimated. Their deplorable situation was brought home to the people of Glandelinia, during the war days by telegram and telegrams which while they contained only a modicum of precise fact, gave glimpses of the terrors that prevailed behind the veil of silence and mystery. The maximum of Glandelinian military strength was being used in many portions of the country already, and it was now declared that Glandelinia was a lost country. That it was completely separated from the rest of the world by its Christian enemies. Its isolation was declared also almost universal in many portions.

Nothing had been heard from many of the cities since the beginning of the Christian invasion the Abbeismian flood having come so quickly that Glandelinia was not prepared. The Abbeismians themselves had found new cause for their faith in Violet and her sisters for whom barefooted they waded through the flood to save Glandelinian families from flooded houses, though they were enemies. The soldiers did most of the work but Violet and her sisters led the rescue parties and Violet and her sisters dressed in clothing that was ragged and their hair streaming with water stood in the raging floods for hours relieving the refugees, mostly rescued child slaves as they were brought in wagons and army automobiles. It was also found that skiffs were needed and the little girls had exhibited the heroic act of engaging the enemy in charge of one hundred big boats and which they secured after a some desperate work.

Violet and her sisters had witnessed throngs of stricken child slaves and of their younger children who had been suddenly driven from their hills by the Glandelinians at the approach of the christians, without sufficient clothing or adequate supplies, compelled to seek shelter wherever it was available, for the rascals would not do anything for them and had purposefully deserted them to their fate when it was seen that they could not get them away from the advancing christians. These were found crowded in business blocks, courthouses, schools and similar refuges by the soldiers and the little Vivian girls, so filled with fear and anxiety that they were unable to sleep or give thought to anything else. It took the christian soldiers a whole day to rescue all of these. And then--thing thinking of all the trails they had even caused on the child slaves by their making of floods, of those nights and days of terror, of all that heat, hunger, and grief, and fear that had been wrought among the child slave survivors of the flood abandoned to their fate by the retreating enemy, the great heart of the Abbeonmian soldiery was filled with the kindest sympathy, and another flood set in for these unfortunate, a much needed flood of provisions and supplies and transports for their removal to Angelina or Abbeonmia.

The exact on extent of the appalling Abbeonmian flood was unknown ever after the battle of G. Germaine polding. Every hour expressed the wicked nation with the uncertainty of the situation. The Abbeonmian advance at all points had assumed such unknown fury and force that it would seem hardly less than a miracle if all the villages in their path of advance were not wiped out of existence in the northern parts of Glandelinia. The war storm was also moving eastward, a thing which was more dreaded.

TO IMPED THE ABBEONMIA ADVANCE THEY TRY TO MAKE A VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH FOR THEM.

Now As Evans army was marching through the valley of affliction a land of deserts and of pits a land of drought, the enemy of three various armies tried to form for them a regular shadow of death, a land that no man could pass through and live, and where no man dwelt. For all the time of his advance Evans army was troubled by series upon series of horrible attacks the Glandelinians yelling like hobgoblins, satyrs, and dragons of the infernal pit, it being a continual continual howling and yelling, clouds of christians time and again were driven into discouragement and confusion by these horrible headlong assaults, death spread horribly its wings over the christian troops in a word it was every whit dreadful the scene being utterly without order.

At many points of the valley through which the christian troops were advancing there were very deep ditches, and it was only through caution that many of the christians did not miserably perish.

It was the purpose of the enemy to prevent Evans from moving on their fortified town of Marcucian and making a junction with general Vivians army, and thus they in retreating had led the christians into this horrible valley even full of dangerous quags into which if any man ran he would sink into or fall he can find no bottom for his feet to stand on and he perishes in quick sand. Many of the Angelinians and Abbeonmians were hard put to it for when they sought to climb the ditches on the one hand they were ready to tip over into the mire on the other, also when they sought to escape they're without great carelessness they would be ready to fall into the ditch. Thus resisted by the enemy at every step they went on carefully slowly for often times when they lifted their foot forward they knew not where or upon what they should set it next. Fires were even burning and ever anon flame and smoke would almost enshroud the distant woods in such abundance with sparks and hideous noise noises, that at many times the christians did not know what to do next.

The Glandelinians in their petty petty attacks admitted doleful yells, and rushing to one charge after another, so that sometimes Evans thought his army would be torn in pieces, or shot and trodden down like mire in the streets by the foes infantry, or cowardly.

This frightful sight was seen and these dreadful noises were heard by Evans himself for thirty miles altogether. Indeed it be first part of the valley was dangerous, but the remaining parts through which the christian armies had to go was still more dangerous, for recently the enemy had made the way full of mines, traps, guns, and so full of pits, with pitfalls, deathtraps, and shambles down there, that the christians had to go slow, and day after day during the perilous advance the enemy had made desperate attacks, throwing forward great onslaughts, and as fast as

as the enemy made at them, the christians, repulsed these assaults, and counterattacked in as great numbers as to be thick as hail, by which notwithstanding all that the wicked Glandelinians could do to resist it successfully, they were hurled back time and again, general Manley himself was wounded twice in his head, his hand and foot, and in confusion the foe gave back again, therefore Evans followed up his work again, but nevertheless again the foe took up courage, and resisted the christian advance as manfully as they could. These sore combats lasted for above half a month until Manleys army and not the foes as desired was almost quite spent. Then Evans seeing his opportunity began to gather his main forces and pressed the advance and in another terrific battle closed with Manleys whole army in a titanic struggle at close quarters, and so fierce was the Glandelinian losses that it was as good as saying that the christian army almost pressed Manleys army to death, but in one terrific counter charge the foe forced the christians to give back, and the victory prevailing this made at the christians again, and in these series of bloody combats no man can imagine unless they had seen or heard as Evans and Violet and her sisters did again what yellings and hideous roarings of outcries, the Glandelinians made all the time of the fight, and indeed it seemed as if in this long battle that the foe exerted their utmost not only to check the christian advance but to exert their utmost to give their worst "Devil yell" ever heard in any battle of the war before.

During three other days of the long and fierce conflict the enemy laid so heavily upon the christians with their storming onslaughts, that Evans for a time was forced to give back a good deal of the ground he won so gallantly, but all this did not check the advance of the army under general Jack Evans, and in due time the town of Marcucian or the Vanity Fair city loomed before them and a double Glandelinian army under general Beelzebub and Apollyon, but do not think they are friends though they have names of these fiends, and the same characters.

And Manleys army had retreated to the town and made a junction with these two armies, Ma 1 Manley taking command in person. The people in this wicked Glandelinian city were greatly moved at the news of the approach of the mighty christian army under Evans and indeed the whole town itself as it was in a hubbub about it, and soon all were leaving as quickly as possible intending to carry off their wicked vanities, which the devil Beelzebub had given them but the christian armies were closing in every where around the town and there was found no escape. Only the armies of Glandelinia could not be surrounded as yet.

In this wicked town, excuse to Bunyan, in whose Faithful had been put to death during his Pilgrimage with his companion Christian, and now it was a fair chance for the christians to revenge the cruelties of these wicked peoples and destroy this wicked trap set up by the prince and Prince of the devils. Evans was humiliated indeed that he had failed to surround the three wicked Glandelinian armies, but nevertheless he was content with encompassing the city, and he sent this message to Manley:

"Your excellency general Manley;

"If you do not yield your positions here without a battle within three days I'll bombard the city regardless of the wicked inhabitants in it. I'll not regard the lives of any ones for this vanity Fair is a house of Beelzebub and his other fiends, and all his companions and he himself I defy and hate worse than a bloody viper.

EVANS.

Big doings was already going on indeed, the fury of the war was progressing fast, and it seemed possible that the enemy was being speedily overthrown and that the war would be brought to a speedy finish. Evans really meant all he threatened, and when three days passed, and Manley had not complied with his demands, the city was fired on and badly damaged.

Violet and her sisters had begged Evans not to do so but he had been so humiliated by Manleys defiance that he did not comply with their request, and soon the city was a smoking heap of ruin the inhabitants having taken to their cellars for their safety. Manley had intended to attack Evans but he was overcautious, from fear of the strength of Evans army, and though Beelzebub and Apollyon advised him to do so he kept his distance and did not engage Manley. This indeed was an imprudent delay, for had he done so right away as advised Evans army would have been readily defeated, before the army under general Vivian arrived, and the cause of the christians would have again trembled in the balance.

Many of the officers had wanted general Evans to attack the enemy, but he wisely did not do so, he having perceived that the enemy's position was unassailable, and that an assault would meet complete destruction. It was advisable however to send spies to learn the strength of the enemy's positions, and as Evans refused under any conditions to allow Violet and her sisters to go, a private who had been a secret service man before the war volunteered to go himself. Since the situation of the enemy's country was most hazardous now, it was realized by Evans that he would lose his best man, and so changed his mind about sending spies, and decided to go on a scouting tour himself.

He decided to go forward and reconnoiter the enemy's position and in this work to take Violet and her sisters along with him and some of their boy scouts especially Starring and their other boy friends. So he waited for the approach of evening, and then started out with his small party of scouts and also being under the guard of a force of the finest cavalry. They galloped for quite a long distance, until they came within sight of the enemy's position, and were indeed surprised to see general Manley and a squadron of his Mo-Holleshtinian cavalry coming toward them. An engagement was unavoidable, but in the melee general Manley got away to the bitter disappointment of Evans, and to make matters worse Violet and her sisters narrowly escaped capture though they took no part in the engagement.

The cavalry melee had been terrific despite the size of the forces sabres being piked like hammer and tongs again and again like the blacksmith hits the horseshoes, lances were used with cruel effect, and pistols and carbines had been fired at close quarters, and there had been an indescribable mixture of men and horses for over fifteen minutes. At the beginning of the fray thomson had almost got the better of the fight, and Evans himself had been assailed by a gigantic glandelinian who appeared to be a Zimmermannian.

Evans Evans however cut him down easily, and then as the surviving Glandelinians retreated the christian soldiers were about to follow but Evans forbade them, as there was danger of their running into an ambush. It was also evident now that their purpose was discovered, and so Evans decided it was best to return, to the lines, and so they retraced their steps Violet and her sisters going on ahead. As they traveled for about probably a quarter of a mile, there was the galloping roar of horses, and glancing back they saw that a strong force of glandelinians on horseback were coming a tearing after them, and that there was 10,000 in number and headed by general Boobhead at that.

"We are perished," said Evans. "I suppose you know who the leader is do you not Violet?" He asked.

Violet on observing who he was admitted it was Boobhead, who they had saved from scolding near the Geyser and told him, who he was.

"If he has any gratitude he will not molest you little girls," said Evans. "We are equal to his force in numbers, but if he is still your enemy there is no hope of your safty little girls, unless we fight a death struggle. But keep out of the melee as it is too dangerous."

The christian force wheeled around and formed in squares and lines to meet the enemy. Boobhead seeing who were among the christian troops and who the christian leader was ordered a halt when within thirteen yards of Evans, and then he advanced alone to Evans and extending his hand said:

"Though your troops and you are our enemies general Evans, those little girls have done me a service which I'll never forget." "These men with me are all Mo-Holleshtinians, and I truly have the power to crush you Evans and your whole force, but on account of the dead done for me by your little charges, we'll still be enemies of war but only that in and in true heart outside of it we are friends. And going back he gave the command to his men:

"Right about face, march." And away they dashed without a collision of any kind.

"This comes from your rescue work indeed," said Evans to the little girls. "It pays to be heroines and makes friends even among the enemy."

"We are praying every day that he will see his folly in serving the wicked Glandelinian cause any further, and resign his command...." said Violet. "And we believe that some day God will hear our prayer."

In fact he was and had already heard a their prayer, and had answered it too for it was Boobhead's purpose, to resign and he was only waiting for his discharge papers.

In the meantime, thousands of Glandelinian sightseers who sought to visit the war stricken regions for curiosity, received a shock. On the first trains to the stricken regions, were many soldiers, and coaches full of people on a sight seeing tour. General Evans learned of this, and on his orders when these trains reached Maroucian and other vicinities, two soldiers were stationed at each door and none, but the glandelinian soldiers were permitted to alight, and these were made prisoners. These trains were then compelled to run back to their destination, with their disappointed passengers. Evans then ordered the other generals commanding the various Angelinian and Abbeismannian armies to let none board trains going for the north, and to seize all trains that came their way. The purpose in this was to prevent a too heavy reinforcing force coming to the aid of the glandelinian armies. Glandelinia was indeed devastated. No one could estimate whether even the north the yellow flood sent that it seething through the flooded regions may sleep 1,000,000 dead or 100,000. No one could picture the situation. The whole country in the north was a fire and marine inferno. Fires lighted the sky all night and early during the days, illuminating the rushing waters and the swirl of currents sounding like a sibilant requiem for the unknown and the uncounted dead. Think of a million people even jammed in the upper floors of their homes, no gas, no fresh water, no light no heat, no food.

During the whole time in the flooded regions hundreds of motor boats besides life saving boats were in the flooded districts of glandelinia and by a weeks end it was hoped relief would be extended to all those still alive by the Glandelinian army. No efforts was made to take out any of the bodies, the first care being to provide help for the living, and for days and days the boats deposited their loads of humanity of from fifteen to twenty survivors at each trip, and many of them were so weak from deprivation and suffering as to be unable to move. Thousands of these rescued had been taken to hospitals on stretchers outside the flooded districts. Child slaves or those professing themselves to be with the christian cause were refused rescue, but the Vivian girls had risked all perils to find them and caused them to be rescued.

The water flood itself was the worse devastation the Abbeismannians in their fury had caused. Bands of despairing refugees and hundreds of thousands of wrecked homes, was an thrilling sight, trains wormed their way over swaying bridges, but were unable to help any of the surviving sufferers. Hundreds of thousands of residents had been driven from their homes, swept along the frightful flood in boats, and other other craft, and houses, barns and many bridges were demolished.

Many of the Glandelinian trains that were brought up suddenly in front of treacherous bridges, spanning rivers which had reached from its banks and covered the surrounding country for miles. These trains had been struck for five to fifteen hours. The supports at the ends of the bridges appeared very shaky, and there had been debates as to whether to attempt a crossing. When these trains did so filled with child slaves who were rescued, as these trails were in the possession of the christians, they went slowly and slowly and they could feel the bridges swaying and creaking beneath them. For miles and miles in many places the water was nothing but water. Farm houses stood partly submerged, and in many places persons were seen crawling out of windows into boats, carrying clothing and bundles with them.

Every stream seemed to be racing at top speed and most of them had left their channels completely. It was hard to tell the depth even in the flooded Glandelinian cities and towns because everything was water. Many of the marooned soldiers had built crude rafts, and were poling these about through what was supposed to be the streets. Some of them appealed to the engineers of the trains as they passed these regions to stop and take them aboard, and though some refused as the marooned were foes of God, others complied, on terms that they submitted themselves as prisoners of war and would not attempt to get away. Glandelinia indeed was struck and devastated even more than was Angelinia and Galverinia, together.

Violet and her sisters were on one of these trains and brave as they were feared that the rescue train would be wrecked. The child slaves on board were wonderfully calm especially the little girls, and the little boys seemed more excited than they.

Hundreds of homes were observed to have been destroyed along the whole route. Dead animals of all kinds were even seen floating around in the water, the railway tracks were covered with water, and at times the engineer was forced to halt the train on account of being unable to see the track and was forced to explore the conditions of the rails for yards ahead. Indeed it seemed to Violet and her sisters as if homes taking chances in going at such a high rate of speed as he did at times over the tracks he could not see and this at times made the Vivian Girls somewhat nervous.

Indeed the scenes along the track of the flooded regions and flood swept towns was the most pitiful sight that was ever witnessed, houses being doormed before the eyes of violet and her sisters, as well as cows pigs, and thousands upon thousands of chickens and other fowls. Hundreds of thousands of persons were many times seen walking the tracks knee deep in water carrying with them the most precious of their household effects. The women were in tears though the better of them declared within hearing at times that Glandelinia was suffering a well deserved punishment, and the sooner they stop the war, the better it will be for their governments. Many families were in small boats which were so heavily loaded that they appeared on imminent danger of overturning. Miles of the tracks had been swept away after the train had passed over it. The water had risen to the second floor windows of many houses even to the roof of two story houses and ever higher, and thousands of houses had been demolished and were floating about in the streets. Later on the train had stood motionless over night only seventeen miles from the christian lines, and poor violet and her sisters narrowly escaped with their lives while attempting to get food for the child ren. Violet and her sisters however safely arrived at a farm house half a mile away through torrents of rains. The water had risen more and more while they were gone and rose so rapidly that it was waist deep in low places before they started to return. One of violet's sisters Joice was swept from her feet, and fortunately a wire fence saved her life.

When the train was able to proceed onward the lives of all were in peril when it crossed a tottering bridge just out of Maricatta, which twenty minutes later was swept away. The train traversed tracks that were under water all the time. They arrived into this small town more than nine hours late. In this town the water was more than four to eight feet deep, each street looking like a mountain torrent. The upper floors of officer buildings were crowded with people who had either deserted their homes or were marooned. In coming over the flood the train had traveled over six different railroads, being switched from one to another as words reached the engineer that washouts had occurred. Sometimes after proceeding several miles from a junction town, the engineer was compelled to back up his train and take another route. The town of Labedan was so completely covered with water and houses were seen that had been torn from their foundations as if made of paper. Just after the left this town the train crossed a bridge which barely stood above the surface of the water. It swayed dangerously as it crept across it and violet and her sisters prayed as they never prayed before. Twenty minutes later they actually observed it being swept away with their own eyes. They had crossed it just in time.

It was indeed a horriblesight for violet and her sisters. They saw the great bridge gone, the yellow swirling flood behind them and at their feet, and done the channel were tossing whole houses, with persons screaming from the roofs. Violet and her sisters watched spell bound. When they got to another swamp town the engine and tender and baggage coach ran off the track and it took until midnight to get them back.

It was staggering to the imagination to attempt to conjure up the picture of desolation, famine and pestilence that would follow the recession of the waters. Indeed to violet and her sisters the flood itself was like a horrible nightmare. Nearly on every house top was a family of what was left of the family, clinging to the ridgepole and chimneys and praying for deliverance. Many of the glandelinian soldiers risked death on the flimsy rafts in their rescue work, but they never hesitated, and did as well as they could. Some of the houses could never be reached at all, the rafts being unmanageable, and the few boats were smashed one after another as they were caught by the eddying currents.

Violet and her sisters prayed at the walls of the unfortunate glandelinian woman and children only a few houses away were borne to their ears. Closed windows could not keep out the sound. Now and then a woman was heard to shriek above the general lamentations, and they knew that when that sound reached them, that some one had seen a loved relative, an aged father or mother, or perhaps a child lose the grip of numbed fingers, and slide off into the black chill waters. Well such is war.

Violet and her sisters saw a house, with one woman and three children clinging to the roof floating down the stream. The house was whirling and bobbing up and down in the water, and the woman was screaming for help. Glandelinians persons on the edge of the frightful flood had a small boat but they could not row fast enough to catch up with the fast drifting house, which bore down on the Pandora McHollister railroad bridge and with a mighty crash and smashed against it. The mother caught the bridge and held on, the children going down but coming up again under a tree. The oldest child helped the other two and held on to the tree, until the boat put out and rescued all of them.

A few minutes later violet and her sisters saw a house with an old man about 75 years old and his wife floating down the flood stream. The woman was lying on the roof. The old man was holding her. Suddenly the house struck a tree and the brick chimney fell off. Also the woman. When the rescuers put out in a boat and caught up with the old house one of the rescuers tried to draw in the woman who was dead but could not get her and so went off with the old man on place of safety. Simultaneously the little girls on the train saw another house on the house with a man and woman clinging to the chimney to keep from falling off. The house also had struck a tree, and the chimney crumbled, and both went down before the boat reached them and they were never seen again. There were only a few instances of the horrible things seen by violet and her sisters in passing along this flooded districts.

"God save us all," said violet to her sisters. "The Abbian Abbianmians did right in doing this but they made it as bad for themselves as us, or the enemy themselves. If this flood keeps on it will be awful. And there is no way of stopping the Ermita and Easter Starring rivers as it is rushing through this region to day. There are no banks to them whatever and it flows only a few blocks from the main section of the city of Goodnow. Only a miracle can save the glandelinian inhabitants who live in the lowlands. The christian armies are surely driving hard at their enemies." 88

At the small town of Stanok the little girls saw at least 500 people standing on housetops, waving table cloths, towels and other things in an effort to attract attention. Even while the train was proceeding on slowly over the flooded tracks they saw several hundred people mostly children standing on the rickety railway bridge, and then the vivid girls saw the bridge suddenly swept away, taking with it the women and children who had endeavored to cross.

It was impossible to aid them, and they sank in a whirling pool before the eyes of violet and her sisters. The scene of destruction and desolation were almost indescribable. Everywhere violet and her sisters saw men women and children weeping and begging for water to drink and food to eat. The Glandelinian rescuers were carrying mud-bed-ragged, haggard women and frightened children to the boats. Their limbs were temporarily paralyzed from standing in the water to their arm pits for over thirty two hours. Many had had babies and children children in their arms.

Thousands of frame cottages from many towns which had been carried two miles to the sight of violet and her sisters were smashed into kindling, in front of hundreds of yards and streets. Thousands of wrecked automobiles, street cars and wagons interfered as violet and her sisters saw with the rescue boats, dead animals were swarming all about, and a team of horses blocked the entrance of a large house where fifteen hundred persons were marooned and at the Fefe-dling station were five thousands persons were reported drowned eighteen dead horses were being forced out by means of poles by the men on boats, the relief train which had been on the way to take five to six hundred refugees to the camps having been seized by the Abbianmians before they got there. Fires even broke out among the taller buildings in the flood and the burned regions covered many blocks, but there was little danger of the fire spreading as the fifteen to forty feet of water inundating the buildings proved an effectual barrier.

Many times the glandelinian soldiers guarding flooded towns had to fire incessantly on Abbianmian looters and in neither case were the Abbianmians wounded, and the Glandelinians after exchanging shots like wild men for days were driven from the region altogether. The principal cause of the flood destruction, was the breaking of the levees of rivers by the Abbianmians, by using tons of explosives, and these explosives tore holes so big that all gave way letting in tons of water and piled up hundreds of thousands of houses and barns against the principal residences and buildings. The force of the current had washed deep ditches through the asphalt streets of towns from which it had subsided subsided, and carried the mud of the levee of the rivers into the buildings, filling them in places as deep as six feet.

Despite all the water in the flood the real necessity of the helpless seemed to be water, and there was no means of distributing the little water on hand on account of the sniping by Abbianmian sharpshooters who were everywhere but not able to be observed, and nearly all the rescued were through outly soaked and chilled though the climate of glandelinia was always warm throughout the year. There was no way of warming them of furnishing them with dry clothing, and so in the region of desolation nothing could be done and 1,675 automobiles running continuously from this point carrying refugees to homes and churches were gradually seized one by one by the Abbianmians who used them for their own rescue work.

Turrales between the Abbeismians and Glandelinians over the boats were frequent and often resulted in killing that was horrible. As the train was passing on Violet and her sisters saw fourteen people on debris jammed between a lamp post, and a telegraph pole. The jam was starting to break up and the people were climbing frantically up the telegraph pole. Many of them were women and children. One woman held a baby in her arms. However all of the fourteen fourteen reached a safe place on the pole, and several attempts to reach them was impossible on account of the fury of the current but out of sight of Violet and her sisters they were rescued.

Even in Glandelinia in all rescue work women and children were rescued first, for in the many thousands of rescues made not a man of Glandelinia attempted to violate the law of "Women and Children first" though this adherence cost the lives of many. There was many cases where boats were overturned and rescuers and rescued alike perished in the muddy waters, indeed rescuers police, and soldiers had no relief, they working untill until exhausted and carried to the huge log fires where they slept in the mud.

Everywhere was found a frantic despairing, half starved lot of people. They were huddled together, wherever high spots in the city afforded a place of refuge, the streets were raging torrents of in many of the cities, and so many persons were marooned in their homes that God alone could count them. Worse of all the waters were becoming higher and higher, and new panics broke out as it was reported that the Frandern reservoir had been broken by the Abbeismians and that a worse part of the flood was on the way..... There was even stories of fearful tragedies mingled with tales of remarkable bravery and heroism to be gained from those who had fought through the trying hours and days to save the marooned. The number of deaths remained a mystery, and one account of heroism which ended fatally was of sixteen Glandelinian soldiers who had rescued at least one hundred and fifty men women and children, from marooned residences, carrying load after load to higher land, and who when they started out upon another trip of rescue they encountered a rapid current, the boat was captured within sight of the persons they had rescued, and so the heroes went down, their bodies being carried away never to be found. The Glandelinian heroes whose deeds could have been recounted were too numerous to list. Men struggled in the work of rescue untill their muscles gave out and their strength failed. Large numbers of boats were at hand having been sent from all neighboring towns and localities, and immediate rescue of those marooned in the large buildings in the business sections of the large cities was impossible because of the swiftness of the current, and this could not be attempted until the waters had receded considerably.

The method of rescue was unique, as the current in most of the streets of the flooded cities made it unsafe to attempt to row toward the buildings. Ropes and cables were hurled into windows and made fast, and electric cables were cut and brought into use in many of the buildings. The batmen used these ropes and cables to propel their boats making progress hand over hand.

Hunger was the chief cause of the suffering among those who had been marooned in the higher buildings but plenty of food was at hand once the work of rescue became possible.

THE BATTLE OF MARCUCEAN. A HORRIBLE STORY OF CARNAGE. A DISASTER AND ITS RESULTS.

A A In the meantime while Violet and her sisters were riding through the flood on the train Evans had concentrated his army upon Manley at Marcucian twelve miles away from Vanity Fair, and so apprehensive was Manley that he saw nothing else to do but to throw precautions to the winds, and assault Evans as he had never assailed him before. It was lucky that Violet and her sisters were not here at this critical time, for so furious had the battle been that it was almost possible that nothing could have survived.

At first it was the purpose of the wicked Manley to make a heavy concentration upon the mighty christian army, but his other generals were not approving of this, as they believed it was a too big a slaughter of men. They knowing that general Evans whole line was too strong, to give way before a general concentration. Learning of the conditions elsewhere, of the devastation caused by the furious Abbeismians, the horrible flood and other disasters, Manley became still more apprehended, and so decided to make an assault upon Evans no matter what the cost and break the line if possible. He knew that he had weakened Evans army considerably by his desperate assaults in recent battles, and realized now that if he could crush Evans army before general Vivian arrived all would be well. He first sent out scouts to learn the distance that the christian army under Evans extended, and received word also about the location of general Vivians army as follows;

"Your excellency general Manley;

The army under the christ ian dog general Vivian is located about twenty six miles north of Marcucian, and is encamped, and not advancing. It seems that he is barred by a portion of the flood that is moving that way so it is advisable to attack christ Evans before general Vivian arrives to reinforce him. If you fail Vanity Fair and probably the cause of Glandelinia is lost."

Manley regardless of the results that would occur if he assaulted Evans lines immediately on the morrow ordered general Beelzebub, to assault the central position of Evans army, while Apollyon was ordered to assault the left. The assault came like a headlong avalanche of destruction, and raged for two hours with unceasing fury, but though the Glandelinians fought with the greatest bravery they could not obtain the position they wanted, and Apollyon, saw his grandest and mightiest columns of men, shattered and torn to pieces, and all his efforts unavailing. Beelzebub, simultaneously made greater efforts than Apollyon, but also with the same results, and Manley was dismayed by his horrible losses.

But he was not undaunted, and he sent then, upon the christian line twenty big divisions of Mc-Hollistinians under generals Plausible, Obstinate, Carral Policy, Worldly wiseman, Slough Despond, Legality, morality, Civility Johnston, Passion, Henry Dives, George Mann, Formalist, Hypocrisy, Difficulty Francis, Mistrust, Timorous,, Hidian, Apollyon, Pope, and Pagan, and these came forward with the tremendous fury, but were met with a fire along the whole christian line, that was like a devastating monster of horrible annihilation, and these twenty divisions were hurled back crushed and mangled and what horrified Manley more was that all these new generals fell some severely wounded, some killed, and the others internally injured.

A section of the christian line counter charged, but when opposed too furiously were recalled, and now ten other divisions of Glandelinians added by those already sent back under Talkative, Shame, Worldlyglory, Selfconceit, Arrogance, Pride, Discontent, Adam, Wanton and Deciet, came sweeping forward to make another assault, followed by a stronger line in the rear led by Beelzebub himself.

Scenes of desolation and horror followed this monstrous assault against the christian line. The assaulting columns when first noticed, had seemed to be forming southwest of Marcucian, and the Glandelinian columns yelling like a thrillion demons gone mad with frenzied came seething with almost irresistible fury over the lane cut offs just west of the points where the Northwestern Frandeseania hills line passed underneath. At one part of the christian line the Glandelinian assault was so terrific and irresistible that it carried all before it, the christians were thrown into confusion, and that portion of the christian line swept back. Another section of this Glandelinian wave swept through the valley of Humiliation and suddenly bent to the north passing directly along the right of way of the Mc-Hollister Pandora Railroad, striking the whole christian center and cutting a wide swath between Concordia Run and the main christian right wing. At the beginning of the assault six of these ten other Glandelinian generals fell mortally wounded, and as the assault gathered in fury and the christian fire reaped a frightful harvest over ten miles long, it was proved that in the ghastly path of the Abbeismian cannon and masonry fire nothing could escape and all of the ten generals were down when the assault was at its worst. That the list of the dead generals was not already much larger was inexplicable for the obliteration, complete and incomprehensible, of whole divisions of the Glandelinians furnished clear proof of the irresistible force of the christian counter charge. The rear line coming on after escaped for the time being almost intact, but the ten other divisions coming on first became for the most part but a dismal reminder of what had been, and as the survivors gave way, the fields and plains, and the valley itself was so smothered in the bodies of the dead and wounded Glandelinians, that travel even on foot was practically impossible without treading on them.

The second great wave however under Beelzebub was not daunted by the most frightful slaughter, and came on with greater fury struck the crest of the christian position g under general Farmer, plowed on through the solid front line until checked by a deadly converging fire that threatened them with complete annihilation. But all this could not stop them, and the survivors came on with all the wildness they could assume. The carnage was something terrible to behold, but early in the struggle along this section of the line general Beelzebub was severely wounded, and so heavy was the losses of his glandelinians that the survivors appalled recoiled in confusion, and at Once Evans ordered a general counter charge. He sent fourteen divisions to keep the enemy retreating, while he cannonaded the enemy's lines fearfully in the meanwhile. Opposition was too strong for these fourteen divisions of Abbeidanians however, and Evans had to recall them and sent fresh forces to replace the broken portions of his lines to repel any further attack from the enemy. The losses of the foe was already 5,678,888 in killed and wounded, while those of the christians was 6,789,999.

Evans in the meantime concentrated all his artillery in front of the main line of works, for his line had fought with only little artillery support during this portion of the battle, and now all was prepared for the renewal of the assault. Two hours lull followed, then suddenly without warning Hanleys artillery let loose a tornado of shell fire all along the line and this was added by a storming assault from his first main line. The attack came on with such irresistible violence that the whole portion of Evans left wing which received the main shock of the assault, was almost annihilated, general Flanders was killed and the survivors were thrown into confusion. Richardson Halsted, was sent to stop the wild attack in this location, and he went forward with his forces, but within an hour desperate fighting sent word to general Evans that he could not do anything to check the assault unless more troops were sent to him. So Parson came with his infantry and artillery support, and also those under Kindermine and the efforts to repulse the assault of the enemy was redoubled in the fury of the battle became so terrific that the thundering crash of artillery and musketry was something like heard at Glorinda.

The wild assault of the enemy was indescribable, the columns being torn and mangled only to rally with fierce yells and come close within reach of the works each time. The christian divisions under generals Evangelist, Help, Goodwill, James Interpreter, Patience, Comforter, Watchful, Discretion, Piety, Prudence, Charity, Gideon, Jai, Sisera, Shammur, David Glo-Golliath, Gath, Je Jeremiah, Faithful, Decie Josie, Knowledge, Experience, Sincere, Greatgrace, Good Confidence, Hoppeful, Honesty Wise, Sagacity, Jack Mercy, Reliever, Gadus, Taste-that-which-is-good, Meason, Contrite, Holyman, Lovesaint, Penitent, Hill Jaure, and Valiant For Truth, arrived to Halsted's aid, but all these divisions seemed unable to stop the enemy's wild headlong assault, but Evans had in the meantime sent a large portion of his army around through the valley of Humiliation, and these soon came upon the flank of the assailants and made such a driving attack, that they were driven into confusion, and so Halsted was able not only to repulse his assailants but also made a furious counter charge which drove the retreating Glandelinians into a panic and so he finally carried all before him.

The assault was also as violent along the central portion of the christian line, but the artillery did good execution and for a time held the enemy at bay until the second line came up, and after four hours bloody fighting drove back the assailants. Along the right the assault was not quite so severe, but it had been almost successful before it was repulsed. But all this success of the christians did not help any just now, for after an hour's lull new forces of Glandelinians came on to renew the attack.

No terrific storm in any time of the world's beginning was as terrific a sight as this Glandelinian assault, and it fairly tore Evans' line to pieces. Who could describe the fury of this violent assault. One lad of fourteen years who was a lieutenant in his army told of his experience to Evans himself after the bloody fray.

"I saw the enemy coming as it were like a big tidal wave. I was commanding one portion of my regiment in a by trench, near a group of trees between which stood a small barn, cumbered with small pit pictures of children looking straight at you as it seemed, and I saw that if something was not done enough for the christian line all would be lost as the foe was coming on so furiously that all hell and its demons could not stop them. The roar of the firing along the christian line almost deafened me, and as the tremendous shock came, from both front and rear, my force was thrown into confusion and almost annihilated. Now my regiment under Captain Joe Hayman stopped the attack along its line I could never tell but he did.

It simply was awful, like some terrific typhoon let loose along us."

Indeed the assault was so violent that Evans was worried, and feared that after all the battle would be lost, and so sent Colonel Sanders to go and find general Vivian and warn him of his peril. His army was good and strong it was true but the enemy when attacking always drove every assault home though repulsed as it was, and his losses was becoming unspeakably terrific, and his survivors exhausted. This brave colonel at once set out to do his duty, and no sooner had he left the christian lines when he observed that he was pursued by a large party of Mo-Hollestonians on horse back led by a colonel too. To meet these dangerous Glandelinians in a pistol fight was suicide, and so he strove to outdistance these hooded demons, and slowly did so, though the Glandelinians let fly a shower of lances, and the leader ordered him to halt.

"Go to hell" was his answer, and with a deliberate shot he killed the Glandelinian colonel which threw the Glandelinians into confusion.

This incident delayed the pursuers somewhat until he gained considerable headway, but now the Mo-Hollestonians were only enraged at the fall of their leader, and came tearing after him as fast as they could drive their horses on the gallop firing their pistols as they did so. Sanders saved himself from being shot down by lying low on the horse, the bullets whistling close to him, and he reached the vicinity of general Vivian's line safely and found the army already moving forward on the march. Watching the advance of the cowardly forces which it was always evident that general Vivian would always ride with they inquired for him and found him just coming up with his staff officers.

Riding up to general Vivian he saluted and said:

"Your excellency general Vivian, general Evans has reached Maroucian ahead of you and is violently attacked by the Hanleys armies and if you do not hurry to his aid the battle will be lost."

"You don't say" answered general Vivian. "I thought something was wrong, for I heard the noise of the firing way out here. I'll go to his aid as quickly as my armies can advance."

In the meantime it happened that Evans' army again repulsed the enemy's headlong onslaught, but now the first line of works was in possession of the enemy, and it was seen by Evans that another onslaught would be fatal, and worse of all most of the ammunition was spent, and all the fresh ammunition he had was captured by the enemy who had seized all the provision trains. He also was terribly worried over the long absence of Violet and her sisters and feared that they had either been seized and slain by the enemy, or perished in the raging floods caused by the Abbeidanians. He knew where they had gone, and was sorry that he had allowed them to do so, for they were absent longer than he had expected, and he almost felt like crying as he believed that they had surely perished. But these worried feelings put him in him his furious fighting spirit, and thus already since the battle began the losses of the Glandelinians was about 10,789,999 in killed and wounded while the losses of the christians was only 8,999,876. Evans believed if he could reform his broken lines he would be able to hold back any attacks of the enemy until night fall, for he knew that general Vivian could not arrive until the next morning, and so the most energetic efforts were made and partly succeeded, so that once again the christian line was in strong reformation, and awaited the next attack of the enemy.

But Manley had foolishly decided to wait until the morning, which if he had not done, he could have easily forced Evans from his position before general Vivian arrived and won a battle which would have insured a great victory for the Glandelinian cause, and drove out the christian invaders quicker than they had rushed in. But this delay brought in the next morning to Manley's army a horrible disaster, and caused him the greatest mortification in his life.

Seeing that Manley had no intentions of making any further attacks Evans set to work to fortify his main second line and in at three o'clock in the afternoon, made suddenly a tremendous headlong onslaught on the enemy in possession of his first line of trenches covered by a battering storm of fire from 100,000 cannons of every calibre. The slaughter was horrible but for four hours the enemy held the works, and the terrific inferno and now the worse of the battle raged. Evans speedily commanded the flank of the captured position bring up more and more artillary until the whole Glandelinian force in possession of the works was inflamed in a conglomeration of shell fire, and driven into panic they retreated back toward the main line, with the victorious christians in full pursuit.

The pursuers swept onward driving the Glandelinians clean to their main line, and then recoiled themselves as they were under orders not to assault the enemy's main lines as yet.

On account of Manley delaying his renewed efforts, Evans had recaptured his second as first line position, and cut up the defending columns so dreadfully that Manleys whole army was so badly depleted and impaired in strength that he did not know what to do. He was confident of success however as more forces were reported advancing to his rescue, and so he decided to wait until morning and begin the battle again with redoubled fury. Evans did not believe it was prudent to wait for Manleys attack, and so during the lull at four o'clock sent forth a large scouting party to locate the enemys main position, and find out their strength, but when these returned they brought him reports which discouraged any intentions to attack Manley that evening. He tried to force Manley however into an artillery duel, but after firing for several minutes and receiving no response Evans gave it up and so the remainder of the evening was spent in quietude, and at this moment from the southeast the train with the load of child slaves which had passed safely through the flooded districts arrived within the christian lines to the joy of all the soldiers, and these children were quickly secured, and placed in proper portions of the line where the foe could not get them. Violet and her sisters were among them, and were received with the greatest welcome by Evans and the soldiers. Violet and her sisters on the train had heard the roar of the conflict, but did not know as yet that it had been

Evans army engaged, but apprehended that the children would be rescued and sent away to Freedom, as he had learned of the arrival of the train by his scouts. Manley had been over worked with frenzy, and so toward eleven o'clock that night, when Violet and her sisters were with Evans in his headquarters telling him how they passed the flood, were surprised by a sudden yell a tremendous rolling crash of musketry, and sudden thundering of cannon all along the whole christian line. Again the enemy had made a terrific assault, and Evans rushed out to suppress orders.

It was indeed the worse assault of the battle yet, Manley having thrown forward nearly one quarter of his army against the christian line and so violent was the assault, that at first a large portion of the three christian wings had been driven back from their works in confusion, and in the midst of the fray a large division of Mc-Hollestonians had carried the christian works in the vicinity of Evans headquarters, and came rushing toward the building with tremendous bull fury and before Evans could escape he with the little girls were good as prisoners inside the building, with many of the soldiers who had entered the place to seek shelter.

The Glandelinians learning that Violet and her sisters were inside the building tried every effort to force an entrance but all those within were sharpshooters and brought down the assailants by the score. Cannon was brought up from the captured works by the Mc-Hollestonians and opened upon the house committing terrible havoc and scores of the christian soldiers were killed and hundreds wounded. Threatened with annihilation the soldiers prepared to fight to the last, while Evans and the little girls went down to the cellar of the house to avoid the fury of the exploding shells in the already badly shattered room. It is evident that all would have been annihilated, and Evans and the little girls captured, had not the frightful assault all along the line been repulsed by the Abbeannians who shot down nearly the whole line of gray-coated assailants, and counter-charged with such crushing fury, that they carried all before them. Neither did the Abbeannian line stop in its mad rush but stormed Manleys main line and despite frightful losses almost carried it and would have if general Goodwill had not fallen wounded.

Then he gave way but in order contesting every step of the way and now Evans being fully aware of the danger, concentrated all his available forces, and met the assailants with a withering fire, crushing back and annihilating charge after charge, and ending the conflict again in a short lull. If a terrific thunderstorm had been going on with a hurricane of typhoon violence at the same time it could not have compared to this frightful storm of battle raging in the dark, with the flashes of musketry, and cannon and added by the different hues of flashes from exploding shells, and the din of the terrific firing. Violet and her sisters had been surprised at the suddenness of the bloody attack but at first thought that the enemy had already just started a fight. But the soldiers told them that the conflict had been raging all day, and that it had been a frightful one indeed. Again and again, and still again the enemy renewed the assault with the wildest frenzied fury but could not break the christian line at any point, and suffered the annihilation of line after line and so Manley again became more prudent, and realizing that he could not accomplish anything in the dark awaited the following morning.

But by this time general Vivians army had arrived, more and more of his army was coming, and Evans was being strengthened ten fold, and instead of waiting for Manley to renew the attack opened a general cannonade with all his guns and came forward with his whole army to storm Manleys army, holding general Vivians in reserve. As Manley saw this monstrous tidal wave of Abbeannians coming forward he had all his artillery primed, and discharge after discharge tore through the whole christian line galling and mangling whole columns, but as quickly as these columns would give way others would mingle with the gaps and so the whole christian line came on, closing all the gaps made, and pouring through the valley of humiliation poured over the enemys works in a perfect surge and close with the first line of Glandelinians cutting down hundreds of thousands in that one rush, driving the survivors from the works and capturing all the cannon. Horrible was the fury of the Glandelinian counter charges, thirteen being made within four hours time and crushed back with almost complete annihilation. Finally however Manley made such an overwhelming concentration, that to hold the position was impossible, and after repulsing equally a hundred bloody assaults in endless succession in which a hundred thousand Glandelinians fell in each assault Evans had to withdraw his shattered lines and the enemy following pursued him clean to his own position and tried every effort to take it also but was repulsed with excruciating losses.

Now it came time for general Vivian to try his luck. He had been preparing his army all this while, and concentrating his army he moved forward his whole army, Evans joining and the biggest charge of the battle was on. The whole christian line advanced in three monstrous divisions each over thirty six miles in extent and in perfect order, but as fast as they could run yelling so fiercely that the Glandelinians were apprehensive. This onrush was unspeakably terrific in the extreme, general Roswell Guster Johnstons Concentinians and Abyssinkilians holding the center, with on their main left the Dandobians and Tripolygonians of kindermine and Halstedes and on their right, the Calvinians, Abbeannians, and Abyssinkilians of Evans, and there were also Protestantian and Mormonian divisions in the attacking force.

Evans army however was the first one to press the terrific charge home. After having started forward, and leaving their own positions the christians had two miles of ground to go in their oncharge across the valley of Humiliation or Shadow of death, and as the ferocious Abbeannians moved forward in their headlong rush they bent their line slightly to the left so as to prevent a gap between them and the Abyssinkilians on their right. Magnificently, and like a soothing storm wave against a breakwater the christian lines came on roaring hideously with the yells of the Abbeannians and other assailants, and as they crossed the Pandora right of war, the eight hundred thousand Glandelinian guns no cool and in good shape opened upon them with a ear-splitting barrage of shot shell and high explosives, making great gaps hundreds of feet long at every step, but the purple and red clad soldiers closed up to the center, and came on with a fiercer rush, the color bearers leaping to the front sinking and waving their beautiful flags just as the whole Abbeannian line dissolved away into a sea of smoke, and so many gaps were observed at once in Manleys lines that what was a conglomeration of confusion when a horrible uproar prevailed everywhere. It was awful, the second line of Glandelinian infantry and artillery reserve vainly reserving their fire until the Abbeannian tidal wave, was within easy range, then all along the line the musketry crashed out like a trillion cannon the big cannons adding with grape, canister and shells at close quarters. The havoc among the Abbeannians was intolerable, but it could not stop general Vivians wild swooping onrush, though his men fell in hundreds of thousands, the colors fluttering on both sides like a forest, the scene was a smoke and slaughter hell, color bearers fell by the score and the din was nerve-racking. The Dandobians were exposed terribly to the terrific Glandelinian artillery and musketry fire, more than any of the other attacking christian forces, and they were horribly broken before they reached the Mc-Hollestonian lines but nevertheless did not falter. Unfortunately for Manley there was a wide gap ten miles long mowed by the covering christian artillery fire in Manleys center, between the Garmian and Masonic forces, and this was taken advantage of by Evans whose army was way in the lead, who rushed the trenches like a roaring cyclone, and thrust forward it into it. Simultaneously Roswell Guster Johnston started to change his own front with his divisions and closing with the enemy in a horrible death struggle, turned a portion of the Mc-Hollestonian force and in the melee that turned hell into a paradise from its horror, Guster relieving Roswell who was wounded continued the attack, caught the Mc-Hollestonians in the flank, and when thus struck in the flank, the Mc-Hollestonians though defending themselves like a thousand million Christians against the same number of Apollyons could not hold their position, and crowding off toward their own center to avoid the horrible pressure they were almost surrounded and forced back in the wildest confusion.

All of these Mc-Hollestonians were driven driven back, hundreds of thousands killed, and millions wounded, or captured, and the whole Abbieannian line like a tidal wave forced their way forward to the enemy's main line position, all of the Glandelinian batteries of eight hundred thousand cannon firing to the last moment moment, untill of every gun despite the many there was all but two officers had been struck, all the artillery horses had been slaughtered, and the gunners mowed down. Indeed it was a massacre.

But it accomplished nothing for general yivian, for during the assault his right wing was turned, overlapped and completely annihilated, Manley brought up his fresh forces, and hurled them upon the christian assailants who were in possession of the works, and after four hours of frightful slaughter that exceeded any battle in the invasion yet, in which both general yivian and Evans fell severely wounded, sent the Abbieannians back across the ground they had captured, a hundred divisions being crushed to the frightfulness that God alone could predict.

Following the repulse so frightful and bloody came a counter charge made by the Glandelinians which though proved unsuccessful and which caused the Glandelinian assailants the loss of 13,456,566 in killed and wounded caused the capture of general Evans headquarters, and also of all who were in it including Violet and her sisters, and all their child friends who were in the building at the time. The struggle along the whole line was horrible to behold, whole lines ten miles long being crushed to fragments by their losses, general Roswell Buster Johnston taking Evans place fell severely wounded, Parson and Halsted were disabled and many of the divisions had all their general and regimental commanders shot to death or wounded.

It was a leaderless army fighting for existence, to try and reestablish their lines after the frightful disaster that occurred, and though the frightful headlong onslaught of the enemy was repulsed, it was speedily resumed by more divisions of Mc-Hollestonians, Manley sending more these forward than the others, as these he trusted to win the battle for him than the others. This new attack was terrific, and the battle raged with redoubled violence, as now Kindernine had taken the place of Evans and proved himself an able bodied commander, though all the new generals had fallen killed or wounded, besides many of the old time fighters. The scene of this conflict now was indescribable, it was a literal hell of slaughter, a scene almost resembling the approach of the end of the world.

Ten divisions of christians were driven into frightful confusion, the assault of the enemy driving forward with the roar of an avalanche, and battery after battery of the christians poured in a fire of devastating fury, which swept away column after column by the score, but in vain on and still on came the Mc-Hollestonians yelling like demons demons and fighting with the same fury. Kindernine was exerting his utmost to help in keeping the line firm, but in many places by the violence of the assault it was broken, and now the foe came within close quarters with the whole line like a surging tidal wave, and all now seemed lost.

General Beelsabub however on the side of the enemy fell mortally wounded, and this gave the christians some time to reestablish a part of the broken and shattered lines. Good God who could have seen this frightful Mc-Hollestonian onslaught and not be horrified. Whole divisions of christians were rushed to fragments, and Manley now was throwing forward his whole entire army to the assault, and the great battle of Maroucian or Vanity Fair was raging at its highest fury. All the christian cannon were in action, every man on the Abbieannian side was put into the desperate struggle, and so terrific was the din that the air rang in deafening salvos of echoes, as if a hundred million thunderstorms was going on at one time.

Many of the wicked Glandelinian generals had fallen, but it did not stop the assault, and toward night fall, when the conflict again closed, it was in favor of the enemy who were in possession of the first tree trenches again.

Evans and general yivian had been borne from the scene of carnage the moment they were wounded, and it was also reported in the evening that Kindernine was also disabled, and that there was no general of any able kind to take command of the army which was completely without a leader, and was also jeopardized. When Evans learned of the capture of Violet and her sisters though wounded and lying helpless in bed he ordered the full force of the strong Abbieannian and Concentinian cavalry to charge the enemy, now at the portion or in possession of the works but Manley's main line and do their best to recover the stolen children. Indeed the capture of Violet and her sisters brought on the fiercest cavalry fight in the war. General Walter Starring was in personal command of the christian cavalry, and Francis Schmidt Stuart the famous Glandelinian commander, moving forward in the mean time to check any effort to regain Violet and her sisters, was met by the Abbieannian cavalry under Starring, and there followed a contest at close quarters with "the white arm." It closed with such a desperate melee that the angles of hell seemed to let loose with demons fighting together on horse back, a scene enough to appall all in heaven itself, and in which the Mc-Hollestonians charging under general Hamptson Wadson, and Leo Janit were not in mid career by the Abbieannian general Gusterson Mc-Holleston Darger, and Francis Mc-Holleston Mc-Intosh. All four fought like mad wild fiends sabre in hand, at the head of their troopers, and though 23,456,789 cavalry men were on both sides every man on each side was put into the bloody fray, and no one could describe the real scene unless it was literally witnessed. The two Mc-Hollestonians their long hair flowing their faces aflame with the eager joy of battle, was in the thickest of the storm in a melee rising in their stirrups as they called to their famous Abbieannian lancers, and swordsmen. "Come on you wolverines of Abbieannia come on. Give the Glandelinian dogs of hell all the position they want."

All that the long lines of inactive Abbieannian infantry watching eagerly from their lines could see was a vast cloud of dust and smoke where millions of flint flakes of light shimmered as the sun shone upon the swinging sabres, pistol butts or barrels, and lance points.

Time and again the forces broke through each other like a thundering series of avalanches of men and horses, fighting fiendish duels at close quarters, even wrestling with each other and using their fists. Time and again the Abbieannian horsemen were beaten back, but again and again they rushed wildly to the attack, and the field was covered with a sea of dead and wounded horses and men. This desperate cavalry melee lasted fully two hours and finally the Glandelinian cavalry proved to be the masters and the Abbieannians silently withdrew. Evans was disheartened over his failure, and begged one of the couriers to go to the nearest christian army that would be imitative and ask for aid. Starring failing in his cavalry fight decided to go on the dangerous mission but was refused, as general yivian himself would not hear of it. Elsewhere the battle was still raging, for at many points the Abbieannians were striving with all their might to retake their lost positions, and the loud thundering of guns fairly shook the earth. Manley having rested his troops decided to renew the attack before any other christian army hearing the wild roar of the conflict would advance to the rescue. It was his purpose to save Glandelinia from defeat by destroying the christian army under Evans, and so he did not intend to let up until he accomplished his purpose. Of course despite being leaderless the christian army was equal to his in strength, but this did not daunt Manley, and what made him hope for success more was that it was evident that without a leader the christian troops could not fight properly and soon would have to give in or meet annihilation.

He decided to throw his whole army into the action, and making three turning movements at the same time. So at nine o'clock that night the struggle was resumed with tenfold fury, and millions of christian soldiers opened fire at once upon the assailants with a terrific withering roar destroying thirteen divisions of Glandelinians.

This put them into considerable confusion, but the main wave came on followed behind them by three other great waves. Each wave was torn to pieces, and driven back within six hours of devilish fighting, but sixteen times fresh waves came on repeatedly, and if the ocean waves ever tore at a ship more violently, then when could have it happened. All these waves were torn shattered and rangled, with horrible loss in officers, but the assaults were repeated again, and again, and still again with unceasing fury and it did not desist until the dawn of day when Manley began to realize he was crushing his army against a solid wall of christian troops leaderless though they were.

His three turning movements had met with disaster, and all assaults at every quarter was repulsed. Early in the morning it was expected that the frightful storm of assaults would be resumed, but for two hours all was quiet. General Melachirno had been offered the command of the army early in the morning and he did his best to establish the broken lines and place fresh guns in the places where others had been blown up or disabled. Evans directed everything from the point where he lay wounded, and so did general yivian and then when it was seen that Manley was delaying the attack, it was thought best to force matters, and a headlong assault was made on Manley's right wing, but it did not accomplish anything on the line of victory but in the headlong fury of the assault many prisoners were taken besides all the children had been retaken and brought safely back to the christian lines though many were shaken up by their harrowing experiences, as they had observed the full fury of the bloody conflict, and saw the frightful slaughter during the most desperate cavalry melee in the war itself. Following the repulse of the christian right wing came another headlong Glandelinian onslaught and thus put an end to anything imaginable. Both sides suffered losses that was unaccountably cruel and barbarous to one another, but it ended after five hours of furious slaughter slaughter as another slight christian success but the works were still in possession of the foe.

Federal Hanson's, Raymond Richardson's christian forces mostly Abbieannians simultaneously made a assault of great desperation against the glandelinians in possession of a portion of the works along the central line, making great efforts to throw the foe into wild confusion by a driving movement and so fierce was the resistance of the enemy, and so terrific was the fire that the christians met that it is probable that a most serious disaster would have occurred, had it not been for the arrival of a portion of Dargers' army which was advancing that way, and followed by his brothers August Dargers. They were thus able to avert the threatening new disaster, but never theless their advance was barred and checked in that location, and a roaring counter charge of the glandelinians was thrown back with the loss of two main commanders.

Evans ordered that fourteen desperate assaults should be made on the enemy's lines in a desperate effort to try and recover the lost ground ordering Shoemunn's Abbieannians to attack the glandelinian center and right, and though these forces were thrown forward as incessantly as the storm waves of the sea, it was unavailable, the whole assailing line of Abbieannians being cut up and thrown into a pandemonium of confusion fourteen times, again hundreds of christian generals were falling dead and wounded in the face of the murderous glandelinian cannon and musketry fire, and other officers who had tried to rally their shattered and mangled divisions fell mangled and bleeding, and though panacea's forces came up in time to take a part in the desperate conflict, the whole line of the enemy was pouring a simultaneous first and then a continuous and incessant withering barrage fire of musketry and artillery, but in the face of this steady assaults, determined and obstinate was made by the Abbieannians the battle raging with frightful fury, these stubborn stubborn assaults continuing for four hours, and though again and again and still again the whole line of christians who made the assaults was torn to pieces, their shattered columns rallied again and again, and went to it with might and main and almost won the field when general Mc-Cantler and Dargen fell dangerously wounded. These christian columns were then counter charged by the glandelinians with the most tremendous fury, cut to pieces and routed with the loss of all their main commanders, and hundreds of thousands of the christians were slain during the retro retreat.....

Other big waves of Abbieannians came rushing on to the assault with redoubled fury, the firing on both sides now became exceedingly severe in the extreme, again desolation was spreading over the distance of fifty miles, shells were bursting in a perfect confetti storm everywhere, whole columns of the Abbieannians rushing clean up to the muzzles of the glandelinian guns were laid low like a forest torn by a tornado, a curtain fire of artillery and musketry breaking out along the enemy's lines and the battle was heard throughout the whole region for the distance of one thousand miles.

Nevertheless the surviving christians went to it with all the force that they could muster raging a nother Francis Atlanta almost. All these christian assaults had been covered by all the available guns of the christian batteries, but the enemy had replied with might and main while leveling and mowing their smallest artillery upon the Abbieannian assailants committing such incalculable damage among the christian troops that they were frequently thrown into great confusion, division after division having been torn to fragments, whole armies were again and again mangled and cut up, the main line by a blasting artillery fire being torn through and through by the greatest artillery fire ever experienced, many of the assailing forces also having been banded back so far, that soon the whole assailing line was again thrown into confusion, the enemy made another desperate counter dash with the fiercest yells, and now the enemy were in possession of the second line of christian works.

In repelling the desperate counter charge however the other portions of the christian line had nevertheless held firm, but soon their own right and left was turned and exposed to a blasting artillery fire on all sides, and threatened with annihilation were compelled to give way in the greatest confusion.

A good portion of the main line then had to give way or be destroyed, and Henry Darger coming to the rescue with the remains of his forces did all in his power to stay the ferocious glandelinian onslaught, meanwhile sending to his brother to hurry up his army, and give aid. A seething storm of carnage was raging everywhere, and as he was reforming a portion of his broken lines poor Darger fell dangerously wounded, and his forces unsupported had to stand for five hours, against eighteen desperate headlong onslaughts which each time threatened to almost carry all before it, and finally the remainder of Dargers' forces was compelled to retreat and again the field was abandoned to the enemy.

Terrific indeed now was the terrific uproar of the battle, along the christian lines under Evans and general Vivian. All of the country seemed to be vibrating with the terrible convulsion of the battle, and both sides surged back and forth all day in series of desperate onslaughts, the battle being more general and the roaring of cannon and musketry never ceasing. Soon however general August Dargers' armies was approaching within view followed by the Abbieannians under Go George Sparr, and these soon forming into line, placed their batteries, opened fire with a roar and crash of a billion cannon and swept forward with tremendous fury, yelling like fiends, their front main line was pounded to pieces by the glandelinian artillery fire, but on swept the survivors survivors, and though columns were shattered, to such horrible dimensions that only one quarter were left and main divisions were hurled back, the remainder of the main line of assault continued to rush forward with terrifying fury, the glandelinian center was stormed and swept to piecemeal by the headlong rush of August Dargers' Dargers' Abbieannians, many of the glandelinians holding their oars to the very last creating a regular fiery battle storm of great intensity. At this section a great glandelinian column made a furious counter charge but was vanquished with frightful slaughter.

It seemed now that the christian assault was going to be successful, and again and again in desperate efforts to strike back the christian onslaught Manley drove with all his might scores of millions of horsemen who rode against the assailants like an avalanche, following an avalanche in endless succession, but they were mowed down by the Abbieannians in such frightful numbers that they left a conglomeration of horses and men lying in that merciless slaughter slaughter inferno.

General James Scott on the christian side was killed, and so was Mc-Holleston Agricola and Dargen's Gaidicalla, while generals Caledonia Johnston, and Severus Higgenbottom were mortally wounded, Bodocia Henryton and his brother Catus were killed, Gaul Francis, and Anglesay Johnson fell mortally wounded, while Mc-Holleston James Suetonius was cut in two by the fragment of a shell.

Indeed like the same shattering storm waves of christians at Gloriana the Abbieannians along the center was pressing onward, but now the glandelinians here were reinforced by other portions of the main body and these were concentrated upon the christian assailants who had already lost over 16,789,999 in killed and wounded, a battering storm of artillery tore up their remaining lines, and the assault was again repulsed with such frightful losses that by night fall all fighting again ceased and again there came a lull in the titanic conflict.

This lull lasted only for two hours and then at eight o'clock general Manley seeing the advantage he had again made ordered a general attack again, and once more the battle storm was raging in full sway at nine o'clock, the christian armies closing upon the glandelinians and falling upon them with such great slaughter that within an hour's time they were glad to give way, the christian cavalries pursuing and dividing a large part of the assailing force and mauling them all as none of the foolish Glandelinians would not surrender. Ten times the Angellians rushed again to the attack themselves like a shattering storm wave, and fourteen times that night in endless succession of assaults the enemy rushed to the storming, and in the morning both sides withdrew exhausted by their innumerable losses. Again had raged the fiercest conflict of the great invasion raging three days and one night, and ending as a draw, with no advantage won on either side. On one occasion during the frightful conflict Violet and her sisters had heard one of the christian generals say;

"General Marcocollio talk about the times of the Anti-Christ? And Anti-Christ; why I think any one would rather meet him than the fury of any of the Manleys of his glandelinians. Good God see how they are attacking us. They will be destroyed, or destroy our own armies. I never saw the like and I fought at Gloriana too. Ain't it terrible."

For three days Manley stayed where he was changing his position, and then started a retreat the christians following slowly, not expecting that the enemy were only deceiving them, and on the following night when the christians were encamped near the southern portions of the Place again battle began with redoubled fury, and raged all night long with such dammning fury that Logan Zoe has seemed to be raging in glandelinia.

The enemy came hurling his himself against the christian line like an overwhelming tidal wave, and carried all before it. The whole christian line was in action once more, and the uproar of musketry was like a trillion cannon. Many more fell in this part of the battle of -arocian than in any other battle up to this time in the invasion. The losses of both sides was too shocking to describe, and August Darger taking chief command of the armies, kept all the whole christian line firm, and drove in his counter charges with such violence that finally toward the morning the enemy withdrew with the losses of 30,000,000 in killed and wounded that one night.

Violet and her sisters were horrified at this long and tremendous conflict, and were also surprised and startled at the fighting fury of the savage glandelinian soldiery. Driven to desperation and despair, by the ravages caused by the enraged Abbieonians, the flood, the sacking and burning of so many of their towns, villages and cities, the glandelinians and the little girls realized had aroused themselves to a fearful fit of frenzy and so the fighting was more desperate and battles more severe and violent than any ever heard of in Calverinia out side of the three most violent battles of the war. Again and again during the whole battle after its first days duration Violet and her sisters had observed the enemys assaulting columns come rushing forward, and after wards to see only remnants go back in shattered fragments. That had been almost saddened again when they had learned that their great friend and guardian Evans had been severely wounded, and also their father, and frequently went to see them, and saw that their condition was bad enough to keep them both out of action for a season. To then this battle of Maraudian was too horrible to believe, and after the second battle had ceased that morning they had hoped that it was over, but not so for later on the enemy only rushed on to the attack again, and so fierce and deadly was the conflict that they fairly begged God to speedily bring it to a close.

They abhorred such a dreadful slaughter and wondered if both armies were going to annihilate one another. They saw the fearful concentration of the Glandelinian soldiers along the whole christian line within their view saw the fearful firing, the inferno like scene, the snowstorm of bursting shells, forests of tattered flags fluttering here and there, and of columns at times giving way in some confusion only to be rallied again, and give more sturdier resistance than ever.

They were shocked by the terrific din of explosions, the crash of cannons, the drumming rattle of musketry like boom of sharpnell fire and knew that it was indeed a furious and bloody battle. Twice the left wing of the christian line was rolled up with heavy loss, and twice it was rallied and regained the ground driving the glandelinians before them.

Violet and her sisters had rembered their frightful experiences during the other bloody battles, and so during this frightful conflict kept their distance far to the firing line, but they would have given anything to have borne the flag into battle. They had the spirit of battle in them, and shouted with glee when ever they saw the christian line surge forward to drive back the assailants. All day long and the rest of the night the battle continued the enemy making at least sixteen desperate onslaughts with unceasing fury and and as many times driving the christian line into confusion, and breaking it and tearing it to pieces time and again. During that frightful night of battle storm and tempest, Violet and her sisters dared not try to go to sleep or lie down for fear that the enemy would make some successful rush and that they would be captured again. All night long they listened in excitement, apprehension and horror to the wild thunder of cannons, the frenzied insane yell of the combatants, the crash upon crash of musketry, the boom and bang of exploding shells, and the cries and commands of officers to here and there. It was indeed a wild and battle storm that night making a din worse than any typhoon could have ever done, and was unapparelled with the recent horro caused by the erut eruption of the calverinian volcano so long ago before the wars outbreak, and sometimes made the little girls believe that the same thing was going on again. It was Manleys purpose to stop the christian advance at whatever the cost and thus the reason for the desperate fighting going on so incessantly.

Then morning dawned there was a lull in the fierce and bloody conflict but scouts came in every now and then reporting that Manley was exerting his utmost to drive a general and final assault against the christian line, and so the officers were keeping their men well prepared, so that they would not be taken by surprise.

Finally the horrible assault came, covered by a tremendous artillery fire and the din was now terrific in the worse part of the battle. Manley hurled three mighty divisions forward to the assault, against the whole christian line and for four hours that morning the firing was so incessant and fierce that nothing could be seen so thick was the smoke. Time and again under cover of the smoke the foe drove their onslaughts home, closing with the christians in frightful merciless deathstruggles, but they were only driven back crushed and mangled.

Darger proved to Manley that he was able to do all that he wished for general Evans in winning this tremendous conflict, and so did not spare a man and kept the whole christian line as firm as a wall of rocks. Fourteen times the glandelinian generals hurled their cavalry forces forward in a fierce effort to capture the wildly thundering christian batteries and those cavalry column came back a dismal reminder of what they had went through. This furious firing left a conglomeration of wreckage in its path mingled with the bodies of the slain.

Darger now decided to assume the offensive, and after preparing his troops drove at the enemy in a fierce attack that surprised them completely. The battle raged with more redoubled fury, it was a screaming hell of fury, but after desperate fighting all that afternoon the foe finally withdrew from the christian positions they had captured earlier in the conflict, and Dargers armies pushing on forced the whole line to give way, though the christians met fiercer opposition at every step, and by the time they had reached the enemys proper position they were so weakened by losses that they did not assault the position right away, but prudently withdrew. The battle however was totally ended now, having ended again as a draw but with the advantage to the christians. At the advice of Evans Darger did not make the general attack he had intended and so the slaughter was over again at last, and at night time the enemy withdrew slowly abandoning their position but taking with them all their provisions and artillery.

This conflict had been a fearful battle and both sides had been so exhausted by their losses which though not stated nearly equaled that of Logan Zee Mac Run, that they were for a time out of commission and could not hardly do any more fighting for nearly two months.

Violet and her sisters were delighted that the conflict had ceased and cheered the men as they marched by in persued of the enemy.

The whole christian army was advancing again, and during the march, which was slow at times, and swift at others, Violet and her sisters stayed with both Evans and their father.

"I believe it's you dear little girls that inspired the men to fight so gallantly and win the big battle," said their father kissing them each. "I can just imagine how you little girls will look when the cruel war is over."

"But when will it be papa," asked Violet. "It's the only words we have been hearing so long and still it continues."

"Well I'll in assure you that without a line it'll be over before next Christmas," said general Vivian. "What do you say Evans my boy?"

"What I say," he answered "is this; I'll see to it that it will end sooner. It will be I who will show that damn fool of a Manley that I'll revenge this crushing of my armies like this and my being wounded."

Violet and her sisters felt that Evans meant what he said and so did not say anything more on the matter of the war but turned their subjects on the conditions of the armies.

"Oh all our armies are very strong I'll ass a assure you," said their father. "They are rushing on everywhere with ir restible forces, devastating the enemy, and nothing will be able to stop them. But there is one thing that I do not like the prospects of. There are already over 100,000,999 glandelinians already intrenched at Fountain of Perene De La Greece and all the armies at the central portion of seried retreats are giving way toward that one objective point. If we cannot force that place our armies will redouble such a serious set back that the war will be lost, for then the foe will crush our invasion can completely. What we must do is to prevent at all cost the enemy from concentrating too strong there. Other wise they will grow to the strength of over 900,000,000 and make such a horrible battle that will make Aronburgs Run look like a skirmish. I have ordered all the generals of the armies who are leading against these hosts of glandelinians to prevat this at all cost, and I hope to God's help they will. It was also my orders to prevent the three Manleys from making a reunion which they are trying with might and main to do."

"Yes Fountain Of Perene De La Greece seems to be our main goal and if we lose there all is off," said Evans. "We ought to do our best to get all of our armies there first and close in so tightly that the place will yield before the many armies come up and can concentrate there. Could not we make a race for the region?"

"No," said general Vivian. "It is well observed that the further we go southward into glandelinia the more fierce the defence is. All that we have already been teachd this lesson from the many conflicts already that had raged throughout glandelinia during these four or five months of bloody invasion. The war is fearful enough now but what will it be by the time we are within sight of Fountain of Perene De La Greece."

CHIA PTER SEVEN.

CHRISTIAN VICTORIES AT LIBERTANIA, THANDHUBER, AVEZZANO RUI, MONTROSE, ORACONIA/COPIA, REDDA ZEPPEVIANI, AND OTHER GREAT BATTLES.....

One day during a halt in the christian advance, violet and her sisters came up to the ambulance to see general Evans on a very important matter.

"Evans said violet who intended to speak for them all. I do not like the actions and conduct of sister Angelica. She has our suspicions."

Evans was surprised at this for it was very unusual for him or any body to hear Violet or any of her sisters to speak so of a man.

"Why Violet what is the trouble?" asked Evans.

"Why she refused to attend to the wounded soldiers, without reward and she shows great disrespect toward us. We don't have no ill feelings toward any sister or man, but Evans we don't believe this person is a man or she would not act like she does. She struck my sister Jennie once. We firmly believe she's a man spy in disguise as her voice sounds like a man's."

Evans did not say anything for several minutes, but pondered upon what Violet and her sisters had said. "It does seem strange that they would have any accusations against a man." He thought to himself. "All of the Sisters have been good to the little girls, and yet they complain of the doings of this one. I'll have to look into this."

Then he turned to the little girls and said:

"I'll trust you little girls to watch that man, and I'll have my officers do the same. But don't let them or even the man suspect that you are suspicious of her actions."

"We'll do just as you say," answered violet.

Indeed Evans being suspicious also decided to have the man watched, and see what was wrong with her. Later one of the officers came in with the report that no one liked her, that she was very sarcastic in their manner and words, words, that she spoke more like a man than a woman, walked more like a man, and had the face of a man.

"This is surprising, indeed," said Evans. "This must be looked into right away."

Orders were at once given that the man should be summoned before Evans but that day she could not be found by any of the soldiers, and her going away so suddenly like that made them all the more suspicious. They began to feel that it was a spy within their lines, a sneaking lander spy posing as a man. Such spies when caught spying, and imposing as a man would as a rule be shot whether successful in their mission or not. It was decided to wait for her appearance again, and as soon as she was seen orders were that she should be seized immediately, examined, and if evidence goes to show that she is no man but a man in disguise it will go hard with the spy. It would be utterly unusual for a man to be seen acting like this one is reported to be doing, and not only was it a temptation from violet and her sisters, but also many of the officers had complained and this had got the superior officers suspicious and angry.

Violet and her sisters had also watched every action of the man, unseen by her however, and saw actions that was confirming to them that it was a sneaking glandelinian spy. At first they had thought that she had been a real man, with a disliking character, probably selfish and surly, but now they thought different, and finally one evening when all was quiet over this subject, and she had been left alone, her manners being forgotten violet and her sisters came in to Evans and showed him a slip of paper which they had found in the man's tent on her table. He glanced over it and said:

"This note is certainly suspicious. It is evident that the person is no man, but a spy. I'll give an order immediately that no one is to be permitted to leave the camp until this person is seized and examined."

He at once gave the order to several of his officers, and then he proceeded to examine the note.....

His orders in the meantime were carried out and soon every sentry had been instructed as to the command and no one was allowed to leave the camp. In due time the spy happened to be seized by some Angelinians as she was endeavoring to leave the lines, and examinations, and investigations proved that the spy was really a man in the disguise of a sister, and so he was forthwith brought before the court marshal to be tried. In Angelinia it was considered a serious offense to wear the garb of a man or priest, or any religious when in spying on christian armies during war, as such spies are liable to be more successful than any others, and so in these theses no mercy is shown in no conditions.

He was sentenced to die, and was put to death that very morning. All during the week during a halt of the christian armies under Evans, the army had been infested by many spies, all of which however had been captured.

One case of a spy was this:

A man was seen in the disguise of a soldier of Abbieannia, looking all around the christian camp, asking for many names of generals, counting with a great carelessness and aliveness the ammunition wagons, seized a document giving the number of divisions in the christian army, and so on. He was seized questioned, and searched and many things were found on him that proved that he was a sneaking spy, but as he proved to be an unsuccessful spy he was held as a prisoner only. Many tricks had been tried by spies during the week before they were captured.

One entered the christian line pretending he was a christian officer arresting a glandelinian soldier who had assaulted him, but his story did not go, he was held for investigation, found guilty and shot. His mission had been unsuccessful but the Abbieannians had seized him, and not the Angelinians, and Abbieannian ways are not Angelinian. Another spy had tried to get great information, pretending to be a great friend of the Vivian girls, but his close attention to them, being extraordinary, they were so suspicious, and by threatening to shoot him forced him to confess, and he was placed under arrest, and many important papers were found on him. He fortunately was arrested by the Angelinians who finding proofs that he was not successful in his mission only sentenced him to ten years of hard labor.

To make matters more serious, it happened that while Evans was now being able to get around a sneaking spy tried to trick him. He had entered Evans headquarters on the pretense of being a new Angelinian officer sent by Hanson to take command of one of Kandermines leaderless leaderless regiments. Evans of course readily consented to his purpose but never the less later on was suspicious on finding that the man committed offenses that made the christian officers under him or over him completely angry, and at last Evans had caught this very man running off with one of his most important plans. He had the man pursued but the sneak got away, and never was heard of since. So Evans had to cancel this plan and form another, so as to frustrate any attempts that the enemy would make in an endeavor to prevent his advance.

Evans himself had planned many different moves, in which to order all the varied armies under Hanson to advise, to as to prevent so many of the glandelinian armies from retreating, and then concentrating at Fountain of Arab Prens De la Greece, and to his dismay and embarrassment many of these every plans were found missing one day, and in his vigorous search in which many of his officers and soldiers helped these documents were found in Violet's bedroom under her pillow torn up with this note tied to it:

"I Violet Vivian hate Evans and his friends and show it by tearing up his plans so that he cannot follow them out."

Of course Evans was not a fool enough to believe her really guilty of the deed, and he knew she was not either, for the day this could have happened the little girls had never been away from him once, not a single moment, and he was bound to capture this sneaking and treacherous spy if he had to go through hell to do so. It was unsuccessful however for this spy had succeeded in escaping through the christian lines without detection, and when Evans learned of this fact he was sore afraid, for there was evidence evidence that this spy would bring the information to the foe and that the glandelinian armies would exert all their utmost to gather there during their retreat, and that all possibilities of capturing that place would be out of the question. Nevertheless Evans was not going to allow himself to be outdone by any sneaking glandelinian spy.

No matter how impossible it did seem to reach that place Evans was bound to try and race for it. His army had rested for a week without any engagements of any kind since the great chase at Marousian, and so the men were in fine shape, and could march fast. On a Sunday the order for the race was given, and Evans also immediately sent orders to the nearest christian armies under the other various commanders to follow after as fast as possible. As soon as the advance began, general Vivian at all laid up got word of Evans intentions, and decided to follow as quickly as possible to keep in un in union with him so that the forces would not be weakened in case the enemy would give any fierce opposition.

Hanley and the other generals leading t of Evans swift advance, and the intention thereof, send the alarm in every direction, and such fierce opposition was threatened at Banbooser, that Evans was checked and found himself unable to advance further. Who the foe was he did not know but the Glandelinian soldiery was wilder than those formerly engaged with him and as he did at dare to try any general engagements with this unknown army Evans decided to wait a little and find out if he could not march by another route, and so outwit this Glandelinian army.

Scouts were sent out in many localities, and those returned with the report that the Glandelinian army was A Ambrose Fullers, and that every route known was strongly guarded.

Evans decided to defy all and press on no matter what the opposition. The advance was begun after a wait of forty eight hours, the Glandelinian army began to retreat in his front, and he was confident, that they did not want to engage him, and so ordered the race to be resumed. But it was Ambrose Fuller who had outwitted Evans for two days later Evans found his army in a trap and almost surrounded by a army of Me-Hollestonians ten to his one.

Evans knew at once that he was trapped, and that to avoid an engagement was impossible. General Vivians army was far off yet, and it was the only outlet. To retreat would mean disaster, go ahead he must at all cost cost and Evans decided to do so if Satan and all his angels were opposed to him.

He therefore pressed on with great wildness until he reached the town of Liberman.

Here a large portion of the appar apparently retreating enemy had quickly halted its southward move and suddenly struck Evans a terrible blow on the rear of his right wing, crushing its two divisions and driving it back all the way it had come with most terrible loss. Thus Evans two wings had been spe separated by this terrific shock, and his army was in terrible danger. Fierce attempts was made to restore the wing, by many of the officers in particular Kindermine and Roswell Buster Johnston did most of the work, but all the efforts to bring the wing back to its former point seemed impossible, and Evans therefore was forced to retreat, until he could reform his army near the northw northern parts of Liberman.

Bad news of disaster reached him from many points, but he was not discouraged, and in the afternoon, he returned the blow with ten fold violence violence, and though he met crushing failure, and though his whole army was thrown back in confusion, Evans was not discouraged, and as the enemy attacked fiercely and violently, Evans brought up all his artillery and cut down three hundred waves of glandelinians, and then threw forward all of his infantry once again, and gradually forced the enemy slowly back toward Liberman. It was a terrible and horrible battle, and both sides were shocked themselves at the terrific losses they suffered. 20,000,000.

This however proved that Ambrose Fuller had not lost any of his fierce and sturdy ways of fighting, and that he really was his equal in any battle on even ground. Evans then decided to press on again, and the assault of the christian army was resumed resumed and the battle redoubled in violence and fury, but again the whole christian army was thrown back in wild confusion, and with exterminating losses to boot. Following this repulse came a terrific storming assault by the whole Glandelinian army as it seemed, which lasted with frightful fury for five hours, and Evans army was cut up so dreadfully but that he was forced to withdraw his divisions and retire for the distance of eight miles. The enemy did not follow up their advantage, which if they had done would have turned out as a great victory, but for their imprudent delay, Evans was able to reform his army, and while attacking the enemy all along the line he sent his strongest force of Concoctinians caverly with an extra division of infantry, to crush Ambrose Fullers flank, which was accomplished in fine style, and though it had the effect of striking back the foe for all the distance he had won, it did not as yet benefit Evans a complete victory, and the enemy rallied and again stormed the christian line, until Evans had to gather his whole army to repel the assault assault and crush Ambrose Fullers army which he finally did, but after the battle the foe's retreat was so slow that Evans was delayed.

General Vivian who had been following after had been opposed by a great Glandelinian army under W Swichenracker, and general Vivian had been checked in his advance. It was the purpose of the Glandelinian commander to prevent general Vivian from joining general Evans and so he had threw his whole Glandelinian army in the way, and with the result that general Vivian was unable to advance as he should have done. He tried every means to get around the enemy like Evans had done, but could not and overlapped he himself was forced to retreat toward Thanhouer without a single blow.

General Vivian made a retreat northward of thirty miles, and then receiving reinforcements pressed his advance again and now it was the enemy's turn to fall back which they did, until a wooded and hilly region was reached. Here both armies halted at the same time, and then general Vivian tried of the delay decided to force his way onward at all cost and so decided to make Swichenracker retreat.

Twice he endeavored to turn him out of his position by making a diversion upon his rear but this was unavailing, and for three days both sides made petty attacks and fought several artillery duels. General Vivian was impatient over this delay, and so proceeded to force a general action no matter how it would turn out.

A slight and desultory attempt was made to take the hill positions during the night but it did not succeed, and once a fierce artillery fight raged for two hours and a half. For a week this kind of action continued, it being more like a quarrel between the two armies than a regular fight. Finally general Vivian grew impatient. All his tricks, and maneuvers, and demonstrations had failed, and Swichenracker was even now receiving reinforcements.

THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF THANSOUR.

So general Vivian decided to lay off all these slight actions, and starting on the following morning a strong demonstration against the enemy's left he suddenly, and without warning hurled a violent assault against the Glandelinian center. The foe were surprised in seeing a monstrous tidal wave of red coated yelling demons surging toward their lines with tremendous fury, and they offered fierce resistance, and did all that men could do in fighting with the fury of desperation and energy of despair, but the onslaught was so wild, and the shock so terrific, that nothing could withstand it the whole Glandelinian center was fairly torn to pieces, and the survivors driven back, the christian troops carrying all before them until stopped by the second line. So fierce was the fighting at this part in particular at close quarters that the uniforms of thousands of soldiers were set on fire by exploding cartridges.

As the other two wings were free from assault Swichenracker withdrew large forces from either one and hurled it to the support of his center, and it checked the strong assault of the Abbeannians, but at this critical moment, a nother wild headlong wave of Abbeannians, Abyssin kilians, Dombobians, Abbeannian Concoctinians, and Angelibians came surging furiously and with irresistible force toward his right wing, all opposition was offered in vain, the right wing was cut to pieces, and rolled up in a great storm of confusion, all the foe artillery was captured and turned upon the panic stricken fugitives and threatened with annihilation they commenced a general retreat and all efforts to rally them was met with complete failure.

All the reserve forces was thrown headlong against this wild Abbeannian wave but in vain, ten times the fierce Me-Hollestonian caverly, added by the sturdy Glandelinian fight fighters, the Quarian Curdes and Gargolians was added to the horsement, but they could do nothing and were so horribly galled that all fled in the wildest confusion.

Swichenracker however had a second army at hand which he was bringing up, and as his left was also overpowered he withdrew in the night intending to resume the struggle in the morning and regain all the lost ground and artillery. General did not think it wise to allow the Glandelinian general to begin the battle anew, so on the earliest possible moment of the morning, general Vivian himself once more resumed the offensive and made a fierce attack on the enemy's lines than ever.

The battle raged with redoubled fury all that day long, but all the efforts of Swichenracker to drive a back the christian was impossible and in the evening he was forced to retreat, confident however that he had delayed and checked the christian advance good deal anyhow.....

Both sides lost nearly 5,000,000

Both of these batt on batt les had been fought withn a close reach of each other, were equal in violence, and ended the same way. The combined losses of both sides in these two battles together was nearly 45,678,899 in killed wounded and prisoners. Violet and her sisters had not fortunately ober observed the battle Evans had n fought but during the battle they had a somewhat trying experience. They had been sent on a message by general Richardson Halsted and going through n thickly wooded country Violet and her sisters had found themselves lost. In endeavoring to find their way out of this wooded stretch they had time and again choose a new direction and moved on silently.

"We are surely lost" Said Violet. Oh Jennie and you l other little girls we are in the heart of the enemys country, and its worse than being lost in a snakes den. Do you think any of the foe will see us Gertrude!"

"No, but we must see that our guns are well loaded. We may need them and need them badly. Mark is that a battle I hear."

After listening for several minutes Jennie said;

"Do you think we'll ever be able to find out way out of this dreaded woods."

"Of course we must or we'll be lost from the army and then something dreadful will happen to us."

All of the brave little girls were determined not to cry though they wanted to do so very much for they were indeed in a dreadful situation. Lost in a Glandelinian woods, and Glandelinians swarming everywhere like hornets.

"I'll tell you what." Said Gertrude. "Let's see if we can't find the road. If so we are safe."

The little girls nodded their heads, the woods seemed suddenly full of whispering and howling spirits, and the noise of distant battle grew nearer. However it was not five minutes later when they came upon the road, and the little girls heaved a great sigh of relief. Gertrude also sighed and dropped Jennies cold little hand.

"My Jennie but I was scared for the first time. Think of being lost in a woods in the enemys country itself. I thought we were never going to get out of the woods again. Now we'll have to find out where we are and carry our message before it is too late. General Halsted expects an answer from us as soon as possible."

Jennie did not say ant anything but caught hold of Gertrudes hand again. In a country like this with perils everywhere, even the open road seemed a fearsome place. They hurried on apparently in the direction of the christian line, and walked and walked but there was no signs of any of their destl destinations, and side excursions in every possible direction met with no success what ever. Nevertheless the little girls cont immed on looking off into the haze with a hopeful expressions.

J "Joyce we'll never find the christian lines again" Cried her sisters.

"Yes we will." T She answered encouragingly: "We must or perish."

They continued onward and onward with the tears trickling down their cheeks. It was dreadful to have to go off alone this way without any escorts and now they wished they had the whole army with them. But they had not gone far when there was a shout in the road, and a squadron of gray coated cavalry loomed up through the haze, their horses cording on with a gallop. They were Mc-Hollentians and led in person by general Boobhead.

Without a chance of escape the little girls were almost ridden down by the Glandelinians who had not seen them in time to halt their horses, and one of the men hollered;

"Why don't you fool Vivian girls keep out of the road. Do you want to get killed."

These Glandelinians however were good fellows, and Boobhead halting the column dismounted and asked them why they were here.

"We are lost." Said Violet. "We cannot find u our way to the christ ian lines."

Boobhead however happened to know just which way they were and directed them as coresorrectly as possible, the men adding also with information a treatment unlike from any other Glandelinian and then cheered by the Glandelinians the little girls went off in the direction indicated.

They were truly on the right road, but they had only t raveled for a mile when reaching a large stream they saw a large squad of Onarian Infantry approaching led by colonel Robin Hood Johnson. They were seen, and they yelled and shouted for the little girls to stop as they started off, and pursued most wildly beating through the thick bushes on all sides, firing at the little fugitives in an effort to bring them down.

Knowing who were after them, Violet and her sisters did not hesitate in opening fire upon these Glandelinians and brought so many down with their well aimed shots that they threw the survivors into confusion, and just as they were rallying a large squadron of christian d cavalry dashed up rescued the little girls and brought them safely within the christian lines.

It was evident to Evans and the many christian generals from this fierce opposition they were meeting that to reach Fountain Of Pr Porono De 'a Greece was an impossibility at that time, outside of losing in t he race as it were. Manley himself was reinforcing general Huebman Manleys army to the number of 600,000,000 which were to oppose the advance of Evans and general yivian, and general Jimmie yivians army itself had been attacked a and frightfully beaten at a battle that was fought at Gondolia Junction, and crushed again at the battle of Candonia.

To avoid the disaster that was feared was impossible. It was the work of the spies, Evans well know, and his rage knew no bounds. During a halt he held a council about spies, their offenses, and works, and later passed a decree, that spies successful or not successful here after shall receive to mercy, and that all sentries shall be held responsible for the entrance of a spy also and shall meet t he same fate. All military laws was made still stricter, and Evans made it that all armies were to have it too and not his own only, and told general Hanson who was advancing in the east of it also, and also asked him how long was it before he could force his way through the region of Bristle Toe Station.

Hanson did not know how long he was going to take at this work, or how he was even going to do it. The Glandelinian armies made a regular hornets nest out of the region, may a worse place even than Christian had to face in going through the Valley of the Shadow Of Death, and so he was at a loss what to do and sent this note to Evans;

Just now I am unable under any conditions to force a passage through the regions of Bristle Toe Station. The enemy have opposed me very often in series of battles along the Easter Starring, having whipped me every time, and it seems suicide to make any more attempts to go through again just now. I have begg begged general or King Cannon to hurry up his forces, to my aid, but he even cannot advance, as the enemy have opposed him so furiously that he cannot advance a step. It is not so easy to force down the enemys opposition and slacken the war as we thought it was. God help us if we cannot force F Bristle Toe Station, even if you and the others succeed in capturing Fountain of Perono De La Greece. I'm confronted by the Glandelinians under Johnston Jacken Manley."

GENERAL HANSON VIVIAN."

Evans gradually broke the news to Violet and her sisters, how the situation was, how Hanson and King Cannon was held at bay y the enemy, and how the advance of all the christian armies was slackening up.

"I don't believe we will win this war then." Said violet. "I feared at the start that the enemy would make such resistance that we would be checked. I felt it coming but did not say anything for fear that it would discourage you."

"But if we don't win, and our invasion is broken up, and our armies are driven out of Glandelinia it will be all of with not only us but you little girls also said Evans. We have all agreed among us, that is all us christian generals that we'll never leave Glandelinia now no matter what happens, untill she is crushed, or we'll all die and give up u our lives rather than suffer the disgrace of being driven back out of the wicked country. We got to end the war no matter how it turn out."

"But maybe we have hope yet." Said Ev Joyce. "I Heard that more Abbiavian and Angolinian armies are pouring through Angolinia to join in the invasion, and if need be we could call upon the armies that is still stationed, and inactive in both countries. We have enough men to follow out our purpose. It is true that christians suffer hardships, and all seems to go against them, and there is no chance of success whatever, but in the end all things turn out well. The me main danger m we must avoid is overconfidence, recklessness, overcautiousness, Presumption, and discouragement, als o Despair."

"Maybe you are right at that." Said Evans. "Most of the officers are discouraged also u discouraged, but many of the others especially the two Dargers are bound to rush all before them if they have to go through hell and Purgatory to do it. It's then two Dargers that I depnd upon wholly to carry the war through to a success for us. They can do it too I'll wager. And no dispute either."

AVEZZANO RUN.

Evans had remembered his personal experiences when captured by the wicked Glandelinian general called Francis Madden Smith, and remembered also that this rascal had called him a rattle snake, and so on. Now my dear readers you must know that a rattle snake strikes suddenly and sometimes without any warning from its tail or rattler either, and so did Evans prove himself to be what Madden called him. The Glandelinian army opposed to him consisted of the fiercest and intolerable Zimmermannians, Omarians, Omani Gurdes, Omani Kurds or Gargolians, Condencians, and Mc-Hollesianians, numbering about 192, 345,555, a greater army that had ever opposed a christian force during the invasion as yet. Striking against these suddenly Evans had for two days waged ninety two desperate onslaughts, fifty nine of which were repulsed repulsed with great loss, and the same two days Evans army repelled with most frightful fury one hundred and fifty six wild glandelinian attacks, and during these bloody glandelinian onslaughts there were three hundred and eighty Glandelinians who gave up their lives, being mortally wounded, eight hundred four more were killed outright, and six hundred & eighty one severely, dangerously or slightly wounded, making a total of 3,434 in killed and wounded during those two mad hellish days of battle, and the charges of both sides had raged with the fury of devastating torpedoes of hell. Total losses of officers on the enemy's side during the mad and insane glandelinian onslaughts of all ranks amounted about 50222 50,222

d During the two days of the frightful battle it is probably that the whole Glandelinian loss in killed and wounded including those taken as prisoners was about as far as 23,455,666 killed and wounded, and 31,000,000 prisoners singly, and the whole glandelinian army in the two b days battle numbered about 407,708,462. The enemy had also made terrific and wild headlong onslaughts during the night after the second day of the bloody conflict, where the Glandelinians suffered extreme extreme losses, and these glandelinian onslaughts had been so exceedingly fierce, that the losses had been either withheld or were not correctly known. This battle which raged fully three days was quite near as violent as either Francis Atlanta, Glorinia or Logan Zoo Rae Run, but the main fury of the frightful battle raged on the third day when Evans without the slightest warning struck a sudden and most terrible blow, the combined Abyssinkilian forces under Halsted, Halsted, Parson, Roswell Buster Johnston, Roswell Buster Johnston, fiercer though, and Roswell Buster Johnson, with Walter John Harrison, and Thr Theodore Linquist, and many other generals leading Abbieannians in the rear made a sudden and fearful assault, on the Glandelinian center commanded in person by Germania w yivian whose forces it appeared to be. At first all the frightful violence of the storm of battle had no more effect on the glandelinian center than a child's fist would have in striking a wall of stone, but general Rudolph Rassendale, made a vigorous turning movement, by moving around by the left flank, the enemy's center was torn to bits, by a withering tempest of bullets, and a screaming thundering hell of shell fire in a perfect infillade, and then upon the whole flank of the glandelinian center came the whole christian line under Rudolph Rassendale, and Desperate Desmond, and Claude Delair, and again, and still again the glandelinian center was torn to pieces by the christian fire as they tried in vain to rally, Germania w yivian was severely wounded, Pemberton Tamerline, and two Mc-Hollesians were killed, and Maudlin Jensen was cut open by a sharp well shell. A serious disaster threatened the glandelinian center, in fact complete annihilation as it was almost surrounded in that frightful massacre of wholesale carnage, but Huebaum Manley brought up the Mc-Hollesian forces under Osborne Hanson, and Madgelinia Hanson Evans, and these being thrown forward with wild ferocity, fought the christians at close quarters with the fury of millions of enraged fiends for four hours and though unable to drive the maddened Abyssinkilians back they managed to check their driving advance, and now the firing on both sides roared and crashed like a trillion cannon.

It was awful, Rudolph Rassendale was killed and the dreadful carnage and Roswell Buster Johnson was mortally wounded, but it did not slacken the fury of the Abbieannians themselves though the Abyssinkilians were finally driven into confusion, and they prevent the Abyssinkilians from giving way by showing their own madlin fury, delivering fourteen to fifty fifteen desperate and irresistible onslaughts, attacking the right of the glandelinian center with all their might and preternatural violence throwing the red forces forward as furiously as a hurricane storm and in the frightful melee Hansonia on the side of the glandelinians was mortally wounded, and Judge Linia Hanson Evans was killed. The whole glandelinian center was like a stranded ship battered by waves driving forward against her in a typhoon and finally being without supports, and their lines in mere tatters broke and fled in the fiercest confusion, their own left was cut up and thrown into a panic, hundreds of others general and officers of all ranks fell dead and wounded in trying to rally the shattered divisions, and all seemed lost.

But Evans had not as yet received time to attack the enemy's other two wings, and at the critical moment the remainder of Hansonia's Mc-Hollesianians arrived to the rescue of the torn and mangled central wing, and came on with all the fury they could assume to recover the lost ground. The Glandelinian wave of assault met a sudden and simultaneous withering fire all along the christian line that also tore up their lines, but recovering from the confusion they rallied and charged as wildly as ever a wave of men could charge, and this frightful attack continued so steadily, and Manley made such a strong concentration for four hours that he that the whole christian line in charge of the captured works was torn to pieces, by the foe's return fire, who though crushed and mangled rallied again and again and it seemed apparent that the foe would have recovered the works had not two of their other main commanders Yens Yensin and Badlin Goharwer fallen dangerously wounded, their horses like Federalists at Francis Atlanta having been blown to atoms by the explosion of the same make of shell.

The second line of the Glandelinian army under Hansonia within the four hours with the loss of all their general officers, and regimental officers was cut to pieces and routed like the central wing and so many hundreds of thousands of glandelinians fell into the hands of the christians as prisoners that Manley was dismayed.

And Evans been able to attack the enemy as quickly as possible he would have been able to win a sweeping victory, instead of the incomplete victory that he did win, for in his efforts to relieve the fearful attack on his center, which was carrying all before it Manley had drove a like fearful assault upon the left wing of Evans main army, and here also the battle was exceedingly severe, whole forests were again laid low by the fearful curtain storm of artillery and masonry fire of both sides and the din could be heard for hundreds of miles, and shook the country for a thousand miles, and a fearful Glandelinian wave nearly ten miles long in sweeping against the christian line in a raging onslaught, was almost desolated, and the few survivors swept back terrified and appalled at the incomprehensible fury of the Abbieannian and Abyssinkilian soldiery.

Along the left of the christian line the enemy had assaulted the Abbieannians with all the frenzy, insanity and fury they could muster yelling worse than any demons or fire fiends could have done, and these desperate onslaughts of the Glandelinians had been covered by all of the guns on the Glandelinian right that could be brought within range, and which received a fiercer answer than they expected a perfect barrage of shells from forty thousand cannon, and to make it worse the christians had massed all their smallest artillery upon their assailants, committing incapable damage among the surging glandelinian waves one after another, tearing scores of divisions into flying fragments, a mauling whole armies, that swept forward to the assault, annihilating whole lines every time they surged to close quarters, and tearing all the main waves of glandelinians through and through, the firing of artillery on both sides being of the greatest intensity, and made a din almost as severe as heard at Francis Atlanta, and finally repulsing this thirteen Glandelinian onslaughts in which again millions fell on both sides, the left wing of the christians charged themselves, the main assaulting line was bended and buckled back, the left of the enemy's right wing of assault was overthrown in a wild close quarters rush, and which threw the Glandelinians into confusion, and sweeping on the foe again tried to rally, and for fifteen minutes the melee was terrific every man on both sides being engaged in all kinds of terrific duels hand to hand, then the whole line of the foe was overthrown and driven back to their own line of works from which they were also driven, and the christians were in possession of all the glandelinian artillery. 70,000 color bearers died in this terrible battle.

Later while this was going on an assault equally as fierce and deadly was hurled ten times against the enemy's left wing, and toward two o'clock Manley's whole army, almost dissipated and dismayed had withdrawn to their second line of works.

Huebaum Manley on account of the marching up of his main center and the serious disablement of their chief commander Germania w yivian was at a loss of what to do, his own main left wing had been turned was exposed to a blasting artillery and masonry infillade, and so he had to withdraw and his other two wings had been rolled up toward their second position in great confusion.

At four o'clock in the evening of the third day Hanley having brought up his second main army made a great effort to recover his lost ground, and this new army did all in its power to drive the christian line from the captured position, it being a regular smothering storm of death and destruction, but the Abbieannians along the center line withstood against a eighteen desperate assaults very firmly, a million of the foe falling dead or wounded on the side of the foe in each of these desperate conflicts at that, and soon again the enemy had to give up the desperate assaults and retreated slowly toward their second position. The line of the christian army on both sides was fearful indeed, the country was viler with the confusion, and the losses inflicted was dreadful to behold. For another hour the two armies lay glowering at one another like two red fangs fighting dragons all this while a blasting artillery duel going on on both sides, and at eight o'clock that evening they again arose against one another with redoubled fury and the main fury of the battle raged.

The christian line swept on sweeping forward to attack the Glandelinians themselves and force them from their second line of positions. As the christian lines advanced to the attack twenty thousand glandelinian artillery let loose with a frightful thundering roar, everything around the advancing christians was pounded and great trees torn to pieces, and stretches of trees splintered, masses of Angelinians and Abbieannians were fast swept away by the shower of Glandelinian shells, and even high explosives tore huge gaps in their lines, and the shattered christian columns were hurled back with stupendous losses, but as they withdrew Evans threw forward another whole line under cover of his own artillery fire, and again and again wave after wave of christians swept forward to the attack, Evans storming the Glandelinian central wing in person, but his forces that he himself led in person was swept to pieces, a portion of his column of Abbieannians were routed by the glandelinians. In retreating fell into a frightful ambush set by the Gargolians, and in that fiery inferno of circling little the christians thus surrounded fought to the last with utmost desperation, and cut their way through dropping the glandelinian so fast, and cutting and beheading such fearful numbers, that it would have taken a whole vast hill of gravestones to mark their graves.

Though repulsed repeatedly the christians rushed again upon the Masonic line and closed with the whole gray line with terrific yells but after a hours desperate hand to hand fighting in which every man on both sides was again engaged in that fearful melee, the Abbieannians was again vanquished with dreadful wholesale slaughter.

Evans then tried his whole army of cavalry, consisting of Abbieannian, Angelinian, Dord Dordobian, Abyssinikilian, Horn omanian, Protestantian and Concoctinian horsemen, and these rode up first to the Glandelinian position in the face of the Glandelinian cannon and musketry, which had done much and horses in windrows, and then being repulsed, was charged with frightful violence by all of the Glandelinian cavalry, but in a terrific encounter in which both sides fought like savage demons the foe cavalry was cut to pieces, and routed.

The christian assailants had time and again been forced to give way only a little and then Evans started to throw forward his whole line into the action, the battle being so fierce that the very heavens seemed to be hursting from the din of exploding shells, crash of musketry, and the Glandelinians of thousands upon thousands of cannons, everything of inflammable material seemed to burst into flame, a volcano of fire and din roared on along the lines of the opposing sides, and time and again a death storm of destruction descended upon the assaulting christian lines, during the time, the very atmosphere seemed to be all fire and smoke, so fierce was the firing that the woods for scores of miles was burning being set on fire by exploding shells, the small hill tops was hidden in clouds of thick smoke from volleying cannon the small valleys seemed to become valleys of the shadow of death, the mouth of hell seemed to open everywhere, and possess the air with all the hobgoblins and fiends from the loud universal "Devil" yells of the Glandelinians, and the loud caterlows of the Abbieannians, the living garments of the earth was withered and torn and thrown into the air, the world seemed withered, and seemed on its approaching end, the crash of cannons, and the exploding storm of shells of every calibre seemed to stun all living creatures in the heavens or woods and hill hills with the shooting and ear-splitting din, and so horrible was the noise that scores of thousands of Blonglomonian Serpents living in the region at the time took themselves to flight as it was enough to drive any sane creature insane. The glandelinians seeing the christians starting to give way pressed forward themselves with greater fury but like a stone wave that smashes everything it sweeps the Abbieannians counter charged, and encompassed the glandelinian wave so horribly that by the time they had been forced to give way over sixteen million had fallen on both sides, the glandelinians recoiling fast and swiftly but this time not in any confusion. The Abbieannians then again swept forward to attack the enemy second line of positions this attack being covered by a battering storm of artillery fire from 100,000 cannon of all calibre, and as the christians were cut down in allibados as the harvester does the wheat by the musketry and artillery fire of the enemy, a portion of the assaulting line of Abbieannians on the right began to give way, the infuriated glandelinians following, but the retreating Abbieannians not having been decimated were rallied speedily again, and closing their shattered and badly galled lines they fell upon the glandelinians with inconceivable ferociousness, driving the glandelinians back to their second line of works with great slaughter wounding severely the glandelinian general Tamerlane Dicknell.

General Hanley even while the Abbieannians was attacking his lines so wildly ordered a general counter charge with the bayonet and pikes, which was made but this gigantic attack was useless, and the Abbieannians being halted in their advance shot the glandelinians all down, and drove back the few groups that survived. They then made fourteen more onslaughts until eleven o'clock that night but Evans saw these cut down like grain before the thrashing machine, and so he had to be finally contented to remain in the first line of the enemy works, and the enemy after making the worse charge of all finally withdrew leaving the field in the hands of the christians. All of the Glandelinian generals in service under Hanley suffered from wounds, mortal or venial, and scores upon scores of his best generals were killed. The number of christians surprisingly to say engaged in this battle was little over 100,000,000. They had been outnumbered a little over three to one, and Evans did his Passa Pazaza work all over again whipping a bigger force than his own, a second time in the war in a more horrible battle. Fields were desolated for miles by the exploding shells, forests were shattered and burned, and the nearest vil/ villages and towns were shaken down by the concussion of the battle.

During the remainder of the night and the next day the total number of renewed onslaughts made by the enemy was up to one hundred and twenty three, indeed a grand total to the others made elsewhere along the line by the christians who assaulted the enemy positions at all various points with a great violence about one hundred and seventy four times, nineteen assaults of which set annihilation.

The total/ total number of assaults made by the enemy altogether during this inconceivable battle with results successful or disastrous to the enemy amounted up to three hundred and fifty six. The main Glandelinian leaders who lead these main assaults in person on the third day of the battle were Logan Zoe Rae Hanson, Girkneel Johnston, Willow Harvest, Pheln Phenlentomburg, Henry Cedernine, Anna Maria, McWhirther, Evans Madgeosnia, and Haroccellic, and these Glandelinian generals suffered the most sanguinary losses of all in the entire battle.

Though the battle finally ended with the christians holding their ground to the last, the enemy finally and defiantly, and desperately maintained their own positions and Evans still found himself unable to advance and begged Hanson to do something to force his way through Bristle toe Station came what may, or lose the war entirely. This is what Evans wrote to Hanson:

"Your excellency general Hanson Sirian,
At Bristle Toe Station

June Fourteenth;

I have had already a frightful battle at Avezzano Run lasting four days and though I was equally unsuccessful in trying to force back the assaults of the foe who made three hundred fifty six attacks, until I had to dislusion their lines. I was also equally unsuccessful in trying to take their second line of works after I had captured the first, and this battle was nearly as severe as Francis Atlanta. This shows that the foe mean business, and I advise you to try and force the enemy back from Bristle toe Station no matter how you do it, and if possible I can get my army turned around and outflank Hanley from his position I'll do my best to come to your aid and hurry up our advance against Fountain Of Perena De la Greece. Your efforts must succeed under any conditions.

"GENERAL EVANS."

Johnson however did not know what to do and reason nothing saw that the one force there overwhelmed his ten to one. He heard however how pressing was the need of many of the Glanclintian armies driving their efforts home in their endeavor to check the advance of the Christian armies, and so Manley was forced continually to send armies from his own to reinforce those so badly jeopardized. Evans Christian army, and general yidians just now were the only two who had won victories, or progressed so far as they did. Evans was ahead of any of the other Christian armies, and was now checked at Avezzano Run. He therefore wrote in answer to Evans letter:

"Your excellency general Jack Ambrose Evans.
I'm glad to hear of your work in depleting the Glanclintian armies in the desperate battles you have won and this only encourages me to make another try. I can maneuver Manley from his last positions where he is at present, and compel him to retreat and fight me at Montrose. This will probably give me a chance to press on. As yet Cannon cannot advance and he has appealed to be for aid. I notified him to strike his enemies suddenly like you did and he could then escape and rejoin my armies here at Montrose.
General Harrison yidians.
At Easter Starling."

Violet and her sisters, who had been surprised at the way the battle of Avezzano Run had turned out, and two days later they went up a large hill to get a better view of the country, and saw to their surprise that the enemy was still within sight and did not know what to make of it.

"It is fearful their stubbornness," said Violet. "I don't see how wicked armies can be so disdainful and desperate. I have read the Pilgrims Progress and how Christian met and beat Apollyon, but these Glanclintians are like millions of such Christians themselves and contend against us Abbaonian armies like Christian did against the four fiends. I never thought we would hear of such frightful resistance, and then when a sanguinary battle ends turn out in this fashion."

"Listen Violet keep quiet and hear voices somewhere," said Jennie suddenly. Listening they found she was right, and going toward a clump of high trees near a glen on the hill they were surprised to see Manley and three Glanclintian generals standing in a group and so near the presence of the dark robed Abbaonian army at that.

"Ain't they nerry though?" said Violet in a whisper. "They are within the Christian lines, and no doubt know it. They are plotting something. I'll be bound. I'm going to find out what they are saying."

"Well, go with you Violet but you must be careful," said Joice. "If they discover us we'll have to do some damage which we hate very much to do just now."

They crept forward cautiously, until they were within hearing distance of the Glanclintians, and then listened. For a time the generals were talking so low that the little girls could not hear a single word they said, but finally Manley broke out louder with:

"Yes I guess it's so. Well I'm not sorry anyway. That general called Roobhead was a friend of those dastardly yivian girls anyway and so his reigning command will not make any loss to us. I believe he hindered their capture a good deal. And I shouldn't wonder if the fool would not go over to the Christians and join them also."

"Well if he does he is a traitor and will be shot for it if we catch him," said one of the other generals. "And so that Christian pig called Jack Evans thought he could force us out of our positions oh, well we have not gone yet."

At this the Glanclintian generals set up a general uproar of laughter, and their laughter was so loud that it was almost contagious and Violet and her sisters had all they could do to keep from laughing out loud with them. After they cooled down the third officer said:

"The main fellows to be dreaded just now is those two generals called Henry and Angus Augustine Barger. Henry Barger is another dangerous adversary, and his cousin Harry or Joe Spragg. They have been making advances and movements that are not only puzzling us but the whole world. If we cannot learn any of their intentions we are worried. They are outside of Evans the worst Christian enemies we have to contend with."

"If any of our other generals who are and armies would investigate the movements of these generals all would be well," said Manley. "But they don't do anything at all. They must be afraid that is all there is to it. If I had something to do with it I would. And I'm going to and I do duty all in heaven to stop me." And he said this furiously indeed.

"He certainly is very wicked," said Jennie. "He even defies God to prevent him from finding out what the Bargers are doing, when the other authorities cannot locate the movements themselves. He ought to have his brains examined, and hang a piece of crap on his head."

"As I was saying," continued Manley. "I have a good plan in which to force the armies under Evans clear out of Glanclintia and in one sweeping rush too. I am sure that Evans is further into Glanclintia than all of the other armies of Christian dogs, but if my plan works I'll show the very world and God too whether they like it or not that Evans will be the first to either cross the Angelinian boundary line in a headlong retreat or even surrendering his army."

"How are we going to do it?" asked one of the four other generals. "Manley produced a small geography and laid it out on a stone. He turned page after page until he came to a particular map."

The officers crowded around until they all saw what he pointed out. Violet and her sisters in the meantime had climbed a tree whose thick and strong branches extended over the generals and the they also saw the map. To get hold of that map or geography they must.

"You see this map?" asked Manley.

The officers answered yes.

"What river is this flowing between Evans army and Avezzano town?"

"It's the Avezzano Run," they answered. "Beyond is the hills by the same name. But how is that going to work out your plan?"

"Easily," said Manley. "We are situated on the opposite side of this river, and our central wing is in possession of the town. If we could move around these hills," he added showing by movements of his fingers, "we could by a long detour bring half of our army around, unnoticed by Evans or any of the Christian scouts and form a second division north of the Christian army. Then I would telegraph these plans, while I attack the Christian armies in front they are to move down from the north and strike the whole Christian army a terrible blow in the rear."

"I see the town of Glanclintia," said one of the officers. "I see it on the map and by the distance it shows from Avezzano Run I calculated that that general yivian army is only within a days march of Evans army and is unopposed also. If he hears the noise of another battle he will surely come down upon the flank of the would be fighters and cut them all to pieces and reinforce Evans in the bargain. And no doubt he is advancing already."

"I'll provide against that alright don't you be fear!"

Said Manley. "I have two reserve forces in readiness and I'll station the whole division in that location (pointing at the map) and these will be instructed to look out for the coming of general yivian army and if he appears to strike us swiftly and suddenly suddenly. I'm bound to carry out these plans, and I defy again all in heaven to stop or frustrate me too. It all depends that it can be worked in time, and that it would not be discovered. Those yivian girls since being now in our country seem to keep their distance from our armies, and do not spy on us, and so there is no danger from them. I'll bet that they have got cold feet now. It's different than being in their own country now. Or either they are afraid of their guardian will not let them out of his sight. But anyway we do not need to dread them little brats no longer. So we can work out our plan without any one hearing what we are talking about and show those Christian dogs that we can and will whip them."

In the meantime Violet and her sisters had realized that it was impossible under any conditions to secure the geography, but nevertheless one of them had a paper and a pencil and she and her sisters being able to draw any map known, and being able to see the map clearly drew it and every point that Manley pointed out, and his explanations also which they could make use of in showing it to Evans. If Manley only knew who were up in that tree wouldn't he feel fool cheap. So Violet and her sisters were afraid to leave the Christian lines. Well they were very much indeed. As they were proving themselves. Well Manley your plans are not good after all for they will not work. Violet and her sisters all worked on the map that was being drawn until all was finished, and every direction that Manley mentioned in his plans figured out and placed to show Evans.

"Another one of the officers said:

"Manley I think you are wrong about the yivian girls being scared. If they are not spying on us it is only because Evans won't let them. Their little brats would dare to go through hell and fire to spy on us. Their duty all peril there is."

"Well we don't have to worry about those pigsties 7000 birds and I don't want to hear any subject mentioned about them again that's all there is to it." Said General Banfill. "I want your attention aid to this plan. I know the situation of events here very well, and have a another plan which I can work very well. Both can be worked simultaneously.
I have through spies discovered how the direction line under general Ewing is strengthened and has left a great break in it his line toward the center.
If I can catch a strong force into that gap I'll surely win a victory that will end all invasion of this country about these plane boys."!!!

"Fine" Answered the other generals in a chorus.....

"But," said one of them, "I have heard that you and hundreds of our lordly generals besides your father and brother have made hundreds of desperate attempts to capture those living girls called Violet and her sisters. I can tell you the reason why you don't succeed. You always rush them on sight. And surely you know how desperate those little gutterbrats are! And their mission is to 'blow mine.' If you could by some trick capture them it would succeed in halting the general plan to burn suddenly Hiroshima."

"Today gave a lot of trouble."

"You don't know those yellow girls and I do or they do," he said. "There is no way to trick them, they trust no one wearing a Japanese uniform who is no true friend, and true friends of their cannot be tricked either. I did not want to put poison the minds of starving, Fredrick and I argue against those little brats, but they discovered my intentions because liberal traitors, and want to protect those little devil against me. And it seems no impossible to capture those three lads as it does the yellow girls or even more impossible at that. Those lads have become my dangerous enemies too. I have even a full list of all the officers and privates shot down by those little girls, of how many times they were captured, and how often they broke away when it seemed impossible for them to do so. If you believe my words I'll show you the list. They even railed my brothers headquarters in California and carried off everything we had. That was the worse trick those little gits ever did to me or my father and brother, and my brother John Hunter blamed the whole thing on father and me because the guards we re abusing. So you see how desperate those little devils are. A hell in a Chinese den is better compared with those dogs and little girl murderers. I have given up all my attempts to capture them because I have found out it is useless."

The generals now started to move away and Violet and her sisters quickly slipped down from the stairs and descended the hill without being seen. They had not time to take any surprising the generals and make any attempt to arrest them, but then she believed that the generals would be too desperate to give themselves up even if they had been surprised by Angel Gabriel and St Michael the Archangel, and so thought it best to let it go at that, and may general Evans of the intentions of these rascals before it was too late that he be carried down out.....

lines." Said Violet, "If he was ignorant of being within the Christian Union nothing could be said. He knew where he was but did it for defiance. He defies not only all Christianity, but God as well, and takes it for granted that if we try our level bobbin to conquer his armies in the end the war-devils of hell will come to his aid."

They soon reached the bottom of the hill and strode toward the places where they had left their horses. They quickly mounted their horses and as they rode onward for some distance the little girls were surprised to see a forest of wagons drawn covered and the horses were harnessed to them. Fortunately the little girls found the places apparently deserted as these wagons belonged to the Hollentintinnu, but the soldiers were approaching with the intention of recovering the trip and the little girls decided to secure these wagons at all costs. The first suggestion however of John to the little girls shrink a little as to the idea seemed a suicidal attempt as it was the severest test of their trained courage.

"Up on Jennie," said John giving her a little push. "You can get down from your horse and jump into that back wagon, and so see that is under the old quilts there. Watch out now that no one of the clondike boys sees you."

Jennie's horse reared up, she jumped up on the step, and quickly exhaled everything under the quilt and then came back. One of the soldiers who was walking at one side of the wagon turned away to attend to his unruly horse, and suddenly saw Jennie leap away from the rear of the wagon. He went a crowd to see who it was and suddenly the little girl surrounded him, made a prisoner of him and then leaping on the seats of the eight wagons changed the direction of the horses and lashed the forward to their utmost speed by at least 15,000 of the famous Mc-Hollisterians who opened fire with a roar and crash as they drove forward their cowardly horses in an utmost efforts to overtake the little girl.

This was indeed a bold attempt of Violet and her sisters in the face of such dangers that they knew damned, and they looked back now toward a horrible death. The Glandelinians surely were leaving their horses - wildly, and clouds of smoke came from their carbines as if from the bottomless pit enveloping the dark distant hills, and the yell of the Glandelinians sounded as if all the demons of hell were persecuting them, and spattering their fearful jets of blasphemy, and flogging their filthy wings around the souls of the brave little girls so blinding and distracting them that they could not hardly tell whether the evil words and yells that filled them with such anguish and unparelleled horror were the atrocities of real human beings or the noises of fiends flying after them in the mad rage. As if from the vault of hell floods of blasphemy poured down upon the racing warriors, and the noises for a while was like as if a midnight typhoon was raging.

It was the first time in their lives that the little girls had ever committed such a brave deed in the face of such furious glandelinian foes but they did it though they themselves hardly realized how they did it. They were confident of successful work however for the christian position was looked up before them and racing on and on they came right up to the breastrokes and raced past the sentries before they could be given even time to challenge and on onto the surge of glandelinians, being readily deterred to recover their margin, though briefly not knowing who had stolen them, and as the little girls had taken the men with them when they surprised and seized. Realizing the truth, on seeing the approaching No-Hollsteinians the sentries gave warning, and a large force of christian navy quickly cut the glandelinians horns de combat.

Indeed Violet and her sisters had made a great haul for the night wagoner went contained the choicest provisions. A lot of shik chicken was found in one of the wagons, and in the others entablés of every description besides a great amount of ammunition and furs. The prisoner himself was led off by several of the Angilinhans, but before he went off he managed to creep up to the little girl and say:

"To keep up the little girls and say:
"I'm a Me-Hollentian, the fiercest of glawelthins but here's my hand little girls. You are the bravest children I have ever seen, and I'm sorry the glawelthins are so cruel to you. If they folk like I do they would not continue the war against Christianity any longer. I'm true to the cause of glawelthins, but I admire you little girls and here after we are firm friends. And its you little girls who have made me a changed man though I'm glad and proud to say that I have never spilled the blood of a single child or any religious person and never will. I hope you children better luck in the future and hope that Medley will die before he can lay a hand on you."

Violent and her sisters saw that he meant what he said and shaking hands with him knew how he answered:

"We appreciate your good words very much and apologize ourselves for the way we tied you up in that wagon. If we known you were a good man at first we would not have done it and trusted you."

"And you little girls were too quick at that," answered the man. "I would not have betrayed you any how but would have only warned you to be careful. I'm heartily glad you little girls made a prisoner of me for I'm away from my wicked comrades, and hope never to be set free untill the war closes. And before God I hope you christians win."

When the 1 soldier was led before the courtmartial he was discovered by the tribunal to be a man that was surprising indeed. This very soldier during the battle of Big Birdhook had saved general Vidvan from being assassinated, had been a prisoner before, and was liberated for his deed, and then later saved general Hanson from capture by the gerginians by pretending he was their leader and saying that he refused to go with it."

He would have been set free even now but as he protested against it saying that he was not in favor of the war and did not want to go back to the armies until after the war they permitted him to remain, but he was put in a prison tent by himself, and being trusted was allowed privileges that men of the enemy prisoners never got. This man soon changed however and put up his lot with Glaxelulnu and joined the Abbekeendans, and soon became an officer of high rank. He served until the end of the war and settled in Abbekeen in which he afterwards called his real home. So wicked as Glaxelulnu is there are nevertheless many good soldiers among them. As soon as the little girls had brought the wagon upon into the Christian lines they went straight for general Evans headquarters, and showed him the map they all took turns in making out. Not at first knowing its real character he said:

"You little girls are wonderful, and flabbergasted me. How did you ever learn to draw such pictures and maps that you do. Even all the pictures of battles and children you have were drawn by you little girls."

3142. "We do not feel like answering your question now," said Violet. "It is true we can draw maps well but then this map is not for pleasure work or showing how we can do it. It is literally a plan of Manley's we copied." "WIA-- -AT! Spying again! What the devil-- Say you little girls must be celestial persons indeed to take nerve like that. How did you do it?" "Why we went on a hill within your lines to see the view of the country and whether the enemy were still within their old positions, and actually came across Manley, and four of his generals in conversation and learned great information from him. I wrote over everything on that map to what he planned. If you look closely Evans dear you'll understand." Evans did so sitting down by the table and looking over it closely. He got up did not say anything to the little girls, just then and then summoned an orderly dispatched him to call a certain officer, and then worked this telegraph message.

"To general Vivian at Glencoe)
Enemy plan to march half of army around Avezzeno Hills and move down on my rear and strike front at same time. Simultaneously plan to bar your advance on my rescue. Done at once or I'll be in a bad fix. G
General Evans."

"I'm glad you little girls discovered this," said Evans. "I-----
At this moment an orderly came in, another one and a saluting said calmly:
"Your excellency cannot that telegram as it will go to the winds instead of general Vivian. He has already arrived. He will in person be here to see you in another minute."
"Recall the messenger who has it then," said Evans after finding the report true. Then turning to the little girls he said:
"Your father will be proud of your deed this afternoon. Learning this intention and bringing within our lines eight wagons while even pursued at close quarters by 15,000 wild Ho-Jollestonians. I can't conceive how you did it."

Violet and her sisters felt no effect from this praise and said:
"There is another danger y that you know nothing of Evans. In the center of your lines as I and my sister heard from Manley also is a dangerous gap. If you do not close it it will be fatal."
"Oh you don't say," exclaimed Evans. "Why I'll simply refuse to close that gap and if Manley knows what is good for his army he'll keep it away from that gap that's all. No army will live going through that gap. I suspected treachery on the part of the foe from information I have learned from secret service men. If Manley only knew the character of that gap he would sooner stick his head into a dragon's mouth than rush any part of his army through it. It's no real gap at all. It's a deadly ambush. I'm sure that my weeks of planning worked out wonderfully. As long as that gap remains there no matter whether you learned this information or not, Manley could never force me from my position, and the longer he would try the more losses he would endure unavoidably. So don't you little girls worry a bit about that gap. It's disastrous to me if I close it."

"But Evans what do you mean?" asked Nettie Anton.
"I'm beyond words."

"It's a well formed ambush of the deadliest shape," answered Evans. "No enemy can run through it and come back to tell the tale. I've made it to insure that in once my rear is ever suddenly attacked, it will be of no effect to the enemy in winning. And with the arrival of general Vivian's army now coming I can reinforce that ambush with cannons and make it far worse. I'm bound to hold this position if I have to go through Purgatory and hell for it and I will. No enemy of God will make me retreat."

At this moment it was announced by the orderly that general Vivian had arrived, and once again the two great Christian men generals were together discussing on the events of the war. Then Evans showed him the plan Violet and her sisters had copied and then told him who done it, gave information about the captured wagons, the kind prisoner, and of the gap he had purposely made to trap any army that would try to force its way through it.

"My lines thank God in practically impenetrable," said Evans. "And with your unexpected arrival it is now more stronger. How did you force your way through so soon?"

"After my last battle I found no other army in the way to oppose me," answered the great general. "And accordingly what my daughters told me you of Manley's conversation I have decided to take the chance and show Manley that they are not afraid to spy on him in spite of being in the enemy's country. Ah! How about it children?"

"Their words made us feel so cheap that we are almost glad to do any thing," said Violet. "It is probably we will learn nothing new but we can seize something anyway and prove to him that we are the same as ever." "Off with you then," said Evans with a laugh. "Show Manley that he is mistaken." Poor Manley. I can hardly help pitying him for what is going to ensue;

"For the sake of Neptune come here every one of you officers," cried an angry voice in a certain had a handsome building in the glandelinian camp. "Tie me loose will you. For the sake of damnation. HELP. HELP. HELP." A bunch of gray clad officers dashed in with some privates, the building being filled with smoke, and flames were leaping from one of the nearest rooms in a perfect furnace. And there in the middle of the parlor was general thebaun Manley fairly covered with ropes that were entwined about him and a round table that had been turned over, and the whole room looked as if a cyclone had struck it. Papers were littered everywhere, windows were smashed, a door was off its hinges, and his bed had been stripped of every thing and the mattress itself was a smouldering.

"What happened gap gasped one of the officers as they proceeded to untie the five hundred yards of rope.

"It was those dratted Vivian girls," he fairly shouted in a maudlin rage. "They surprised me in this room, and set the place even on fire with the intention of burning me alive because I struck their sister Angeline in the jaw with my fist. They damaged everything that they could not carry off."

"We'll have to catch them," cried one of the officers who was an onlooker and who was examining the damage.

"It's no use shouting Manley still fastened to the table. They have been gone for five minutes, and they are out of the line by this time."

"For goodness sake how long is this damn rope anyway," growled the officer who was still untying it and yet Manley was encircled in it. Finally they got him loose and one of them testing the rope found it was five hundred yards long. Manley was so tickled over this experience that it was a wonder he did not explode.

"Ornabra I'll kill everybody that is a damn Christian pig dog," he yelled dancing as if stricken insane. And he shook his fist as if he would ram everything in pieces that came his way. Despite the fact that the little girls had been gone for fully fifteen minutes, Manley ordered a vigorous pursuit, but the pursuers found no signs of the little girls who had safely reached the Christian lines.

"You see it was like this," said Joice in explaining it all to Evans. "Disguised as dirty glandelinian peasant children we being not recognized entered Manley's lines easily, and pretending to sell the soldiers and officers fruit which we brought along with us, succeeded in gaining entrance into Manley's headquarters after learning from one of the men where it was we saying that we wished to sell him some swell apples. He recognized us the moment we entered, but we at first threatened to shoot him if he uttered an outcry, and while seven of us kept him covered Gertrude ransacked the place, and secured the letters of importance which we have given you. He finally surprised us, and almost had us but aly little Gertrude had secured a ropes end from a cupboard and suddenly tripped him and tied him fast and gagged him before he could make a yell. In a trussle he struck Angeline in the face with his foot or shoe but we managed to tie him with a long rope to a round table. We accidentally set one of the rooms on fire, but I'm sure he was discovered before the flames went too far."

"You little girls have given him proof that you are not afraid to spy on him, in a way that he will never forget," said general Vivian laughing. "It would have been worth seeing. My but I'll bet he's mad."

"I believe he is for the way he cut up when we tied him up," said Joice. "We gave him a good lesson however that to be over confident is fatal." And she and her sisters also laughed until the tears ran down their cheeks.

Indeed Manley was angry angrier than a raving lion or mad dog. He blamed even all the guards for not watching, and threatened to do over everything that would be a mortal sin to explain, and blasphemed God fiercer than the very devils in hell would have done. He was also fully aware now that he may have been spied on before, though he knew not where, and felt like if he could fairly kill himself over his bad luck. Driven to frenzy by his rage, that very evening he set up his mind to get the children at all cost, and was unexpectedly and without warning of any kind hurled a most frightful and tremendous onslaught against Evans whole line that after noon the Christian line was thrown into confusion by the sudden and mighty shock which was like a midnight tropical hurricane, the whole battle line was sheeted with intense flames of cannon fire and musketry, where the helpless christian columns amid the bursting confetti rain and thunder of shells momentarily expected to be crushed or annihilated for their whole line was torn to pieces, by the shock of the assault, and by the fiercest firing of the enemy the very breastworks were set on fire and trees and bushes and grass grass was blazing furiously. Rain of shells lightning from cannon and musketry, and whirlwind of assault. However the wing rallied again and again and stood gallantly against the raging tidal waves of frenzied assault floods of blasphemous yells poured from millions of attacking glandelinians as if from a million vaults and mouths of hell, so filling the air and overweighing the atmosphere with their number, continuance and fiery force, that the Angelinians felt that there was nothing else inessantly, and room for nothing else, and as if God had in the very wrath to the world given them up to be carried away with the wild and uncanny Glandelinian "Devil Yell" as if with a mighty whirling Typhoon gale on the McWhirtherian seas.

It was the fiercest devil yell ever uttered by the glandelinians and the assault had been so fearful that no one knew for a while what to do and worse of all Evans though hearing the tremendous din of battle from his headquar headquar headquar and who was talking to general ivian, and as at the same time a terrible thunderstorm was raging with mighty force did not know his lines was being so assaulted by the enemy.

But the assault soon extended along the other portions of his lines and suddenly both he, general ivian and Violet and her sisters were startled, overawed, and appalled as if a roaring scream as if a hundred million fiends and devils had been suddenly let loose among them in a more palpable and heinous reality frightful and malignant. This was followed simultaneously by a tremendous crash of cannons and musketry all along the line and then a wild salvos of explosions tore the air like a storm of bursting planets around general Evans headquarters, and the roof simultaneously caved in burying many beneath it though injuring none.

General ivian and Evans in the lower quarters with the little girls realizing what had occurred rushed out of the building, gave stern commands to hold ground and sent orders by telegraph for the remainder of the line to come up and join the bloody fray.

So complete was the surprise that it had thrown a good portion of the whole christian line into confusion, but it was only the suddenness of the violent attack that did this, the Abbeismians were speedily rallied, and gradually more and more divisions came up to their assistance. Artillery was brought up and opened with double charges of canister at short range, and every arrangement was prepared for a final struggle. Evans concentrated his own right so heavily that the enemy made no head way, while general ivian himself prepared his own forces for action, deciding to throw them forward at a moments notice.

So fierce was the firing that each discharge of musketry intensified the smoke so that it appeared as if a forest fire had broken out, and now as general powell guster Johnston and Kindermine arrived with their divisions the enemy was checked at all points, and at the given orders, with a fierce yell the Abbeismians with fixed pikos and bayonets charged upon the Glandelinian waves and with a terrifying pandemonium of series of devil yells closed with them, forced their way through the gray line, and for fifteen minutes it was every man for himself.

Despite the shock of the fearful christian counter charge the enemy did not waver, but rallied their shattered columns and pushed back the Abbeismians step by step, millions of men facing each other, fighting and shouting like pirates and driving each other back and forth in a horror of battles confusion.

Evans in the meantime had brought up general Graners divisions of Abyssinians and these also were thrown upon the glandelinian surge, and now adding to the wild din and fury of battle the entire line of batteries of Manleys began firing as wildly as they knew how, and five hundred and sixty five thousand cannon volleyed and thundered in earth rending salvos of cannonading heard for a couple of thousand of miles, and then in answer in universal uproar came the loud thundering crash of general Evans long chain of batteries, followed in chorus by all the batteries of cannons cannons along general ivians line, and the clamor surpassed any battle fought on glandelinian soil yet. The battle had become general, and during the shock in the Glandelinian assault general Manley was pushing large bodies of McHollestinians forward toward the whole christian center under cover of his artillery, and being shielded by the great glandelinian shell storm hurled within four hours fourteen desperate onslaughts against the christian line, while simultaneously he was gathering forty million McHollestinians to throw into the exposed gap, which Evans had purposely made to fool the enemy of god.

The fury and violence of the battle was exceedingly horrible and as it grew in redoubled fury toward six o'clock Evans decided it was time to put in other great divisions, which he did and so all the furious attacks of Manleys divisions was unavailing. Within the hour of seven o'clock the heavy column of glandelinians in series of waves came headlong for the large gap, and poured through apparently successful, but the succeeding waves of Glandelinians saw them disappear and melt away in a circling inferno of musketry, and discovering that the gap was a trap the officers halted the remaining waves, and telegraphed word to Manley that it was suicide to assault the christian lines, and that no army pouring through the gap would come back to tell the tale.

Manley then realized that his plans had been discovered, and the great army that was moving around the hills would be trapped also. He hastily sent a recall, but too late, the shock came on the rear of Evans army, but the battle again was finished, the flankers were crushed and torn to pieces, ten of their generals were slain, and every regimental and brigade commander shot down or captured, while five hundred ragged flags were taken by the victorious christians.

Nevertheless Manley was determined in his wicked defiance to god to retain his positions nevertheless, having the same determination as Evans had but the next morning Evans made an assault, and series of other assaults that lasted all day, crushing and crippling Manleys armies, and capturing not only all of his positions, but all of his military stores, and artillery and hundreds of more battle flags. The second battle of Avezzano had ended gloriously for the christians and Manley was forced to retreat as his army was too badly impaired to resist any longer at this part.

Now that the way was open again Evans decided to press forward and move against Fort Fountain Of Prens de La Greece. Violet and her sisters realized how bad they had made Manley and said to Evans during the time the advance was starting;

"Manley was so angry over our treatment of him that he actually attacked your lines to get revenge. And I bet too that he did it because he was terribly determined to get us no matter what the cost, but it did not avail him nothing at all."

"Well it was good that he attacked as I was growing impatient and intended to wage another battle that following day anyhow." Said Evans. "He started it sooner than I had intended it to come and now we are able to advance again. The sooner we can reach Fountain Of Prens De La Greece the sooner we can capture it and titanic fair and crush the enemys opposition. After you came back from the spying attack, and when you told me how you had tied Manley up so firmly I expected something serious would result from it but did not expect it so soon."

The advance was soon on the way, and Violet and her sisters the glorious little heroes he heroines rode around him as if they were his fairy body guard. In the meantime Hanson himself had been having serious trouble. He had succeeded in his plans well enough but found serious opposition when he attempted to move around the region north of Montrose. Cannon was still unable to advance, being held back by the armies under Phellinia Tamerline, and finally Hanson after striking a series of blows had been forced to retreat northward until he got to the grounds of Easter Starring. The enemy followed but Hanson made another movement around the enemys rear and again forced Manley to retreat.

THE BATTLE OF MONTROSE.

Finally Hanson decided to try his luck and he hurled a heavy and deliberate assault against the whole glandelinian army raging a frightful battle that lasted sixteen days in series upon series of bloody combats. He came off victorious and succeeded in driving the foe back toward Montrose but still all efforts to move across the paster Starring and against paster Toe Station was unavailing. All depended that Cannon could force his way past Phellinia Tamerline and come to his aid.

The events of the war was following thick and fast. At the region of Onion River there occurred a volcano of explosions that committed such incalculable damage that the Abbeinnian armies in the location under the Werner were crippled, raids by the thousands was being made, towns and villages were being seized and burned and the Abbeinnians had even started a general and big forest fire that was surprising the world who marveled at the fury the war was assuming now. The fortified cities of Gushmann, Thanhouse, Thanhouse Run and Mellenberry were captured without a conflict, snowflank gap and Pepper Necklance were in possession of the Abbeinnians and they were pouring through this portion like a ravaging tornado of hundreds of miles in extent. For Glandelinia indeed "War was hell." Scores of towns and ten cities crisscrossed with child slave factories and mills were captured by the Abbeinnians, and the number of children rescued by the Christians numbered 13,456,789 and three quarters of them were all little girls.

Every railroad in Northern Glandelinia was seized, railroad tracks ripped up and tiles burned, all hay stacks seen in great and beautiful farms were burned, the farms were desolated, and every thing of good value carried off. Fierce opposition threatened general Germaine Vivian at Gracelandia which checked his advance, but learning of Evans great success as he was not daunted and prepared to wage a general battle.

Evans army itself was advancing fast now without a check at any quarter, and Violet and her sisters had hopes that all would turn out better than before, though they heard that all other Christian armies were receiving fierce opposition at every step of their advance and that small battles numbered by the tens of thousands. Evans army led the van and general Vivians the main section of the advancing Christian armies.

As soon as the enemy made a halt in front of Evans army and threatened opposition Violet and her sisters lusting for more adventures decided to take the chances and spy on Manley again that evening. They dressed themselves as cleverly as possible, making themselves look like conspicuous Glandelinian boyscouts and then telling Evans where they were going, and taking their boyfriends with them they started off toward the enemys gloomy and sullen lines.

As soon as they reached the vicinity of Manleys lines there came a sharp challenge;

"Halt you little rascals. I recognize you as Starring, Fredrick and Powden and the doggedest Vivian girls. You are under arrest."

At once before he could make an outcry they were upon him like little beautiful fiends, and bore him to the ground, Violet in the struggle grasping the mans bayonet from his hilt and running him through the body. Then the boys quickly hid the dead sentry and entered the lines cautiously. They reached a city of tents beyond the wooded regions of the enemys encampment and then proceeded toward the main section of the camp.

"Who are you kids and where are you going?" Asked a sergeant coming up with a squad of privates who were on drill.

"Can't we rubber around without being bawled out like that?" Asked Violet in a voice that Starring did not recognize.

"Well excuse me but you look familiar." Said the sergeant. "I believe at least I have seen some of your companions before."

"We are strangers to you." Said C. F. Fredrick. "So leave us alone or we'll call for help." And he started to weep on pretense.

"You are a cry baby." Said the sergeant. "I was only fooling. Be on your way and I won't tease you any more."

They went on further and soon came upon another officer who was a lieutenant.

As soon as he saw them he made a move as if to draw a pistol but the little girls covered him at once and cried;

"You have discovered us despite our disguise lieutenant but if you draw on us or open your mouth to raise the alarm I'll kill you and so will my sisters."

The lieutenant had recognized the little girls alright, but knowing their desperate ways did not care to take any chances in trying it out with them, and the little girls backed him into a vacant part of the camp, Jennie secured a tent rope which she cut with her pocket knife and tied his arms and feet with it. Then they sat leaving him sit there said;

"It's up to you to tell us where Manleys headquarters are or we'll keep our threat now."

"It's up to you in company B." He answered sullenly.

"You lie." Cried Violet not believing him.

"No truly and honestly I'm not. It's up to Company B. But you will not be able to fool Manley this time I'll warrant though you have me at your mercy. He watches for you now."

While Violet and her sisters were proceeding onward toward general Manleys headquarters, a series of great outcries, that might neither seemed human or earthly echoed and reechoed through the woods and came penetrating the hearts of the brave little girls as they heard it it being the wild Devil Cry of the frightful Mo-Hollestonians. Then a stillness apparently as deep as if all the noises had been stopped at such horrid and unusual interruptions followed, and after a few minutes of terrible suspense Violet and her sisters listened intently as if expecting that the same sound would be repeated.

The cry that was bad and shocking had seemed very unearthly indeed and it again filled the air and made a creepy feeling go through the little girls and their boy companions. For several minutes it continued very steadily undulating through the air during the conclusion in distant and dying cadences seeming to be indeed very unearthly, and changed to the same yells but a perfect tumult and which made the little girls deaf. It seemed as if all the demons and fiends of hell were possessing themselves of the air around and about Violet and her sisters and were venting their savage humors in the most barbaric sounds ever heard in all the whole entire war.

The cries and terrifying yells did not seem to come from any particular directions though it seemed to penetrate the whole northern part of the Glandelinian camp, then came bright flashes, puffs of smoke, and quick reports of a three score of muskets at once rending the air in deafening echoes and a bullet grazed Violets cheek but wounding her only slightly..... She and her sisters drew their revolvers but were dismayed because they could not see any of the wicked Glandelinian assailants, though all the trees and shrubs around them were being cut and torn in a hundred places by bullets, eight of which the little girls had stepped behind, and again and again, and still again the muskets flashed, and the leaves and barks of the trees in front of Violet and her sisters flew into the air and were scattered by a fierce wind then blowing from the southwest. The little girls realizing they were discovered by the Glandelinians and that the rascals were trying to assassinate them in cold blood dashed behind trees after trees, firing their pistols every time, but soon the leaden hail flew thicker than ever, the rolling volleys making a great din, and now the little girls seeing moving objects opened fire again and saw eight men drop.

Then with a increase in the wild yells there came a rush of Mo-Hollestonians, and off the little girls sprinted in a frenzy as if a million lives was concentrated in that one single moment, the Glandelinians dashing after Violet and her sisters like hounds after a deer, but scarcely did the feet of the little girls seem to touch the ground, and in that dizzy moment the little girls came to a network of dangerous rifle pits and knowing that it was the only way from being shot down, they seized a Glandelinian flag, glaf flag and waved it in the breeze. This stopped the firing of the Glandelinians but nevertheless they came on, and again started a fusillade but took care that they did not fire on the captured flag, and moved with strength such as God gives only to the most desperate in need, the little girls with one wild cry of defiance to the enemy, and giving a flying leap vaulted sheer across pit after pit it being a series of desperate leaps in impossible to anything but madness and recklessness of death defiance and the wild Mo-Hollestonians instinctively of cried out in their rage; "Halt you little dare devils. What in hell is the matter with you, you'll not escape." and then discharged a rolling volley as the little girls continued on flaunting the flag in their very faces as it were. Bullets whistled close to the little girls but never touched them.

However there was danger of their being fired on from those treacherous Glandelinian rifle pits, but regardless of the danger Violet and her sisters did not stay a moment, but again with wild shrieks of defiance, and desperate energy followed by the boys they leaped across another another-- and still another though each pit was about six feet apart, stumbling almost into one--leaping--slipping--springing upwards again, and firing wildly at their pursuers, and crying out their defiance "Come and take us if you dare" bringing down the Glandelinians by thirtens at every volley from their pistols. Violet and her sisters losing their shoes and stockings from their feet, blood from a cut foot from Starring marking every step. But the fugitives in their excitement of the pursuit and chase and filled with glee at the disdain and rage of the foe saw nothing felt nothing and continued on shooting at the foe again and again causing frightful havoc among the perishing ranks, and even bringing down a colonel. The Glandelinians however had bloodhounds with them which discouraged at the speed of their fugitives, and of their own losses and driven desperate let them loose but Violet and her sisters shot them down, as they came dashing and baying up to them, fired again at the enemy and reaching the other street of the huge camp saw a new regiment of Glandelinians swarming through to intercept them and at first Violet and her sisters and the boy companions seemed caught for to go down another company street was as risky as to face either pursuers, but the little girls plunged into a hastily erected Mess Hall as the foe again yelled, hooted, and opened fire, bullets whistling dangerously close to the little girls, and one cut off a foot of Gertrude's leg. The Glandelinians swimming around the building besieging the Mess-Hall but Violet and her sisters were not to be thus caught napping, and reaching a side entrance they hid in a cellar place. Looking out Violet and her sisters saw that all the nearest company streets were swarming with the excited Glandelinians and that a score of the boldest cowardly were on horseback, and were caving a tearing through the first company street at a swarming gallop. Violet and her sisters opened fire from their hiding place and on sight of the horsemen sprawled from their saddles into the dust, and the survivors rode about shouting a cool conglomerate of words and commands to each other, being excited and dismayed not knowing where the shots at first came from. A shower of bullets from every Glandelinian rifleman whistled incessantly against the house and a command was heard given to shell the Mess hall but it was also contradicted by some other officer.

"If we could only hide somewhere else we probably could elude them." Said Hettie.

Suddenly looking toward the roof, and seeing below it wide beams stretching across below the ceiling they clambered up and reached it by means of the beams and there they hid, though Jim T. Jennie with a large stick smashed a window at one blow to make the Glandelinians think they jumped out.

In a moment a swarm of men came in and the little girls clinging desperately among the upper beams above them were fortunately undisturbed or they would have been brought down with one volley.

"Those little brats called the Vivian girls and some companions with them got away, and are gone somewhere." Said a Familiar voice.

"I don't see how they got away so quick." Said another Glandelinian officer.

"But where have they gone to?" Cried a Third. "They cannot be in here for by the sound of breaking glass they leaped through that darn window, and if they were in this mess hall we could see them. Even the beams could not conceal them from us."

"Maybe they are hiding among those beams stretching below the ceiling at that." Cried a fourth man.

Some of the soldiers and officers looked up there but as the beams were eight feet wide the little girls had been able to slide out from in such a position that they were invisible to the searchers, who looked diligently everywhere but in vain. Even when soldiers started to clamber up to the beams the little girls had in the meantime escaped through a secret trap door which they discovered to the roof, and down to the ground unseen, and reaching other quarters of the camp without being observed and watching for signs of pursuers and wondering how to get to Manley's headquarters Violet and her sisters had observed that they were being criticised and sized up by every man that passed them. It was starting to rain now in big drops, the feet of the brave little children having been cut during their wild jumping over the rifle pits and they began to feel sore, but nevertheless they continued on being determined to find General Manley's headquarters at any cost. On they went slowly passing less watchful sentries without mishap but being at times questioned closely by officers who felt suspicious of the strange children within their lines. The little girls however passed many company companies in drill or parade, and squads exercising and then going forward more cautiously they finally saw to their surprise twenty eight watchful guards posted on an intersection of roads two on either side and many standing right on the road. It was their only outlet to the Christian lines and nevertheless it was evident that all roadways and fields were being watched so that the children could not escape from the lines. Violet and her sisters knew that they could not pass these sentries, but decided that when desperate needs came to pass anyway if they had to shoot them all down to do so. They then made across a meadow unseen by Glandelinians where they came upon one sentry pacing up and down and where in the distance loomed a grand building which evidently was Manley's headquarters. This sentry was as watchful as a cat and kept on marching up and down without a pause, and the little girls coming nearer cautiously cautioned the boys to be careful, and then all the children dropped out of sight, and every time he passed worked themselves further and further away until they came close to the building unseen.

"He is quite a slow polk, and seems to be looking in all directions as he walks but have not seen us yet." Said Jennie with a smile. "But there is another guard walking up and down in the yards of the house and I wonder how we are going to pass him, as he has a machine gun to work against prowlers in case they try to surprise him."

"We will do it." Said Violet. "We did it before. But us children will have to be good and quick so that he does not let out a shout or yell or fire his racket and raise an alarm. If his gun goes off we'll have to do some clever hiding mighty quick. Indeed this attempt will be a desperate one but we are bound to pass him. We have even if he was the King of the demons, and we will pass him if we have to kill him to do so."

The little girls watching him as he came closer spread out separately in a wide diminution, and the boys working themselves closer and closer were the first to spring at him, then following came the little girls, there being for a moment a desperate struggle, but Angeline grabbed his gun from him and hit him over the head knocking the guard senseless, and then tied up his hands and feet and gagged him good, and then covered him up with bushes so he would not be seen.

Then the little girls continued on their way through the meadow which was bordered with the distant city of white tents, though being met and questioned by many Glandelinian boy scouts and officers and even privates. Passing the entrance to the house the little girls saw a piece of paper lying on the stone walk and Violet picking it up went behind a wall followed by the five little boys and her sisters, and as she unfolded it, they all glanced at it to see and this is what they read;

"YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL ABERDEEN STANISLAW:-----

You are under orders to make a flanking movement at twelve thirty to morrow mor against the Christian right under Roswell or Baldwin. The attack must be made upon the flank of these two armies in the greatest force for one of the generals must be captured and the Christian bulldogs routed at no matter what the cost. But be cautious as general Evans have too many scouting parties out, guards out, with a tremendous number of boy scouts and signal stations. And look out for the famous spies known as the slick Vivian girls for though I thought they would not have the nerve to say on us because they are now with the armies in Glandelinia they have showed me in a way my mistake that I would not care to experience again. They are still as slippery slippery as eels, and are as dangerous as demons now and would shoot any one on sight. In particular look out for them I bid you for your own safety as they are great sharpshooters, and too quick at it to suit me. As to my plan we must get around Treceas demmer by the east bank and then descend upon the rear of the Christian line under Roswell, under Johnston and then rout him before the noise of the firing will arouse the main line, and if a simultaneous attack can be made on the whole line at the same time all good will be accomplished. If we could also get upon the flank of the Christian divisions guarding the Vivian girls and surround them and capture them all we could easily bring the Christian dogs into submission. It's a dangerous task however as they are most watchful the men are all ferocious Abbeian warriors, and we got to keep the doggie Christian armies from advancing on Fountain Of Fire De la Greece and shall. But be careful of the Vivian girls as they are reckless as tigers, and what ever the nature of the Christians are a flank attack will decide the conflict at all costs and make a grand victory for us indeed.

YOUR CHIEF DIRECTOR GENERAL.

ORDERS FROM GENERAL HUBERT MANLEY.

General Gordon

C.B. Smith.

G.S.C.D.E.L.I.N.

Folding the slip Violet put it inside her waist, just as several privates came running up...

"Those children are spies and the Vivian girls with their companions." Violet and her sisters heard one of the men shout. "They were besieged by one of us in the Mess-Hall and escaped through a door in the roof and eluded us cleverly. Give chase double quick."

"How do you know those children are spies?" Cried one of the officers coming up.

"I recognize them as the same children whom we besieged in a Mess-Hall. I know them by their clothes and their picking up a paper and reading it is a very suspicious act. I observed them pick up the paper and read it."

Violet suddenly drew her gun and brought two of the telltale men down with quick well aimed shots, and then the little girls and boys ran as fast as they could, the glandelinians dashing after them well-nell shouting and yelling just as a party of cavarly men came riding down a company street and seeing the commotion and knowing what it was all about started after the fugitives a like the wind. Violet and her sisters were passing down one of the company streets and reaching the meadow again observed that the Gargolian cavarly was coming after them at break neck speed and that there was no time to lose.

These reckless Glandelinian cavarly men were driving their horses so swiftly after the fugitives that they would have rode the little girls down had they not jumped out of the way, and as the glandelinians whelled with a shout the little girls brought down exactly twelve of the glandelinians and the boys sixteen more, causing such confusion that it gained time for the fugitives to be enabled to jump on the empty sa saddles and dash off before the glandelinians recovered from the panic and amazement. Hundreds of other cavarly men were dashing after the little girls from several new directions.

"Stop you little female devils." One of the Gargolian leaders shouted wildly and with a curse. "We are bound to capture or shoot you down and you cannot get away from us now." Violet brought him down with a well aimed shot, the other little girls also opening fire followed by a volley from the pistols of the boys, and thirteen glandelinians dropped causing more confusion.

"After those guttersnips!" yelled a sweet faced officer. "Head off those little desperadoes. They must not escape, or we'll be frustrated. They are spies."

"Now already two hundred glandelinians were coming after the fugitives, at a thunderous gallop, yelling and firing for further orders, but the little girls had taken the lead across the meadow, though Jennie received a painful wound in the left foot but nevertheless she managed to keep her seat and shot down the man who had wounded her. The Gargolians were fast riders but nevertheless the fugitives were steadily gaining the distance on them galloping at a still more furious rate than the enemy was.

"Why but we are gaining on them though they seem worse than the Omnians." Said Gertrude Angeline. "I knew their true nature before and we are in for it now if we don't keep our distance from them for we'll be arousing the whole camp against us."

A large force of infantry had now lined themselves up in front but violet and her sisters dashed through shooting to right and left wildly and without missing a single shot captured several forced them to mount their horses and led them inside a large house stripped their captured victims of their weapons and tied the men firmly to a bed. Then violet standing at the door in full view of the near approaching Gargolians who were already dismounting to charge the house said:

"If you men attack us we'll burn the house and the prisoners who are with us. You will not capture us and that is all there is to it."

"Go to Hell ye little devils." Cried one of the officers and the men opened fire but the little girls had slammed the door shut and violet was not harmed. While the glandelinians were attacking the house, and while three of her sisters were returning the fire and shooting down twenty of the glandelinians within a few minutes and holding the foe at bay.

Joice set the bedding in the house on fire filling the room rapidly with smoke. By desperate attempts the glandelinians who had been made prisoners by the little girls managed to work the ropes loose and flinging the remains in the pail strove to overcome the little girls but three of them were shot and mortally wounded, the licking flames were catching the window shades and draperies, and half choked by the blinding smoke the little girls fought on driving back many attacks of the enemy, then joice seizing a chair hurled it against a window on the side of the house where the foe had been unable to get around and smashed it pane and all. The smoke was filling the room in thicker volumes but the little girls were setting other things on fire also, then after delivering one volley which brought down thirteen glandelinians simultaneously the little girls and boys sprang out of the window one by one, just as the glandelinians succeeded in breaking in. They had broke down the door with a battering ram, and then rushed into the smoke filled house, and as two rooms were like furnaces they were driven back by the heat, the whole floor of the hall also being a mass of flames, and not being able to stand the heat the men edged away as quickly as possible.

"Well if those spies and child fire bugs are not clever I'll eat my hat." Said Lieutenant Sanders. "They have escaped after setting the house on fire and slew their prisoners because we attacked the house. Go some of you men and search for them."

Along the ceiling now the fire was spreading fur furiously, also along the corridors and between the walls.

"The blaze is beyond control." Said another of the officers in a surly manner. "Let's get out. This is no place for us, and the fugitives have escaped through that window after setting fire to the house. See the smoke is coming through the cracks in the floor." Fifteen minutes after the Gargolians had left the hall and whole building became a roaring inferno, the little girls lying in hiding near the building watching the flames leaping out of every window in glee and admiration, and then slowly and cautiously resumed their way across the meadow. Their hearts beat fast for they saw three score of Gargolians looking in all directions for them, and also another cavarly force was coming up being lancers the most dreaded men of all.

"We must be careful that they don't trace us." Said violet. "We don't wish to leave the camp yet as we have not paid Ganley a respective visit yet."

"But two of the cavarly men among those just coming up and who were the lancers saw the fugitives crawling through the high grass in the meadow and yelled:

"There goes the yivian Girls and their five com panions."

"They are escaping you fools." Cried an officer to his men at the same time. "After them and don't be slow about it either. But be careful or they'll pick you men off like flies. Follow them and don't make a reckless dash."

The soldiers bounded after the little girls yelling for them to stop but violet shouted back:

"Enbaie Memie Minie Moo, Catch a Nigger by the toe, and if he hollers Make him pay fifty dollars every day." And singling out a lieutenant and he brought down his horse. Jennie was suffering from the wound in her hand and seeing that blood was dripping from the scratch Jennie wrapped her clean handkerchief around it, and tightened it with one of her small blue belts. Bullets in the meantime were whistling about the little girls incessantly while through the meadow a perfect swarm of the Gargolians were slowly following after them while the lancers were moving in a oblique direction to head them off.

This did not daunt the fugitives who continued onward, the little girls now reaching a cornfield close to where gunners headquarters stood, and suddenly to the eyes of the men the fugitives suddenly disappeared as if into the very ground. They gasped, looked around for the little girls but could not find them. They saw a depression in the ground at one point which looked like a old sinkhole and into this the little girls had dropped, but having landed on a ledge which prevented them from falling sheer two hundred and fifty feet to the bottom, they had clambered up again and were safely lodged in one of the rooms of the building. The little girls found their ammunition badly exhausted and realizing that if escaped spies are to have need of ammunition it was then, and realizing that those who hesitate are lost, the little girls seeing on a door the sign: "AMMUNITION ROOM" crept stealthily toward it, and pressed it open wide enough to discover a score of glandelinians come in suddenly. In the little girls went just in time not to be seen. Looking around after carefully fastening the door on the inside they saw weapons of the guards hanging by w racks all around the four cornered walls. As they touched one of the weapons with the intention of drawing it it gave a resentful groan so loud that violet and her sisters felt that their chances of escape now was jeopardized, and with hearts standing still with excitement and little fear they waited for the expected attempt of some one to open the door from the outside.

As several footsteps stirred, and fearing that now they must see the adventure through violet and her sisters made a spring as swift and as noiseless as cats and landed on each side of the door to offer resistance should any one try and break down the door to come in and seize them. They had drawn their pistols and waited for the moment when the door should fly from its hinges, it seeming an eternity to their overwrought nerves as they remained beside the door, but nothing more was heard from the outside. All was quite quiet. As the little girls drew a small gun from its hostler a scabbard on the opposite rack scraped against the wall and holder with the sound of cast iron being filed violently against a great rasp, and with their hearts beating wild wildly violet and her sisters expected to see the room immediately filled with alarm and attacking Glandelinians and the door bursted down. But not a man came to the door. Four other revolvers they drew noiselessly, but as Jennie drew one from another hostler and proceeded to remove the bullets in them a cutlass fell from the rack and in dropping clanked against the iron floor with a most frightful and deafening clank.

Surely to Violet and her sisters it must have aroused some of the men outside on inside the building, and fouring again a break in at the door the little girls were on the point of forestalling the expected attack by a charge for the now open doorway but to their surprise not a graycoat appeared. But all of a sudden a door did open from the outside and in a moment looking then full in the face stood general Phollinda Janssonia who evidently took in the situation at one glance and appreciated the gravity of it as quickly as Violet and her sisters did and was about to arouse the alarm when Violet and her sisters fired as one and he crumpled to the floor with eight bullet wounds in his leg. The sound of the ten shots were ten times louder than the noise they made with the work inside the ammunition, and so fouring detecting and deciding to cause confusion they lighted one of the fuses of the powder barrels, and just as men dashed into the place were through the windows, and as a maelstrom of confused shots rang out the little girls dashed for a corn field just as the explosion occurred causing a series of explosions which sent the building flying into the air an avalanche of wreckage shooting through the black clouds of smoke. An alarm gun bellowed simultaneously from the battery nearest to the place its deep boom reverberating in deafening tones adding to the series of crashes caused by the explosions, which rained debris in every direction and scattered bricks mortar and timbers for the distance of four hundred yards. The whole camp teemed with glandelinian soldiers who were aroused, shell and rifle fire was opened furiously toward the cornfield, while men came dashing forward in every direction by scores yelling and shouting like demons, the pandemonium being deafening, hundreds of rifles cracking, scores of cannons booming and roaring deafeningly, officers shouting various orders to the men, men shouting directions to each other, and cavarly galloping here and there, and the glandelinian fire department clanging up to put out the big fire caused by the explosion. Violet and her sisters were rushing through the cornfield and came upon a party of infantry without warning and seeing that they were outnumbered and in danger of being over taken the little girls and boys decided to fight with the fury of desperation because they were bound at all costs to get away.

"Halt ye little rascals." Yelled the soldiers but the little girls paid no attention to them. What happened was the work of an instant: for the only reply the glandelinians received was several shots from the pistols of the little girls, three of the glandelinians sprawling while a sergeant caught a bullet in the left shoulder, he having fired at Gertrude Angeline whose gun cracked simultaneously with his own and the Gargolian sergeant fell from his horse like a bundle. Simultaneously a major was hit by Violet and collapsed with a groan of anger and rage, and then a colonel a fierce looking man broke forward toward Violet and her sisters followed by several Mc-Hollestonians the rascal rushing violet in person, and Jennie who was white with excitement fired and missed, but Violet fired herself knocking the gun out of the colonel's hand, and as he still lunged toward the little girl with savage outstretched hands Violet fired again and as the bullet only grazed his forehead he uttered an obscene blasphemy and giving forth a brutish roar of rage, his eyes protruding in his passion and fury managed to catch her in his hand but even as he did so Jennie fired a shot at close range, the savage hands fell back from violet's shoulder in a convulsive manner, the huge form of the major jerked sideways from her and the next instant he lay dead at her feet. Yet the other glandelinians being maddened by this came rushing toward Violet and her sisters who fired volley after volley so fiercely and incessantly that over fifty of the men fell, and in the confusion the little girls secured eight horses, the boys leaping on the same and off they dashed pursued by hundreds of the glandelinian soldiers who fired confusedly, the bullets whistling all about the little girls but doing them no harm at all and on and on they dashed.....

"If we must escape those wicked glandelinians we'll have to run down that steep incline over yonder." Said Jennie to her sis sisters and boy friends. "Come on we must be quick."

They raced for the incline and down it they dashed outdistancing the freemasons who opened a rattling ringing fusillade as they teemed above their rise. Simultaneously a large force of the lancers under general Aronburg came dashing swiftly up a tumpike, and discovering the fugitives quickly spread out to intercept them firing a terrific volley, but expecting what was coming the little girls had leaped behind the nearest trees and the shots missed them, and now the little girls found themselves placed between two fires. Violet and her sisters were calm, though at first the boys were bewildered, and as they were confronted by two high ledges of boulders, and knowing that it was instant death to be captured for the foe would shoot them down without mercy Violet and her sisters determined to make a stand against the Mc-Hollestonians and escape further to escape further when opportunity presented itself to them.

Besides the pistol the little girls were armed with automatics mostly colts, and so Violet and her sisters drew off their bolts and waited for the gray coats to come within range. On came the glandelinians not expecting any resistance as these rascals did not know that the children were armed but all of a sudden the little girls started firing, and fifteen glandelinians rolled down the ridge, the survivors cursing and swearing. Nearer and nearer the glandelinians came more swiftly now despite their losses, and though they went down like flies scores crawled on their hands and knees and got close to the ledge. In a few minutes the wicked glandelinian infantry outdistanced before were now upon them and finding themselves surrounded on all sides the little girls and boys fired away with their pistols with such effect at point blank, and as fast as they could fire and reload that the glandelinians gave back, scores of the glandelinians then trying a rush and leaping over but were shot down without reckoning by Violet and her sisters, who secured several men whom they bound hand and foot and placed in front of the stones in defiance of the foe. One of the glandelinians unseen by the little girls had rolled a barrel of gun powder with a lighted fuse attached into it and pushed it into the trench held by the little girls and then cried:

"Ha cried another of the men." "Those little devils shall pay for their rashness. Off you nearest men before the keg explodes." The nearest glandelinians dashed off full speed and the infantry and cavarly started firing anew to prevent as it seemed the little girls from escaping the danger. Violet and her sisters had not seen the keg of dynamite powder until the men had shouted those words, and this at first almost terrified them for if that big keg ever exploded they would be blown to pieces. However the fuse was seven inches long and the little girls struggled desperately to get rid of the keg as it was impossible to put it out the fuse and so hard did they struggle that they finally hoisted it over the wall to the dismay and surprise of the foe but back again it fell. Another minute and it would be too late the barrel weighing a hundred pounds. Again the thirteen children struggled and the seven inch fuse was now only two feet. At last they again got it over to the top of the pile of stones, and now more desperately they works as now they must make haste as the flame was already half an inch to the hole. The glandelinian infantry at the distance of five hundred feet and still firing in vain to stop the children from getting rid of the barrel for it would roll down upon them saw the barrel topple over at last and come bounding down toward them carrying all before it and uttered an imprecation and scattered wildly. They were too late, there was a report like a giant high explosive going off, and a great column of smoke shot upward among the glandelinians mingled with clouds of dirt and wreckage a hundred feet high. Two hundred glandelinians were fairly killed and five hundred wounded. There was a hue and cry among the men enraged and badly shaken survivors who were so demoralized by the incident that the little girls had succeeded in getting through their besieging lines and away and now again they swarmed in pursuit.

"Well who ever saw the like." Growled the main leader Aronburg in a rage. "Those little devils must be death proof. Can't kill em with a keg of powder and can't hit them with bullets."

"And my but the are slippery as ice." Another officer said in answer. "It's impossible to hold those little girls at all when you do catch them."

The cavarly were in the lead of the fugitives but the little girls were able to run down faster than the horses, and now the glandelinians were again firing, and cursing, blaspheming and swearing and yelling to the fugitives to stop but in vain, the brave little girls did not pay any heed at all but continued on until they reached the base and then sped across a wheat field, and setting fire to the wheat, with lighted matches dashed over a high fence the infantry again opening fire but not hitting any of the fugitives.

Shouting and firing the cavarly men alone dashed after the children their steeds jumping the high fence, and again slowly but surely they started to over take the child fugitives but the little girls had reached a barn and going on in and securing a bunch of cavarly horses that was found within dashed off again across a cabbage field, coming in sight of another row of tents. The fugitives having outdistanced the other pursuers kept their horses going on at a good speed when suddenly a countless number of glandelinians swarmed toward them from the tents.

"We have galloped right into the enemy's trap." Cried Joice. Hundreds of graycoats came swarming up armed to the teeth but in answer to the leaders' stentorian command to:

"Surrender you little dogs or we'll shoot you down!" The little girls charged them and caused such confusion that again they got away after shooting a horrible number of them down. To give themselves up would have been utter rashness for they knew that the glandelinians would have killed them anyway and so the thirteen children at the command of the foe leader to surrender had wheeled their horses sharply around in a flash and opening fire on all sides simultaneously had galloped upon the men in the way knocking them down by tens and causing confusion, and then dashed off in another direction, and now the glandelinians recovering opened fire so fiercely that the many rifle reports were incessant. Hundreds of bullets whistled incessantly about the little girls making rips in their clothes and all of the little girls were unhorsed.

"Those dratted little devils certainly do possess charmed lines." Said one of the officers. "We have over 1,000 men in pursuit and all firing incessantly as it seems and we can't catch them or shoot them. Can't hit or kill em, and when we have them surrounded they charge us and break away. I believe the men are not good at target practice."

"Wouldn't that get your goat?" Said another officer. The glandelinian cavally made the dust fly with their furious galloping as they raced after the little girls and quickly overtook them, but the little girls fairly unhorsed thirty and securing thirteen of the horses during the confusion, kept up a furious fire until they were all mounted and then again dashed away in the eyes of the really astonished Glandelinians. The little girls urged their horses over fence after fence the enemy in hot pursuit it certainly being a stirring time.

At this moment a shot struck the horse violet was riding and it fell but she jumped before she was thrown to the ground, and Joice quickly helped her onto her own, and the whole party fairly raced for freedom followed by almost a thousand glandelinians and Mo-Hollestinians, and now again Violet and her sisters headed for a fence, which the horses leaped with perfect ease, but the wicked glandelinians were close on their heels, and seeing their peril the little girls stopped momentarily and aiming at the foremost soldiers, but before they could fire these glandelinians wheeled their horses and made a dash for safety. A score of other soldiers made for the same fence uttering their weird devil yell at being pretty far ahead by this time the little girls did not care a bit how loudly the pursuers screamed, and rapidly outdistancing their pursuers taunted them with a handkerchief.

A portion of the glandelinian cavally column had separated to intercept the fugitives and were seen by the children to be advancing from another direction, the little girls fortunately seeing them coming in time, and made for a deep stream they had crossed over to get into the heart of the enemy's lines. Into the roaring waters they plunged to the surprise of the foe laying low on their horses necks to avoid the danger of flying bullets as the foe was again firing incessantly, and Violet looking behind saw the foremost Glandelinians also plunging into the water after them, while a line of others were racing along the opposite banks shouting and yelling to the little girls to stop. On continued the little girls heedless to the shouts of the foe continuing on down the stream their horses submerging as fast as they were able, but nevertheless the glandelinian horsemen seemed to be gaining on them again and the foremost soldier who happened happened to be their old time enemy general pick later ordered the little girls to halt or be shot down and del declaring that it was the last time that he would warn them to do so.

In the meantime violet and her sisters had approached a tree which was now which had a long branch overhanging the stream, and by means of climbing onto it the little girls managed to pull it down, and though receiving a good ducking for their work, they succeeded in barricading the advance of their pursuers, and as the men and horses got entangled in the network of branches the little girls swam after their horses, and dragging them toward the bank remounted and continued on their way. The men were caught fast in the strong twigs and leaves of this palm tree and there was a babel of confusion, and a volume of cursing and swearing, as a score of those on shore had to ride into the stream to the rescue of general Aronburg, Slater and the others, thus making a long delay which caused violet and her sisters and their little boy friends to have a good chance of outdistancing them, and ride to the shore with comparative safety, and then dash off into a woods.

The remainder of the glandelinian pursuers were led by Jorden, and these sturdy Glandelinians continued the chase riding in three directions so as to head off the escape of the fugitives, and violet and her sisters and the little boy companions seeing that they were in danger of being horned in dismounted, hid their horses in the thickest shrubbery, and climbed up to the top of a good sized tree, and hid in the thickest of the foliage.....

In a few minutes each party of Glandelinians met suddenly to the surprise of each other at finding the fugitives gone so unexpectedly and so mysteriously mysteriously even their horses.

"It cannot be denied that they are hiding somewhere in these woods." Said one of the officers to colonel Jorden. "And you know colonel it is manley's orders that they are not to be taken as prisoners but shot down on sight."

"The only way we could root them from their hiding places is to either set fire to the tree tops or the whole forest." Said general O'Donnell, and as he gave the order a score of the best tree climbers skinned up the trees very close to the ones the fugitives were hiding on, and applied lighted torches to the dry leaves in an effort to break up the hiding places of the children and capture or destroy them. Several even started to climb up the trees in which the fugitives were hiding, but violet and her sisters drew their guns, violet herself striking the first man that reached the top a stunning blow on the head, and the rascal fell fully eighty feet to the ground. At this unexpected occurrence the others thinking he only fell quickly decided to descend, the officers and the general rushing up to the one who had fallen.

"Did he fall?" Asked one of the men who was the first to descend. "Yes he did after he was struck on the head with something." Cried the general in a rage. "Men get those little brats. Fire a volley into that tree and kill them curd outright." "

"Twenty soldiers aimed upwards and let loose a simultaneous volley and the little girls and boys feeling the wind of the bullets, and hearing the whistling, and seeing the leaves drop like snow, and that the furious flames from the burning tree tops was catching the foliage of their hiding places clambered like monkeys to a tree opposite, and descended as cautiously as they knew how taking advantage of the thick clouds of smoke to that hid them, and reaching the ground, they stole silently and carefully to where they had left their horses, which they easily found, and mounting them quickly dashed off just as several of the Glandelinians saw them, and who ran after them, and then stopped and fired several times bringing down two horses.

Quickly Jennie and Gertrude were helped onto the horses of violet and Joice and off they went again, then some more shots were fired, and Jennie and Joice felt a stinging sensation in their right arms, but regardless of the wounds they continued on.

"After those little devils." Yelled O'Donnell in a maddened rage at having been outwitted this way. "They are escaping, getting away you men. What are you standing gaping like that for. FIRE!"

Half a hundred of the men were remounting their horses, while a score of others pursued on foot for a slight distance and opened volley and were satisfied at seeing all the remaining horses go down in a heap with all under near underneath as it seemed. The little girls however managed to free themselves, and the boys also and plunged out of sight of the wicked glandelinians into a thick line of brush wood. To the Glandelinians they had again mysteriously disappeared and they were as flabbergasted as any man would be at witnessing the greatest freak on record.

"Why don't some of you men relight your torches and set the brushwood on fire?" Cried O'Donnell. "Are you asleep. If so sleep where I can see you do it."

"But it is no use" Said some of the under officers. "They are surely not hiding up in that brushwood."

"I said set--"

All of a sudden one of the men interrupted; "There they go yonder across a bridge and clear toward general Manley's main headquarters to the east."

At once those already on their horses raced after them, while those dismounted leaped on their saddles and followed after them. Finally they divided into two parties one going westward, and the other southeastward, so as to cut them off from escape before they even reached the bridge. However the movement was more completely successful than expected, but before they could get near enough to open fire upon the fugitives apparently at a loss of what to do at finding themselves trapped on the bridge, the little girls urged their horses over the railing and into the water below, and then hid in the darkness as of the bridge house underneath. General O'Donnell was more so furious than ever before, for this was the fourth time that the child fugitives had so cleverly outwitted him and his soldiers, and being outwitted in this manner by mere striplings as he called them was tantalizing in the extreme. Part of one of the parties went back swiftly, and even their horses under the bridge with the intention of searching for the fugitives

While the remainder swarmed along the two opposite shores of the river, he remained to guard the bridge.

"Those kids who ever they are must be caught and slain at all hazards." Said O-pennell. Before those yivian brats used to spy alone and now they bring more to make it worse for us. "I don't know who those other kids are who are with them but by heck they are the most desperate beings probably just as bad as the yivian girls and may cause just as much harm to our armies. They must be caught at all hazards." About a score of the Gargolians on horseback waded carefully and cautiously under the bridge and started a diligent search, but could not find the little girls, or those with them at all. As they waded far beyond, the little girls saw a chance unseen before to slip away without being observed and so leaving the hiding place plunged into the water once more, and swam to the shore, dodging in a thicket, just as a glandelinian saw them and fired. Some of the glandelinian officers saw them also, and brought the place to be continued though already their horses were badly jaded by so much wild running.

"It seems possible that those glandelinians are bound to get us no matter how much time it takes." Said Jennie. "We are in great peril indeed and in the first place we ought to have avoided contact with the Ho-Hollentinians and not let them see and surprise us as they did, for when those rascals set upon an intention to do a wicked thing, they never give up unless they are compelled to do so by tremendous odds against them. We'll have to do something desperate before long or we'll never have the chance of paying Manley another visit."

"I see a flower field yonder and a couple of bee hives." Said Violet. "We could throw those hives at the enemy, and the confusion caused by the bees would enable us to escape them."

They reached the hives in no time and as soon as the foe came near enough the little girls throwing their hats low down over their heads, and stuffing something down the backs of their necks, grasped the hives and threw them right into the midst of the glandelinians. If I was to die I could not do other the rout. You would only realize it by witnessing it in person. Some of the glandelinians dove into a creek, others ran and tripped one another in the confusion, and the remainder did all they could do to beat off the bees with their coats. Violet and her sisters had been stung slightly by some of the bees, having been pursued for a great distance by a small swarm.

Despite the fact that the enemy had pursued the little girls so relentlessly, Violet and her sisters had reached general Hanley's headquarters, and entered by one of the rear doors unobserved by any one. They lodged themselves in one of the spare rooms unobserved by any one, but had to wait fully a whole hour before any one showed up. It was general Hanley alone, no one being with him, but nevertheless he appeared to have a fierce growl on about something, for his eyes flashed, and his fists were clenched.

Suddenly one of the privates entered and saluted.

"Have you found those little brats yet?" Asked Manley. He had heard of the entrance of the yivian girls into his lines and of the way they had eluded their pursuers despite all the desperate attempts to capture or shoot them down outright, and thus his reason of being in such an ugly humor.

"No your excellency they have not taken them." Answered the soldier sullenly. "The men have tried with the fury of desperation to kill them even but in the end the little girls even turn a hive of bees loose among us. It's tantalizing, and we won't stand it your excellency any longer. If something ain't done to cause the destruction of these little snakes the whole army will rebel against you. They are murmuring about it now."

"That is just what I feared." Said general Manley. "But there seems no way to catch those devilish children called the yivian girls. It's enough to make any one commit suicide. But how dare they rebel when they are conscious it's their own fault by not catching the little fiends."

"Well they say it's your own fault your excellency."

"How dare they use such words against me! My fault! I've offered every reward known and possible for the destruction of those little gutter-snipes and they do not try to obtain it. I've placed the rewards in thick red letters all over throughout Galverinia and Amelinia during our own invasion of that country and now they blame me because the children spy on us. But then poor fellows I pity them and cannot blame them if they did rebel. It's really John Hanley's fault, for he blundered by being their enemy after what they did for him during his quarrel with Hanson and have thus made them his enemies one less that we all dread. It's up to general John Hanley to catch them and not I. I also thought they would not dare say on us since they know they were in the country of dangerous enemies but I have been foolishly mistaken as they have proved themselves. I always hated those yivian girls, and cannot describe how I hate them now. I'd give my soul for their destruction itself. And I mean it too."

After a few more words the soldier left and general Manley was left alone. He seated himself at the very table under which the children were hiding, and knowing now that it was impossible to hide themselves any longer and that they would surely be discovered, the little girls suddenly revealed themselves. Joice of course looking the door as the key was in it at the time Manley was so flabbergasted at their appearance that at first he could not utter a word, but losing his temper suddenly he drew his gun and tried to shoot the little girls down, but they being prepared for just the very thing, had taken every advantage of protection in the room, and after returning a fusillade of shots without however harming Manley as he stood behind a thick stone pillar, the little girls managed to escape from the room and dash away, Manley bursting open the door to let in those who were pounding madly, in desperate attempts to get in and see what the row was about.

Manley told in the briefest words possible what happened and ordered a pursuit. Fortunately for Violet and her sisters this headquarters of general Manley happened to be on the outskirts of the glandelinian camp, and though being pursued wildly than ever before in their lives by the glandelinian cavalry soldiers, they luckily ran into a squadron of byzantinian dragoons who made a sudden frantic dash upon her the pursuers, and in the clash cut down forty glandelinians and routed the others like frightened sheep. Again Violet and her sisters had accomplished a great spying exploit at the expense of the glandelinian armies and they made Evans and all the other christian armies all the more proud of them, and they were considered great heroes indeed.

.....THE BATTLE OF GRACE-DE-LINDA.....

In the meantime Germaine yivian was confronted by the great glandelinian armies under general Morgan Sturgeon, at the town of grace-de-linda or along a stream of a wat or called the Jorinda jorindel Run. Germaine had finally wished to avoid an engagement with the enemy, and had tried many various and desperate means to force his way past them, but in vain, and during the time Evans was waging the battle of Yezzeno Run, Germaine felt heavy assaults along his own lines and finally was forced in two days hard fighting, and a good portion of his army cut to pieces, and routed for the distance of twenty eight miles. Fortunately for him his second division of the army had not as yet been engaged, and when the battle was renewed on the third day, all the desperate efforts of the enemy was not successful and they had been forced to retreat back to their own works. The battle was resumed the next day with redoubled fury, but nevertheless the enemy could not break any part of the christian line, though they managed to hurl the left wing across the river, and in the afternoon Germaine yivian was able to crush the main line of assailants, and then move forward to the attack himself, and captured a quarter of the glandelinian army, cut the remainder of the glandelinian army up to pieces, and scattered it to a distance of a hundred miles, capturing all the military stores, the town itself, with all the fortifications, and every piece of artillery, and 10,000,000 small arms..... It was a great victory for Germaine yivian and made general Evans marvel when he learned of it, and he sent a note by wireless to Germaine yivian, praising him for his success, and advising him to keep it up, and that soon his own armies will be hurling assaults against the foe at Fountain Of-Perene De la Crece.....

Violet and her sisters enjoyed the good news of this great victory won by one of their good brothers, but they felt very bad about the fact that it was so long ago that they had last seen either one. They had prayed for their safety day after day, and indeed God was hearing their prayers, for neither brother had fallen in the battles since the frightful carnage at Jorinda or Aronburgs Run. In the meantime it was rumored that a great army of glandelinians was advancing under general Ah Amble-Wad to reinforce general Manley, and Evans realizing more reinforcements which had been advancing swiftly toward him lines decided to beat Manley once again, but Manley was willing to leave off fighting for a while and so withdrew completely leaving the new glandelinian army twice as strong to oppose Evans.

It was during a halt against the glandolinians under Ah Annie told that Violet and her sisters and a shocking experience, which though they proved that they could save any one they loved no matter how great the odds. That night while Violet and her sisters were in the dining room along with William and Francis, then gray coated glandolinians who had stolen into the christina lines unobserved sprang into the room with fierce and devilish blasphe mies. The vivian girls were giving Francis their Geril when these rascally glandolinians entered. They stopped sniffed the breakfast with relish then observed the children, Francis and William alone being paralyzed with fright.

Frozen with amazement and astonishment Violet and her sisters stared at the rascals but was instantly aroused to action when two of the Huanan monsters rushed forward and graps grasped or jerked Francis towards them with a brutal grin and a savage curse. Leaping from their seat at the table the Vivian girls drew their weapons and went to the rescue of little Francis and shot down the rascals, but was charged upon by the remainder of the brutes and hurled across the room. At the same moment Gertrude Angelina struck the angl ankle of the other man grasping the child, but with a fierce oath he seized Gertrude by the collar and with an easy backwards gesture threw the little girl clear out of the window. Fortunately the distance go to the ground was only three feet or she would have feet injured by the fall. Inspired by their love for little Francis and William, and forgetful of their own danger for the rascals were Ho-Mollet Indians, the little girls tackled the brutes, Joice and Jennie attacking the man who was shocking Francis.

At first their clinched hands flittered frantically like a humming birds before the rascals eyes, but after beating at the rascals hardened chest, and straining to loosen his grasp on poor William, Joice shot him dead. Just what purpose the men had in mind of attacking her and not William or her and her sisters was not clear, but their attention was fixed upon the child, and the attack of the vivian girls gave them no concern whatever, for another of the rascals hands circled the throat of the little one and strangled her terribly, while Lil/ William screamed piteously. Violet shot this rascal also down and as Francis dropped to the floor Violet seized her in her arms and looked toward William, but the remaining rascals sensed the meaning of her glance, and seizing William around the neck threw the little girl across the room and was about to run her through with his bayonet when Jennie shot him dead. Joice darted to where William lay and then both children were pushed into a closet, locked the door and then Violet and her sisters in leading Gertrude who came in again stood defiantly before that door with leveled doors daring the glandolinians to charge them.

"Get away from that door roared the leader. "We want that little girl and are going to get her. "And we want you too."

"Come and take us if you dare." Cried Jennie. "There are only six of you rascals left and there are eight of us."

The men however rushed the little girls with wild fury, but all were shot and mortally wounded, just as Evans and a number of his officers having a been aroused by the shot sound of pistol shots, and the shouting and cursing, and children screaming burst in to the room.

Evans under stood the situation at once. The glandolinian soldiers who were found only slightly wounded, were taken prisoner and those already dead were thrown out of the window with little ceremony.

After Evans tried to force the confession out of the rascals not badly wounded, but no matter what was said, promised, or threatened they would not give the reason of their attack on Francis and William.

"Well then I'll confess that I'm sorry for you foolish glandolinians." Said Evans. "You are in the hands of the Abyssinikilians and not Abbeonians or Angelinians, and you ought to know the penalty these kind of soldiers impose on those who attempt to harm children. They punished me that they would let it go at that if you confessed the reason of your attack on the children, but as you won't do so I cannot save you from their wrath. Tell me and I'm wise, or they'll even burst in on me, and kill you like dogs. There is a roaring mob of them outside now."

At first the glandolinians believed that general Evans was only saying this to compel them to confess and still refused. Evans saw that they doubted him and said:

"You are greatly mistaken if you think I'm lying to you, and I'm a Christian as I'm trying to be. If you don't believe me just look out of this window!"

The men obeyed and were startled at what they saw. There was before the house a multitude of frenzied redcoats with high long hats about in the shape of those worn by the Pope or bishops. They were the dreaded Abyssinikilians and they were besieging the hos house, and already impatient a mob of them was swarming furiously up the steps with the intentions of already breaking in.

"I won't be able to hold them much longer." Said Evans. "They think you make the attack on the vivian girls instead and are going to lynch you without more unless you confess the reason. They won't wait a another minute."

"We were sent by general Ah Annie to kill the little girl called Francis Schmidt." Said one of them. "We really truly intended no harm on the other children as we were not so married to do so. She is wanted as a runaway child slave, and Stanley himself was bound to have her. It's the truth your excellency."

"And the vivian girls showed you what they were made of." Said Evans with a grin. "They overpowered all of you yourselves, though one of you threw Gertrude out of the window as she told me. I'll report to the enraged enraged gallowinians that you confessed."

"They have confessed." Said Evans as he opened the outside door so if you will let them alone it will be as you say. But if you think they are worthy of hanging why of course do it. It was their intention of stealing Francis Schmidt who was a runaway child slave as they claimed, but who was rescued from slavery by myself."

A murmur of assent came from the throng somewhat cooled down now.

"We thought the rascals attacked the vivian girls." Shouted one of them hoarsely.

"The little girls fought for her." Said Evans. "That is the cause of the shooting you heard."

The mob of soldiers gradually and suddenly dispersed and the glandolinian and glandolinians felt relieved. They however were taken off to the prison camp under a strong escort to be later brought before the court Marshall and tried.....

THE BATTLE OF MEDDA ZIBERMANNA...

In the meantime Jimmie Vivian in advancing in a southeast course with the intent intention to try and gain ahead of Evans in his advance toward Fu Fontain of r Porene De la Greece was opposed by the glandolinians under general Zee Res Becklinia Zibermann, Bernard Zibermann, and Zibermann Stanck three armies opposed against Jimmie and still overwhelmed by the a distance..... Bernard Zibermann opposed general Jimmie Vivian right grand division at Medda Zibermann, and after some of the most sanguinary fighting of that part of the christian invasion was thrown back with the complete destruction of that portion of the glandolinian army, and with the death of Zibermann.

Jimmie Vivian then forced himself across the pursuit and Harper Junction and made a fearful onslaught against the glandolinian forces under Becklinia, but it took five hours to force the foe from the position and not without the most fearful loss. Twice the foe had made terrific onslaughts, ten times had swept forward against the christian lines in roaring counter charges, only to be wiped out, but finally this army gave way in confusion and Jimmie Vivian at night took possession of the city.

Zibermann Stanck's army did not arrive in time to take part in the battle that day but he arrived with his forces in the night, and then early in the morning with redoubled fury resumed the battle and a most sanguinary conflict raged all a long the time for the whole live long day and charges were numbered by the three hundred on both sides. The glandolinians however were worsted on this day also, and Jimmie Vivian found his advance unimpeded to his good luck.

Evans later heard of his good luck and urged him on in his race. Corlette True simultaneously clashed with the enemy during the frightful battle of Yimo Childrens Gule and this battle raged with greater violence than even Medda Zibermann. He had learn learned of King Cannons failure to advance to the aid of Hanson and so had endeavored to advance to Cannons aid and also send a large portion of his army to aid general Hanson at Priete too station.

He, Glandelinian army who stepped in his way to oppose him was under general Heller Johnston. Heller Johnston had been moving northward to reinforce Manley at Bristol Station and hearing of the advance of Everette True had changed his course and came upon his army just at the junction of the Easter Starring and Mc-Hollister and Pandora Railroad, near the town of Mine Childrens Gulch. At first he had hesitated in attacking Everette True for his army were all Abbeianians and conscientious the worse of all the Christian soldiers, and not only that but the Christian army was five to his one.

THE PART OF THE EVERETTE TRUE.....

It was soon to be found out by the Glandelinian generals however that this Abbeianian general was a different fighter, than any other Christian general known. He was no fighter, oh no. Heller Johnston made his great mistake by delaying too long in waiting for reinforcements which had been promised him. Ever True as Everette True was called did not believe to be attacked first, always having the opinion of who strikes first strikes to win. Seeing that the armies under Mc-Hollister was delayed in its advance the Heller Johnston did strike a sudden blow on the eighteenth of June. The battle raged desperately for two days in series upon series of savage encounters here and there, but gradually the whole Glandelinian army under Johnston was cut to pieces, and routed, and rolled co, completely from the field.

It was a surprising defeat for the Glandelinians at that but at this critical moment the armies under Aberdeen Mc-Hollister arrived, and his army was equal to that of Everette True. The next day the third the battle was renewed with greater determination, ten times Everettes right and left was rolled up from the field, his center broken once, and as many times did he recover all the lost ground during the early part of the third day of the great contest many attempts were made by the Abbeianians to take the enemy's works, and though successful, the enemy had counter charged so fiercely and with such almost desperate determination that they recovered every position taken and rolled the Abbeianians back crushed and mangled with their fallen lying in monstrous heaps.

In the afternoon after a fearful artillery duel of three hours in which three hundred thousand cannon roared and thundered in tremendous salvos of broadsides, the whole Abbeianian line with clouds of skirmishers in front swept over the whole plain under the deadliest Glandelinian artillery fire which tore their lines through and through, and as rolled the Glandelinian positions with such violence and violent fury that they tore the enemy's lines to pieces in turn, rolled them from the field and then as the enemy rallied again and again, fought back twenty eight charges with might and main within an hours time.

Fearful was the struggle indeed, and the losses were fearful but nevertheless the enemy held their ground until night fell and then retired in order, but in the noise in the early afternoon Mc-Hollister had been mortally wounded, and the army was practically without a leader. It was also a dead deadly tough victory for Everette True, and despite it being a Christian victory, his advance was too slow and finally barred altogether as the two Manleys were hurrying heavy armies to the aid of Heller Johnston and Everette True not wishing for another desperate struggle so soon decided to call it off and halted his armies to rest.

It was truly evident that the enemy was resisting the invasion with great fury indeed, showing themselves to be heroes wicked as they were, and giving the Christians great opposition every step of the way.

Evans army itself continued its advance day after day the enemy under general Ah Annie-Wadd retreating slowly before him. But as the Christians reached the town of Blander the those going through saw that the retreating enemy had massacred all the child slaves, for they were found lying in the streets brutally mutilated.

The air of the abandoned town smelted of death and the scene was frightful horrible. The number of children slain was about 70,000

1,000 of whom were boys and the rest girls. Violet and her sisters had been with these soldiers who were going through this town, and saw on a curb on which lay a little naked shapeless heap, and they horrified looked down on the face of a little girl. She was not more than five years of age, there being a glimpse of white beneath the long curving lashes in of her still white lips.

A curl of soft brown hair lay over her cheek half hiding a wicked cut, and except for the fact that the face was untouched and calm.

"It will do those wicked Glandelinian assassins good to have some of their own little girls butchered this way." Said one of the Abbeianian soldiers who saw the sight. "The man who killed her must have wanted to study on her interior Christian children it seems never have a chance to live during this damn war."

Violet and her sisters had recoiled covering her eyes staggering back half fainting at the sight.

"We can't stand it." They cried. "She's like my own little girl friends. who we have loved so dearly and lost."

The little body indeed was twisted and mangled a gaping cut almost a foot wide exposing everything inside the child ran from shoulder to navel one small round leg had been crushed almost into a pulp from knee to foot and her arm was torn and blood covered.

"That ain't what human beings do." Said another Abbeianian with a curse. "It's the deed of fiends in human form." "If it did not horrify us we would and could have been mean enough to do the same to their kids."

In utter silence the white faced shaking African girls forced themselves away from the horrible sight. The rear guard of the soldiers set fire to the town and some Abbeianian was heard to cry:

"BEFORE AN EIGHTY GOD, MAY THE BLOOD OF INNOCENT CHILDREN DURING THIS WAR BE UPON GANDALINA AND HER PEOPLE."

News of this slaughter had been spread to other armies, and soon devastation and destruction was continued with redoubled fury. On many occasions hundreds of thousands of Glandelinian prisoners were ruthlessly massacred by the enraged Abyssinkilians, and even by Abbeianians, but no such occurrence happened however in Evans army, though he did not make any degree to prevent it.

During the advance a part of Ah Annie-Wadd's army along the right was cut off by a large force of Abyssinkilians, who suddenly fell upon them with great slaughter, and carried many off as prisoners routing the survivors like frightened sheep. Later as the advance was halted for a day near the town of Ah Aberdeen there was suddenly upon the air a series of loud shrieks from a childish voices, and full upon the Christian guards ran a swarm of frightened children, many injured and bleeding from cuts of all sorts and pursued in full fury by a swarm of Mc-Hollisterians whose swords was dropping blood. The guards raised the alarm, the Abyssinkilians gathered, fell upon the Glandelinians and shot and cut down every one of them without mercy. Realizing now that the enemy was murdering all the child slaves for either revenge because of the Christian success or because because they were apprehensive, or because they did not want the children to be rescued Evans reported the matter by wireless to Hanson stating thus:

The foe are murdering all the child slaves they have in their possession. It is horrible but I'm bound to have it stopped at all cost."

EVANS.

Evans during halts investigated the serious situation and Violet and her sisters spying on the enemy once more learned the real crime and reported to Evans.

"They are bound to show you and all the Christian generals that you and they will never save the children or bring their freedom." Said Violet "That is the reason they are committing the horrible massacres."

"I'll stop it or I'll know the reason why." Evans answered boy and knowledge answered furiously. "And damn them old devils in human form I'll prove it too."

He wrote this to general Ah Annie Wadd:

"Your excellency you are I am doing the good work of annihilating all the child slaves in your path and encouraging the other armies to do so to frustrate us in our endeavors to rescue them or set them free. Well I appreciate it very much, and will reward you handsomely. If any more children do this will be the reward. I have in my army over 14,000,000 soldiers and officers of Glandelinian prisoners of war, one eight of whom are spies.

"Now, there are about eighteen great generals and forty-three other high officers. We'll massacre any more children as you have been doing. I'll tell you fair and square that it won't take me long to decide to set my prisoners free. If you valuable the soldiers of Glandelinia. So are prisoners in my hands and do not wish them to be assassinated in return stop massacring children. This is the last warning. I'll not warn again."

GENERAL EVANS."

At first Ah Annie Wad did not believe that Evans meant what he said but then he had heard of the massacres of glandelinian officers and soldiers committed by other Abbieannian armies over this massacre of children, and as all his officers warned him to be careful, that Evans would not only keep his word but might do even worse, Ah Annie Wad stopped the massacres of the children but millions were carried off further to be out of way of rescue.

Evans pressed on in his advance, the enemy steadily retreating, and not offering to do battle as Evans was expecting. It was also reported that the glandelinian army at Fountain Of Perene De La Grecco already numbered about 234,567,000, and Evans learning of this decided to force Ah Annie Wad back at all hazards, sweep him aside and try and make a race around so as to oppose any more armies moving there. It was his purpose to get down ahead of other retreating armies, before they got there, cut them off by fierce opposition, and so prevent the army at Fountain Of Perene De La Grecco becoming so large that no army could be mustered in time to force the position.

So under cover of a dark stormy night Evans set his armies in motion and notifying general Vivian of his intentions advised him to do all he possibly could on the same line and to follow him as quickly as possible.

Ah Annie Wad seeing Evans despite the feint he was making doing this suspicious action retreated hastily to the southern bank of the great Easter Starring, and then learning the purpose of general Evans Evans extended his army in such a way as to frustrate any attempt of Evans to get around Ah General Vivian himself was simultaneously checked at the northern bend of the same great river by an overwhelming force of glandelinians under general Ben Logan. Evans was enraged at this being frustrated so cleverly by such a dauntless enemy of god and all the saints, and felt so humiliated, humiliated and mortified that he acted like a man about to kill every body that got in his way. Again Evans plans had been frustrated, and he blasphemed the devil and all his angels and defied them all to come out and help the glandelinians fight him single handed. Evans had heard a lot of this glandelinian general who though having a queer and funny name was as wicked as a hellish fiend and a hellish child butcher, and who deserved to be slain for the hundreds of thousands of frightful sacrilegious sacrilegious he had committed during his service in the glandelinian rank. And Ah Annie Wad the man who had murdered his father and mother and sister, and Evans thirsted for revenge.

To think of being humiliated, humiliated and mortified by a man who had murdered all he loved so dearly, by being checked in this manner was maddening, and Evans was filled with the desperation of despair. Get to the region of Fountain Of Perene De La Grecco he must before the foe armies gather there too strong, and get there he will if he had to wring from heaven the host of angels to help him. He tried many various maneuvers to get around the rascals army, and while out reconnoitering with Violet and her sisters was fired on by the foe's batteries and all were dismounted and scratched and bruised though it was a wonder they were not all killed. Evans was still for intensified with his mortified feelings, at seeing his dearest friends thus mortified, but in their presence he said nothing.

That night he held a council, and after informing of his officers of his intentions to get there at all costs Roswell master Johnston bringing his fist down violently on the table said:

"Damn it we can do it easily enough. He don't dare attack us because he is overwhelmed ten to one. If we keep on letting that devil outgeneral us we'll never get by. Crush the sneaking child assassin's rank and we'll get by. I'm for battle not demonstrations and maneuvers. They do no good."

Violet and her sisters who were in the same room though taking no part in the council was in favor of Roswell's decision, and so were most of all the officers themselves including Underline and some others.

Evans in the morning commenced to the disgust of his generals more concealing demonstrations and demonstrations, which made the enemy work their armies as before, and the christian generals began to think that Evans was wrong in the head to act this way time and again, but at ten o'clock that morning he changed his tactic.

FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE AT SOUTH BEID.

Increasing the threatening formations of his demonstrations and maneuvers, Evans had brought unseen by the foe a large army around the rear of Ah-Annie Wad's whole line, and at Eleven-O-Clock, struck such a mighty blow that for four hours the whole left wing of the enemy was demoralized and panic stricken and when later in the evening Evans withdrew from this maneuver he brought back with him 10,000,000 prisoners, two of whom were generals Pemberton, and Pictoral. He inflicted a loss on the enemy in killed and wounded amounting to nearly three million in that bloody sortie.

During the rest of the time all was quiet and nothing occurred for a while. Evans was for assailing the enemy right on the morrow and not wait for another week as many of his officers had decided, but Violet and her sisters did not think it wise just then to do so. During daylight however the enemy also made some sorties, and surprised a portion of the christian center and fairly captured general Evans headquarters.

Fortunately he over the christian generals and violet and her sisters escaped before the enemy came, having observed the approach of the gray wave in the nick of time. New christian forces however concentrated heavily upon the glandelinians and after some fierce fighting of an hours duration drove the enemy back with considerable loss. Many prisoners were taken by the Abbieannians who threatened to massacre the glandelinians for their rash attempt, but Evans managed to restrain them though it was difficult work. Violet and her sisters were indeed surprised at the nerve of Ah-Annie Wad's glandelinians and believed that it was the forerunner of some great attack that was threatening. In the excitement the little girls had fled from the building with their nighties on, and so had their other little friends there hardly being time to put anything on.

They had been aroused from their sleep by a wild fusillade of firing seemingly in every direction and having gotten out of bed ran to the window and had seen the glandelinians surging forward toward the building just in time to arouse General Evans and the others, and all had escaped from the building before any of them were captured. The enemy however had obtained some valuable reports, and the main field dress uniform belonging to general Evans and many other supplies that the glandelinian officers themselves were in great need of.

After the excitement was over Evans and the others including the children returned to the building, which though set on fire was saved in time by the army fire department which had arrived on the scene just after the repulse of the assailants. At other points of the christian lines came reports of many sorties made by the enemy, but as yet there had been no general attack, and it was believed that the enemy were taking revenge for the blow Evans had struck them on the left flank early that day.

The sortie however in which the glandelinians had captured Evans headquarters was the fiercest, and had resulted in heavy losses for both sides.

During the remainder of the night many of the sentries observed suspicious lig lights, and movements among the distant lines of the enemy and sounded warnings now and then but nothing unusual happened though sorties were reported every now and then, and Evans expecting that another would occur in the region of his headquarters told the vivian girls not to go to sleep any more if they valued their lives.

At times the enemy was reported to be advancing, and then to be moving around the christian left, but such reports could not be confirmed though the sentries kept a strict watch nevertheless, and sounded the alarm at the slightest sign of a suspicious sound or movement anywhere on their beat. Violet and her sisters had dressed themselves, and so had the other children, and then they went outside to join the excited throngs of soldiers outside. Violet and her sisters wished to go and see some of the picket lines, but many of the under officers warned the children not to do so for it was dangerous and so violet and her sisters did not.

Scattered violet and her sisters would be surprised by hearing sudden volleys of scattered shots, which would last fifteen minutes and then slacken and all then would be quiet again, except the excited voices of soldiers and officers here and there. Finally toward three o'clock that night Evans came out of the house, and said to violet and her sisters!!!!

"I just received reports that general Evans' army is also checked at the North Bend of the Easter Starring river, by a large force of the enemy under general Ben Logan, and that he is checked just as completely as I am."

"I told him that I was checked too but I'm going to force my way past it all cost, and told him to do so too."

"I believe it is right," said violet. "And as these soldiers are all excited over the sorties made by the enemy to night I and my sisters think it would be best to force our way through the enemy's lines instead this morning itself, and show general Ah Amide-Wad that we will go just where we please."

"I think it is the best plan also," said Evans.

Toward daybreak Evans prepared his divisions for more maneuvers not saying to his officers what his intentions really was, and they thought Evans was going to make another sortie on the enemy's rear. Of course the same movement which had been expected by his officers was repeated, and all too much to the surprise of the enemy, which again drove them into confusion, but this time instead of withdrawing his forces as he did the day before, he concentrated to the front and threw a tremendous and a wild hail storm of attack upon the whole glandelinian center, covering it with a pounding artillery and hurricane storm of fire which demoralized the enemy beyond description.

While this was being done Evans moved a other forces of his around to the left of the river South Bend and struck the enemy's right wing a terrific blow at Twelve O-Clock. The enemy were surprised at the suddenness and wild violence of the great attack, and as they their wings were cut to pieces and mangled, the glandelinian generals had to withdraw. Ah-Amide-Wad's extreme right division was outflanked, and rolled up in great panic and disorder, and the main line withdrew across the river toward night fall, and though hurling a good portion of Evans' army across the river, general Memie Zimmerman's division of 11,000, 897 Gargolians were caught in an ambush at the crossing of the Bantushy and Sorden railroad lines and three quarters of the divisions not shot down were taken prisoners.

Though Evans' army had been driven across the river he had at least succeeded in driving the foe out of their position, just what he wanted, and as the glandelinian army still stood defiance and disadvised he decided to reform his armies and resume the struggle as quick as possible.

At two thirty Evans resumed the attack at all quarters of the line, and again the struggle raged and waxed fast and furious. Amid a dreadful storm of carnage that broke out all along the line the glandelinian general Henderson, Handamdon, Henderson, Hanson Gish, Handon Jennings, Henry Johnstonin, Hindale St. Clare, Hindlerd James, Hindalsand, Hindale, Hoo-Hoo, Handon, Hentaine, Hellingor, Hellington, Hemlin, Hemberton, Hantoria, Hemberton, Heldon, and Memie Picknell, drew from the main right wing of the glandelinian army forty eight monstrous divisions and with tenfold fury hurled these in as many bloody and successive assaults against the attacking christian line, and as the fury of the battle became devastating, and the losses terrific, and as officers fell in wholesale numbers on both sides, they saw their four strong forty four eight divisions sent back in a flying repulse a dismal remnants of what had been monstrous columns.

They had however seriously broken and weakened a good portion of the Abbie anian line, but Evans had learned of this beforehand and sent in large divisions to take the places of the weakened divisions and they with their tattered colors left that wild inferno and strewn a broken and bleeding mass of humanity to the rear. All of Evans' batteries of cannons were roaring in a heinous manner making an ear-splitting clamor that shocked even the vivian girls, and the whole region was being torn by the terrible firing that was waged on both sides.

These twenty glandelinian generals were not discouraged at such heavy losses that they suffered, and again attempted with night and main to break the christian line, but again were repulsed and Memie Picknell fell mortally wounded. Evans kept up the fearful assaults upon the enemy's lines all day long but at first could make no impression though he inflicted heavier losses upon the enemy than he received himself.

Harrison Kauffmann tried to flank the right wing of Evans' army during the lull that followed in the evening but if in a desperate melee lasting four hours he was repulsed, and he himself slain.

During the night Evans straightened out his lines, and made preparations to re-see the struggle, while the enemy generals were doing likewise.

Millions more of the glandelinians were approaching to the aid of the wicked glandelinian general, and it seemed evident that Evans would never be able to push his way across the river at all. But he was not daunted, and when morning came he started fiercer attacks on the enemy's lines, and hurled back all the counter charges that his divisions received.

While the battle was on in full sway again violet and her sisters had taken up their position, on a high hill to watch the battle at a distance and actually saw a large force of the enemy moving around Evans' flank, or any way it was a large force of men who wore a strange gray uniform. But instead of attacking the christian rear as they had expected, and which it would have been too late for them to tell Evans about, the new stream of troops poured on across the river to the extreme south, and making a long detour, came descending down upon the enemy's rear like a roaring cyclone pushing a wild inferno of fire and smoke before it.

The glandelinian army was driven into confusion by this unexpected attack made by the Calvinians, and Evans taking advantage of it, pressed forward to make a general assault, the whole christian line was called upon and soon all were pressing forward, and after resisting desperately for four more hours the enemy broke ranks and fled, and Evans' army ordered army. In a two days battle Evans had again crushed a large glandelinian army to fragments, was still ahead of all the other christian armies and was gaining more and more. Now fortunately for Evans there was no other retreating glandelinian army to oppose him and so Evans at once started a swift rush, and toward a week and had come within sight of the city of Fountain of Perene De la Grèce, and viewed from high hills the whole vast glandelinian army. After pulling through inconceivable difficulties, and being opposed step by step, and being forced to fight many desperate and bloody battles Evans had with his army reached Fountain of Perene De la Grèce first, and was now able to make maneuvers to oppose and hold off all other armies from retreating that way and to hold them until they the christian armies could come to swell his army to the size of that of the enemy now confronting him under general Mc-Hollisterino Heller.

In the meantime general Evans had found himself opposed by armies too great for him to contend with just now and had waited just as long as Evans had before being able to start a battle.

THE BATTLE OF NORTH BEND.

This battle was which raged simultaneously and lasted just as long as Evans took to fight his out raged along the North Bend of the Easter Starring River and was hereafter called the battle of North Bend. General Evans in moving southward had unexpectedly made a junction with the army under Everette True and now he overwhelmed Ben Logan's Mc-Hollisterino army.

General Evans had made the same demonstrations and maneuvers that Evans had until Everette True's army had arrived. Everette True had that morning after his arrival endeavored to push on not knowing of the enemy's presence and of general Evans' failure to advance, as general Evans had not told him of the presence of the enemy quick enough not having had the chance to do so. So Everette True came upon a portion of the enemy's army unexpectedly, was attacked furiously and for a moment thrown off his guard.

He in no time changed the shape of the glandelinian columns entirely wrecking a good portion of that part of the glandelinian army, and then notifying general Evans of the state of affairs going on pushed forward without orders, and cut the whole army to pieces that was opposed to him, capturing 10,000 guns of a series of batteries, ten headquarters headquarters held by the highest generals, and millions of prisoners besides a good quantity of ammunition, and provisions. He went so far as to be able to get way around the enemy's rear, which he wrecked so badly that the foe was in confusion, could not stand before his crushing assault and retreated in such wild confusion that he carried all before him, tore the enemy's whole army to pieces, and routed the survivors before general Evans had a chance to be engaged. At this time another glandelinian army under general Maldon Starring was advancing to Ben Logan's aid, Everette True's army was checked and after five hours and a half furious fighting, in which charge followed charge on both sides in endless succession Everette True was able to prove that no foe could daunt or worse him and hurled back the glandelinian army with the most frightful slaughter seen. Night ended this bloody conflict which was only to be renewed in the morning, by both general Avian and Everette True. It was the enemy however who did most of the attacking this time. On this day General Logan's force numbered about 33,500,000 men the majority of these heavy columns being massed upon general Avian's armies, in fearful assaults, along of which there had for the whole entire day been concentrated the heavy fire from 110,000 cannon and these batteries had for hours and hours swept with terrible effects the thickly massed glandelinian assailants in an effort to stop the headlong attack of the wild glandelinian hordes, leagues glandelinians alone making some of the most wildest assaults of the day, having again and again rushed forward across the North bend of the stream to attack and force back the christian lines, but this time and again their columns were torn and mangled by a fearful tornado of shells and hurricanes of musketry and canister.

Simultaneously the glandelinians had succeeded in concentrating all their own guns, but brigade after brigade of the Abbeismians was concentrated upon the crazed assailants, and general Mc-Hollister's Franciscan divisions instead of forming into a single line of defense broke and simultaneously into two big separate columns, enveloped the fore most glandelinian assailants, thus cutting off this part of the force from the main body of assailants and annihilating them all as they would not give up but fought desperately.

Simultaneously still the christian line of Abyssinkilians under Eastman Estrabrook were reestablished across the Easter Starring River and 200,000 glandelinians were taken prisoners.

The fearfulest part of the the glandelinian onslaught was the assault made by general League's forces of Mc-Hollisterians. His biggest columns of Glandelinians swept over the plains and meadows shoulder to shoulder advancing again and again to the general assault, but had their infantry lines been as good as the pounding effects of their storming batteries the glandelinians might have succeeded in breaking the wall whole christian line and hurling them back crushed and mangled, but with an ardour and persistent tenacity that had never been surpassed in battles before the Abbeismians poured in a fearful counter artillery fire tearing wave after wave to pieces and hurling back the survivors, cutting down each succeeding wave, the mighty surges of the foe breaking helplessly to mere remnants against the impassable wall of christians whose guns for fourteen hours fired four hundred thousand shells per hour completely changing the appearance of the country side, crushing the enemy's trenches itself tearing hundreds of thousands of trees and columns of men together to shreds, and barring all efforts to approach by way of the south.

The glandelinians however redoubled their efforts League throwing forward the entire main line to the headlong assault, column after column making a double quick charge and leaping at the first line of christians closing with it in a frightful melee, but the main christian line counter charged with irresistible fury, the clash being frightfully murderous to both sides, but nevertheless the thinned glandelinian columns were not to be denied but went on to the second wing of the Abbeismian line with irresistible violence themselves, while reinforcements were being hurried to their support. The masonic lines wavered west of general Avian's right wing the ardour of the christian counter attack being redoubled with frightful fury while the artillery fire surpassed far any firing of cannon in any battle fought in glandelinian before.

These glandelinian forces were then forced to recoil but League had continued to hurl heavy masses whose attacks was terribly incessant the losses of the enemy being horrible but as fast as whole swarms fell fresh divisions came on but again the foe were driven back leaving hundreds of thousands of dead behind them.

The main and last assault of the battle was fearful. It was an unparalleled attack of the whole invasion. During the attack broken and mangled christian brigades were being withdrawn to the rear these being forced to fall back under the diabolical fire of the enemy's infantry lines. For that whole frightful four hours of battle the whole region was the object of a tearing frightful christian cannon and musketry fire, the air being for all those four hours filled with hundreds of thousands of screaming whistling and exploding shells, and these with the roar of hundreds of thousands of cannon and musketry produced a din that was truly infernal. All these frightful engines of destruction was for four hours concentrated on the assaulting glandelinian columns, and in the midst of this frightful inferno could be seen general League who was sometimes half hidden in smoke, but every time he reappeared he was as tranquil as if nothing had happened, the glandelinian general and his aid continually and frantically urging their men on to the assault. Hundreds of times per hour scores of hundreds of enormous explosions made the earth fly around and behind the christian positions, but their own huge shell fire score huge gaps in the enemy's line, and so fierce was the terrific Abbeismian musketry and cannon fire that it presented this and again a frightful spectacle. Every time the enemy rushed forward in the heaviest columns and every time the christian fire burst out anew, where there had been enormous columns of glandelinians nothing would remain, while barbed wired intanglements and barbed wire had all been cut down or had disappeared under the very earth the exploding shells had thrown on to them. But despite the awful losses the whole main glandelinian army continued the desperate assault in closed formation despite the deluge of shells that burst among their lines and the musketry and canister that galled them so scathingly, but thousands of the front columns were flying to pieces, while myriads of regiments of others covered with earth and blood sought to shelter themselves behind the walls of dead. The first main wave had been wiped out in that fearful inferno of battle there being piles of dead bodies on all sides, and new waves just as monstrous tried desperately to make headway headway against the hurricane and tornado of shell and steel, but incessantly the christian fire cut wide lanes through the glandelinian columns, but more and more glandelinian waves formed more formidable and more furious the glandelinians swarming like demons, the christian fire seeking to throw great arches of flame among the enemy's ranks, fields of bodies time and again obstructing and forming a barricade before the glandelinians who could not make any headway, but the main solid columns still tried to come on loading and loading their rifles without cessation in their answering fire to that of the christian line, hundreds of christian militiamen also entering into the action, and soon it was no longer an army that was charging. It was a few scattered groups of men that could be observed torn by the hurricanes of shells and bullets squeezing close against one another as though for mutual protection. One of the groups disappeared before the explosion of one shell as if they had been swallowed into a maelstrom.

The terrific Abbeismian fire. What horrible havoc it did. Never would the christian officers forget the small fragments of human beings that fell just at their very feet, never could they forget that very picture, the complete annihilation of the main line of glandelinian assault.

So loud had been the cleaver of the christian fire and that of the enemy, mingled with exploding shells, the screaming of shells, and the frightful noise of the yells of the combatants that the whole world had seemed to give way, the air had seemed as if continually all day long been filled with a sheet of flame, while the horrible roar was a fury of thrillions of distinct sounds that almost paralyzed all in its pressure and irresistible force.

The main glandelinian commanders especially Ben Logan did not wish to continue the horrible and bloody struggle any longer. They realized it was useless to try and force back the christian line and so they withdrew their shattered army leaving 10,000,000 dead where they had fallen.

All the time the glandelinian armies had fought the christian invaders with all the superhuman strength that they could ever muster, but in vain, the Abbeismians were not Angolians, neither did they fight like the Angolians did, and these with the Abyssinkilians were continually carrying all before them, winning battle after battle like they did before in the war of Eighteen fourteen one and crushing the foe every time.

Even Evans purpose had succeeded grandly, his army had increased to the strength of 1,845,978,999 to that of the enemy over 200,000,000 and Evans had thrown such opposition in his way that no other glandelinian army had been able to move on Fountain of Perseus De La Gresson a strong and beautiful glandelinian city, with a 1,889,999,999 Fountain there by the same name large enough to cover four square blocks.

CHAPTER EIGHT.

THE VIVIAN GIRLS AT FOUNTAIN OF PIRANO DE LA CHIFFRE.....

THEIR SPIRIT WORK..... A DESPERATE BATTLE.....

.....AND NOW THE MURDER BATTLE BEGINS.....

The big city of Pireno was so delightful to Violet and her sisters in its scenery that they decided to take the chance of making a trip to the place despite the fact that the glandolindians themselves were in possession, and decided not to wait until the christians ever took the place to do so....

They told of their intentions to general Evans, and though he decided himself that it was a good plan, most of the officers believed it a very dangerous undertaking, for should they be discovered or caught they would never escape for the prisons there was like those in the city of Norma (Calvernia,,,). But Violet and her sisters knew how to take care of themselves and told them that they had no intentions of spying on the enemy, just to view the beauty of the city before the cruel Angolindian guns would demolish it.....As soon as it was favorable to do so the little girls started off but soon found to their surprise that to get to the city they must work themselves through the enemy lines. Nevertheless they were not daunted and proceeded on their way. They slipped past the enemy sentries, and being in disguise as Glandolindian boy scouts they managed it easily enough as the army of glandolindian soldiers were strangers to the little girls and all their general officers also and so there was no danger of them being detected with their clever disguises.

They were questioned however by many of the glandolindian boy scouts, but their answers were so satisfactory and clever that the lads suspected nothing, and even gave them passes into the city and passes for the return out. One of the boy scouts recognized the little girls however and it would have been all of with the little girls too without any dispute, but he was a good little boy despite the night he fought for, and told them that he knew who they were, but chided them to be careful in their undertaking whatever it was for to be captured now meant certain death.

The little girls then told them that their intentions was only to view the beauty of the city, and not do any spying exploit unless necessity compelled it. Finally they reached the city and were indeed surprised at its magnificent beauty. Most of all the big public buildings were like palaces of olden times, the streets were well kept and clean and very large. The city itself however was small, every tree was smothered on both sides in beautiful foliage, and so beautiful was the sight that Violet and her sisters decided to ask Evans to try and not demolish the city, as though it was the enemy country they did not like to see it done. After being absent three days the little girls returned without any adventure of any kind and went at once with their plan to Evans.

"It certainly is a beautiful city for I could see its buildings from here with my glasses," said Evans. "But spare it I'm afraid I cannot unless the enemy gives my without a battle. They would even probably destroy it themselves and so what's to be done. I will try to preserve it but the question is will the enemy? No. Rather than allow it to be captured they will destroy like the fools they are...."

It is well known that if the enemy fail to hold the fortified positions here all the fortifications of Titano Fair would be captured without bloodshed for the enemy there then could not hold and it was a win for the christians one of the most sweeping victories of the war little intirely. Titano Fair was east of this beautiful fortified city and so were the hundred fortifications, and there the enemy were anxiously awaiting developments at Fountain of Pireno Of De la Graeco.

Evans was as anxious to end the long and horrible struggle as the enemy was to maintain it and so he was bound to capture the positions in front of him as soon as possible. His armies was not ready for any action as yet, though occasionally he did let open upon the enemy a series of petty artillery bombardments.

Evans finally wished to find out the strength of the enemy and so sent Violet and her sisters to find out if possible. This was more work for the little girls but they enjoyed it and did not flinch. They entered the enemy lines with the same ease as they did before, and readily learned the strength first of the enemy sentries. But for a time they could not obtain any other information and so they went into a big house which proved to be some sort of headquarters of the great generals. Not being known by the enemy they were greeted cordially, and admitted into the room by the generals.

These new glandolindian generals did not recognize Violet and her sisters though they had heard a good deal about them and of what they have done for the christian armies during the entire war. Hanley had warned them this and again telling them of the various ways that the little girls put on their disguises, but these officers still did not know that these very children were before them.

First the generals were conversing among themselves about the showing out come of the war, but anything else of importance however was not heard and finally one of the generals strode up to Violet and handing her a package said:

"I want you little girls as I recognize you are to take this package to general Hanley. And hurry back before evening."

Violet did not say anything but took the offered package, and followed by her sisters went out. They decided to make for a clearing and examine the package but then they felt it was not safe to do so until they were well inside the christian lines and so they continued on until they reached the outskirts of the glandolindian army and passed the sentries.

Two of the sentries stopped them, but the message was there to prove they were sent out by the generals and so they let them go on their way not in the least suspecting that they were indeed Violet and her sisters. They reached the christian lines toward evening and forgetting to look what was in the package, gave it to Evans who examined it.

"Why Violet and your dear sisters," he cried. "If you little girls had not obtained this it would be this coming to morning driven from my position and totally beaten. The glandolindian generals saw a clear way behind my rear and it was a long letter to Hanley asking him to move his army around my flank and crush me before general Vivian would arrive to my assistance. I want you little girls to go to general Vivian and hurry him on while I'll see to it that no enemy surprises my rear. I'll see to that for me."

"Certainly," said Violet. "We'll be glad to go."

Violet and her sisters made their preparations to go and soon as it dark set in started off under a strong moon and on the swift horses. Violet and her sisters had not galloped far when all of a sudden the woods seemed to fairly blaze like a blazing furnace from rocketry fire and all of their horses sank to the ground, and twenty of the soldiers were slightly wounded. Just as soon as they fell and arose to their feet disabled and demoralized there was a rush of feet the sound of clattering muskets and then up flared a score of camp fires.

"Good god," cried a soldier. "We made a mistake."

"The more they," cried another man.

"They are the Vivian girls with a party of soldiers twenty of whom we shot down and wounded. We are sorry dearest of friends but so swift was the horses coming toward us that we thought it was a charge of light cavalry of gaudiness or gaudiness. Were the enemy chasing you?"

"No," said Violet. "We are sent by Evans to find general Vivian who is not far off to hurry him to come and join Evans before the enemy close around the rear. They are going to make a tremendous flanking movement and it is expected that Hanley's army will do it."

"There was no need of sending you little girls," said the officer while the wounded soldiers were being attended to. "You are within general Vivian's lines now. We opened fire because we thought a surprise attack was being made upon our lines. It's a providence of god that we did not kill you."

"There was a thousand of us who opened fire so suddenly," said Violet. "We were galloping our horses fast enough to scare any body," said Violet. "But we did not think general Vivian was so near. Could we not see our papa?"

"Certainly we'll lead the way," said the officer.

After a long distance of traveling they came within sight of a beautiful house and in their own hearts and minds a faced their loving father. General Vivian was glad to see his beautiful daughters and after he had found out their story told him of the enemy's intention and so he got right to work to help general Evans crush the enemy for good and so on for all.....

In a few days general Evans' army numbered about 343,500,000, and about three quarters of these Abhianians Evans decided to mass upon the whole Glandelinian army concentrated at Mountain of Virgo de la Grasse, and the attack of these Abhianian columns were to be supported by the fire of nearly 345,499 cannon of every calibre..... For two days preceding general Evans had with unceasing fury with his five hundred batteries smelt hotly massed at all points of the Christian line the whole region in possession of the enemy in his desperate efforts to prevent the vigorous and abrupt concentration to the left of general John Hanley's armies which had arrived to reinforce those already concentrated before general Evans, who again and again those two bloody days rushed forward making hundreds of violent and most fearful attacks that Evans had ever seen since the war began.

Evans' batteries tormented the enemy lines every time they did rush forward to the attack, and as the Glandelinians had failed to renew the frightful onslaughts added the desolation with canister, which swept their scores of columns to fragments.

The Glandelinians had not been able to concentrate their own batteries in time to give Evans any serious reply and had they done so Evans would never have won this great and glorious victory. As on the second day the assault of the enemy had grown in fury and violence and was like a hurricane lashed sea dashing against a strong iron wall, Evans massed brigades after brigades which in concentrating upon the assailants enveloped all of the furious Glandelinian surges, and cutting off this body from the main force drove it back with great and terrible slaughter, 2,000,000 Glandelinians were taken prisoners and the center of the Christian line once broken was reestablished by reserve forces.

At other points the attack continued with the same frightful violence the Glandelinians having no idea at all of abandoning the attack at a time when success was expected by attacking first, and keeping up their attack and at last their own heaviest artillery was brought up, and pointed the whole battle line of the Abhianians in an endeavor to prepare the way for another general infantry attack, the attackers again advanced to the attack shoulder to shoulder, the infantry lines were about as good as their guns in their desperate assault but the order and tenacity of the whole Abhianian line that had never been surpassed by the Abhianian soldiery before hurled each succeeding wall or wave of gray coats back with frightful losses, but each succeeding wave of Christians in counter charging broke helplessly to pieces, against an invincible wall of Mc-pollestinians whose guns firing seven hundred thousand shells per hour completely changed the aspect of the Abhianian counter attacks into frightful mass waves of troops, tearing hundreds of columns of Abhianians to shreds and sweeping all southward approaches so that the Abhianian advance was barred.

Taking my advantage of confusion that would ensue the Abhianians redoubled their desperate efforts, but again the Glandelinians made a charge that was almost irresistible standing their way across the plains in a double quick charge, and leaping at the first lines of the Abhianians with the most irresistible fury, but nevertheless the thinned Christian lines were not to be daunted but repelled every assault and crushed the second wing of the Glandelinians while reinforcements were being hurried to their support.

Before the resistance of Maurice's position the Glandelinians wavered, the ardor of the counter charge was redoubled by the Christians with tenfold vehemence and again the Abhianian artillery surpassed all intensity in any previous actions since the battle of Gloria, and the Glandelinian forces were forced to retreat again leaving general Planterfords out off and surrounded by the Christ line.

All along the line the Christian fire had raged with unceasing fury but Hanley had brought up still more heavier masses to throw against the Christian line in a fearful assault, and the attacks of these more heavier columns of Glandelinians were made so repeatedly and in such heavy force as to continue the bloodcurdling slaughter with unceasing fury. As the titanic onslaughts continued on, and as the Glandelinian onslaughts were becoming more terrible a portion of Evans' line became broken up but as fast as their men fell fresh forces came up to take their places and while simultaneously a deliberate assault was being delivered on the whole position of Godfrey's divisions, the Glandelinians along his right after a fearful storm of carnage carnage was compelled to withdraw by a overwhelming concentration of Abhianian troops leaving hundreds of thousands of dead and wounded on the battle field. At this moment an attack unparalleled in any battle outside of the three bloodiest ones of the war was made upon the Abhianian lines under general Donald Aronson, but it also had ended in bloody failure, the broken and mangled Glandelinian divisions being forced to fall back crushed and mangled under a most diabolical fire of all of the Christian artillery. Thus ended the second day of the battle and during the night itself the whole region was the object of a most frightful bombardment, the air all night labor filled with hundreds of thousands of various exploding projectiles, and their whistling, and singing, and shrieking and screaming and growling like frightful fiends providing the atmosphere, and explosions, added by the prolonged drum-drum roar of hundreds of thousands of big cannons which fairly shook the earth fiercely enough to level trees and a conglomeration of sounds that was as infernal as the uttermost depths of hell.

In the morning the battle was redoubled once more by a fiercer infantry assault made by ten gigantic divisions of Mc-pollestinians, and in the midst of the storm of exploding shells among the enemy ranks could be seen their various general officers who were sometimes half covered with the earth suddenly thrown over them by the exploding shells, and sometimes they disappeared completely in the thick clouds of smoke, but when they reappeared they were seen to be as tranquil as a calm sea, continuing only fruitlessly to urge on their men to the desperate assault.

Suddenly an enormous explosion burst forth as if from the whole Christian line and before the eyes of all was such a frightful spectacle as to shock the very fiends of hell itself. Where there had been a supporting column of or line of infantry nearly ten miles long nothing had remained of them, while all the other columns which had been following were cut down or had disappeared in a smother of smoke from bursting shells. But undaunted the survivors continued to advance in solid formations despite the deluge of shells and then yelling fiercely made a tremendous rush against the Christian positions and almost closed with the Christian line, and after a shocking melee lasting forty minutes, thousands of the front ranged Glandelinian columns were sent flying in a total rout, while myriads of others covered with earth and blood, and failing to find safety from the terrific hurricane storm of Christian fire threw down their arms and surrendered, others shattered themselves behind piles and walls of dead bodies and opened fire upon the Christians, and encouraged by the appearance of new Glandelinian waves which tried to make headway against the rain of steel swept forward again but this Glandelinian surge was wiped out, the surviving waves found it impossible to advance and began to give ground.

The Christian fire being terribly rectified, their projectiles, and masonry fire cutting wide lanes by the hundred through the great Glandelinian columns.

But the Glandelinians were redoubling the assault in to fury for more and more waves were gathering more formidable and more furious, and like a legion of yelling demons came swarming on, the Christian fire or artillery increasing in a truly terrifying manner, the thousands of huge shells in exploding throwing jets of flame on all sides, the whole battle field having become like a veritable volcanic crater in frightful and eruption. Thousands of dead bodies had finally obstructed the Glandelinian advance itself and formed a barricade, and again several Glandelinian columns gave way to seek safety in flight as the Christian fire was more than they could bear. The main surviving column in solid lines still pressed on in the frightful attack the Christians being forced to fire furiously and reload and reload their firearms and cannons without cessation, while the seventy fives from the 70,000 Christian guns along the Franklij Creek and then the hundreds of Mitrailles entered into action with an added storm of carnage and the charging column was no longer a wave of men to twenty miles long. It was going back confused and panic stricken in a few wildly scattered and separated groups of men, that violet and her sisters viewing the bloodcurdling assault saw torn by a terrific rain of shells and bullets squeaking themselves close together as though for mutual protection and consolation. One of the groups was hit by one of the shells and disappeared as if swallowed up by quick hands.

The Christian fire did indeed most frightful work wiping out almost a whole line of a Glandelinian assaulting force, and never did violet and her sisters forget the fragments of human columns that fell to pieces within their view, and never could they forget that horrible scene, and only then was the full brief brief for Hanley was sending general Zeigfelds great wave of Mc-pollestinians which advanced in a wild rush and in masses protected by their own severe artillery fire, but at times before the severity of the Christian fire their foremost columns halted, wavered, halted, disappeared their attack having failed after terrible losses and time and again the Christian generals had said as they saw wave after wave of the Glandelinians come forward to make a tremendous assault only to be wiped out or crushed to fragments.

"No the Glandelinians will never force back our line of Abhianians. They will only break their teeth and bodies here." The thing for us to do is to make the glandelinians have meant pay dearly for all their recent wanton destruction of town, towns, villages and forests in galvordia, and Angellina and for all the massacres of children."

ANOTHER GREAT WAVE OF GLANDELINIAN THIRTY MILES LONG IS WIPED OUT.

The main fury of the battle in the meantime had advanced against the christian line center commanded in person by general Roswell Buster Johnston, and the roar of cannons and musketry along this portion of the christian line itself made a most odious and horrifying and deafening a conglomeration of sounds. The glandelinian twenty six mile wave was making a desperate and wild rush across the creek, and moved upon the lines commanded by Halsted, Parsons, Maurice Costello, Walterington, and now Roswell Buster Johnston, and under a terrific firestorm on like a seething cyclone through a portion and the preternatural fury of the battle grew in such severe intensity that no one could have any idea how it would have turned out, and like a legion of yelling, screaming, and blaspheming fiends savage in their desire for swooping revenge the marians pushed on and simultaneously a large portion of this christian column swept upon the main column closing with the solid christian line, and so furious was the rush of the glandelinians at this point that it carried every massive division and brigade before it like a tornado does in sweeping through a corn field and the bloody carnage and destruction. Simultaneously the attack of the foe along Costello's lines was equally as vehement, but at this point the christian artillery let loose a storm of exploding shells that blew scores of divisions to pieces, and annihilated hundreds of large platoons. Along general Hermann's lines the glandelinian attack was also pressed with the greatest fury and utmost determination, but the whole line of assault at this point was swept and torn to pieces, but reinforced the foe went to it again and crushed themselves against Hermann's christian line like a seething avalanche, but the christian machine guns sent forth such withering showers of grape and canister, and the bigger guns adding their shell storm concluded by a withering tempest of musketry fire almost annihilated this surging wall, the very heavens seemed to sway from the battle's terrific din, the roar of destruction became so terrific that the ground shook harder from the concussion of the din, the remaining attacking columns of glandelinians progressing toward Nelson's lines, but all those attacking forces that struck against Nelson's christian line were shivered to pieces in the frightful fury of the battle, and a strong chemical action seemed to take place so strong was the stench of powder smoke.

Indeed now the battle surge was becoming a seething horror.

The remaining surge of the glandelinians and marians were crazed with the fury and frenzy of the destruction still going on all around them, and still advanced in strong force against the christian divisions itself with a most mad and furious yell, and soon any one would have been terrified in seeing suddenly a furious blizzard of debris, bodies and wreckage that flew up into the air for the length of six miles, as the christian shells exploded by the thousands among the enemy's surging line and the few surviving graycoats only in few scattered groups here and there terrified to insensibility and crazed by the slaughter they saw all around them, and the frightful massacre of their comrades, dashed madly on over this ground of death, charging furiously like the avak avalanches of demons rushing out of the jaws of hell to seize some more christian and carry them off into the bottomless pit where whether god wished them or not. They were all shot down. The glandelinian column under Pynchon also plunged on recklessly against Parsons' christian line attacking in a fit of frenzy but they were thrown back in fragments, though a portion had succeeded in pouring over the works yelling like a million fiends, but in the first frightful devilish noise the christian forces under Carlisle had rushed up in time drove back the foe and opened upon the retreating masses a withering fire tearing to pieces all the columns of the enemy. Making the whole surge into mere pieces, every surviving group giving way before the oncoming streams of Concentinians, and over the reserve columns rushing up to the top the Concentinians were dashed to pieces and once again a mighty wave of glandelinians had been annihilated.

In the meantime the assault of the glandelinians was equally as fearful along the left wing of general Evans' army. Here the glandelinian forces had continued to pierce their way on in unbroken lines one of these glandelinian waves dividing into two as it came on, and for a time it seemed as if the tremendous glandelinian attack at this point was going to be finally checked by a barrier of stone walls defended by christian artillery which was cutting; to pieces every division that charged it, but so horribly was the avalanche of human shrieking human fiends swelled by reinforcing columns, that the attack was redoubled in strength and wildness and fury, and the artillery defending the series of stone walls was captured the infantry line of Abbiau mine there going to pieces before the pressure of the attack, the frenzied glandelinians delivering their wild "Devil Yell" progressing onward with irresistible forces seeming to abandon themselves wholly to insanity and rage, indeed fearful was their fits of fury, the assault was exceedingly dangerous, the glandelinians again and again dashing themselves furiously and violently against the christian line and closing with them more than ten times only to be hurled back again with the most stupendous losses.

The roar of the battle as it seethed along the lines of Evans' left wing when added by the crashing storm of shell explosions and cannons in perfect salvoes was such like the sound of a series of exploding words being dashed to pieces against one another or like a tremendous growling million cannon like roar, the fearful unearthly sound of the desperate battle being heard within the distance of 2,345 miles and seemed to awe the very heavens. This peculiar roar of the battle echoed and reechoed throughout the whole region, and which made even the cattle and horses to tremble with fear and horror in their barns in the farms many hundreds of miles followed indeed with intense anxiety exhibiting symptoms of the most intense fear of some approaching danger that was unseen by them. The first in assault of the enemy struck Kindermann's position with the most terrific fur, and in their frightful "Devil Yells" the glandelinians bellowed most lustily but the christian fire here almost now moved down every glandelinian soldier in its range. The glandelinians under general Vancouver Aronburg rushed a part of Evans' left wing with tremendous fury, whole thousands of men at once being tangled by the bayonet as the opposing lines closed, whole platoons of men were cut to pieces, and as the enemy increased the fury of the attack as more swarmed to their aid the fallen formed windrows of dead and dying making a most horrible scene as many divisions fairly melted away, hundreds per minute having been mangled by the bayonet per minute.

he appalling fire of the Abbiau canon made a terrifying uproar that was maddening, added with the redoubled resounding crash of musketry, that was incessant, and it all was added with the shrieks of the flying shells the screams of the mangled, and though the glandelinian attack was increased with inconceivable fury and frenzied violence and though whole thousands of men were mangled by the powerful explosions of the shells, the survivors did not desert in the frightful onslaught and as more and more Abbiau brigades concentrated upon the assailants the horrible roar of the battle increased very rapidly, the very very heavens reechoing the horrible conglomeration of sounds, whole platoons of men at every discharge being wiped out divisions were torn to pieces and mangled amid the choicest of destruction, and Sedwick's front line of Abbiau men at the same time with stood the fierce attack of of three big surges of the glandelinians, and in the fury of the onslaught thousands were mangled by bayonets on both sides but seventy platoons of glandelinians were being moved down and a score of thousands of the Angellians themselves who were also fighting at this portion of the line had the skin scratched from their bodies by the very concussion of frightful explosions, thousands having their very skulls fractured, and many scores of thousands of fallen had their bodies lacerated frightfully.

However though the assault of the enemy was wild enough to carry all to hell as to say he managed to hold his lines to the last though suffering the most frightful losses, but carrie's elements divisions attacked furiously by the foe under general ignorance were dominated by a frightful volley of shells and amid the dreadful and indescribable tumult enormous masses of the assailants fairly melted away one by one, and then a fresh fire from the Abbiau canon musketry tore the men assaulting line to fragments.

but at this point the attack of the enemy was too violent to be checked at this critical time, and the whole of Sedwick's army being again heavily assaulted and with the most tremendous fury, that his whole line threatened to give way, their lines were going to fragments, every ancient pile of dead and wounded fell, the surviving graycoats and that inferno were pushing on with the most terrific fury, and soon his advanced front line was dreadfully cut up and rolled for the distance of two miles from the field.

son of vast clouds seemed to sweep the whole battle field as it were, and among the christian line which had been driven back the wildest confusion prevailed, but gladiators Massivallians were in the way the confused masses were rallied and the huge billows of gray coats whose right column was under Gopis was smashed back with frightful slaughter the hundreds of thousands of glandelinians rangled and wounded screaming and cursing; horribly and the wicked glandelinians who were mortally wounded blasphemed in their death agonies. The same force which had forced Sedwick's lines attacked the Abbeismannian battery under general garrie, but the parapets there were soon submerged in the dead and wounded glandelinians who fell in that mad charge against the thundering cannon, and all of the dead were later on found entirely covered with mud, their eyes starting from their sockets, in all the expressive horrors of a most violent death, a hundred thousand Mc-Hollistinian soldiers having been killed, during this terrific part of the violent charge against the christian batteries itself, which showed indeed the extraordinary fury of the Mc-Hollistinian soldiery.

Indeed so fierce was the attack of the glandelinians and so terrific was the firing that the christian soldiers could have believed that the throat of the whole universe was near, and instead of being thrown into confusion or demoralized and driven back as was expected the Glandelinians were highly irritated by their fearful losses which they suffered, and as their reserve forces came up to their support they threw greater vehemence into their assaults, and though for a time they threatened to carry all before them the main Abbeismannian batteries letting loose a general fire bore down everything in the whole stretch, and this for a good time managed to check the wild onrush of the glandelinian foes, but the other portion of the roaring and shrieking line of Mc-Hollistinians came on again with the most terrific energy, the fury of this assault finally forcing the whole of general Aronburg's divisions clean from their position while Sedwick was already regaining his ground amid terrific wholesale slaughter, but a deadly fire of machine guns mowed down thousands of platoons of Mc-Hollistinians, Aronburg was reinforced by the arrival of Concentinian Aronburg's divisions, and though the glandelinians roaring and screaming with rage tried with might and main in that conflagration of horror to press on, an inferno of musketry and artillery was loosened upon them by Concentinian Aronburg's Abbeismannians, explosions seemed to tear the very air to death and destruction, thousands of glandelinians were suddenly buried under hundreds of tons of debris thrown on top of them by the salvoes of exploding shells, those dying of strangulation and suffocation, any having their mouths and throats fairly packed with dirt, but all this did not check the maddened insane survivors who sped on across the Helian works with terrific alacrity, and as two other of the surviving columns made a junction, these again swept upon the christian line with the most savage manner which was terribly indescribably and simultaneously one of these columns came violently into contact with the psatabrooks line of brigades and closed furiously with them with the frenzy of a hundred thousand prize fighters against demons and though in the frightful engagement at close quarters they did scatter the Abbeismannians in all directions cleaning out this part of the line of breastworks completely the main line of psatabrooks divisions threw themselves forward to resist the foe and poured in a fearful annihilating fire that shot them all down and sent the survivors flying for safty like frightened sheep.

On progressed the other column these Mc-Hollistinians coming on at a fearful charge, and these columns though galled and torn up by the christian fire came tearing on like a screaming cyclone across and through the captured christian position on the right, where the fury of the christian cannon fire fairly began to blow the trees to pieces, and dash the mangled corpses in all directions, whole windrows of men ten miles long were being precipitated to the ground, by musketry fire, shells and canister, and though the survivors here was checked, a large portion of this crazed column did succeed in getting to the rear of this part of the christian line and taking the flank by surprise came on in a headlong rush yelling like a hundred million demons and then with one deliberate yell that sounded like one shout from the whole line closed with the rear of the christian line in a most frightful and inconceivable conceivable paroxysm of furious hand to hand fighting, and the glandelinians pressing on like a tidal wave cut the Abbeismannians down, and hurling them back again and again upon the line lines in front, breaking the whole christian line to pieces at this quarter, throwing the remainder into confusion and increasing the frenzy of the fury, continued to smash down whole platoons of christian soldiers, the fury of the attack at this portion of the line being so extremely furious, and the headlong sweep of the enemy so irresistible, that this portion of the christian line was driven from the field and surely at this very moment the battle for the christians would have been lost and the whole of Evans' army fairly annihilated, had not general Vivian himself drew up his armies in time and thrown his strongest forces to the counter assault again and again with obscene fury, smashing the jagged lines of the wild glandelinian surges, and fairly hurling the fragments back in all directions, and rushing them furiously over the recaptured works, moving the retreating foe down like snow flurries in a blizzard. It is impossible to describe the horror of the slaughter now going on, and the only chance for the surviving glandelinian troops at this point of getting out of the bloody inferno into which they had ran was by defending the first line of works they had carried, and back to this the hurriedly flung themselves, and fairly smoked the region into insensibility with the tremendous intensity of their musketry and artillery fire, but the vivianians continued their frightful charge, and general Vivian bringing up his artillery let loose a withering fire of shot and shell that tore and blew this line of works fairly to pieces, but reinforced and driven to madness by this devastating havoc the glandelinians opening fire like an inferno of hell's conflagration shot the christian gunners down by the thousand thousands, and fairly rushed madly over the whole exposed place, and with such force and wild fury was the onslaught made, and so sudden did it come, and without the slightest warning, that the series waves of christians was forced back several spaces the artillery was in possession of the foe, but so fierce was the christian fire that the front line of the assailants had been wiped out completely, and the remaining lines had been riven to pieces, and the columns which had closed with the christian line in a frenzy of fury was annihilated by the cruel Abbeismannian bayonets.

Mowed in by millions of glandelinian assailants one portion of this christian line was so furiously attacked that their whole line was shattered to pieces every time they rallied to the counter charge, and thus the enemy at other portions of this line of assault was enabled to press on with increasing and redoubled fury, but general Vivian had not as yet brought up his whole force, and as Evans also had not thrown all his armies into action a most heavy concentration of troops all Abyssinians, Abyssinians, Abbeismannians, Angelinians, and Galverinians were massed upon this point alone there was an ear-splitting roar of firing, and so terrific was the losses of the glandelinians that it was murder not war.

Never before during the invasion was there ever such carnage going on, or neither was there ever known such fierce onslaughts made in any battle during the whole invasion to the close of the war except what was witnessed at Hon. Catherine, and pristle Toe Station which are to come. The glandelinians under Hanson's Apooloons continued the fearful charge despite the heavy concentration of christian troops, but a large section of the gray wave was ripped to fragments, hundreds of platoons were blown into the air by exploding mines, and as still more came to the support of the christian line, the uproar of firing increased to redoubled fury, and for every explosion of shells or even bursting cannons dirt and wreck ago was hurled high into the air, and now as two lines of Mc-Hollistinians closed with the Abbeismannians time and again, the rattling of clubbed muskets, the multitude volume of cracking pistols, the crash of muskets at point blank, the yells of the combatants, the ring of steel on steel, made a hideous noise, the effects of the close quarters conflict was something terrible, and could not be described, being enough to horrify any one who witnessed it, and every time the assailants were repulsed, fierce streams of canister would be poured upon the retreating foe, but again and still again the few frenzied graycoats dashed forward to the charge, charging again and still again through this withering storm of death and destruction, and though galled and withered, only recoiled to rally again, and during the bayonet fights the noise made a metallic roaring, and the whole scene for the distance of forty miles was truly an inferno, explosions by the score of thousands tearing up everything, the smoke hiding the combatants, and mine explosions threw dirt and debris time and again high into the air with stunning crashes, which descended in hundreds of torrents among the combatants.

Undulating almost like the monstrous waves of the sea the long surges of glandelinian assailants extending for many leagues, poured on over the windrows of dead and dying dying, some waves having a death of fourteen fourteen feet, and plateaus of bodies fairly covered the fields and meadows as the men fell in such frightful numbers, it being a horrible slaughter indeed.

Even all the near by plains for miles was covered with the frightful sea of dead and wounded, where the dense columns now repulsed which such horrible loss had swept with tremendous fury, but at other points of Evans' lines great and now floods of glandelinians poured against the christian line with indescribable fury, the roar of the conflict seeming about to split the earth. The assaulting columns multiplified and swelled into a vast wave, their flags and banners making myriads of sea, colors. But as a truth before God the assault was of no avail for more and more reinforcements were arriving in the support of Evans' lines, the struggle and resistance gradually increasing in violence, and continuing steadily, and now the christians themselves made a desperate counter charge with irrepressible fury, shells shot across and through the assaulting columns in the wildest manner, yet this did not stop the half crazed survivors from keeping up the assault, their yells were in the most savage uproar and as they closed with the christian lines the rattling of clubbed guns was universal, and the shrieking yells of those trying to cut each other down, the groans of the wounded made a most appalling tumult, but even the assailants amid a burst of new and horrible thunders from fresh cannons were hurled back pell mell the assailants being almost deafening and blinded by the horrible ear-splitting din, their main line was rent and split into many small fragments, the adding musketry fire tearing their line again to pieces as they tried to rally and the shouted torrents of canisters swept among the panic stricken survivors with a deadly whistling.

The main assault of the enemy in the morning part of the battle was an appalling circumstance this gladiatorial assaulting column stretching for the distance of thirty miles and with a fury that was beyond description this mighty surge came on with a rush and roar of yells, and the shell fire of the enemy covering this onslaught seemed to wither and set whole forests of trees on fire, wrenching and uprooting thousands of trees and the whole christian line exposed to it was threatened with annihilation for minute by minute scores of columns in a twinkling of an eye were driven into confusion and started to retreat as they themselves now were in fragments and could not stand before the mighty assault.

Those thousands of Abbeinnians lay stunned and bleeding, and the left wing of the wave of desperate assailants rushed swiftly and struck Rowell Buster Johnstons' lines, but crushed themselves again and again upon the massive front of red coats, and indeed it was won to the multitude of these assailants who faced this annihilating scourage of the deadliest christian fire, for nearly this whole section of the line of assault was lost even at a long distance from the hammering christian cannon multitude after multitude being literally mowed down as in many other great battles, trees numbered by the hundred thousand were blown up by the roots, the violence of the war thousands of exploding shells rending the trees into fragments, and multitudes of the dead and wounded were completely covered by the awful storm of falling foliage.

In the meantime Evans realized that the assault of the foe was wilder than he had ever expected it to be, and wondered how he could stop it without such slaughter among his own comrades. He decided to try the unequal test on Violet and her sisters. Evans reports that he received all the time from various officers, Evans realized that the only way to win this tremendous battle was to turn the enemy's rear, by a movement that would be most desperate and require great courage and skill.

And yet there seemed no chance to do this, and later in the day it was reported that the heaviest firing was heard for four hours already along all parts of general Vivians' army, and that the enemy was fairly raining can in the fury of their attacks. To stop the enemy Evans realized he must for without any stratagem or some trick on his part the enemy's continued and stubborn attacks would soon prevail and Evans would receive not only a sound thrashing but his army being in danger of an overwhelming movement which had been observed faced complete annihilation.

General Vivian himself had all he could do himself to stay the desperate assaults of the enemy and Evans got the report from telegrams that for four hours already without cessation the cannon along general Vivians' lines sounded like a hundred thousand cannon hursting to a piece.

Evans' right wing and center had already been partially rolled up for a great distance his left was caught between two fires and threatened with annihilation all his first line positions were still in the hands of the foe. Evans' headquarters was captured, besides those of all the other generals too and thousands great danger indeed, for Hanley was being driven from the north having gotten around as far as he could and advised and now Evans must do something mighty quick or it would be all up with his army and Violet and her sisters too.

Violet and her sisters had watched the outcome of the battle with unspeakable horror, and decided upon something for themselves, and so went to find general Evans before it was too late, and however taken the little girls over an hour to find general Evans but at last they found him and reported to him what they feared and soon he asked them to advise as to what should be done to turn the tide of the battle or it seemed if the whole christian line was becoming exhausted.

There is another christian army stationed about twenty miles of here under general John Evans my brother. Said Evans. "I don't know whether to fear the battle or not, but I don't think it is wise to wait and find out and so I must do the best that I can and would allow you little girls to go on the mission successfully."

"Sure we'll go as soon as we want us." Said Violet. "Which way is his army concentrating?"

"The little girls will have to go northward through the lines of the enemy under general John Hanley." Said Evans. "There is no way around him for he has extended his lines so far that it would take many days to get around and that would be too long. I don't doubt it at all but that I will be able to hold against all the assaults the enemy make in front but should Hanley be prepared for his movement too soon he'll come down upon my rear like an avalanche and crush my army beyond repair. It will take general Hanley four hours to make preparations for his flank attack and I know you little girls can get there quicker than an hour if the enemy don't detain you."

"But we can never find a find the place where he is concentrates unless you tell me." Said Violet. "To heck with the enemy we want to know where your dear brother John Evans is situated."

"At South Bend where we previously had a battle as you little girls know."

"At South Bend?"

"Yes."

"Then we'll go right away."

"But remember Violet." Said her sisters that we'll have to disguise ourselves an not be overconfident. The enemy are more watchful now since they know we have any on them though being in their country as it is."

Violet looked at Evans and said: "But have we time enough to disguise ourselves. It takes an hour to do it." "No you will not." Said Evans. "It's best to trust to luck while on the way. All depends on the quickest hands. I hate like drinking poison to send you little girls on this dangerous mission, but I have already sent a score of men out on this morning and none of them have returned. I trust that the mission would be successful if I send you little girls. You may realize the danger, for I'll take time to explain. Every where outside the rear of my lines the enemy having cavalry forces out scouting for any one would wait try to go for aid, and there are ten chances out of nothing that you little girls will ever return. Go you want to save our armies from failure and the loss of the war to the christian nation, but refuse you can and I'll go myself."

Violet and her sisters laughed heartily.

"We'll go and we'll assure you we'll return." Said Violet, while her sisters nodded. We have many ways to disguise ourselves and we'll do it right away too. Good sisters. And good bye Evans dear. You will be welcoming us this evening and win a good victory too."

Off the little girls started. They started to put on their disguises and:

"Stop a minute where in hell are you eight little housecats going." Cried the leader of a party of cavalier riding up to eight little housecats, but who seemed to have been with a family of pigs they were so mud bedabbled and dirty. "And why so dirty. Are you living in dirt or what?"

"We were perused by the christians and had an accident." Said one of the boys who in reality was Violet and who was really perused by some Abbeinnians by mistake and that she and her sisters had only escaped by hiding in a yard where a swarm of pigs were kept. "Perused by those dirty smothering christian dogs who are trying to capture our whole works." Cried the leader. "Well I believe you for I thought I saw it myself but did not know you were the fugitives. But how is the battle going. Did you see such of the fighting which is going on?"

"They are fighting the gladiatorial soldiers like bloodthirsty wolves." Said Violet assuming a serious expression and in lying as if she meant to tempt the christians when in truth it was an insult for the enemy in disguise. But how it is turning out your excellency we do not know. But sides seem to be holding out just as good as the other."

"But why do you call me? Your ex-excellency." Asked the officer.

"I'm no general but only a lieutenant."

"But you look like a great general." Said Jennie herself. "You are so dressed in badges and medals."

"Those medals and no badges ought to be in pordition." She inwardly said.

"Well any way you children had better keep away from those christian dogs and never go near them again." Said the officer. "You boys are to do scout ing, report where the wounded are lying, and bring them in, and signal when you see danger but not get on the foot. It's dangerous enough with the duty you have to perform without saving on those christian curs." And with that the column of cavally moved on not suspecting it was Violet and her sisters when they had stopped for that few minutes.

Violet and her sisters had chosen a straight ahead road, but every half mile of the way they were stopped and addressed by the groups of cavally cavally they encountered, but as they were not disguised they were not molested as they were not recognized by the glandolinians. "Hans' lines were about two mile away from the rear of general Evans' lines, and it took Violet and her sisters about forty eight minutes to come within view of the first swarm of tents. They now began to wonder how they were going to get through without detection. It is true that they probably could fool many of the under officers and even the privates, but many of the higher generals could recognize them despite their disguise and thus they wished to avoid contact with them, especially John Manley.

"We'll have to be as careful as a cat." Said Joice. "We are now before general Manley's lines, and we are exactly at the center for there in the dark distance looms the enemy's main headquarters for the general officers. I can tell the building from the flag that flows above it."

At this section the camp appeared to be deserted, but never theless the little girls used the utmost caution, and being questioned by the sentries as they rode up, gave such satisfactory answers that they were allowed to pass without resistance and soon they were within Manley's interior lines.

Sure enough who must approach them but general Manley himself. But fortunately this time the disguise of the little girls through the Mercy of God happened to be so complete that he hardly recognized them, but he immediately demanded:

"Why do you boyscots leave the lines without permission to go and spy on the christian lines when you know it isn't in your line of duty. You have committed an offense which will have to be looked into. Come at once to my headquarters. I'll teach you little fools what I say when I tell you not to go out during a battle."

He went off at a gallop the little girls apparently following but later surprised at the sudden quietness Manley wheeled to find no one with him.

"The in dependent little devils!" He growled. "Disobeyed me again."

He looked everywhere for them, up and down many of the company streets, even inquiring of every private and officer he met walking back and forth of where the boyscots had gone but they answered that they saw no one follow him, or any children in the camp, that really no boyscots among the full list had left the camp, that no one had been absent all that time.

"But I came upon eight little boyscots dirty as pigs." Said Manley. "If they did not leave the camp then who were they I'd like to know. Call all of the boyscots that are here and have their roll call. I'll see that there is no joke being played on me."

The order was obeyed, all the boyscots about fifteen thousand in number were lined up and their names called out, but every one answered "Here" and when examined and asked questions proved themselves true that in their statements that no one of them had left the camp or entered it since the day before.

"At once Manley was suspicious, and the number of the group he had detained made him more suspicious.

"This is the first time that their dogged disguises fooled me." He said angrily. "Then it was those beastly yivian girls. How in the name of thunder and lightning did they pass all those cavally scouts without being arrested and detained. Well if they are not the slipperiest little fishes that God put on this earth. Oh how I hate him for all this. Those yivian girls must be overtaken before they leave the lines. That their purpose is I do not know. Spying most likely."

He issued orders, and soon a force of cavally was off in the direct ion apparently in which the little girls were supposed to have gone. They not knowing the real intention of the little girls did not go in the right direction and so the little girls managed to leave the enemy's lines within three quarters of an hour without a pursuit of any kind.

They could still hear the frightful roar of the distant distant battle as loudly as if it was raging where they really were themselves, and the fact of this hastened them on more swiftly, and they did go on a tearing gallop now that they were out of the enemy's lines at last.

They knew the direction in which they must go and so they took the turnpike first and then proceeded down along the two main railroad crossings or junctions and thence down the river bank. How far they were from the christ ian lines Violet and her sisters could not tell as yet. But they were to have a great advent ure indeed. Three times violet and her sisters had terrific battles with quick sands into which they had been caught, a bridge which they had started to cross gave way under their horses and threw them head long in the deep water, and a tree nearly fell on them too.

But they did not pay any attention to these incidents though of course the bath had cleaned off the mud a good deal from their clothes. But the next thing they wished to do was to discard discard their uniforms but then they did not believe it wise to do so too soon. On they progressed until they came to a stream of water which joined the Easter Starring and which was just as large as the latter at this point. Here there was no pon toon bridges, and let not across they must, and so they urged their horses into the stream. As they had made about three hundred feet of the river Violet and her sisters suddenly heard the whistling of bullets around them and ducking their heads, Violet chance to look around and saw a large swarm of gray coated horsemen entering into the water after them.

"Glandolinians." Uried violet. "I thought we were passed them long ago." At this sight the little girls urged their horses on faster, but the they were swifling as fast as they could, and could go no faster while the horses of the pursuers were about to gain on them. Violet and her sisters then whipped out her pistols and aiming at the main leader who appeared indeed to be a general of some high rank violet said:

"Withdraw your men from the pursuit or we'll kill you like a dog." "You dirty Glandolinians will never capture us and so you might as well give up. We are all dead shots and if you believe it not we'll prove it to you in a way that you won't like."

There came sharp exclamationations from the men, and some confusion ensued while the leader hollered through his hands:

"Who are you kids anyway and what are you doing with that uniform on?"

"It's a big business affair of our own." Said Jennie. "We have you well covered general and if you pursue an inch further we'll fire. We warn only once."

There was a loud murmur among the men and then the leader shouted:

"By your determined words we know that thou art the yivian girls in disguise and that your uniforms are glandolinian. You have invited me greatly by thus showing your defiance, and shoot me if you dare. You are going on a message to bring aid to the christian army under general yivian and Evans for we have discovered the way you went and came out here to get you. We will not turn back for you and you cannot make us. Forward men. They won't dare to open fire."

"Stop!" C Screamed violet.

"FORWARD!" Talled the leader.

The men started forward when eight shots cracked out loudly and the general toppled from the horse. At once the glandolinians were driven into confusion and dismay. Violet and her sisters in the meantime had reached the opposite bank and while most of the soldiers were attending to the wounded general the little girls progressed onward, the enemy not pursuing for good reasons for suddenly violet and her sisters found themselves surrounded by a large swarm of Red coats with fixed bayonets.

"So we have caught some of you dangerous glandolinian boyscots at last!" Uried the officer of the party. "What is that noise we hear so plainly. Tell me you little rascals, enemies of God or we'll run you through boys though you are."

"We'll tell readily enough, and we are not enemies of god and do not wish to be called so either." Said Jennie. "We are the yivian girls and if you don't believe it we'll throw off our disguises and prove it."

"Don't need to take off any of your gray clothes." Said the officer. "We know you from your voices. How in the name of the goodness of God did you get through Manley's lines and reach us. You little girls are clever. And we beg pardon for our conduct toward you but your disguises fooled us. You are within Hanson yivian's lines."

"Good god and we were heading for general John Evans army." Uried violet in despair. "We were sent by his brother Jack for him to come and throw Manley out of the way. Evans is attacked by a great indian army at Fountain de Firens de la Greece and old Manley is in his rear and may crush his rear in another two hours. We have failed to reach him having gone the wrong distance."

"But there must have been some mistake in your directions then as to the army." Said the officer. "He is in our command. Your mission is no failure for I'm sure Hanson can spare him, and allow him to go to his brothers aid."

Violet and her sisters were conducted within the lines, and brought before their old time friend general John Evans.

"I Oh thank god and I've been longing to see you dear little girls." He suddenly cried folding them each in turn in his fond embrace. "And what brought you on this visit?"

In as short a detail as possible violet told him all. He listened in surprise and alarm and then calling his orderlies sent him to bring one of his officers and telegraphed an order to another general.

"Ain't there any armies near by to go to his and general's aid?" He asked demurely.

"No," answered violet. "He sent me to find you and ask you to aid him." He wants you to stop any attempt that Manley will make on his rear."

"I'll go," he said. "I'll telegraph the news to Hanson. I'm sure he will allow me to go for any way it'll cause the lost loss of the war if Evans fails there."

He at once telegraphed this order:

"YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL HANSON VIVIAN
ARMY OF ABREATHA AND ABREATHA"

Big battle going on at Foundation of Pirene De Ja Greene-----Armed under general Evans and your brother. Abreathans with serious defeat and disaster probably annihilation-----Manley's army, because of Evans-----If Manley is thrown off it will be well---Have sent to the aid of Evans.
JOHN EVANS."

The message went off off quickly and presently came the order from Hanson vivian himself:

"I have had good luck press only through the love of god almighty for general Everett True and King Cannon have pressed on themselves and joined me. Go to your brothers and as quickly as you can and I'll not cease praying until you get there. Hurry as time is precious. You have only an hour."
GENERAL HANSON."

John Evans receiving this note at once issued an order for the advance and Manley himself did not get the news of the help that was coming to general Evans either for the men who had pursued the little girls half way across the river, had been pursued themselves by the Abreathans overtaken, and shot down or captured and so no one was returning to warn Manley that the little girls had escaped.....

Manley in the meantime was preparing now to start his advance, and when about ready he had received a word that a big force of christians was moving down from the north, but he at first did not believe it and so did not guard his own rear. He posted his batteries however to prepare for any surprise, and advanced half of his force to storm general Evans' rear. Just as the whole force was well under way more runners came that the christian force was nearer, that it appeared from the shape and uniforms to be Hanson's army and Manley now became alarmed, for his scouts came in and told him that he had better be prepared for he was overhauled by a christian force that was approaching under general John Evans. But he had not taken precautions quick enough. He realized that he had to fight his own part of the battle without giving aid to those attacking Evans and now he realized indeed that the battle was lost. He knew that there was no difference hardly in either one of the Evans and that he had a terrible and cruel fighter to contend with now under the name of John Evans the very one who had by the terrible and horrible effects of his cannon proven that his advance was a great success on the eve of the battle of Pirene.

Which way the christians army was coming he did not know, but nevertheless he prepared for battle as quickly as possible. However Manley did not realize that Hanson was moving also around him and that he was to be attacked on two sides at once until on his whole rear and front all of a sudden there came such a tremendous crash of cannon and musketry that the earth seemed to open at the horrible explosion, this uproar sounding far and wide in a continuous and rattling crash as if a billion cannon were in action in a space of less than ten miles, the horrid roaring of the volleys pouring out in a prolonged crash that was almost insupportable, and as Manley advanced his cavalry squadrons to the scene he saw to his dismay streams of redcoats pouring across the whole region in front of his position the uproar of the answer answering fire of the thick red wave being so terrific that it was beyond description, the storm of cannon seemed to fairly wither the grass under the feet of the christian assailants, and as the closing quarters of the lines met the scene was as if the world was approaching to its sudden end, and the violence of the Abreathan attack fairly tore its way through the main front line of Manley's army, and whole sections of the army went to pieces, other portions were unable to withstand the assault, gave way after meeting for twenty minutes a terrific fire, and Manley now hastened heavy reinforcements to rally them, but now the Abreathans had brought up their artillery and opened a storm of fire that fairly shook the ground and threw men off their feet from the concussion, the din of a billion cannons it seemed increasing with redoubled fury, the very heavens also in Manley's rear seemed to be filled with a most indescribable uproar that tore all before it with the volume of deafening sound, hundreds of platoons of the enemy every minute being literally blown to pieces, and dissolved into whirlwinds of dead and dying by the fierce fire of the christian cannon.

The assault on his rear being almost simultaneous was still more frightful for the Abreathan line of assault extending in the shape of a long thin wave advanced with frightful velocity and as the enemy opened fire themselves the scene was so terrible that probably the angels would never go forget it, the whole region within that short time being covered with burning fields or whirlwinds of dead and dying of both sides, but the surviving Abreathan line had come on with irresistible force and tore the main front line of the enemy rear into a thousand small pieces, and then a closing with the rest, and thus by surging two and for, but finally the foe yielded ground back by inch, the mingling of the men being frightful, the Abreathans attacking with such indescribable fury that Manley realized all was at last.

Along his main left the horrible battle had increased with redoubled and most amazing fury, the resisting Abreathan column being crushed to pieces as their counter charge and closed with the christians line who furiously cut their way through them like savage red coated demons, despite the terrific resistance more and more of the Abreathans came on the pressure of the charge increasing with redoubled fury, and the millions of bayonets clashing against each other mingled with shots at close quarters and the series of frightful universal devil yells making a perpetual conglomeration of sound that was startling to the heavens itself, the Abreathans meeting the Abreathan charge without flinch flinching, and pressed themselves against the onslaught waves of purple and red smoke snatching column after column, but the fury of the attack at every quarter of the two sides of the army was still increasing in violence and increased to such an extent, that the left of Manley's line was swept back and forth in a seething fiery and bloody inferno that was shocking to behold and finally that portion of the whole line gave way and retreated in general confusion and panic and no effort to rally them could be effective.

Never before in the invasion was there ever such a frightful christian assault made and as they rushed on and met with the fleeing fugitives spreading out their columns far and wide they sent them flying, and Manley realizing that he was placed between two fires and that he was attacked so furiously that he his army could not withstand it long became almost disheartened.

The opposing lines actually fought in titanic throes and the most terrific confusion of battle, and nothing could check the furious onrush of the Abreathan assailants who gained and kept every inch of ground they did seize, and general too countless army before rent asunder was now actually blown or smashed to pieces, whole columns having dissolved and Manley's whole left was rolled up from the field for ten miles and fairly cut to pieces, and threatened with dissolution.

Along the other portions of Manley's lines the Abreathans charged again and again with the furies of a legion of hell, and though the gaps made in the Abreathan lines were wide and many it was impossible to disorganize the assailants, the whole assaulting line along Manley's southern front being forty miles long and advanced on and the trillion like roar of cannon and musketry and rain was never thicker than the hailstones that fell before the violent christian assault. Along Vanley's center both on the southern and northern front the attack of the christians was redoubled still more new frenzied columns hurrying on furiously uniting with the foremost assaults, this column being a terrible force of christian attackers and the attack torn all the foremost squares of Vanley's front line to pieces. It struck general Gibson's square of divisions and Vanley's divisions who resisted to the last man, and the whole gray line at this point seemed to dissolve into dead and wounded as the main christian columns both front and rear swept on and on, and Vanley's center indeed found itself over whelmed by this monstrous arm of Abbeismunna, and all those remaining under Bonanberry met annihilation.

In the meantime in desperation too gossellie had moved twenty parks of artillery upon the christian assaults, and opened fire with a fury that knew no bounds, and a portion of the assaults at this point fairly leave left a sea of their own dead and wounded behind them, but they made such a tremendous rush that the batteries did not get time to fire but twice and then they were captured the Abbeismunna's snoring, cutting down and bayonetting all the gunners and scattering the infantry like bees.

THE ARABIAN LEANS APPEAR AS IF THEY WERE THE RED FRIENDS OF THE UTTERMOST DEPTHS OF HELL.
VANLEY'S ARMY IS CRUSHED AND ALMOST DESTROYED.
THE DEFEAT OF THE GLANDLINIAN ARMY IS COMPLETE.
VAIN CAPTURES THE CITY AND TRENCH OF VICTORY IS."

To the glandlinians it seemed as if some monstrous swarm of fiends from the bottomless pit was trying to wedge themselves against the whole line on the front and rear,, so terrific was the assault of the christian line, and despite the column of men that dissolved away or into pieces the assault continued, and of the shriek shrieking yells, screams of fury, and howl of the Abbeismunna, and of the glandlinians being overwhelmed by the tremendous human flood was completely heart rending, and so fierce was the Abbeismunna's yell that it sounded as if millions of screeching demons were filling the air, and as they lunged forward with fixed bayonets and closed with the glandlinians they destroyed multitudes, in their rush, as shattering to pieces whole massive brigades, and fairly mowing down every glandlinian that opposed their onslaught.... By the horrible din of the christian all thousands of glandlinians were almost rendered deaf, the Abbeismunna all the time making up a new series of frightful yells, that made a clamor that became universal, like as if a thousand tornadoes were forcing into one at this point of the battle, the hand to hand fight being most terrible in the extreme, muskets clashing against each other in a general turmoil, the fighting becoming frantic, and to the desperate glandlinians the Abbeismunna were indeed like a strange legion of fiends and devils rushing on in drunken rage, thousands upon thousands of the glandlinians going down in mangled corpses, their main front line was falling to pieces before the headlong Abbeismunna's tidal wave like millions of small airplanes, the Abbeismunna charging on and fighting like a sea of madness like a regular hell legion of christian soldiers gone mad, the christian line literally cutting their way onward, tearing wave after wave of glandlinians to pieces, ripping many soldiers apart with their bayonets ripping many other wide open, hinging the heads of thousands into mere pulps.

Indeed the furious onslaught of the Abbeismunna was crushing the enemy's lines to fragments, whole sections and masses of Abbeismunna mingling with the confused enemy like a frightful hell of destructive fiends, whole masses of Abbeismunna were then any ever seen in a charge before rushing onward unchecked, and the shrieking yell of each line the whole battle line seeming to be wreathed in atmospheric fire the force of the assault becoming more and more violent every minute, increasing most furiously, and soon continuing to increase.

At Vanley's rear a hundred platoons of Abbeismunna came again onto close quarters with the retreating glandlinians, but the enemy at this point was pouring in a musketry and cannon fire that was making a noise as if to fill the air with a countless million deafening echoes, thousands upon thousands of deafening earthshaking detonations per second proceeding each other in a continuous uproar, the exploding shells making the heavens loud with their rattling uproar, the noise being horrible and here multitudes of men were literally killed, and debris was scattered in all directions by the great explosions. The two columns of Abbeismunna that assaulted the rear and front of Vanley's army so simultaneously had shaped like an awful endless stream of wild human beings, the advance guard having at the beginning of the charge struck forward with corps like a crashing avalanche, and it had disappeared in that inferno of slaughter though for all the time afterward during the fiercest conflict the whole two opposing lines had been hidden in smoke of the fierce firing of cannons and musketry. One dense dense column of this Abbeismunna tidal wave late that afternoon had struck and swooped down upon Logan's square of Mc-Pollastians, annihilating all his squares, and pressing on toward Mc-Pollastians lines with wild frenzy, and at the charge of this most dangerous and stupendous column of Abbeismunna the opposing glandlinians under Clinton had spread out bit bit in the noise which made the battle look like some hideous night mare of hell his line was annihilated himself killed, and the great army of assaults having crossed the western part of the faster starting run, spread out to greater width, and as it went on it formed two huge streams of men which advanced as fast as men could ever be expected to run, and no portion of the glandlinian army in the rear could be expected to check them, despite their desperate preparations to bring up more and more cannons, and on and on pressed the frightful torrent of Abbeismunna with the most appalling fury enveloping general surgeons multitudes of fugitives amid the crash of musketry at close quarters, and in the noise thousands of lives were lost in that one rush, and those though thousands of cannons sprang to their guns and fired them again and again, and still again, with night and main, a great yelling surge of Abbeismunna overwhelmed them out and slew them with the bayonet and sabre, crushed the main infantry supporting lines and swept it back pouring the musketry shells and solid shot from the captured guns until the remainder of the christian surge came up and then on it pressed.

At all points the christian line was rushing forward and from the very heart of the fearful slaughter ran the cry of hundreds of thousands of mangled, the christian columns were fairly torn by the main line still resisting, scores of thousands of mangled were still revealed along the broken foliage and it was as if the hand of death had covered them with a thin veil, and crashing clouds of dirty dirt, and clouds of dirt and wreckage from thousands of bursting shells still wrapped the victims in agonized death, it being a regular seething hell of death and destruction tenfold in fury, Antonio's ten divisions of guerrillas had been crushed to pieces in clashing with the frightful wave of assaults, and glandlinians left wing was crushed to pieces, but the remainder of his force spread out in separate columns and again and again made a sweeping charge upon the attacking Abbeismunna only to be swept down in hundreds of regiments at one time, for every charge, but nevertheless the counter charges of the glandlinians continued to rage with the most terrible violence, their own column columns extending seventeen miles, and attacking amid the most fearful inferno of firing ever heard and seen, and the quantities of red regiments, and brigades crushed, shal shattered, or annihilated completely by the terrible storm of fire along the christian line was frightful.

Whole columns of the enemy fairly dissolved in making these sweeping counter charges and the christian lines having spread to the length of fifty miles continued the assault with redoubled energy, the battle continuing to rage with increasing fury. The solid purple and red lines were time and again driven into many parts amid the blinding hellish uproar, but the main lines rushed forward again and again in solid waves, and though every one of the first waves extending for ten miles seemed to go to pieces pieces along the line of assault before the Masonic fire, the surviving waves moved for a moment, but rallied, and again swept on, and again the foremost lines about forty miles long almost dissolved away into fragments leaving before the view of the enemy a horrible field of dead and wounded, but the other waves pouring in a fiercer fire than they received pressed on without failure and by this crushing onrush which carried every thing before it the Masonic lines under Lannoe was driven back and mangled, and for a minute not now the firing was so fierce that for many miles the men on both sides together seemed to dissolve into dead and wounded, the losses of both armies being frightful, but still the christian lines only rallied again and again and again swept upon the whole Masonic lines in possession of the guns, the fury of the Abbeismunna attack increasing to such an extent that most of the guns were abandoned without firing another shot, the glandlinians retreating in greatest confusion at this point.....

and along this point the works for the distance of forty miles could not be distinguished for here the dead and wounded lay so thick that who could count them correctly..... Never before during the war did the Abbeian fight with such frightful fury, or neither did the glandelinians offer offer such wild resistance,, and the worse about it was that Manley continued to increase the frightful struggle by throwing in all the still inactive forces, and the rallying garrisons, and Mc-Jollestonians were making the most desperate efforts to re take the guns,, the battle everywhere being a noisy inferno, and every assaulting wave of glandelinians that swept up upon the captured guns, were rangled to pieces, the left grand division of Mc-Jollestonian army was crushed to a mere handful of men, in making one of the great counter assaults,, and under Nelson the strongest force of 10,000,000 Mc-Jollestonians were rendered to fragments, in an hours series of assaults,, dead and wounded glandelinians lying all over the frightful battle field, and the works and deep trenches were fairly clogged with the fallen of both sides and the valley of the Shadow of Death could probably fall to make a scene equal as horrible.

The battle between general John Evans, and general John Manley indeed seemed to be drawing forward toward its height. During their frantic efforts to retake the works and artillery seventeen divisions of garrisons had been crushed to fragments, and again they had swept forward in one long line only to have it swept and torn to pieces,, and the christians now were concentrating so heavily that the foe along this section horrified at their losses as millions had fallen ceased their assaults,.

At other points of the rear the Angelinians and Abbeianians still advanced with their extraordinary rapidity, advancing in a fearful force that nothing could stop. The awful uproar of the battle seemed to burst the very ground asunder, the advancing christians dividing into many separated columns, and now as more and more added to them, they continued the frightful onslaughts anew,, and general Hansonian christians rushing on wildly like a tidal wave of water struck the Masonic lines, under general Quincy Marcha, Marchaian wedging the wolves again at his solid lines with the pressure of a windmill of wreckage against a broken and frail wooden house, driven forward by a flood of water, and after some of the most desperate fighting the glandelinians were forced to give way,, though the firing at close quarters seemed to shake the very heavens heavens,, the Abbeianians pressing on with the most amazing fury,, but one whole right wing of the christian line was a fast dissolving into fragments, while the central portion seemed to driven,, and then general Garries divisions collapsed and fell back in some confusion.....

During this frightful onslaught the enemy had managed to open fire with all the artillery which they had succeeded in bringing into action, the shells blowing men to pieces by the thousands, and riddling whole platoons with bullets,, and even fragments of hundreds of troops, thousands of stones, fences, and masses of wreckage were blown high into the air by the bursting shells,, and clouds of debris, dust and tons of earth were scattered all over the combatants,, like snow the dust being as thick as the powder smoke itself.....

In trying to reestablish his badly broken lines Manley in withdrawing a large force from his extreme center had left a wide and dangerous gap through which the Abbeianian torrent had poured, and though exposed to a severe cross fire from the glandelinian cannon whose shells shattered myriads of beautiful trees, and hurled clouds of stones fifty tons in weight into the air and galled the christian lines blowing whole sections of the christian columns to pieces, and bursting every column that followed under the surviving Abbeianians however advanced with the most irresistible force and fury, shattering every opposing mass of glandelinians that still opposed their advance, advancing upon the Garrison lines with a still greater fury and almost closing in the Glandelinian center, tore whole sections of the graycoats down capturing hundreds of thousands of prisoners, and completely destroying general Mc-Jolleston's Left Wing, and reducing his center into heaps of killed and maimed.

The surviving columns of the glandelinian center still tried to stand its ground, but were borne before the furious sweep of the Abbeianians who charged as furiously as they knew how and rendered the whole center to pieces and rolled it upon those attacking in front. All was in the greatest confusion, and the enemy who were retreating had to swim the river they endeavored to cross as the shells had blown away all the bridges, the explosion of the shells tearing immense gaps in the panic stricken columns tossing tons of dirt and wreckage among them burying many,, the high explosives indeed threw an incredible quantity of men into wild confusion killing thousands of the panic stricken fugitives and all along the line of retreat nothing remained but an appalling medley of slaughter. The whole line of battle for many miles presented a fiendish scene of wreckage and mangled human forms, a sight more fearful than Dantes Inferno, and so completely were thousands of the glandelinians covered by the earth and wreckage wreckage lurled back and forth and in every direction by the terrible storm of explosions that one could only see a half covered head here and there, a horrible gaping mouth, or a hand or leg miserably crushed, and thousands of dead bodies had been found after the battle honey combed with bullet holes, or so terribly mangled by shell fire that to look upon them turned one sick to his very soul.

The Abbeianian assault on both the rear and front of Manley's army had been made with the most extraordinary violence, the series of immense christian columns having succeeded within one afternoon's time in fairly cutting their way through the most thickly populated parts of general Manley's lines, and so terrifying had been the din of the battle between the armies under Evans and Manley, that any witness had they observed the terrific conflict could have instinctively expected the opposing lines to literally destroy one another.....

The avalanche of christians had pushed on at every point of the two sections of Manley's lines with awful force and fury, creating a hell of destruction for over five hours, and on one sunken road near the center left section of the enemy's main line tangled heaps of graycoats were seen. The christians had pressed on like a wild storm of incarnate spirits of destruction, cutting Manley's left and central wings fairly to pieces,, it being both a fierce and magnificent sight, the fury of the Abbeianian advance having been indeed so stupendous that the two wings had been unable finally to withstand it, and as the eastern wing of assault had reached out and banded toward the terror stricken swarms of fugitives in gray under Anderson, and as their escape was cut off, they had all thrown down their arms and surrendered.

Though Manley's left and center was rolled up completely from the field and almost dissipated, the right had still held its formations. The Abbeianians who had been yelling like a hundred million demons being checked many times, their columns dissolving into vast windrows of dead and wounded, and all along the line of battle at this quarter the onerays had put cannons had put into the christian ranks such a storm of fire that not only were the christian columns galled and scathed, but hundreds of thousands of trees were swept down and shattered, the terrible storm of shells making a noise as if the whole universe was blowing to pieces,, but the christians had only rallied to the attack again and again, rushing upon the foe in series of desperate onslaughts, and mingling with them at close quarters time and again and causing the wildest confusion before they were checked.....

The first main loss that the christians suffered since they started their great attack on Manley's army on both sides was from the close quarters fighting which occurred so often during the series of wild onslaughts, being at one point alone over 745,678 in killed alone, and in addition to the unsurpassing horrors occasioned by the horrible battle the devoted survivors of the Abbeianian columns had been frightfully exposed to the ravages of the greatest cannon fire.

WHAT VIOLET AND HER SISTERS WENT THROUGH WHILE ON THEIR RETURN TO THE CHRISTIAN LINES UNDER GENERAL JACK ATROPS EVANS.....

In the meantime while Evans had drove his main forces against the two sides of John Manley's army, Violet and her sisters had made their way back toward the direction in which they could find general Jack Evans and bring him the good tidings, which they knew would encourage him to fight all the harder and win the great battle. But it was not so easy in returning as it was going out on the mission mission and violet and her sisters soon found this out and without very much time to consider about it either.

Knowing what would be the result of going through the enemy's lines while a wild battle would suddenly open had decided to make a long detour this time and get safely back to general Evans' lines. They had no sooner started out when violet looking around saw what appeared to be a little girl, looking out at them from behind trees, and realized that they were almost walking into an ambush set by the fierce garrisonians or Mc-Jollestonians. To progress onward recklessly meant certainly their destruction and so wheeling their horses the little girls opened fire and raced off for the shelter of the nearest overhanging ledge of rocks which they observed in the distance. To reach this they must or all would be lost. Just then they heard the sudden crash of the sudden outbreak of the christian attack, and knew that John Evans had struck John Manley's army the blow that would insure general Jack Evans the great victory that they wanted to see him win. Onward the little girls raced, and then looking back saw over forty gray-coated soldiers racing after them full speed on horse back, and coming on so swiftly that there was a certainty of their being overtaken. However the little girls had reached the ledge of rocks, and leaping from their horses scrambled swiftly up to the top and at once opened fire upon the horsemen below before they could make a charge bringing down nearly ten of them at once.

The glandelinians dismounted, for it was impossible to bring up their way on horse back, and then started racing up on all parts of the hill that they could find a footing on firing as they progressed onward, but finally the little girls fired upon the assailants so furiously that the glandelinians became more wary, and halted their advance but poured in an answering fire that kept the little girls hugging the ground for cover.

Jennie received a scratch from a bullet but was not seriously injured. Knowing that were long the glandelinians would completely surround them Violet and her sisters seeing the way clear to the rear decided to retreat, but to fool the enemy as to their real intentions they left the place one by one until they were all gone and the enemy had not started up the hill as yet for oversight, and overcaution.

Finally seeing no more shooting going on from the top the glandelinian soldiers started to climb upward slowly, halting every moment in expectation to be fired upon, but finally they reached the top and saw to their mortification that the children had cleverly outwitted them.

By this time the little girls had cleverly worked themselves around to the side of the hill, had recovered their horses and were racing down the road southward before the glandelinians on the top of the hill discovered them.

By this time the little girls were surprised by hearing the redoubled crash of the distant battle, and believed also that they could plainly hear the roar of battle in a more southerly quarter and knew that it was the conflict along general Jack Evans and general Vivian's lines. The glandelinians now started to scramble swiftly down the hill, but by the time they reached the foot they saw that their means of pursuit was gone for the little girls before setting off had dispersed their horses, and it would take fully over an hour to find them again.

The glandelinians were not ignorant of the character of the children however and the leader cried:

"If those dog-gasted Vivian girls are not the cleverest little devils I'll eat my hat. It's certainly impossible to catch them. Why in hell does Manley sent us to capture them. For any way when he ought to know it cannot be done. If he thinks it so easy why don't he go after them himself. I'm true with concluding them for good. What say you men?"

"The same horse they all cried. 'We will never catch them. We are God's foe it is true, and we do hate him and all that is his, but that does not make us ignorant, that no matter what we try we cannot get the best of him. No one can conquer god or his intentions and Manley ought to know it. And I bet Ten thousand million dollars that the christian dogs will whip us in the whole war. And some day Manley will see it is true too. Christianity is as easy to conquer as it is to over-see overcome god and his angels and crazy Manley ought to be clever enough to know it.'"

Though these glandelinians abandoned the pursuit that did not relieve Violet and her sisters from other perils which they were facing. Once upon passing under a group of trees when hearing the son of a zone of the terrible battle a stray shell burst far above them showering them with a blizzard of leaves and sticks and one of the horses received a cut on the head and it was Violet's.

Fortunately however the little girls had not as yet discarded their disguises, and so when progressing a certain distance the came suddenly and without warning upon a squadron of cavalry that was approaching at a tearing gallop. So swift had they appeared that the little girls had been engulfed and surrounded by the mass of gargolians at once, but as the cavalry surprised as at the children's presence and not recognizing them stopped, the leader retorted in a grilly:

"What is the matter with you boys anyway. Are you going dippy?"

"You want to be run down by our horses. Why don't you look out of the way?"

"How could we know you were coming so fast?" Answered voice in a disguised voice.

"That's no excuse." Retorted the officer once more. "You ought to keep to the side of the road and not in the middle." "A

"And don't get away either." Cried a superior officer. "You boys know that is an offense. How did you come to be outside the lines?"

At first Violet and her sisters did not know what to answer to this question but then thinking how they were surrounded by John Evans christian soldiers a little while ago Violet answered:

"Your excellency we were sent on a message, and were captured by some christians probably the men of the army who is attacking us now. We just escaped them, by bribing them who were worse, and telling them lies and so on we belong to the command south of here, not Manley's."

"How comes it that eight of you had to go on the errand?" Asked the other officer. "Our generals generally only sent three or four boys. When I ever seen eight children no matter how they look they remind me of those dog-gasted little Vivian girls, called Violet and her sisters."

"I do not know." Answered Violet truthfully. "But down yonder road just a few minutes ago I observed thirteen boys going toward your lines and that surely is more than eight. But pray who are the Vivian girls? Are they women?"

"Women?" Laughed the leader. "If women would be as fearless as they we could love women no matter how homely looking or pretty they are. Why no those Vivian girls are merely your size, and there are eight of them called Violet, Jennie, Joise, Catherine, Evangeline, Daisy, Nettie and Gertrude Evangeline Vivian. They are eight of the most dog-gasted spies that have ever come within our way, and they are more dangerous, and more dreaded than the strongest Abbieannian armies attacking us."

Violet and her sisters had in the meantime counted the men and saw that there was about five hundred of them. Not being recognized the little girls felt at ease, and said further:

"What would you do to the Vivian girls if you saw them?"

"What would we do except the men themselves." They just bring them here and you see pretty quick. We are Gargolians but we cannot help loving those Vivian girls because their unusual bravery makes us so filled with admiration that we do not know what to do. And if we ran upon them unexpectedly we would not molest them because we don't think it is right. We hope them success in their work, and we would be glad to see the day that they themselves would be wise enough to shoot that damn Manley down like a dog. We hate him worse than a snake. Us Gargolians were fools to join the war. We are truly fierce fighters, and all that but not child butchers as you boy scouts know. Many of our soldiers have perished the little girls because it was duty not murder, and yet they did not realize the intentions of the soldiers and shot many of us down. We are all instructed by Manley to shoot those little heroines down on sight but we'll be damned if we'll do it."

The officers as accented to the words and said:

"If you boys want to remain our friends leave the little girls be and do not persecute them. Us Gargolians have seen the real truth and from now on will never persecute them. And if you see them give them my compliments and tell them that we'll see to it that they do not meet ruin."

And before the astonished little girls could answer the Gargolians rode onward.

They had suspected something of this from Gargolians right along however from experiences with them several times. During the time they had been pursued by the gargolians these soldiers could have easily shot them down if they wanted to and this they had realized, from the fact that when ever pursued by hooded glandelinians, and when these glandelinians were open fire their horses always had been shot down. They had never dreaded these soldiers so much since, never believed what bad things was said about them and never believed that they ever butchered children. They remembered once when Hanson making a speech to his staff officer had concluded with:

"All sects of glandelinians known as the Mo-Hollestonians, Kurds, Orian Kurds, on Orian Kurds, Zivemmanians and Amm Americanians and Gondenians are the worse of the lot they butcher children as cruelly as any wicked rascal could have ever done, driven children off to slavery and make them suffer untold misery, and worse of all they show their wicked fury when ill treating our doctors and Red Cross nurses who attend them when in suffering from wounds and wants, while the gargolian soldiery are only frightful and ferocious in methods of fighting, but have never harmed a child under any conditions and have pursued my noices because of duty. It was gargolians who had said to me once,

"Keep the foolish Vivian girls within your lines and we'll leave them alone. We don't want to persecute them but have to when commanded by Manley. It's the children own fault but not ours."

Hearing the increasing sound of distant battle the Vivian girls came turned on they were heading first toward the east. They had turned in a bend of the road when suddenly meeting them face to face was a other column of Gargolians. They were just now unhooded and Violet and her sisters could have sworn that never in their lives did they see men so had hands looking or so tall and green-skinned in front.

"Hello!" said one of the lieutenants hitting the column of men who were about five thousand in number. "If you had value in valuable your safety you had better keep your distance from the lines for a while. The army had taken the whole of our army by surprise and is attacking Manly's army both on the front lines and in the rear. We are also that the war is lost for we'll never win this do or die battle."

"I thought something was wrong," said Angoldus. "We heard this terrible noise for a long time and thought indeed that it sounded like a battle. But why are you not fighting with the rest of the army?"

"We are going to," was the answer. "Forward men! We have to get there before we get charged with the tardiness of delay."

And off the whole column galloped and the little girls were able to continue on their way again.

"We met the Gargolians twice," said violet. "I hope at least we can keep ourselves clear of the others."

Violet and her sisters now continued on their way as before riding along sometimes at a lively clip and sometimes trotting along slowly, as to avoid suspicion as most of the peasants noted suspicious and they feared that they would be recognized and either seized or shot down without warning. The country here was somewhat hilly and so the little girls for a short out started up one of the foot hills, and then viewing from the top the whole surrounding country, and looked for the direction where the two sections of the battle was raging but all they saw was clouds of smoke north and south of them and puffs of thicker smoke which no doubt were cannons firing or shells exploding. Finally they started down on the other side, and seeing a farm house in the vicinity halted their horses, and violet rode up to the door and knocked. No one answered. Violet then pushed open the door, and going in saw two glandelinian officers sitting at the table playing cards when they should have attended to their duty when their own country was at stake.

"Hey," cried violet. "And the men jumped up with a start. 'Don't you know that Manly's army is being attacked. Where are your divisions?'"

"Say go alone with you and add your own business," growled one of the officers. "We had enough of fighting this morning."

"Well give us something to eat and we won't tell," said violet stepping in also. "We are hungry."

"Why don't you go and steal something on the christian dogs and not come here begging for eats," said another of the officers with a horrible blasphemy which shocked violet and her sisters.

"You are certainly a blasphemer," said violet looking fiercely at the man who had cursed God. "And if you use such language again we'll revenge it and shoot you dead where you are. We are coming in to get something to eat and we'll get it if it is whether you allow it or not."

"What did you say," said the two officers angrily. "You dare turn traitors by shooting one of us down and stealing our food and you'll suffer for it."

"Not from you anyway," said violet. "We are not glandelinian boy scouts but the Vivian girls, and we will accommodate you with being fastened to those chairs by your belt-belts." And the little girls covered them with pistols. The rascals made a menacing movement which predicted a rush but the little girls threatened all the more while Gertrude tired them to the chairs and then they proceeded to ransack the place. Right in front of the enraged Ho-Hollesstinians the little girls ate a hearty meal saying their Two Graces, and blessing themselves devoutly which still more horrified the glandelinians. Then the little girls supplied them selves with the ammunition belonging to the men, and went out leaving them still tied to the chairs.

"Here come back here and tie me and my companion loose," cried one of them wildly. "No one will come this way for a long time and we'll be killed."

"You will cause us no end of trouble is if we release you," said Jennie. "No remain where you are. Some of your comrades will come this way soon and will release you."

The little girls paying no attention to the further shouts of the two officers went their way, and reaching the main road, soon found themselves at the banks of the river near the south bend. At this point they could hear the roar of battle still nearer and louder, it being probably the battle along Jack Evans line, or along the lines under general Vivian, and so the little girls now knowing that they were right continued on more swiftly. Soon far behind them there was a thunderous roar of horses galloping after them and looking behind violet and her sisters saw a swarm of Omarians tearing after them at the highest speed their horses could go.

At once the little girls urged their own horses on full speed, and now the Omarians set up a shout and started firing. Violet and her sisters however rapidly outdistanced their pursuers, but nevertheless they saw that the glandelinians were not giving up, and so the little girls not wishing to make their horses jaded decided upon a trick. They each separated and disappeared to the astonished eyes of the glandelinians who rode up to the place where the fugitives were last seen. Violet and her sisters had outwitted the these glandelinians by going suddenly down eight roads, arched on both sides by thick foliage which completely concealed the fugitives. The foe however seeing the roads and believing that no one of the children could have went any other direction continued the pursuit, divided dividing into eight small parties and going down the eight roads.

But again the little girls had outwitted them for they had all skipped separately across a field and came together once more and the glandelinians continued down the roads a good ways until they at last realized by the disappearance of the horses feet in the road dust that the children had not continued down the roads all the way and so were flabbergasted than ever.

They saw the field however and after uniting their parties together started across in a long line, but the little girls had gained a great distance by this time and were far ahead. The foe however had swept flected horses, and believed surely that it would be no trouble to over take the fugitives, and so raced after them. Violet and her sisters crossing the field reached another road and passed on encountering suddenly a small body of Gargolians who seeing the men racing across the field so wildly, realized that the children were fugitives. They however did not make any attempts to detain them, but continued on their course until the Ho-Hollesstinians and Omarians came up the leader saying to the Gargolian leader:

"Why did you not stop those fugitives? They were the little guttersnipes called the Vivian girls."

"It's your work to catch them not mine," growled the leader. "We fight in the war and so on but do not make war against children. They were not spying on you and so why hinder their joy. I'll not persecute forward men."

The Omarian leader looked surprised and dismayed, but he expected this of the Gargolians and so did not say a word, and ordered the pursuit to be continued. Violet and her sisters during their progress down the road had fairly bumped into another squadron of horsemen, who however detained them for information, and seeing danger violet said:

"If we trust you with a promise will you keep it?"

"Yes we will boys was the answer."

"Well be quick cried violet. "What if a number of little girls were persecuted by a lot of Omarians and they did not do anything to them and were only persecuted because they were wanted for reasons of being murdered?"

The leader realized indeed from this that the Vivian girls were before him and surrounded them with his men just as the others came up.

"You got them I see," cried the leader of the Omarians.

"Yes they bumped right into my men," said the Gargolian leader.

"They are the Vivian girls safe sure enough," said the Gargolian leader who was smoking a cigarette. "As we were busy will you take those little girls to the camp right away. We ask you that because we know nothing will cause you to kill them on sight as they deserve."

"We'll see to it that they are taken care of," said the Gargolian leader.

The Oai Omarians then rode off followed by the Omarians, the Gargolians going down another road. At first violet and her sisters thought they were prisoners in the hands of the Gargolians but as soon as the others were out of sight the leader said:

"Now my little birdies you see what it is for doing a good turn for me when I was so cruel to you. And unveiling himself the little girls were surprised to see that it was the officer called general Boobhead. They knew he had not resigned from his command as expected for his resignation was not accepted and they were glad in one way for it shielded them all the more.

"But we are prisoners any way anyway," said violet. "What more can we expect after you saved us from those murderers?"

"No you little girls are free to go on where you want," said Boobhead. "It was only pretense. We did not want to reveal the truth or those murderers would have taken you children from us by force. You see they were too many. So hurry along little girls. Go to the left of your way on and you will easily find your way to the christian lines without encountering another party of glandelinians."

The party of soldiers then went on their way waving their hands to the little girls who waved their own in answer. The fierce Gargolians had proved to be the children's friend after all. And violet and her sisters were glad.

3190. The roar of battle had increased by this time and this haste hastened the little girls on still faster. Suddenly the little girls found themselves surprised for far ahead of them was approaching a column of panic stricken soldiers who no doubt were worsted by the enemy. Here is where for the first time the little girls showed their real bravery.

"We ourselves must rally them," cried violet.

She and her sisters set their horses going in full speed, and then when near enough violet and her sisters started screaming to them to be brave. The soldiers saw the little girls and tried themselves to turn the little girls to go back for safety but the little girls paid no heed to their entreaties and seizing a flag which a color bearer had, violet and her sisters rushed through the column of confused men and waved it back and forth.

Each of the little girls raced to the very sight of the enemy, forgetting themselves in the excitement, and in their efforts to rally this part of the line which they succeeded in doing, though at once a swarm of men pulled them down from their horses, and carried them to the rear out of danger and then had them sent quickly to general Evans with the tidings of their deed.

Evans was surprised for he saw that the little girls had not only been successful in their errand, but had returned far ahead of time, and even rallied a panic stricken column.

Evans had received this message before violet and her sisters had returned.//////

YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL JACK ANDROS EVANS://////

It is surprising to say that a great army of Abbsennians under general John Evans your brother have taken the enemy under Manley by surprise, by not only preventing him from attacking your rear, but also closing on his own front and rear and crushing his whole army in a five hours terrible struggle. The battle is still raging but Manley's armies are cut to pieces, his two wings are rolled up and his right is gradually being forced back also. A portion of your brother's army has moved far around your army and that of your assailants and will strike your enemies a terrible blow at any time now. You can give credit to your best little sisters the Vivian girls, who have went through great risk to do this for you.

GENERAL CARO.....

He Evans was happy indeed over it all. Violet and her sisters had saved his army and that of general Vivians from defeat, and it did not take Evans long to have the little girls one by one folded in his arms for a short time.

Then he directed the officers to take charge of the line of battle while he raced for general Vivians line to tell him what violet and her sisters had accomplished. Reaching the region of general Vivians line where the firing was something terrible he asked one of the officers who raced up at his reports where he could find general Vivian.

"General Vivian is dangerously wounded your excellency," said the officer shouting. "But believe you could see him."

The officer led the way to the place where general Vivian had been brought. At the highest point of the battle along general Vivians line the attack of the enemy had been so furious that the Christian line had been driven completely into confusion, and in endeavoring to rally the panic stricken columns, general Vivian forgetting himself had seriously exposed himself, and was slumped in the hip, thigh, leg and foot. He was lying or half sitting up by a tree surrounded by a number of his generals still giving directions, from his position, and telling them what to do and so on. He was glad to see the little girls and Evans.

"General it's too bad your are wounded," said Evans regretfully. "And we have such good tidings for you. Manley is crushed by my brother, my assailants are being worsted and dreadfully cut up and will soon be able to push on and carry their own positions and capture the city. And it's all on account of your dear little daughters!"

"You don't tell me," said general Vivian. "Why I did not even think that Manley had gotten around to our rear. How did your brother know it?"

Violet and her sisters went and told him. "Said Evans. 'I sent them to bring him and they did.'"

For a while general Vivian did not know what to say for this news was astonishing but nevertheless he hugged his little children tightly to him and praised Evans for taking such good care of them. Later on as the battle was now progressing the other way, violet and her sisters watched the scene with awe, and then taking up their work at signalling, asked for all their boyscout friends to come and help. The whole swarm went up a high hill to watch the battle from there and each had took his position a long distance from each other and awaited for developments.

From where they were violet and her sisters could see the battle surging back and forth, but just now there was nothing unusual or suspicious going on, and the little girls began to believe it useless to be up there and were about to change their post position, when being behind a ledge of rocks violet and her sisters were startled by hearing a voice suddenly say:

"Those Vivian girls have surely been the undoing of us Landelinians now. They have brought down upon Manley whom we depended on to help us a strong overwhelming force of Abbsennians under John Evans, and now that his army is crushed we cannot hope to force the two Christian positions under Evans and general Vivian though Vivian is wounded."

"But if we wish to win something must be done," said the other man and looking through a clump of bushes violet and her sisters saw six men all generals standing there and there but closely to each other all watching the progress of the battle and talking to each other.

"But what can we do," asked a third general. "There is no way to send a force around the Christian rear for all is too strongly guarded by the artillery."

"See," cried one of the other officers. "Ain't that a suspicious column moving around this hill and going toward Mountain Of Fire De La Gruesse?"

The officers became excited and first straining their eyes to look, then pulled out their eye glasses.

"Abbsennians," they gasped.

"And where are they going?" gasped another.

"I do not know," said the third man. "But their advance is in a suspicious direction."

The officers watched for a few moments and so did violet and her sisters, and then the main leader cried:

"They are moving around to flank general Brunel's army. We must warn him before it is too late."

"You'll do nothing of the kind," suddenly cried violet and her sisters making their appearance to the surprise and dismay of the Landelinian generals. "We are too few however to take you Landelinians prisoners but we can and will prevent you from leaving the hill to warn the foe."

"He! Here you little devils get out of our way or we'll shoot you down like dogs," cried the leader and he ordered his men to separate and rush down on all sides of the hill, but violet and her sisters opened fire as they started to do so, and brought actually all of them down wounded in no time. At the sound of the shots on the hill Roswell Starring, Fredrick, and Drager, and Penrod with several other lads came rushing up from another part and seeing the Landelinians lying there relieved them of their weapons and tied their arms behind their backs with their waist bands.

"You see we can do it when we said so," laughed violet. "But we hope all of you are not seriously wounded. You fools could have averted this if you had listened to our words."

"You little devils shall pay for this defeat," cried the leader.

"And do we look like devils?" said violet. "Why we thought we were such pretty little girls. Are we devils?" She asked turning to Starring with a wink of her eyes.

Knowing that the enemy must have this hill for an outlook station the children did not think it wise to remain here and so descended as quickly as possible, and took up their quarters at another place. Here they watched the battle and observed every movement which was taking place. As they were thus engrossed, violet heard a slight noise behind her and looking back saw a man in the act of drawing one of Starring's guns. Quickly she drew her own gun and covering the man cried:

"Starring look behind you."

He did in amazement, and seeing the man jumped up, while the other sisters did the same.

"You have me so for goodness sakes don't shoot," he cried.

"Oh no we won't shoot," said violet. "We are only playing war and you are playing the leader."

Starring searched the man, and then tying his hands behind his back marched him up to a tree and tied him to it with another band. Then taking the package of paper he found on his person he proceeded to examine it and then showed it to violet and her sisters.....

"What was your intention of drawing Starrings revolver." Asked Fredrick of the man while violet and her sisters were looking at the papers.

"I wished to shoot you christ ian dogs down." Was the surely answer.

"You are a dirty cur to try such tricks." Said Fredrick. "I am sorry that we did not shoot you as you are."

Violet and her sisters looked through package after package and found them all important. One was a letter addressed to Joshua Manley and the others were plans and maps. Just at this moment violet happened to be glancing toward the direction where the great battle was raging, and saw a hill which they were very anxious that the christ ians should get hold of. Should the enemy take possession first all would still be lost. So they proceeded down the rise of ground they had been on and went up this hill. Reaching the top however they saw hundreds of thousands of trees scarred by bullets, and worse of all bullets were flying like hail and the place appeared unsteppable. However the little girls took shelter behind some high rocks and with bullets flying above them, like a storm and humming them a shrieking war song, the little girls started a signal toward the christian lines. At first they could not attract any ones attention, but finally they saw a red and white flag flying along a certain portion of the active line in the rear and gave this information:

"Am on a hill exposed to terrific fire of enemy. If this hill is not occupied soon the enemy will be in possession and will be able to sweep all of your exposed flanks. The vivian girls."

Soon as they received an answer the little girls hurried off from this dangerous place and descended the hill just as a salvoes of shells exploded with a deafening ear-splitting roar high above the summit. The christians were cannonading it and now a large force was seen hurrying forward to take it before the enemy could make possession of it themselves.

The enemy had however in the meantime seen that hill, observed its great importance, and simultaneously a large force of glandelinians were advancing to get it themselves. They were too late however, the abbie anians were there ahead, were in possession and after repulsing the first assault with frightful slaughter were enabled to bring up artillery, and no desperate effort of the enemy could take that hill, thanks to the watchful eyes of little violet and her sisters.....

But still violet and her sisters were keeping their eyes open for other things to happen. They took post of another slight rise of ground this time dangerously near the roaring battle line where they could observe everything that was going on, but at the same time being exposed to the stray bullets of the christ ians which flew everywhere there as thick as snow.

They prevented themselves from being hit by first crawling and lying down at intervals, and then swerved the deadly fire from the hill by signalling to the lines who were on it. But this really put them in peril. The enemy had observed the signalling, and a large body dispatched itself from the assailants and swarmed for that particular hill with the intentions to destroy that signal station at all costs.

Violet and her sisters saw the glandelinians coming, and seeing that their weapons were well loaded, all of the little girls but gertrude started firing, while gertrude signaled their danger. The enemy rushed up the hill step by step despite the fact that the little girls brought down a man at every shot, but the angelinians fortunately saw the signals saw the enemy swarming up that hill, and let those rascals have a shower of shells that tore them down in hundreds and sent the survivors flying for safety. Again and again the enemy tried to get at the bold defenders of the hill, but the artillery of the batteries interfered every time and the Glandelinians finally discouraged gave it up, but some of them signalled to their own artillery battalions, and soon violet and her sisters had to crouch low in a deep ravil ravine as a salvoes of shells were bursting over their heads.

Here violet and her sisters seemed to be caught for good, and they decided to watch out and not let a shell make them. But this shelling was stopped in no time by the christian batteries opening fire upon the glandelinian artillery shelling the top of the hill, and then violet and her sisters were warned by signals to leave the dangerous spot before all the foes between batteries would be concentrated upon it.

Violet and her sisters willingly did so and just in time for at once a hundred shells dropped with frightful reports upon the summit of the hills while the little girls were rising down the side, and it looked as if they were running down the clevery of a active volcano so terrific was the scene and the loud clamor of shell explosions on top which were blowing everything before them. But violet and her sisters had accomplished their purpose and so they now proceeded back toward the safety of the lines.

But here again violet and her sisters were found themselves face to face with an insurmountable peril. As they crossed a creek a squad of retreating glandelinians fired at the little girls and endeavored to catch them when missing their aim. Violet and her sisters were too quick for them, and shot ten of them down and escaped the rest easily. Worse of all for violet and her sisters however shells were exploding everywhere, and they had to pass through a regular inferno like glen, where bullets were whistling a furious concert, and whose shells were screaming and thundering in a frightful manner. But they got through this without any mishap, and soon reached the christ ian lines without any more trouble. The assaults of the enemy finally however had failed at every point. All the utmost fury of the enemy failed to force the christian lines, and they had to give it up and withdraw to defend their own lines from capture.

And the sad rumors of the almost destruction of manleys left and central wings, and the defeat of his whole army unerved this glandelinian army, and all the way of their retreat they fought with the energy of despair, and for a time evans realized it was impossible in his demoralized condition to obtain possession of the enemys works. Nothing as yet had happened to the city and no attempts of the enemy were being made to burn it as yet. Night drawing on the fighting had to cease, but nevertheless Evans kept up such a fierce activity at other quarters of his lines that no surprise could be made by the enemy, and all that while he made preparations to assault the enemys works in the coming of the morning.

During the evening he had received a note which reported the conditions of the enemys lines. It ran as follows:

"YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL EVANS.

The enemy under Manley and Brunselaw is already badly worsted, Manleys armies are almost dissilusioned, and Brunselaws are in a terribly weakened condition. This is our list of prisoners in the attack of on manley and the list of other trophies:

Prisoners: 10,000,000.

Artillery: 10,000 cannons.

Baggage wagons: 10,789 captured.

Small fire Arms: 10,000,786.

All this during the struggle this afternoon with manleys army. Evans crushed his rear and his front in no time and broke up the whole of manleys army and almost routed him. The condition of the enemy at Fountain Of Firens De La Greece is such that if you take advantage of it, you will win a sweeping victory on the morrow. Brunselaws army is in strength and other things as follows:

Army 67,899,888 strong.

Amount of ammunition Almost 0.

Artillery: 1456,789 Pieces. Ammunition almost exhausted.

Cavalry: 1,897,999.

So this proves that you can easily sweep all before you and by your grand victory the enemy will have to abandon all the fort fortifications that guarded vanity and itanis Fair. Yours Truly;

General Darger."

Evans examined this note carefully and then went to find violet and her sisters and see if they were asleep. They were not as yet, having just now finished their supper in his dining tent which he had cooked himself for them.

"We have good luck he" He said as he greet them. "The enemy have almost exhausted their ammunition in their attack upon us and we'll clash them out of their works to morrow."

And he showed them the note.

"Thank God." They cried. "Now we know the war will surely be won."

And they one by one threw their arms around him and kissed him like the loving little girls they were.

Evans himself was elated over the good news and fairly danced with joy and the little girls fairly danced with him.

Morning dawned bright and fair and warm. All night long had been spent in gathering the many wounded and the burying of the dead. The enemy were sure however that the Christians would be contented with the advantage they had gained and that they would not attack themselves. While Evans was sorting out some papers in his room a man was seen standing near him and Violet and her sisters recognized at once this man as an old time enemy and a spy who had been successful many times in his exploits.

He gave a start as he saw the little girls and realized they recognized him and Violet as stepping up to Evans said:

"This man is a treacherous enemy of us little girls, a traitor a spy. This man Evans if is an Arabian spy in disguise. He has sold the secrets from your offices many times and escaped, secrets even from the offices of the Abbasinian governments. He has sold even the Galverinian codes, and the Abyssinkilian codes to a glandolinian agent named Henry Page. If Von Godfret knew what had happened here he would have had this man killed for his treachery."

The spy gasped in amazement. He had lost his tongue so astounding to him was the turn events were taking. Violet gave him no chance to recover but pointing her finger at him continued vehemently:

"And there is other tidings we discovered about that man; he is one of general Germain's private agents."

Being still speechless the glandolinian spy which really he was replied in the only manner he could think of. He sprang up and aimed a swift blow at Violet's face with his fist, which she dodged, Evans being on his feet almost as at the same moment with revolver drawn and covering the enraged glandolinian he exclaimed:

"You rascal if you make another move toward the little girls I will shoot you down like a dog where you stand."

The spy now found his tongue and tried to offer to some explanation but Evans cut him off saying:

"I will not hear a word. You are a scoundrel a spy, and a rascal that ought to be hanged. You are under arrest."

Several men seeing that Evans covered a purple coat with his gun through one of the windows came in and taking in the situation, took hold of the spy and turning to Evans waited for some directions.

"Search him," was Evans order.

This was done and was obeyed in fine style. They found several letters on the man, a large flat piece of package and a bundle rapped up in a cloth. Those were handed to Evans with sharp exclamations and Evans proceeded to examine these. While Evans was examining the contents of these packages and letters the spy suddenly turned upon the three men, knocked them down with one blow, almost threw the little girls to the floor and made a dash for one of the nearest windows. Finding it locked he seized a chair and smashed out the pane but Evans was too quick for him. He sprang at the rascal and bore him to the 1 floor, and pinning his hands to his side ordered the men to get him a rope which he did and with this he tied up the hands of the spy and then jerked him to his feet. The men were enraged from the blows they had received from the rascal, and would have run him through with the bayonet but Evans forbade them to do so saying:

"It is not worth the waste of time boys. He is a spy and will be shot successful or not."

The man was led away by the men and placed under guard until his examination and court was a marshalling should be done.

In the meantime the army was prepared and Roswell Puster Johnston came up and finding Evans inside saluted and greeting the little girls with a cheery good morning asked Evans when the attack should be made.

"You can start it right away if you like," answered Evans. "But cannonade the enemy's lines first before you make the attack at least, so as to test whether they really are short in ammunition or not."

"I'll do so," answered Roswell and after saluting and bowing politely to the little girls he left. Kindermine got his instructions by telegraph, and soon one hundred and sixty six cannon along the whole Christian line broke out in a tremendous uproar, and a long line of exploding shells was observed along the enemy's whole line. Evans kept up the cannonading furiously for quite a while and found indeed that he received a spirit spirited reply. But this did not daunt him, and at eight o'clock he ordered the attack to be made right then.

Violet and her sisters were permitted to go up on the highest hills to watch the Christian charge and so up they went with a large column of their boy scouts and reached it just as the long lines of Christians started for war.

For a time the little girls watched the long billows of Christian Christians sweeping toward the enemy's lines, saw them go across fences and fields and still not a speck of smoke came from the enemy's lines. Onward and still onward pressed the red and purple lines, and now Violet and her sisters saw Roswell Puster Johnston's army starting to surge forward at another quarter and as soon as these had extended for miles along the fields, and gone across half way, then appeared Kindermine, and Richardson's platoons, and all these combined swept on ward toward the quiet and sinister lines of the glandolinian army. Still all was silent and now the assaulting party which had gone out first reached within some hundred yards of the enemy's parapets.

All at once it was sheeted in smoke and flame, there came a tremendous earthshaking roar that shocked Violet and her sisters to the heart, and almost paralyzed them with the sound, the hill shook beneath them, the leaves in the trees though there was not the slightest wind blowing stirred violently, and the little girls thrown off their feet by the concussion saw a good portion of the first Christian wave fairly melt away.

One line halted, other still pressed on then halted too, and suddenly let loose the same awful uproar of masonry themselves, while Kindermine's forward columns seeing the sudden firing of the enemy along the extreme left, and the terrible decimation of Charles Brown's divisions began to move forward more slowly and firing as they went.

"I don't believe the enemy exhausted their ammunition," said Violet. "And I think Darger was mistaken. I--"

At this moment one of her boy scouts came riding up to her and saluting said general Glannon is coming up to see you little girls."

Up came the general and he said:

"Evans has told me to tell you little girls to watch any suspicious movements of the enemy. Last night the foe received ammunition and heavy reinforcements, and are resisting us more fiercely than we expected. We can force them if no force of their own moves around our flank. I'm going to signal to the nearest signal stations and find out if John Evans is able to advance. If so I'll have him come and strike the enemy's position in the rear."

"I'll watch every movement," said Violet. "And so will my sisters."

The officer saluting galloped away to work out his second duty.

In the meantime while the assault of the Christians was now on in general Evans received this note:

"YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL K JACK AMBROSE EVANS.

FROM YOUR BROTHER JOHN EVANS:

I have defeated the enemy under Manley yesterday, but was unable to prevent him from retreating southward, and he has joined general Brunesslav's army during the night, and received reinforcements from glandolinia also. I learned of your intentions of attacking him, and so while you do so I'll move my armies around the enemy's rear and take his forces in flank, and while I do this you can then force your whole army upon him. I'll let you know why when the blow is struck. Your loving and kind hearted brother; GENERAL JOHN EVANS.

UNDER ORDERS AND COMPLIANT FROM YOU OR HANSON."

This again was good news for general Evans and now he knew for sure that for the foe the battle was lost. In the meantime Violet and her sisters watched every column of Christian soldiers who swept toward the enemy's lines and saw that Evans indeed was meeting with serious resistance. But no suspicious movements were being made by the enemy, and despite the strong resistance it was evident that the assault was on the verge of success for though he was later in advancing than the others Johnston was already in possession of a portion of the enemy's works and holding it against a fearful attack that was being made by the enemy in series of gigantic waves. Violet and her sisters felt like cheering when they saw this occurrence and signaled to Evans the good news. For a time now all was hidden from the little girls by immense clouds of smoke, and then to the surprise and sorrow of the little girls they saw the monstrous Christian columns flowing back firing furiously as they went. Evans knew this would happen however, and their signalling was headed. Violet and her sisters saw a monstrous swarm of gray pouring forward against the recoiling lines in purple and red, and ever and anon the firing of both sides obscured everything to the view of the children.

Now Violet and her sisters felt better for they saw that Howell's master Johnstone's lines were rallying, and starting to press forward again, and even the little girls forgetting themselves seized one of the regimental flags that the boy scouts carried and started waving it when starting pulled it out of Violet's hands saying:

"Don't do it Violet or we'll have the whole Glandelinian hell upon us. If they see that flag waving here they'll think the Christian troops are charging from here also and will open fire with all their artillery upon us and we'll all be killed."

"That's right too," said Violet. "But we did not think."

The other Christian columns were now starting to rally and Evans himself started to move his whole line forward. Suddenly Violet and her sisters looking in another direction with their field glasses saw to their surprise and excitement a long stream of men in red moving southward far to the east. It was John Evans' army about thirty miles away and they were heading for the attack they were going to make on the enemy's flank.

All for a time seemed nil for Evans' violent assaults. Frightful assault had been made again and again on the enemy's lines and the enemy had opened fire of such intensity as to scath the most intensive lines of the Christians and still they had continued the attack until counter charged by the enemy. Suddenly Evans looking through his glasses saw the enemy moving forward in a mighty body as if coming forward in a wild charge but all seemed a storm of confusion and he wondered what was up. He started to telegraph to all officers in a mad hurry, and Violet and her sisters observed the same watched closely.

On pressed the mighty column and then back it went again the Christians pressing forward. Ten times this surprising scene was repeated, and then using their glasses Violet and her sisters looked further to the south. But they could not see anything, though they felt that it was the blow struck on the enemy's flank. Indeed it was. Placed between two fires the enemy's army were driven first down upon those massive assailants in front, and these in turn drawing backwards for a short distance from the pressure only turned to the charge with redoubled fury and such confusion that prevailed could never be correctly described.

Evans realizing the truth also threw his full army forward to help those in front while then receiving a note sent this message to General Vivian:

"Your Excellency General Vivian;

"The battle is won for Evans my brother has again struck the enemy on the flank. It is still raging but nevertheless we'll soon have their works. If you are feeling better to day I would advise you to come along with us to the city for I believe we'll be in possession this very evening. Come and see how the enemy are in confusion. They are literally driven wild with it.

Your great Friend

of the Army of Angelina and Abbeaudia. C.D.E.S.A.

General Vivian received the note with pleasure and as he was not half so seriously wounded as he was reported to have been he got on his horse with the help of his men and viewing the scene through his glasses, became wild with joy and praising God with hymns and prayers, and exultations finally ordered his own large army forward, and this new assault fairly crushed the enemy's right wing. Caught as they were between two fires the Glandelinians fought with the utmost fury of desperation, counter charging a hundred times that fearful bloody afternoon but their columns were shot down by the whole sole line twenty miles long a score of times were annihilated, and the whole line the entire main line though already crushed to fragments foolishly fought on. Nightfall finally brought the struggle to an end and the enemy were still in possession of their own works. They had held their works against all the most furious onslaughts of the Christian line as successfully as if they had won on them a gloriously fought victory, but nevertheless they were badly beaten. Early in the night Evans decided to press on and did so. The enemy had already abandoned their positions early without resistance any longer, and started off toward the south many of their torn and mangled divisions retreating through the city and leaving their millions of wounded behind to the mercy of the Abbeaudians. On pressed Evans and toward night his army was in possession of the city and once more Violet and her sisters were in the city also. All the inhabitants had fled at the first news of the enemy's defeat, and so there was no one there, and so quick had the inhabitants fled that they abandoned everything taking nothing with them but what they had on.

Millions of dollars worth of goods fell into the possession of the Christians, provisions and eatables for the army, and clothing and materials of all kinds. It would have been a great scene to see so many Abbeaudian soldiers trying on the Glandelinian shoes, and other clothing material and Violet and her sisters also had a pair of new clothes and shoes besides anything that they needed and wanted. All materials were taken possession of by the Abbeaudians, books worth reading were saved and those not worth reading made big bonfires bonfires which Violet and her sisters enjoyed to their hearts content.

The battle had indeed turned out as a glorious victory for the Christians and the enemy had abandoned every section of fortified works within reach of the great city which had escaped destruction on the request of Violet and her sisters.

And the little girls had some fine sleeping quarters too believe believe me sleeping quarters better than the best king or any lords or rich people could have ever enjoyed though Violet and her sisters belonged to poor parents who were or had been rich themselves before the war broke out.

CHAPTER NINE.
WHAT THEY THOUGHT OF THE GREAT BATTLE.

THE results of the great battle of Fountain Of Pirene De La Grece was simply tremendous. It had caused the defeat of two great and main glandelinian armies, simultaneously, the sudden fall of all the fortifications around Titanic Fair and insured to the christian side that the war really was going their own way and was going to stay their own way that it was lost for glandelinia's cause, and that all child slavery would soon be done away with.

Violet and her sisters were astonished at the way the great battle had turned out and especially more so astonished at the violence of the battle itself and of the unspeakably heavy losses occasioned by it. To them it was like another Jennie Turner or Francis Atlanta and also it ended to grandly in behalf of the christian cause that the little girls were overcome with excitement and joy.....

During the evening of the next day after the bloody battle Evans entering the room where Violet and her sisters were occupied asked them what they thought of the great fighting just passed....

"Why it's just grand," said violet. "We have seen many battles and went through their horrors and experiences but have never observed a battle like this one which raged so long fully four days. We term it another Francis Atlanta, and do marvel how two great glandelinian armies one under general Brunelaw Paszyński, and general John Manley, were thrashed so tremendously and so quickly and simultaneously. And we at first believed that the situation looked so serious for us that all was lost, and that the glandelinian armies would quickly drive us out of glandelinia and win the war after all our trouble and efforts we have made to go as far as we did in our successes."

"The battle was certainly a great one," said Evans himself. "And fiercer than I had ever expected it ever would be. But no matter how sanguinary it was we won just the same, and won a glorious victory at that."

"And what makes us think of it more and more is because it caused the other armies to be enabled to capture the fortifications around the city of Titanic Fair," said Joice.

"And how many forts were there guarding the city?" asked Evans who had forgot the actual number of the fortifications.

"We have forgotten," said Angeline. "But then there were over a hundred and all great forts too. And our armies won these forts without any blood shed either. Now surely I don't doubt but that we'll win the war to a finish and crush glandelinia down her on her knees."

"There is one thing that we think about the great battle," said Nettie Vivian. "We have been advancing and fighting nearly day after day since the Abbieannian and Angelinian armies commenced the invasion, and we have not been checked ourselves hardly, though the other armies lost many battles before they could progress very far. This great battle of Fountain Of Pirene De La Grece now enables us to advance full upon glandelinia itself and we believe it's you Evans who will besiege that city and bring the war to a speedy termination. This battle has actually opened your way to the enemy's capitol, and if you don't receive any more checks during your march your armies will be the first ones to get there. Bloody as it was this battle nevertheless has been a fortunate occurrence for your armies are far in advance of the others."

"Yes it's true and there's our uncle, and general Everett True and King Cannon," said Oct Gertrude Angeline. "They are still held at bay at Easter Starring, and all the western armies of Abbieannian and Angelinian though they are winning battles are far behind and would not reach the city of glandelinia for a year from the serious resistance they are meeting. We are the only ones who have advanced so far your army and papas. And we give great credit for your brother John Evans too. He helped you to win the great battle of Fountain Of Pirene De La Grece."

"Put how did you accomplish your mission so soon as you did?" asked Evans of Violet. "Then I sent you you was not sure whether you would return until that evening and it was not three o'clock yet when you were back within the christian lines."

"We know we got back so quick alright," said violet. "Put we ourselves do not know how we ever done it. We had little trouble too, and only three times were pursued by the glandelinians. The Gargolians themselves appeared very good to us whether they recognized us or not. And we thought they were such bad men."

"No one claimed they were bad soldiers as far as I know," said Evans. "Put they are well noted for the terrific charges they make, and their fury of fighting. It's the plain gargolians who were well suited for good conduct and for their refusal of obeying the commands to murder helpless children. Those we got to look out for are the Gargolian Kurds."

"Gargolian Kurds?" asked violet. "Why we did not know there were two kinds."

"There are four kinds," said Evans. "Omarian Kurds, Mo-pollestinian Kurds, Zimmermannian Kurds and Gargolian Kurds. All four sorts of gargolians dress different in uniforms. The plain Gargolians who are good dressed themselves in long robe robes like overcoats of deep gray color and wear hoods over their heads. The Zimmermannian Gargolian Kurds, dress like you probably observe before the war like devils. They are well known for the bloodcurdling slaughters of all helpless peoples they have committed, and of the horrible ways they gut the bodies of children they slay. They are the only ones who would slay children like this. They are all fierce and frightful savage fighters equal as fierce as the Zimmermannians and Mo-pollestinian soldiery, and can lick ten Abbieannians pitched onto one of themselves."

"The Omarian Kurds called the Damarian Gargolians are the worse of the lot. They do also hood themselves but are dressed in coats and pants like the Omarians and are as fierce and as savage as the very dervish demons in hell. It's mostly these frightful Omarians who give the terrifying

"Devil Yells and they are as cruel as the Mo-pollestinians themselves to children in massacres, and put them the same as the Zimmermannian Kurds though do not always do it. The Mo-pollestinian Kurds are we very little known and whether the massacred children during the war no one knows. They are the ones who have pursued your little girls relentlessly, and probably when you took for Omarian Kurds. Watch all Gargolian soldiery closely the next time you see them and you'll observe the difference in many."

"We saw many of you during the battle just passed," said violet. "Some appeared like Zimmermannian Kurds and some were under Boobhead whose resignation was refused. Yet they saved us from our Omarian pursuers."

"But they must have been plain Gargolians," said Evans. "But I can tell what they were for real if you explain this question to me how were their hair fixed?"

"Every one had their hair bobbed short, and had black hoods slung down over their shoulders," said violet. "They were fierce and savage looking men armed with long lances, and sabres four feet and a half long he besides two long braces of pistols. Some of them were fairly dressed like Arabians."

"Then it must have been Boobhead who saved you and his men for facts at that," said Evans.

"And they waved their hands in a friendly manner at us," said violet going on with her story. "And some of them even wished us very good luck. From their fierce looks however we had at first been suspicious of them as they hardly looked like Gargolians. But they dressed like them."

"Something must have changed them, probably it was Boobhead," said Evans. "They are the Mo-pollestinian Kurds or Gargolians. I believe if it had not been for Boobhead's ways with those under his command all would have been off with your little girls. Only those under his control have got so that they will not harm christian children. But is only those under him and no one else."

"We were lucky then," said violet. "We thought they were some kind of Mo-pollestinians, because of their dress and the form of their hair and head wear. And there were about 10,000 of them."

"We met other Gargolians who were only hooded but whose uniforms were more soldier like," said Jennie. "Those probably were the plain Gargolians. We asked them what they would do to us if they knew where to find us not saying of course that we were the very children themselves. The way they spoke about us, Vivian girls surprised us and made us feel that we were mistaken about the bad news of Gargolian cruelty to helpless children."

"Put the main thing we marvel over is the battle just past." Said little Daisy Vivian. "But though we did win that great battle how do we know whether we will still win the war or not?"

"And what makes you say and think that?" Asked Violet. "It opens the way to the city of Glandelinda for Evans!"

"I don't think so." Said Daisy. "And I remember Hanson declared to Evans in one of his last letters that if Bristle Toe Station is not captured and the enemy lines forced all Christianity would be checked, and the enemy would be given time to rally and gather against us in such tremendous force that we could not withstand it, and even if all that did not win the war for the enemy, and if to the Glandelindians would lose it for sure, Hanson's failure would lengthen the war for another year or probably two years, and we want to end it as soon as possible."

"I believe you are right Daisy." Said Evans. "And I do not know how long it will take Hanson to force the enemy back either. A mob of pullers army is stationed there with general Manley, and while Manley had escaped us despite his defeat already at Fountain of Fire De La Grace he is as reports came in to me retreating toward Bristle Toe Station to relieve General Manley."

Indeed Violet and her sisters thought much about the battle and its immediate effects. They thought of the way the battle had raged, how long it has continued, the tremendous charges they had witnessed those four terrific days of fighting, made by the enemy and the Christians also and thought of the results the battle would make. But the words and sayings of Evans was contrary to what they had expected. Why was it that so many of the other Christian armies were able to forge ahead unchecked, though having been defeated in many battles, and yet Hanson was unable to move forward against Bristle Toe Station, and had also been checked and seriously defeated in a number of severe battles along the Easter Starring? They could not understand the reason at all. They were puzzled at the check that even fierce King Gannon was meeting, being unable to move to the aid of Hanson's army. Turning to Evans Jennie asked;

"Evans how far does general Hebaum Manley's army extend in front of Bristle Toe Station?"

"His army is not extending in front of Bristle Toe Station at all and never has been driven there as yet." Answered Evans. "I am saying that Hanson your uncle is or has been making fierce attempts to get there and drive the enemy from that point but had been completely unsuccessful in a number of great battles at the Easter Starring Run. Manley's armies are extended before Hon Catherine De La Poer Berestford."

Violet and her sisters gasped in dismay and surprise. "Good God if something isn't done quick enough all will be lost." Said Evangeline. "Manley must not be allowed to make a junction with his brother. If he succeeds in doing so it will be fatal for our cause."

"It is true but where is the army that is to check him?" Asked Evans seriously. "My brother followed his army as fast as possible but cannot catch up with him. I dreaded the outcome. We shouldn't have let the rascal escape."

"Couldn't you warn Hanson of the fact?" Asked Gertrude.

"I've tried to but cannot get any communications with him."

Violet and her sisters pondered for a few minutes upon the situation and then thinking of something said;

"Where is Everett Trues Army situated?"

"At Condon Bandonia."

"Do you think we could get there ourselves and see what could be done?"

"I wouldn't let you little girls go there for all the money or success that would be heaped upon the Christianians." Said Evans sternly. "Do you little girls realize what you are thinking of doing? If you little children are against suicide you will not attempt this rash thing."

"Why is it so dangerous as that?"

"Certainly."

"But couldn't we use an airship or airplane?"

"It would not do any good at all little girls. Their cannons could bring any airship down within range, and those too far up would be checked so furiously by the enemy airships that escape or destruction would be certain to be impossible to escape from. And the enemy are scanning the country everywhere with their cavalry."

"Our cause is at stake then." Said Daisy. "If it is as bad as that we might as well pack up and go home." "I believe this was caused by some one blundering in Hanson's army too. It's very unusual and even tantalizing that our Uncle whom we trusted more than general Vivian in leading his armies successfully should be so seriously and dangerously checked at Bristle Toe Station by such an inferior force of the enemy. If something cannot be done to communicate with Everett Trues and his army we'll go there if it is such to do so."

"What do you say if I would change my course then and move to reinforce Hanson, and let my brother take care of Manley?" Said Evans. "How would that do?"

"It would be just as bad to change off your course as it is to see Hanson to be so continuously checked." Said Jennie.

"But that is the only thing that could be done." Said Evans. "No matter whether you are a brave enough to make any attempt to go to Everett Trues army or not I am under instructions from your father to take care of you little girls and prevent you or from running into any unnecessary danger and so I would not permit you little girls to make the trip to that region."

"If it's as hazardous as you say we would not attempt the trip anyway." Said Violet. "For what is the use of us trying to do something that we know is utterly impossible?"

Just at this moment general Oswald Buster Johnston came in with three new Christian generals who had just arrived. Evans arose at their entrance and after saluting in answer to theirs said;

"What brings you here? Nothing serious I hope?"

"No." Answered the great general. "But these three generals are new to this army having arrived here just this morning. They were sent here by general Williamson Zimmermann, as he knows you are scarce in general officers, as so many fell in the preceding battles."

"Has Zimmermann got any armies opposing him just now?" Asked Evans.

"Not just now." Answered Oswald Buster Johnston. "Why do you ask?"

"For good reasons." Answered Evans. "John Manley had escaped our armies on account of the other barring our way southward under general Prunslaw and he is advancing fast in an effort to make a junction with his brother at Hon Catherine. I thought if Zimmermann was not too far away with his army he could advance by an easterly, and then southeasterly course, and come around by the south of Bristle Toe station and hold Manley off before it was too late. If Manley makes a junction with his brother the war is lost. We must keep the Manleys separated so for good now you know if we wish any success, and to keep up the success we have already gained."

"It couldn't be done." Said Oswald. "All must be depended upon from Everett Trues. Zimmermann is two hundred and eighty miles south west of us, and or northwest of us - mean and cannot reach that place in time. Why not find out how far the distance is from us to Everett Trues army and then send your little girls to tell him since I know you as a nun cannot get into communications with him?"

"I know the distance and I know the place." Said Evans. "But if I send the little girls on their way to destruction what will I be? Nothing doing. I proposed to march that way myself and reinforce general Vivian. Hanson but Violet and her sisters would not hear of it. And I cannot spare general Vivian, because I need his help badly. All we can do is to have recourse to God. He'll enlighten Everett Trues of the danger some way."

At night Evans and all his officers assembled in his headquarters, and Violet and her sisters were seated at the center of the table. Evans related to the officers what the little girls thought of the great battle, and then told them all how Manley had escaped, where he was heading for and how futile it was to try any efforts to get into communication with Everett Trues, and also related what the intentions of the little girls had been.

"Where is Everett Trues army?" Asked kindhearted me.

"At Condon." Answered Evans.

"Why that is not far from where Manley is heading for?" Said Richardson Halsted. "If that fool don't know of the near presence of Everett Trues he will collide with his army before it is too late, and be defeated in every detail. Between the city of Pottigazeeza and Condon lies the stream of water called Arokanobis, or Pyar for us. If Manley gets caught by Everett Trues there he will be placed between two fires and crushed entirely. I'm sure that Manley will never reach Hon Catherine."

"Can't be too sure about that." Said Fredrickson parson. "Manley has a force twice as large as Everett Trues, and it may not turn out so good at that. We must in person watch John Evans and if he keeps in touch with Manley, and arrives there quick enough he could help Everett Trues but Everett Trues cannot do the work alone. He would sacrifice too much of his army and he surely don't want to see his army slaughtered like rats in a trap."

"Yet if Manley reached his brother at Hon Catherine and makes a junction with him our invasion will be thus threatened with serious disaster." Said Evans.

"Put there is some way to prevent that." Said General Richardson halted himself....

"How?" Asked Evans.

Halted produced a map or at least he pulled out of the table drawer a geography of the country of Glandelinia.... He turned page after page hastily and then reaching a certain map threw it over to Evans Evans and said to him.

"There is the town of Gordon on the northeast corner of that map you see there. Well we are still in possession of Fountain Of Pirene or Pirene de la Greece. Well stretching from our positions, to Gordon are the towns of Rosebud, Matilda, Katie Kent and Punchinello. I'm sure these towns are in possession of christian armies and if we could telegraph to the town of Rosebud the morning they would telegraph to town after town until Everett True at Gordon would receive it. How about trying it Evans?"

Evans looked closely at the map and saw that it was true. Violet and her sisters also got a view of the map and said to Evans:

"Please make the try any way. It would hurt nothing even if we don't succeed."

"Yes I guess I will." He answered and he summoned the man who attended the telegraph and writing down this message to Gordon said:

"Telegraph this letter to the town of Rosebud and ask them to telegraph it to the next town until Everett True at Gordon receives it. Hurry and do not delay...."

The man saluted and went out with the message in his hand. They all waited for his return. Five minutes passed, then ten, then twenty, and thirty and still he did not come. Just as all the officers were getting anxious he returned.

"Well demanded general Evans arising.

"Good news." He cried. "Our worries were foolish. Hansons far reaching scouts discovered the threatening danger, and reported the fact to him early this morning. Hanley will not only fail to reach Mon atherine but if he don't halt his advance he'll run run plump into an ambush. Evans has got around Bristle toe Station by making a swift detour around and across the place, and is moving northward in front of Hanley while Hanson is throwing his left wing across Bristle toe Run, and is moving other forces between Pottsgassessa and Arokanobis. This is the report that I received from Everett True. And we are better off than ever. Everett True said that King Cannon pressed his advance two days ago after a terrible battle at Mary Hedda junction, and also fought and won another frightful battle at Durmad and Cape Casper Junction. He is only a mile from Hansons lines and in reinforcing Everett True also. We are in luck too for Everett True destroyed a Glandelinian army at Gordon."

All of the officers fairly jumped up at the news. Evans snatched the paper out of the mans hand and looked at the message which he had received and saw that the mans report was true.

"Maybe we could go there ourselves." Said Violet. "I don't think it is so dangerous after all if we can communicate with those four towns so easily. If they are in possession of the christians why shouldn't we visit King Cannon or Uncle once. Evans you will be inactive for a long time now. Why not leave Oswald master Johnston in main command of your armies and come with us. We are simply asking to go."

"Can't do it without Hansons permission." Said Evans shaking his head. "But if you little girls want to go you can."

"But we like to have you with us." Said Jennie. "We love you so that we have hate to go alone without you. I--"

"Oh General Evans." Cried an officer who had just dashed in all covered with dust. "I've a message for you from general Hanson himself. Here is it."

Evans noticed that the officer seemed quite excited but he took the message and opening the sheet of paper read it's contents.

"More surprises." He said.

"What is it?" Asked Violet and her sisters while the officers looked at him inquiringly.

"I'm afraid I'll have to hurt your feelings you dear little girls." Said Evans. "But it's my orders and I cannot help it. In this note I got the dickens from Hanson for sparing the city of Fountain Of Pirene de la Greece. He orders me to destroy all no matter how beautiful and magnificent a place is saying that in despoiling our countries the enemy spared nothing whatever. So why should we spare theirs. I hate to do it Violet and your sisters and I'm afraid it'll break your hearts but I cannot help it." He showed them the note.

Violet and her sisters did not know what to make of the letter. Hanson from his statement had evidently been very angry because the city was spared by Evans and his army, and Violet and her sisters realized that they had been responsible for it.

"We can make atonement for it." Said Violet. "I'll telegraph to Hanson that it was our fault and tell him why we wished the city to be spared." She did so but it took her a long time before she could get an answer from the first town she telegraphed at. Finally she got this answer:

"Hansons army-----situated ---at Lady Decis--- --Communications---with him---forbidden just now---by his authority---who ---who---are---you who want to ---get---into communication ---with ---him?"

Violet and her sisters were all there in the room and she explained to them what the answer was that she had received and then she sent back the answer in as short a space as possible:

"This is Violet Vivian---her niece---I must talk to---him---and won't go away---until I ---speak to ---him---Please get him and get him quick---who ever you are---or we'll charge you with not doing your---duty."

Again she waited for an answer. For a long time nothing came back and she began to think something was wrong.

"Something must be wrong." Said Jennie. "Or maybe that person does not want Hanson disturbed."

At this moment the telegraph started ticking. It was from Hanson as the light little girls knew from the producer. After conversing with him for a moment they confessed that they had spared the city because they adored it and that it was not his fault. Again there was silence for a moment and then Hanson answered back:

"I appreciate your goodness little nieces of mine---by revealing that it---was your---doing. ---But just the same there is no way---out of it at all.---The foe destroyed everything on us---in a most wanton---way and I'll spare nothing no matter how---beautiful it is.---If we do it the foe---will think we are becoming easier and will take advantage of it.---Tell Evans---it like good little girls ---that the city must---burn at once---and that he must resume his advance as soon---as possible."

YOUR LOVING UNCLE

AT HON CHERISH."

Violet and her sisters told Evans what they had done and then said:

"You might as well leave the city and set it aflame." Said Violet.

"We hate to see it but then it is well deserved. If the foe surrendered at this moment and the war was over then probably Hanson would not have ordered this. We'll have to leave by to-morrow."

The council was soon over however and the generals prepared themselves for bed it being the last night that they would have their sleeping quarters in the city. Evans himself however did not care much about the city and felt that Violet and her sisters were foolish to have had him spare it when it ought to have burned like the rest. And what did the enemy spare in Angolinia or Calverinia? Nothing at all. All went before their destructive war and even his own home had been burned and destroyed by the glandelinians, and his father and mother and sisters being murdered by the brutal Me-Hollensteinians. And Evans had not forgotten the frightful scenes he had witnessed in the ruined cities smitten down or blown and shattered to ruins by the cannon fire of the enemy, during the great battle of Aronburg Run or Glorinda, where it was reported that the velocity of the air waves and earthquake waves caused by the most frightful concussion was almost estimated at about a mile or a mile and a fraction a second or five thousand two hundred eighty miles an hour.

Violet and her sisters still pondered upon the effects of the battle just passed, and when they themselves thought of the scenes they had witnessed at Glorinda they began to feel that they had made a mistake in asking for the city of Fountain Of Pirene De La Greece to be spared, and now began to wish, that they had not done it. For a while they lay awake in their beds thinking of it all and also of the battle, and how they wished that the war was coming to a close. They knew that the glandelinian armies were still strong and powerful and feared somewhat that something serious would happen before the war ever ended.

In the meantime Evans was sitting up in his room not at all as yet having retired as he was pondering upon the results of his discovery of Angelinas good luck, when a heavy sack suddenly fell over his head and he was thrown violently to the floor. Who ever his assailant was he did not know but he was too quick and powerful to allow such a small surprise get the best of him, and after a valiant effort he managed to get to top of his adversary and then removed his hood which had been thrown over him. "For the love of God Kindernine what means this." Gasped Evans as he turning on the light which had been out discovered it was him. "Why did you assault me your best friend."

"No need of questions just now." Said Kindernine breathing hard and worked up to great excitement. "It was a mistake of mine on account of the darkness of your room. I thought you was a spy. We looking for one who is in this very building, and have the place guarded so no one can get out until he is captured. You leaned so far over the table in the darkness that I not seeing the color of your uniform and not recognizing your face but seeing by your shape that you was a powerful man threw this sack over your head with the intention of strangling you."

"We'll have to get him." Said Evans. "Have you got the room of violet and her sisters well guarded?"

"You bet I have." Answered Kindernine just as several officers came into the room. He ordered the officers to send for general Oswell Gustaf Johnston, and then both he and Evans arising the whole house by pulling a big bell he they saw in the hall strode toward violet's room and saw that the little girls were up and aroused by the excitement.

"What's the excitement all about?" Asked violet as Evans came in.

"There is a glandelinian spy in the place and we are looking for him." Answered Evans. "I did not know it until Kindernine told me. I had my room in darkness and he mistook me for the spy and threw me to the floor. See that your weapons are in good order little girls and for God's sakes don't let no one in your room no matter who he is."

Evans then closing the door softly after him went down the stairs into the reception room and just as he turned on the light saw two feet disappear under the council table.

"There's your man Kindernine!" He whispered pointing under the table and with that with one shove he turned over the table, and there within full view was a grayed out graycoat with pistols drawn.

He saw that resistance was useless however and arising to his feet he surrendered himself meekly.

"Well." Said Evans. "What's the meaning of your presence here." The man was silent. At this moment violet and her sisters having heard the crash of the table being overturned appeared in their nightgowns.

"Who is he?" Asked Jennie. "I think he looks familiar."

The man started when he saw the little girls, and made as if to bolt for the window but a sinister expression in Evans face made him think twice before attempting to do so.

"You are here for some purpose." Said Kindernine. "But what it is we probably cannot get out of you. But you are nevertheless a sneaking spy and now we don't spare spys even is not successful." He called several soldiers who were looking on into the open window to come and take the man which they did! On him was found a important paper which Evans examined and found evident proof from what it stated there that it was a good deal wiser to burn the city, for if it should stand without ruin glandelinia would recover from the mere fact of it and rally in such fury as nothing could withstand.

Violet and her sisters had begged Evans to spare the spy from being shot down in cold blood, but Evans said that they ought to appeal to general Hanson and not him for it's Hansons orders now and that he would be disobeying Hansons command to let the spy go without the severe punishment.

"All the glandelinians who go out on spying trips and exploits really know the consequences if caught, and it's up to them if they are so anxious to die." Said Evans. "And why appeal for such rascals as the glandelinian spies who not only spy on us when doing their dirt dirty work but also spy on the very intentions of god himself. Such rascals deserve to die the death of a dog. If Hansons orders are disobeyed you know what the penalty would be right away. Can't do it and if you want the spy saved you must appeal to him."

Violet and her sisters knew it was useless then for to appeal to Hanson was like appealing to a starved tiger to spare its victim which it is already got within its grasp. And so they let the matter drop. But how they wished the war was over and all it's horrors. This cruel war was as it seemed fiercer than anything ever heard of before, no earthquakes, typhoons or volcanic eruptions could have caused all the damage it did, and caused such heavy losses of lives, nay to them it seemed that it was worse than even the end of the world. And why shouldn't the world end when such horrors continued. The war was already in duration for over three years and a half, and seemed to be growing fiercer and fiercer. If it would end soon when then their thoughts turned back again to the great battle of Fountain Of Pirene De La Greece, and they wondered if any more battles would turn out like that one did. From the excitement and experience of the night none of the christian generals could see sleep another wink and neither could violet and her sisters, and so Evans decided to start the advance southward right away, and burn the city as soon as the christians had all left it.

He gave the orders at once, and while preparations were being made Evans told violet and her sisters that the advance would be resumed before morning, and that they had better prepare and get all their belongings together, and the Abbeannians cannot delay.

At this news Violet and her sisters at once dressed themselves, gathered together everything they had and then went out with Evans and the other christian generals. Everything belonging to the city was taken off by the soldiers all kinds of pictures, everything that was eatable, and bedding, besides every article of furniture that could be carried by the army, and then the main army outside the city already being on the march the soldiers in the city lined up and to the command forward off they were, while general Baldwin remaining behind with his artillery was preparing his guns to shell the city into ruins, as soon as the command would be signalled to him by Evans.

A desperate attempt was made by a glandelinian army near that vicinity to prevent Baldwin from shelling the city, but in vain Baldwin repulsed their attack almost destroying the army, capturing the few survivors as prisoners and marching them off as prisoners.

Evans army soon started in full marching order, violet and her sisters going with Evans and the main christian generals in person. It took three hours before they were out of the Abbeannian city, and then when far enough violet and her sisters heard a great thundering noise behind them, and looking back saw the once beautiful city crumple into abject ruins. It was a sad sight to the little girls and for the first time violet and her sisters felt that Hanson was rather little cruel in his warfare, but did not say how they felt to Evans. Evans however delighted in the destruction of the city and so did the other christian generals who looked on the scene however with some awe. In the afternoon Evans halted for the arrival of Baldwin's army, but he did not arrive until late in the evening, and Evans already was confronted by a new glandelinian army under Ah Annie-Wad.

As soon as Baldwin arrived Evans being advised to refuse any obstacle stop his advance now, decided to push on despite the fact that a new army was in his way, and did so Ah-Annie-Wad however not showing any resistance as was expected, but retreating before Evans advance. Ah Annie-Wad was a wise general despite his true or peculiar name a good fighter, but he was also not a reckless man, and he knew just now that it was useless to oppose so great an Abbeannian army, and so continued his retreat, though several times he threatened Evans seriously on the left wing.

Violet and her sisters loved to see the sights of the country which they had already observed since the start of the invasion on invasion and it was the first time in any war that so beautiful a city like Fountain Of Pirene De La Greece was destroyed by glandelinian enemies. In the war of 1841 Abbeannia spared it at the request of other nations, and other nations who warred in earlier centuries spared it but Evans did not. It was a fact that surprised the whole world, and they realized that now the Abbeannians were mad clean through, aroused before to high pitch by the scenes they witnessed in Calverthia and now aroused still more by the fierce resistance they met. Violet and her sisters had never actually seen the Abbieannians really severely and totally beaten in any battle yet under Evans, at least Evans seemed to be victorious in every fight. And they wondered how it could be possible that after so many serious defeats already, and even of their failure at Fountain Of Fire De La Grece, that the glandelinians could be so stubborn as to keep up the bloody resistance, when it seemed indeed as useless as to expect to live after being shot in the head.....

But then the glandelinians had not been reduced sufficiently enough to cause the resistance to cease, and this was mainly the thing that was required upon. It was not true that desolating the enemys country in as wao wanted a manner as possible would require some means as to shorten the duration of the terrible war, but then reduction of the armies was the main thing required. In truth the Abbieannian armies were larger than the glandelinian armies opposed to them, but nevertheless there were scores of glandelinian armies not as yet engaged under the old time commanders not fallen during the war, except those resigned, and these were being reinforced and under orders to rush to the aid of those engaged with the christians, and if these came up to the assistance of many armies already depleted they could be enough for a while to overwhelm all the Abbieannian armies then in glandelinia.

To prevent this reinforcing was an impossibility, and so Hanson still checked at Hon Gatherine, sent an appeal to Abbieannia to hurry on more troops and this was the note sent to the governments of Abbieannia by King Gannon Gannon himself:|||||||

"It is my request and also general Hansons that you governments exert your utmost to support the invading armies, even at the cost of drafting the soldiers. With the approach of the first Abbieannian armies in to Calverinia we had after the bloody Henrietta struggle at Glorinia, easily evicted all the glandelinian armies from Calverinia, Abyssinkile, and Angelinia, and with this driving out of the enemys armies, we thought that we could win an easy victory at the start of the invasion into Glandelinia. We have progressed far into the enemys country it is true, but like to this we have observed that glandelinia was like a hell of demons gone mad with maudlin fury that knew no bounds.

Our armies at the start of the invasion had lost scores of bloody battles, especially in the west, and east while the central christian armies have won victories over and over. But this does us no good. Entering glandelinia was like entering the mouth of Hell while defying God at the same time. Hanson has lost millions in his series of attempts to obtain a foothold on Bristle Toe Station, and the enemys resistance everywhere is simply frightful. More troops must be sent as quickly as possible as the enemy are gathering in ever increasing strength against us, and unless my request is replied with and granted our armies will be swept back out of glandelinia in utter ruin on account of our serious delay at Easter Starring.

KING GANNON

In fact this was true. It was a serious situation this delay of Hansons advance at Bristle Toe Station or Hon Gatherine. All the other christian armies everywhere else had been able to push on despite the most terrific resistance they had met, while all the efforts of Everette Truc, Gannon, and Hanson to push ahead had met with bloody crushing failure and series upon series of complications of dreadful disasters. The christian losses in the series of battles fought along the Easter Starring had been so heavy that they simply could not be estimated though during the long lull afterwards Hansons army itself buried or burned 45,678,999 glandelinian dead.

Their losses is really shocking but Hanson loathed to report the number of his own dead which covered that completely. Hundreds of generals had readily given up their lives in their attempts to push their armies across the Easter Starring, and indeed the first battle of Easter Starring early at the wars outbreak was only a skirmish compared to those already having raged between Hanson and Huebaum Manley.

Hansons reports had confirmed that these series of bloody battles along the Easter Starring had been the most sanguinary battles of the war, far outrivalling all that Evans had fought during the invasion, and each conflict had outrivaled the frightful battle of Logan Toe Rye gun, and nearly equaled the losses of the great Francis Atlanta massacre. This means each one singly and not together. Hansons losses at the last one he fought went as far as 98,765,555 in killed and wounded alone, while the losses of the enemy was 89,765,000.

Evans feared indeed that something would go wrong entirely if Hanson could not advance any further. His armies and Everette Trues, besides Gannons would be left entirely alone if the christian armies went further on, and this would enable the enemy to send a other armies north-east ward unopposed, and these would completely inc encircle the three christian armies, and either destroy or capture them.

Evans determined to prevent this and decided to act without orders too. He depended on the Bangers more than any other christian general commanding the outside armies, and so he sent in orders that their armies should not go on any further, and advised Zimmermann to remain where he was while the other christian armies could go on and finish to the goal. And it was Evans purpose that if possible he would himself move his armies to Hansons aid; for Bristle Toe Station was more importance just now than a thousand Glandelinian capitals.

"This war is just like a war between a christian, and a storm of mortal sins." Said Evans. "This horrible war will soon make history that will not be forgotten. Glandelinia I can see will not give up untill she is crushed, disillusioned completely, and her wicked armies destroyed, or scattered. My plans seen the only ones that will change the aspects of the cruel war." |||||

Many of his general agreed with his and declared that it only would take the most hardest fighting imaginable that would end the war. Desolation of the enemys country, was only as a severe punishment, but if the christian armies did not do their utmost in fighting, the glandelinian armies would soon show how easily they could revenge all punishments given to them, no matter how deserving their punishments were.

"Glandelinia is a nation so powerful that no other christian nation could have conquered or never will." Said poswell guster Johnston. "My father served in the Abbieannian armies during the very four wars Abbieannia fought with Glandelinia, and he himself had told me many times about the terrific struggles he had been in, when I was a boy, and later on when I grew up he gave me better details of the war, taught me histories, and declared that it was a miracle only that Abbieannia could have looked the wicked nation and the other christian nations who have dared to war with her over the child slave question had been so horribly crushed, and their entire population of children taken into slavery, or cruelly murdered.

Abyssinkile had one with her too, but the great struggle she had fought was only won, because Abbieannia gave all the assistance she could. Otherwise she could not have done it."

CHAPTER TEN.....

AT POTTIGAZEEZA OR AROKIANOBIS.... July 146

In the meantime general Everette True was endeavoring to press his army between Pottigazeeza and Arokanobis, but general Ambrose Fullers army opposed his way. Everette True pushed on desperately for Pottigazeeza, and the enemy maneuvered so vehemently that he was forced to retreat back to his own positions again. The next day E. True tried to push on again, and reached Pottigazeeza in the evening. But again the enemy repeated the same movement, and threatening to overlap general Everette Trues left wing he was once again compelled to withdraw his army, the enemy under general Martenque making a sudden rush and capturing of one million prisoners without firing a single shot. Everette True was driven back quite a distance this time and was again held at bay for four days.

Everette True realized that if something was not done all would be lost. He was willing to push on at all cost, and to make a break in the enemys lines which would endanger Martenques army greatly.

So the advance was again repeated and Everette True finally reached Pottigazeeza and encamped his army with a firm determination not to retreat under any conditions but to hold his lines and if the enemy should make such movements again to commence an attack that would surprise them. But in the meantime general Ambrose Fuller had threw a large force around Arokanobis, and this threatened Everette's flank, and being in dire danger Everette True after some considerable activity, but not general was again compelled to withdraw, and he recoiled toward his old positions.

Everette True was indeed astonished at this turn in the affairs but the next day he advanced again, took Pottigazeeza by main force and destroyed a glandelinian division who attempted to rush him out of the city.

Everette True had simultaneously thrown his cavalry squadrons in every direction and these by various maneuvers of their own prevented any series of movements, and in the next morning determined to force him back to his former position. Martenque himself made a most desperate assault that began again another frightful battle. It was known as the battle of Pottigazeeza or Arokanobis. Over all the plains, through orchards, over fields and through forests far and wide swept a frightful glandelinian wave against the whole christian line, and so vehement was the attack that the christian divisions meeting the crash of the collision strove madly to hurl back the wild assault but were torn to pieces by the musketry fire of the enemy and driven back in great confusion. Cries, groans, shrieks and sudden prayers all arose from the many wounded, as the enormous enormous columns of glandelinians poured on with a shrieking roar of their 'Devil Yell' and in the face of a shower of grape and canister they came on a maelstrom of glandelinians surrounding the christian troops that still dared to stand. So sudden and unexpected had been the great assault of the foe that the main portion of Everette Trues front line was fairly scattered to the four winds, the enemy opening shells and canister upon the retreating christian columns tearing and rending their lines furiously, hurling torrent upon torrent of canister in addition while the main line in gray pushed on madly and it was a sudden and ghastly charge that was rushing upon the second christian position.

Indeed amid the horror of the struggle the columns of fugitive christians taken so suddenly by surprise, were mingled with the glandelinians who fell upon them with great slaughter, and indeed it was a tremendous and frightful scene of carnage, but fortunately for Everette True he had his artillery in good readiness and as soon as the fugitives passed he opened these upon the enemy tearing their wild columns to pieces. The first frightful shell bursts increased the scorching glare of their flashes though in broad daylight rivalling their varied dyes, the flashes at times being the shape of sheet lightning, of a bright blue color as the most entire depth of a blue sky undulating sometimes when many exploded together like the great northern lights, others shaping like arches, of livid snake green, and also of a lurid and intolerable crimson. This cannon fire along the christian line was furious beyond description and made a noise so loud and shocking as to take away breath and consciousness, followed by a rapid revulsion of the arrested blood and a tingling sensation of agony through out every nerve of the human body. The main line of the foe appearing like an army of the most horrible fiends of hell poured on unchecked by the terrific christian fire, and they extended into two awful monstrous shapes, and they came on in a rush which seemed as if they would overwhelm the whole christian line, and in six places places distinctly seen and in serpentine and irregular shapes came six monstrous waves of glandelinians and who yelling most wildly closed amid the frightful uproar with the christian lines and disappeared in smoke and flame amid an awful crash that shocked all that heard it. Indeed the roaring musketry fire roared all along the christian line in a most appalling manner the fresh fallen half concealing the quivering corpses of those already fallen. Everette True watching the glandelinian wave approaching his second line despite the fury of his artillery fire observed that the Masonic lines was a massive and impenetrable wave. Many of the retreating christian columns which were borne before that screeching yelling, blaspheming, and roaring wave of humanity seemed to assume many vast and broken and torn up shapes, one and another trying fiercely to stand ground, others trying to get ahead of the fellow columns, others hurled hurling themselves frightfully against the onrushing glandelinians, only to vanish swiftly as a gray wave enveloped them, and indeed once more the glandelinians showed themselves to be the awful agents of death and destruction. Every inflammable material that was within the battle zone was set on fire by the fierceness of the christian musketry fire along the main line.

APPALLING ROAR OF THE BLOODY BATTLE.....

As the confused christian columns poured on to the rear a stupendous arch of flame spurted out from along the whole line of christian batteries, then the very jaws of hell seemed to open as the whole christian line broke into action, as the main force of the glandelinian assault struck at all points points with such vehemence that good portions of the christian line was shattered. As line after line of christians opened fire while falling back here and there at the same time, the crash of musketry, was fearful and as the enemy suddenly opened their own fire the uproar was a continuous million cannon exploding roar for several minutes. Thousands of the glandelinian platoons were torn to pieces in a moment, and so were many christian divisions going to scattered pieces, while at other parts of the battle line a simultaneous ear-splitting ear-splitting roar resounded for hundreds of miles, and the glandelinian wave started to recoil at this point their line being almost withered.

As Everette True hurled more men to the defense and started a never ending concentration against the glandelinian attack the firing grew fiercer and as more artillery was brought up and put into action the awful uproar increased increased a thousand times louder. On pushed the glandelinian column with the irresistible force of a hurricane, and as the glandelinians closed with the Abbaunian line there could be heard the rattling of musket butts against musket butts, the sound of bayonets, and again the gray line gave way repulsed at all points.

So terrific had been the uproar that the heavens seemed to be torn to pieces. The two lines surged to two and then as the foe gave way they only rallied again and amid the mightiness of the awful roar which only the supreme beings of heaven could describe, again rushed swiftly to the assault, and as they again closed with the christian line both opposing armies seemed to go to pieces, the uproar of the battle going far above anything imagined, but Everette Trues line was broken and crushed the force of the assault having fairly shattered his most massive line.

His forces were driven back for a great distance, many of his generals had fallen, and he himself was slightly wounded in the hand by a spent ball, and the enemy continued the assault without abatement they would probably have won a sweeping victory, and drove Everette True clean back to where he had come from. But after they had forced the Christian lines they foolishly paused in their attack, and this enabled Everette True to throw in his reserves, and these toward noon recovered every portion of the lost ground and drove all the Glandelinian columns back toward Arokranobis. The battle again lulled, and toward three o'clock the enemy then came on again to try and recapture what they had lost. Now came the main fury of the battle. With a fiercer rush than at the first of the battle the enemy came on in a headlong assault and the fury of the battle was redoubled.

Costello's Johnstons Abbieannian line was overwhelmed amid the dreadful carnage and crushed to fragments, and the surviving Christian troops who did survive the terrible massacre had been so demoralized at the almost preternatural fury of the assault, the wild "Devil Yell" of the Glandelinians, the gasping forms of hundreds of thousands of mangled, and from the uproar of the enemy's musketry fire, that they fled in confusion, many hid from view of the enemy. Streams of human beings retreated to the rear despite the efforts of their officers to rally them, and all the plains, meadows and even glens and the trenches displayed the horror caused by the furious Glandelinian soldiery during the fight at close quarters, all being littered with multitudes of dead bodies of both sides: Costello's army was almost wiped out and the disaster caused demoralization in almost half of the Christian army. Fortunately however Everette True had reestablished his lines, and Manley fearing that the noise of the conflict with Everette True would bring Hanson into action withdrew from the assault.

Thus the frightful struggle ended but what a woeful losses the enemy suffered. Everette True had failed entirely to get in between Pto Pottisgazeza and Arokranobis but he had seriously broken a good portion of Manley's line and only heavy reinforcements arriving would repair that serious break.

Many of his officers desired to resume the assaults and crush Everette True, but they were not in favor of it either as they realized their shocking losses and so Manley did not do anything further, and Everette True withdrew his army back to its fortified works which it had left in its advance against Arokranobis. The battle had raged twelve hours and had been a drawn battle completely with no advantage whatever on either side.

FLOODS AND FIRE. TERRIBLE DEVASTATION, AND GREAT LOSS IN LIVES

During the meanwhile other Abbieannian armies had gone far in their wanton destruction and bursted the dams holding the waters of the great Mc-Holles ter and Mc-Whirther Run rivers in Glandelinia, and heavy rains having occurred in Calverinia at that time the rivers had been wild and furious rushing at the rate of sixty miles an hour. With the bursting of the levees and dams the greatest floods ever described in short or long details occurred. The flood was worse than if the ocean had swarmed half of the country, and it carried all before it. The vast sheeted torrents of waters swept into the streets of the city of Joania, withering the houses with the force of the current, tearing bushes, trees, and vines loose, and flooding the main forests far and wide. Before the rushing tidal wave of water and at the first shock the houses had crashed madly to the ground, in rended and badly torn timbers. The victims swimming or drowned were hurled about in all directions by the violence of the current, and oaths, groans, sudden prayers, and shrieks for help. The enormous volume of water vomited itself everywhere into the streets of the flooded city, being driven through in maelstrom eddies. It was certainly a sudden and ghastly calamity that had fallen upon Glandelinia and now it started to rain in torrents and a bad thunderstorm was on. The losses in lives was frightful.

The first night of the flood had been a harrowing one indeed. Little had been known by the Glandelinians of the nature and fury of the Abbieannians, which had advanced and advanced, and fought battles after battles amid a withering uproar of firing that defied the elements. The flood made by them before had subsided, but this new one was worse, and increased rapidly covering the whole country for hundreds of miles, and all of Glandelinia was encompassed with doubt and horror at the frightful fury of the Abbieannians. House tops were on fire, in the city of Juliania the flames darting and quivering in the darkness of the night, lighting up the flood in a weird manner. Horrors upon horrors indeed prevailed in the city of Bagdardania. The flood swirled avalanches of wreckage everywhere, with irresistible force streams of water pouring in waves through the streets, and upon many dwelling houses poured these sweeping windrows of wreckage, the cries of help from many being as cries of death, their silence of eternity.

The swirling waters roared down upon even vivian Sandorine, the wreckage having half concealing the quivering corpses swimming about in deep black and yellow waters, and many were found to be children tossed hither and thither by the waters, the waters rising higher and higher, suffocating many who were marooned in their houses. The fire burning house tops indeed in the meadows display, and the water elements seemed supernatural indeed. The flood which had scattered so deep a murkiness over all of the Glandelinian nation he had now become more extensive resembling a sea like expanse.

FRIGHTFUL COLORS OF PECULIAR LIGHTS.

But in proportion of the indescribable horrors occasioned by the floods, came hideous but magnificent lights, from some peculiar reason which gradually increasing showed a fierce and scorching glare. The rainbow itself could not out rival their horrible beauty and they varied all the colors that the artist knew. Sometimes the lights appeared like lightning flashes, sheet lightning, bursting shells, undulations, arches, and like the folds of enormous sheets, and these every night of the flood would be seen gushing forth through the impenetrable darkness, all over the sky in the distance southward, sometimes lurid and crimson, green, white and blue, lighting up the whole sea of water and whirling wrecks wreckage and swimming houses, and then as morning approached to die into a sickly paleness like the ghost of their own life, and to appear again with the coming of darkness. Many of these strange flashes formed vast mimeries of monster shapes, striding incessantly across each other, always hurling frightfully one upon another and vanishing swiftly into the awful turbulent abysses of awful shade. Every inflammable material not wet by the floods caught afire through some reason, substances in metal were ruined, and the furious waters bore such sickening vapors and smells as to drive the survivors frenzied, and the longer the flood continued the more the strange lights seemed to increase and spread flashing and lingering at times athwart and above the houses making them look weird and unearthly. At times during the days of the flood the horizon northward far beyond the flood the darkness of every night would at every intervals be terribly relieved by a intense glow that would break out fierce and sullen against the solid gloom. Indeed the whole scene of raging destruction and floods was completely lighted by the most intense and lurid glow, never before in Glandelinia itself seen so bright, and indeed gigantic through all the awful darkness of the night a cloud canopy would rise from the midst of the glow making the sides appear as if it was the skies of hell, and at times a most swift indescribable awful terrorizing pile upon pile of blood red clouds would extend across the entire northern and southeastern horizon, and the upper portions of this pillar upon a pillar of cloud would seem to form and extend two awful monstrous shapes like umbrella formations these also being of terrible blood red hue the light illuminating the whole atmosphere, and flood far and wide, and in many places distinctly seen at times by the terrified survivors appeared tongues of flame. It was a scene indeed like hell with a sea of water under the fire.

At times the monstrous shapes appeared pierced by sheets of flickering light, in the shape of stupendous arches, and at times the very jaws of hell seemed to descend from the very skies.

Indeed it was a horrible scene to witness when the flood torrent at rushed upon the glandelinian city of Glandelinia. Here the flood cannonade and advanced upon the city like a roaring tidal wave, and made a din like a trillion cannon. The mighty crash and smash of mangled houses, , , , , sounded like millions of musketry, , , , , thousands of buildings going to pieces in a moment before the irresistible pressure of the flood. Simultaneously a ear splitting uproar resounded through the streets, , , , , as the houses went to pieces ever where, , , , , and down among the swirling waters crashed the ruin echoing for scores of miles, the roar stunning the inhabitants who had the chance to seek refuge in the more firmer houses, but who were marooned. As the flood pressed on overwhelming the city, the noise of destruction increased a thousand times louder, , , , , and a tall bronze statue of a glandelinian hero supported by a tall column seemed to change to a shape of fire when house tops around it broke into flames.

Indeed amid the increasing roar of the destruction could be heard heard the violent rattling of the avalanches of wreckage, which swirled every where through the streets, , , , , and as darkness settled over the scene the sky seemed to be suddenly illumined by an unearthly brightness, which covered the whole horizon and gushing forth from the horizon came clouds of the blackest smoke, and which at times almost hid the glow out of sight.

JENNIE BAIDERME CRUSHED BY THE ROARING FLOOD. WAVE...

With a continual awful roar like many cannons the flood advanced upon this small city and for a time the mightiest houses wavered to and fro before the force of the torrents and currents, and then adding the din to the awful roar of the flood, they gave way, and soon all the houses wooden in particular were masses of floating wreckage, and the flood rushed with irresistible fury through the city, tearing down even the buildings made of brick and mortar, and indeed every building went to pieces before the onrush, the roar of destruction going far above anything ever imagined and every one in the big town lost their lives as no building stood before the flood. The furious torrents of water had been terrible having shivered the most massive building in this glandelinian town, and every one of the inhabitants not drowned were killed and maimed beyond recognition by the six swirling avalanches of wreckage.

THE CITY OF COSTELLIO (CLAUDELINIA) WIPE OUT!!.....

Terrible was the destruction of this glandelinian city called Costellio. The flood had caught the town when most of the inhabitants thinking all was safe had been in their beds, and with a fierce rush the flood had come on all of a sudden and without warning, , , , , and indeed those who had reached refuge in the tall buildings which withstood the flood, had been so terrified by the preternatural fury of the flood, the preternatural shrieking of the very elements, the gasping forms of thousands of people drowning with out their being aided, , , , , and from the roar of destruction, and the glare of frightful fires far in the distance that they hid from the rescuers, for weeks, and were found half starved, and almost dying from hunger and thirst, for to drink the flood water was deadly. Indeed after the flood had subsided streams of human beings who had been hurled about among the wreckage had been found by the glandelinian rescuers. Distant plains meadows, and glens were flooded, displayed the horror of the floods, and when here the flood had subsided it was found to be covered and littered with multitudes of dead bodies, carried by the current out of the city of Costellio. During the nights of the horrible flood here the lights of the distant fire now and then had pierced the smoke clouds, sometimes spreading in a fiery arch along the whole northern horizon lighting the watery waste for miles, making the scene both a fire and marine inferno.

Even at the moment the levees and dams were blown up by the Abissinian dead troopers, the flood had rushed from the two overflowing rivers, with a blind and deafening uproar resembling a most awful terrific cannonade, and the main an stupendous force of the flood had struck the town from north, and the uproar of a destruction of buildings, explosions of munition factories, and munitions, and other great explosions seemed to rend the heavens to pieces, and indeed an appalling outcry came from the many marooned persons in the higher buildings withstood standing the flood, and from those engulfed in the wrecked buildings or from those on housetops, and rafts, , , , , and also from those who were pinioned among the floating wreckage wreckage cries for help and succor. Rescues were made by thousands, but many lost their lives. Lives even those who did the rescue work.

Clouds of debris was carried far and wide by the flood, thousands of houses were seen floating like boats, and rowboats, and even after the flood did subside here, the air was full of sulphurous smells, the streets could not be distinguished from the ruins of wrecked houses, and scores of thousands of dead bodies of men women, and children besides many different kinds of animals.

Even after the flood lurid sheets of light continually flickered across the horizon which at times revealed the thickest clouds of smoke, which looked more awakens during the daytime.

THE DESTRUCTION OF JENNIE BAIDERME TOWN.

This town was struck at the same time by the mighty flood, and all the houses wooden or brick were horribly wrecked, the whole city seeming to have dissolved into a mass of wreckage before the pressure of the roaring flood, , , , , the flood sweeping everything before it, and within a few minutes the whole city, except the higher portions had been flooded, streets being regular rushing channels of water three stories deep, and the wailing piteous cries of thousands upon thousands of marooned was heartrending as they feared the refugees would go to pieces every time the windrows of wreckage went crashing against them, threatening to shatter everything.

ONE MASS OF SEVENTH WRECKAGE AND INJURY DEATHS.

Amid all the infernal uproar of the destruction in this great city, which looked very much like a great vortex of wreckage in the lower quarters, that at swirled in all directions, people caught in their careening houses floundered about, and indeed this city though flooded a score of times in its history was now in the destructive way of one of the worst floods known the whole city being in a chaos of wild destruction, and all houses not flooded to their upper stories, and especially the tall brick ones caught afire through some mysterious cause, fierce explosions occurred, and the whole lower quarters of the city seemed to be enveloped in seething flames, wreckage, and multitudes of dead human beings. Thousands perished in the houses in which they were marooned when they broke out into flames.

For three days the awful destruction continued at its worst, and by that time all the lower quarters of the city had carseened into swirling wreckage, and if it had not been that large portions of the city was on higher ground built mostly on hills, the whole city would have been annihilated.

REDEE JENNIE'S THEATRE.

At the beginning of the floods outbreak the inhabitants of this city had been startled by a peculiar snarling sound, and many beheld with dismay toward the northern horizon, a vast cloud in the form of those seen at the approach of typhoons, the bases of great inky blackness, and of the edges varying on hues, shifting and wavering in the hues, every time the glow along the horizon became fearfully luminous, this dull red glow appearing along the horizon blazied forth in a terrific manner, it being an intense lurid glare. They observed that the mountain cloud rolled upward to many thousands of feet, and an hour after hour passed the nighty cloud grew darker and darker, and spread far above the sky, the blackness along the horizon becoming utter and complete, and times sudden blazes of light shot through the edges of the cloud along the horizon, streams of sparks seemed to rise like a blizzard of snow, and though this city was out of the path of the great flood the streets and house tops were whitened by a strange kind of ashes, the fall of which increased at times, and a strange sulphurous smell pervaded the atmosphere. Sometimes the inhabitants were mystified by strange gusty winds which rose and died in a breath, and as they continued to watch they observed that the distant distant scene became appalling, the distant smoke cloud settling into a solid and impenetrable mass being thicker at times than the blackest gloom, and the more did the blackness gather did the light along the horizon grow dimmer and then darkness, its vivid and scorching glare. Sometimes there came strange blundering noises, mingled with a strange grinding, and hissing murmur more like a snarl from the far distance, and the soldiers around the region knowing what was threatening sent the warning through town after town.

"Forest fires approaching. Fire town before it is too late." Flames were seen pushing through the clouds, far and wide along the horizon and the glow at times lightened up the whole city. Sometimes when flames appeared in elevated tongues, the black clouds seemed to break from their solid masses, forming many vast weird shapes, striding across each other like the some some witnessed during Mt. Calvarius eruption, and then vanishing swiftly into the abysses of blackness only to appear again. On the house tops, and in the streets the fallen ashes were found to be two inches deep in many places, and the ashes found its way into many an open window, making the people close them to keep it out.

As the conflagration grew nearer and nearer, the darkness became terribly relieved by the dull red glow which increased still more, along the northern horizon, spreading also toward the west and east, which at intervals rose suddenly and fiercely against the solid gloom. In utter darkness lay over the south, where massive floods were raging, and at the moments when the fiercely luminous glow would increase with renewed strength, the inhabitants would be enabled to see the ashes falling, the streets and house tops presenting a ghastly and leprous white, or as if it was snowing gray. In some places the ashes lay matted in drifts, especially in street corners, and clear and distinct could be heard the strange noises from the conflagration, and from time to time the burst and horrible roar of distant explosions grew louder and more frequent. Toward mid night the whole southwestern horizon to the surprise of the inhabitants of this city became lighted with an intense lurid glow being like a bright gigantic arch of flames, and rushing clouds forming above and around and in the middle of it closed around like the smoke of hell.

The smoke clouds were denser than that observed in the north, and in monster shapes, the nearest columns rising swiftly past those further to the rear, the clouds in the rear being of either blood red hue or pinkish in color, the glow of fire seeming to light the very atmosphere far and wide, while beneath the neither part of the smoke clouds, arose ink black smoke, while darkly red through the profuse gloom clouds of different colors arose, while in the distance southward there arose a dim distinct bounding roar, mingled with a furious dog like snarling, which grew more in tense every hour.

Indeed as if from the sources of the sudden Phlegrean, there at times rushed a craggy and stupendous arch of flame through the smoke clouds, and through the air was heard definite whistlings.

The Abbeismians were repaying Glandelinia indeed, for the havoc wrought in Angellina and Galverina.

"They burned the woods and cities in Galverina, and Angellina, devastated the country in the most wanton cruelty, and so we'll do the same to them." Was the cry of the Abbeismians. "We'll do worse. Our women and children suffered. We'll overflow the country all also with floods, and let the inhabitants take care of themselves. To hell with the whole Glandelinian nation and their whole population."

Fortunately for the Glandelinians this city was spared from destruction but the inhabitants witnessed indeed the destruction in the distance caused by the Abbeismians.

HOW THE FLOOD ADVANCED AND TORN THROUGH THE CITY OF VANITY FAIR.....

"The inhabitants of this town watching distant fires or the glow in both the north and southwest, were startled by a sudden roar of wide spread destruction coming to their ears all of a sudden, a simultaneous crash resounded through a distant portion of the city, and to them it sounded as if thousands of buildings were immediately going to pieces. Indeed it was true for before the flood every building was careening into ruin, the upper of waters echoed far and wide, and drowning out the shrieks of the tangled and drowning.

Suddenly as a duller shade fell over the aid the glow being suddenly hidden by clouds of smoke in the distance the people in the houses in other parts of the city heard an appalling roar like the crash of a world of cannon, in action and they saw to their horror a gigantic black wall pouring on through the streets toward them, rushing on avalanches of debris, and just as many managed to reach the top floor of houses or roofs the roar of destruction became appalling, there was a sudden shocking rush of water seemingly everywhere, houses at once by the hundreds were shattered to fragments, heavy showers of debris swirled and fell into the raging torrents, thousands of men women and children were caught in the flood, and suffocated or drowned to death, while the roar of devastation seemed to mock them in their death agonies. At the same time south of the city, and north, again pushed volumes of the blackest smoke clouds, rolling far over the sky, while the lurid glow again appeared with tenfold brightness throwing a crimson redness upon the sea of water, and shattered windrows of floating wreckage, and floating houses. The flood had broken upon this city with all its worse fury suddenly and whole sections of hill buildings had disappeared as the flood rushed on through the city with irresistible force swirling and careening in the most alarming fashion, this flood causing the greatest destruction.

The air was hot and stifling, a strong st smell from the burning fires in the distance pervaded the air and at times strange odors as if some noxious gases was escaping from the interior of the earth took away ones breath. In this city the death list was frightful.

APPALLING FURY OF THE FLOOD WAVES, AS IT SWIRLED UPON THE GLANDELINIAN CITIES OF ARONBURG, AND KAUFFMANNIA.....

The fearfullest parts of the great flood struck the Glandelinian city of Aronburg, and the flood without warning at its very first onset came rushing into the city like a rush of a tidal wave from the ocean which sweeps everything it sweeps, thousands of wooden houses were suddenly torn to pieces from top to bottom, and tons of wreckage from these houses mingled with huge masses of timbers, furniture, with branches of trees and rocks, went swirling on through the flooded streets, the flood having suddenly advanced into the city in a perfect wall thirty feet high, and rushing into the city with irresistible force. Indeed with the roar of ten thousand cannon the great flood simultaneously tore its way through Kauffmannia, and bore along with it immense windrows of wreckage, which swirled in all directions. The water rushed through the streets in great surges and currents, and even large mangers of floating trees torn up by the roots by the force of the current swept through the flooded streets, and outside the city columns of trees in the dense woods were uprooted and swayed about in the raging flood, the whole forest ended in the path of the waters, became a sheet of roaring destruction, and all around for hundreds of miles the waters and destructions spread.

From where the forest fires were the skies at night time were aglow with the reflection of the flames, which also showed its reflection in the sea of floods, and the waters and swirling waters seemed as red as blood and looked most weird and unearthly, the light of the distant fires all the time growing brighter and brighter. Even across the watery waste the air became thick with smoke and flying ashes, and in the distance clouds upon clouds of sparks rose into the air, and at times a blasting roar broke out in the distance. The noise of thousands or millions of timbers, and all kinds of wreckage also added to the clamor, and the whole northern portion of Glandelinia seemed to have turned into a fire and water hell.

A STRANGE PHANTOM VISION THING..

One night when in these two cities the raging floods was at its worse a strange phantom weird light appeared far in the southeast along the horizon and this strange illumination had an appearance entirely unlike anything ever seen before, being of many hues at once, filled with glaring flashes like bolts hurrying in a bewildering fury along the horizon, and with a fringe of blackness and red all above it and seemed to be in constant motion all along the sky for miles and miles.....

It also had the appearance of a distant fire but it could not be for it appeared out of the path of a fire, and it was too bright to be even a volcanic eruption. This red and other colors of light became brighter and brighter hour by hour, and then suddenly died out altogether leaving everything in the southeast in supernatural darkness.....

AN UPRUSH TIDAL WAVE OF WATER
RUSHING THROUGH THE CITY OF RICHARDSON.....

The force of the waters rushing from the bursted dams of the rivers swept in rushing currents strong enough to raise the waters of the floods, until the surging waters reached to a depth of four stories in some places, and this flood rolled fiercely into the city of Richardson, whose hundreds of thousands of houses in the lower quarters of the city seemed to dissolve into windrows of wreckage with a days time. As the flood had increased the waters rose still higher, and the waters surged through the streets of the city like avalanches of water, the flood pouring through the lower quarters of this city with the roar of thousands of cannons..... The flood dashed far beyond the original points of flood stretches, and some places in the country and fields it was stated that the water was nearly a hundred feet in depth, and this torrent was borne in among the wreckage of the lower section of the city, and time and again sent swirling windrows of wreckage several blocks from the front line. Many wooden houses full of refugees not shattered or flooded up to the upper stories as yet were wrenched from their foundations by the force of the current, and hurled away like ships with people clinging to the housetops calling frantically for help. Far from the city tons of wreckage floated for miles railroad bridges were washed away and tracks also, and indeed fearful was the wall of water that advanced and rolled into the town which even swept way up the higher high portions carrying away thousands of partially wrecked buildings from their foundations swirling the wreckage straight ahead. Millions of tons of water had rushed through this doomed city like a frightful tidal wave or avalanche, roaring through the streets in boiling foam, and amid the terrific roar scores of buildings were crushed by the floods pressure, and the whole city on the lower portion threatened to become a regular avalanche of wreckage, and human beings, while hundreds upon hundreds of houses all wooden were carried by the flood for hundreds of miles, the destruction being awful and in some instances even brick buildings filled with marooned men women and children collapsed like a child's house of cards and all perished.

The flood came in two monstrous wave formations and the second flood wall brought in a volume of water thirty feet in depth through the city, the flood within four days having swept whole multitudes of buildings into swirling windrows of wreckage, social barriers being washed away, thousands upon thousands of wooden houses being swept away like chaff and at the height of the flood the city in the lower portions was almost unindented, and for hundreds of miles the flood extended for two weeks mingled with fearful avalanches of wreckage borne along with the current, thousands of floating houses, all rushing northward with fearful speed the flood having swept many villages, cities and towns from end to end tearing to pieces thousands upon thousands of lighter houses, adding to the destruction everywhere, and thus the masses of wreckage had grown and grown daily being carried onward and even two and for by the flood, and like tons of battering rams upon the houses still standing and indeed no architecture could resist such crushing force. The great avalanche of debris was hurled forward and again and again upon the southern and northwestern cities and these caused terrible destruction along with the flood wave, the irresistible attack of the flood laden with hundreds of thousands of tons of wreckage overthrew myriads of houses at every sweep, the destruction of scores of cities and towns by the flood being awful. Scores of thousands of human beings had been mingled with the ruins of flooded houses, which were scattered broadcast by the flood and found after the flood receded in windrows or scattered fields of bodies everywhere.

One of the most extraordinary circumstances of the frightful flood was that it was added in the waterless regions in northernlandinia by incendiary forest fires which extended for the distance of five hundred miles in three weeks, and swept over a region of fifty miles in one day.

FRIGHTFUL FURY OF THE FLOOD.....DESTRUCTION OF MILDRED JOHNSON.

At Mildred Johnson the flood approached with a series of rending roar of smashing houses resembling the explosions of hundreds of cannons, which seemed to shake the very earth, followed instantly by a new kind of roar which seemed to rent the air like a million cannon as the flood struck in its fullest fury. The awful uproar startled the inhabitants who seeing the wall of water, coming and hearing the roar of the approaching destruction, became panic stricken and realizing that a flood was on, and that the waters were pouring through the lower streets with a most frightful speed, and that escape was impossible unless by reaching the larger buildings first raced for every house within reach.

Amid the awful uproar the very ground seemed to burst asunder and with a crashing roar of splintered and overturned houses the flood advanced swiftly through the streets the swirling wreckage making the terrible noise the avalanche of wreckage being driven forward a hundred yards a second, and soon nothing was left of the wooden houses not torn aloft but masses of floating wreckage the maelstrom eddies forming wreckage maelstroms.

The flood had swept on with amazing fury indeed, and at the same time when the flood having broken at night everywhere, the southwestern and northern skies to the greater terror of the fugitives was becoming brilliant with a fiery glow, and as house after house was being torn from their foundations and as all the lower portions of the big city seemed to dissolve itself into wreckage and riven into careening streams of ruins.

During the flood a large section of brick buildings filled with marooned people on Cannon street collapsed before the pressure on the crushing flood and descended into the water an awful avalanche of wreckage, which was buried beneath the flood, while timbers of all kinds, furniture, bedding and everything that could float was swirled and scattered for scores of miles from the city itself, and as houses in every village went to pieces or were torn loose in the path of the raging flood, immense masses of wreckage floated about all over the flooded area, waters were rushing over all the railroad lines, bridges by scores were going, and the roar produced by the rushing wreckage and current of water was continuous, and witnessed who observed the flood with comparative safety predicted that they saw hundreds of millions of timbers floating in the water, multitudes of houses, with people clinging to the roofs, and trees half submerged in the water. The flood day after day tore onward with a frightful uproar ever heard to be made by rushing water, and the flood even shattered millions of beautiful trees, that were submerged tearing them until all branches were gone. Foundation stones 100 tons in weight had been torn loose by the current of the flood in the cities, and carried enormous distances down the streets.

A FRIGHTFUL ROARING FLOOD OF DEATH AND DESTRUCTION.....

The whole city and the stretch of flood seemed to be reddened by the brilliant glare of the distant forest fires, the flood was fairly covered with the wreckage, the waters also poured through Marneian with an indescribable roar, smoke clouds seemed to mount cloud upon cloud in the distance, and all the time of the flood sections of houses were time and again splitting to pieces and becoming gigantic masses and windrows of wreckage. The pressure of the waters in time burst asunder every house struck by it the flood having poured on with such force as to be irresistible the water rushing over a hundred feet a second through the streets with a frightful roar, and one big eddy of water swirled the wreckage to pieces and hurled it against a frail house which from the shock gave way and precipitated its occupants into the water. The main flood advanced upon the heart of the city with a most awful fury tearing whole sections of houses from their foundations of shattering them to pieces, and killing thousands every day. The southern part of the city within two days had become completely destroyed, and all the population were either drowned, or marooned in the upper stories of houses which still stood. As the floods had reached the northern limits of the city, the terrified fugitives who were caught in the flood being dashed about with the wild confusion of wreckage amid the loudest shrieks of despair, while the smoke from distant forest fires covered the sky in the thickest clouds blacker than erubust darkness and whose under portions shone like molten cauliflower suspended in midair. These clouds rolled so far over the sky at times as to reach over the flooded city hiding it at times in darkness that was appalling at day time, and being riven with tongues of fire at night. The death flood itself boiled in swift ceaseless and irresistible motion, while the distant smoke clouds had ugly looking convolutions each convolution being alive as it seemed seemingly to work as hard as it could to bulge out and roll so that the masses of thick smoke far above the horizon or even across half of the sky resembled a close knit cauliflower or brain like convolutions in constant and swiftly rising motion, and each advancing and ascending push sent the whole lower masses toward the upper masses where its crest making a convulsed junction gradually lost its pinkish or copper color, and where its convolutions growing larger and larger changed gradually into mushroom and other sample forms that smoke has been observed to have during a great forest fire observed at a long distance but always kept that awful look of solidity and power. At some portions of the clouds upper crest there would at times appear a long curved parabolic sweep beneath which shone the reddish convolutions. Every telephone pole was torn down by the rush of the flood, or fairly carried away and mangling everything with the tangled networks of live wires, every wooden house was shattered to kindling wood, villages were borne away with the annihilation of the people by the furious sweep of the death floods, and hundreds of farms and orchards were destroyed.

Everywhere for many days was a frightful chaos of wreckage, the frightful flood sweeping on with a frightful roar the millions of wrecked timbers being rended to pieces by the rush of waters and scattering the partly wrecked houses every old way. The immense death flood tore on through all the streets as if through plain empty air tossing about thousands of tons of wreckage against houses still standing, which if they gave way left a new deposit of wreckage everywhere in the floods wake, swirling on the debris in incredible quantities with a most terrifying din. This flood destroyed lives too many to be estimated, all bridges in the city, and in the whole floods path were completely swept away millions dollars damage was done to railroad trains, and of the wreckage of houses after the flood had subsided nothing remained but an appalling medley of ruins, timbers, bricks and mortar and multitudes of dead. The whole region swept by the flood after he had subsided presented a scene a fiendish sea of wreckage a sight more fearful than Dante could have ever imagined. In reality vast multitudes of men women and children had been caught in the terrible current of the flood, and thrown violently about and dashed to pieces among the wreckage, and were so completely buried by mortar and stones that after the flood people coming to dig in the ruins found half covered heads, a hand sticking out from dirt and mortar, a gaping mouth or a leg miserably crushed. The stench of sulphurous fumes caused by the distant fires was abominable and many human bodies had been found honeycombed with large holes.

THE PROGRESS OF THE WILD DEATH FLOOD.....

The ugly colored death flood in its swift seathing onrush expanded wider and wider and at night time it was seen to mingle with columns of blacker objects. The smoke clouds itself in the distance night after night, day after day honey combed at times with convolutions some spreading horizontally others parabolic in shape most of them higher up than others made a grewsome appearance to the surviving flood victims marooned in the tall brick buildings and who were facing starvation. The wreckage floated about for days and to the marooned persons there was at times something very odd in the appearance of the smoke clouds which at times were pierced with tongues of flames. Straight streaks of light sometimes seemed to flash a row across in all directions sometimes like strange bewildered globes of fire red lights moving somewhat slower, and disappearing abruptly.

The clouds along the southern horizon seemed to rise higher and higher mingling with the wreathed formation of smoke overhead seeming to reach a height of twenty thousand feet and spreading out in a huge dark umbrella like canopy whose intense blackness shone like varnish when lit by the extraordinary flame display.

For night after night there was a bewildering display of flashes like bombs bursting in the air, and the whole edge of the cloud gave forth a strange glow, and the outlines of the horizon night after night was vividly brought out by a fitful intense lurid arch of flickering light. And to make matters as bad the sudden advance of the frightful flood and the rapidity of its frightful manifestations, the blackest and most solid color of the smoke from the burning forest fire and the solid character of the cloud was enough to throw any multitude into a panic and confusion. The terrible flashes and display of flames increased while in the meanwhile the floods tore through the city, while overhead the cloud seemed to be like a solid storm cloud and seemed to reach out and bend down over the flooded region, and at times the cloud seemed to be of a sinister crimson black color, with a fantastic jet black bosom its absolute blackness being lit at times by the glow of the fire. The air was strongly impregnated with a strong sulphurous smell, and around like the letting out of steam seemed to come from the distant conflagration getting more louder and more screeching day after day, then bursting with extraordinary violence becoming a deafening roar like a hundred thousand Niagara. The immense death flood being in full sway had tore its way through the thickly populated portions of the city and so terrifying became the din of destruction that any one could have instinctively expected the city to be fairly carried away and scattered in all directions, the whole city being in a hellish inferno of water destruction the whirling avalanches of wreckage being frightful and covering the whole wake of the passing death flood, and the whirling death flood progressing onward hurling before it immense volumes of wreckage rushing through the heart of the city, scattering the tangled wreckage into tangled heaps pressing onward like an incarnate spirit of destruction cutting almost the entire city off from aid.

During the progress of the destruction caused by the flood a big cauliflower cloud welled up from the southeastern horizon until in a short time it resembled boiling convolutions along its whole stretch, and a moment later at other portions of the southern horizon another ashen ascent of cauliflower clouds raced upward and across the black mass of clouds and the glow appeared at a new quarter.

THE FRIGHTFUL FURY OF THE DEATH FLOOD AT ITS WORSE, AND THE PECULIAR POSITIONOUS FUMES THAT IT PREVAILED THE ATMOSPHERE.

All the adjoining valleys was also in a chaos of destruction, the whole two double scenes, fire and flood being a magnificent and horrible sight to behold. The wreckage of towns and villages floating everywhere crashed forward like a series of avalanches, through rapids and whirlpools in the flood, rushing among the business sections of the ruined cities, becoming a wild tumult of destruction, and indeed the fury and power of the immense flood was indeed stupendous and fascinating.

The inky clouds of smoke at times was mingled with millions of displays of queer lights, and with millions of fiery cauliflower clouds above approached over the northern limits of the horizon, and the whole scene as before at night was brightened up by the glow of fire and darkness continued now even in the day daytime.

In deed Indeed the floods had swept with greater force than a tornado or Terrocan Typhoon as its torrents had thrown down more completely the most massive buildings, and so many thousands of survivors were marooned in buildings and facing starvation that it was horrible to think of though they were landelinians but escape was impossible until the floods receded. The flood had rushed through village, town and city with a horrible uproar to defending to describe, and to tell the truth the awful flood when it did recede left a depth of twenty inches of mud. The flood of death was continually mingled with wreckage its whole width, and the victims howled so constantly that hundreds of millions of demons seemed to be in hell that this was hell itself, and as everything was enshrouded in darkness, and pierced with the glow of distant forest fires, and while buildings anew every hour careened into windrows of wreckage and as the sulphurous smell was stronger than ever it was really an impersonation of that lake that the Ferry man took Dante and his companion across to the borders of hell.

No such darkness had occurred during a disaster before. Not even in Galverinia or Angelinia, or during any frightful typhoon ever raged. It was at times when the smoke hid the glow out of sight completely like erebus, and at times the whole region of the flood, and the flooded cities were enshrouded in darkness that nothing could be seen at all. Thousands upon thousands of men women and children had been victims of strangulation by the sul sulphurous smell caused by the distant fires, whose substance being all kinds of material and probable fields of coal left poisonous vapors and fumes in its wake. The smell of noxious fumes was in the air for many days even after the great flood, and in the houses not damaged by the flood hundreds of children had died of strangulation or suffocation, for the sulphurous fumes had gotten into their lungs, and indeed they struggled and gasped for breath in a piteous manner, and their white blanched faces could have showed how badly they had suffered before death came to relieve them. The awful gases had gotten into their lungs with fatal effects. The death flood of water had swept through the whole regions of Marcucian sweeping away huge fields of trees, and came rushing through the city of Marcucian for days with an awful roar, indeed the flood carried all before it with a fearful uproar as if the whole world was coming to an end. After the flood subsided skeletons of trees were found hundreds of feet high, which had been torn and swept against obstacles by the rushing floods.

THE LAST ONRUSH OF THE FLOODS THROUGH THE MARCUCIAN REGIONS.....

The flood continued its fury with a roar of six hundred cannons of heavy calibre, the water and wreckage rushing onward through the streets of many cities in the wildest confusion, and thousands of men women and children who had been rescued by men in boats and launches had been so violently too tossed from side to side that they had received severe contusions and were badly maimed, while hundreds of others, were carried away beyond reach of rescue and into the overflowing rivers where they were all drowned.

For two weeks the roaring floods continued to rage and at times the rush of the flood was so terrific that the sound of artillery could have been completely drowned.

The noise indeed was like the approach of the end of the world. The foundations of many large buildings in the largest cities and towns scores of places, palaces and churches having been flooded to the roof itself and gave way before the pressure of the onrushing waters being leveled to the ground with a most frightful crash and roar, amid the shrieks screams, and yells of the many women and children who were buried under fallen walls. Within the time the flood had subsided in this region all the other larger buildings, had been thrown down by the pressure of the flood, and the death list was shocking though of course hundreds of thousands had been rescued.

Hundreds of small and big cities and towns were flooded during those three harrowing weeks, and the victims were numbered by the hundred thousand, and in some instances by millions. But it was the city of Richardson that the most terrible desolation was wrought by the flood a complication of disasters having followed the sweep of the flood. And cities and towns burned by the forest fires numbered by the score. And 78,999,999 people were homeless and the property loss amounted up to $ 789,999,876.

WHAT CAUSED THE ENORMIOUS LOSS OF LIFE?

The first great loss about seven hundred thousand, and then fifty thousand more were not drowned by the flood but crushed by the ruins of falling churches churches and brick dwellings which they had confidence of standing before the floods pressure, the dead being mostly grown people and only few children. Five hundred thousand others had been swept away and drowned by the flood itself. Most of the churches strong as they had been were unable within three days to withstand the pressure of the flood and had gradually been reduced into a heap of ruins for not a single wall no matter how thick was left standing, and in addition to the horrors occasioned by the floods, and privations, and exposure, all of the upper stories of houses still standing and not reached by the flood, and all floating house-tops also unreached by the flood was gradually in a blaze which became brighter than the distant glow of the forest fires, and any one could have read their morning papers in the solid glow of the flames. Hundreds of house tops were on fire, and these unprotected buildings continued to burn for all the days of the duration of the floods without intermission, and indeed it would have consumed everything had it not been for the frigid winds wash of the floods and the millions of surviving people were so dejected, and terrified that for days and days they continually set up a storm of wails, and screams everyone having their eyes turned toward the flames, and floods, and looking on with wild grief, which was only interrupted by the cries and shrieks of the men women and children on floating house-tops calling to the rescuers for succor, when ever the floods threatened to reach out for them and engulf them in death. The cause of the fires was never known but it was believed that crosswires torn apart from force of water currents had sputtered here and there, reaching sometimes inside of windows of houses still standing thus at setting fire to window curtains and timber work, that was soon consumed before the blast of the conflagration, which spread to the neighboring houses, and being there joined by the smaller fires on the tops of floating houses, and so many were the fires that every city could have been easily destroyed, had it not been that the cities were flooded with twenty to thirty feet of water. The loss of life had indeed been appalling. Thousands of horses, chickens cats and dogs and other animals were drowned but the greater portion of people who were marooned in buildings were left there to burn or be swept away by the seas of water, as no one could reach them on account of being driven back time and again by the violence of the current.

HORROR ADDED UPON HORROR.....

The scenes of horror exceeded all description, even all that had heretofore been witnessed during the war in Galverinia. Nothing could be heard in the flooded cities but the shrieks for help from thousands of marooned people in the path of the flames, also sighs, groans, weeping and curses. Suicides numbered by the thousand on account of the flood. Not a soul in the flood filled cities and towns could be found who was not bewailing the death of relations, dearest friends, father or mother, or their children or the loss of all their substance. The darkness caused by the smoke cloud from the distant forest fires was hideous, and after the flood in all the streets where the survivors could hardly take a step without treading on dead bodies of humans and animals, lay hundreds of handsome coaches and automobiles with their masters, horses, and riders a most crushed in brick and mortar and covered with six feet of mud, here multitudes of drowned mothers with their little ones lying scattered here and there, half crushed blood besmeared boys and girls lying about, many with their very bodies torn open by electric wires and their intestines all hanging out. There thousands of ladies richly dressed, either in the same or worse condition, many having backs, arms, head, thighs, or legs crushed and broken, thousands of others almost buried in mud and wreckage. The sight was fearful but the sight of the mangled drowned was more fearful. The largest proportion of the inhabitants of the wrecked towns had been carried off to all parts of the country by the flood and buried in mud and branches of trees, and it being impossible for want of laborers to render assistance under such circumstances to withdraw from the marooned houses those still living. Storms of universal shrieks, and cries and groans and sighs, all the expressions of grief were everywhere heard where it was impossible to redeem from death those wretched persons marooned in buildings in path of fires which rendered still more harrowing the cries of despair, that appealed in vain for help and succor. GLENDELINIA HAD PAID THE PRICE. AND TO WHOM? ABYSSINIA.

A SECOND TERRIBLE SCOURGE.

The new scourge already described had added to all these calamities indeed. And this augmented their horror. "FIRE" from amid the buildings still standing as stated before the raging fire was soon all at once to increase into a veritable wall of seething flames, and as no fire departments could go through that flood, and wreckage, even when it was receding, and the absolute want of laborers, and needful appliances rendered all efforts unavailing and it was impossible to extinguish the fire, and to stop the wild progress of the wild sea of flames that burned above the raging floods, and which continued to burn up the sad remains of house tops in all the flooded cities and towns, and to so many simultaneous disasters a hundred thousand others had been added to the horrors, being beyond all descriptions.

All corn magazines, grainelevators, bakeries and other factories had been flooded and the food stuff spoiled and no bread could be gotten. The water courses had been shut off or turned aside, all the public fountains were polluted by the flood, and these aggravations of disasters and others had reduced to complete despair the remaining inhabitants who became benighted their destroyed goods, and chattels, others most children their parents, or parents their children. Others wished, begged and prayed that the governments of Glandelinda would give in to the Abbeannians before the nation be wiped out. Even after the flood had subsided every street could hardly be distinguished on account of the ruins, and every street was covered with corpses. The loss of life in the villages was appalling, over forty thousand having perished by the fire, and eleven thousand more having died from privation and exposure, but the greater number were either buried in the wreckage or drowned in the flood, and many were engulfed in the hundreds of fires, which seen in all directions gave the burnt burning city and village tops the appearance of having been covered with networks of fire streams above a waste of water and windrows of wreckage. Many thousands who were buried in the ruins, were never recovered, and those who in houses were trapped by fire might have been saved had the rescuers been able to reach them, and who were left to die by fire and sea committed suicide. Many persons trapped in a warehouse and surrounded by burning houses gave out cries of help which could have been heard for days until death from the tidal wave of fire burning all before it put an end to them.

Of still more interest was a case of a certain glandelinian child a little girl. Having been terrified at the house in which she and others were marooned in caught afire, she jumped out of a window into the seething flood below, and great was the scene when desperate efforts were made by rescuers to snatch her up and finally they succeeded though the child was almost drowned. There were other cases similar to that of the child but was attended with more fatal results. In the great majority of instances however the instinct of self preservation was over overcome by many and thus the number of rescued per people was tremendous.

GREUL FREAKS OF THE FLOOD....

Still worse was the conduct of freaks caused by the raging floods. Windrows of wreckage had been scattered like chaff, hundreds of dead horses were found inside of houses swept roof by roof, other ruins were mysteriously plundered and sacked of their belongings by the water currents, and the bodies of the dead were mysteriously blackened, and those swimming among the wreckage had suffered from still more atrocious freaks.

Pawn repositories were clean out of every kind of property by the flood, and carried inside of other wrecked houses, and several cases occurred of freaks of where the flood carried wreckage clean up the sloping sides of some low hills. In one town the flood killed about six thousand people and injured and sickened two hundred and sixty thousand people in one of the larger cities. At Agathia Mc-Hollester the flood made thirty six thousand corpses, and spread desolation for the space of two hundred and sixty miles. No typhoon had ever visited the nations of Angelinia, Galverinia, Protestantia, Condencia, and Abbeannia, which can be compared in extent or energy of this go horrible flood, which wrought such terrible complications of disasters in so many cities in Glandelinda a worse scene than ever known in Calverinia or Angelinia together.

FLOODS OF SIMILAR CHARACTER.

Yet during the war floods of similar character though not so great and devastating and less in degree, had been of constant occurrence caused by both sides, in Calverinia and Angelinia. But in this great glandelinian disaster fully 90,000,000 were rendered homeless by this flood, and as written before no Cholera or any other pestilence had more reason to be dreaded than the fury of the Abbeannian rage, who let loose such terrific floods which demolish the most massive and storm proof cities, and swamp and level whole villages and towns to the ground in a very short time hurry frightful multitudes of human beings to a sudden and terrible death. During this terrible flood many cities had been swamped and great destruction to property resulted from the terrible visitation. Yet considering the frightful havoc made by this flood which overwhelmed all of the cities and towns in its path with a great loss of life, and added by fire, Glandelinda was fortunate that the disaster had not been as great as the Abbeannians had intended. All the trees when the flood had subsided became afterwards inclined toward the ground, the ground had also subsided about three inches below the former level, and all farm houses were scattered timbers and nothing else.

Adding to the destruction of the floods and fire, the Abbeannians with blasting mines thousands in number had torn and rent out of shape a range of hills seventy miles in length leaving no trace of all their trees, while smaller hills had been fairly swamped by the floods where it was deepest and had been almost engulfed for sixteen sixteen days. A volcano in the path of the flood had been effected, as the waters hurried its way into every crevice, crevice and cavern of the mountain, filled the deepest fissures with tons of rocks, and rent and tore open other fissures sweeping millions of tons of water into its focus, and thus the volcano got into such a violent activity which raged forty three days, that it committed incalculable damage for the distance of eighty one miles and made a clamor which all of Glandelinda was shaken by and which was heard for a thousand miles.

The whole world indeed had its attention awakened by this strange volcanic convulsion caused by the flood. Large quantities of mud and dead animals had been swept for many miles and into the rivers, and an indescribable multitude of dead fishes, could be seen floating in the two rivers, which was also choked up with windrows of wreckage. The site of Banberry was covered with water and floating wreckage, and the whole flooded region presented a desolated state. It is happy the case that was attended with such fearful occurrences had not happened in reality as yet, otherwise the losses in lives would have taken up many quarters of the world, and so terrific was the effects of the flood that not only were the works destroyed that the Wicked glandelinians raised to render their lives comfortable and the cities flooded, and villages and towns leveled to the ground that they have erected to protect them, but the face of the country was found to have been changed after the floods had receded. The neighboring woods and forests in the path of the forest presented a most singular scene ever known before presenting a singular scene of wild confusion, the trees standing branchless and inclined in every direction, many without barks, and others with their trunks shattered and splint in many places, the ground was in thousands of strange undulations like the small waves of the sea, and on each side of the Mc-Hollester Run and Mc-Whirther Run rivers the ground had been found to have swelled up through some mysterious convulsion, probably caused by the rushing pressure of the floods.

Hundreds of the biggest wooden houses had been torn from their foundations, and carried to places higher than those on which they formerly stood. Even by the pressure of the flood the foundation of many buildings in many cities had been found completely removed from the ground with such violence that the stones were found broken to pieces and scattered about, and the hard cement which had united them was crushed into dust. Corpses of many dead animals were found on top of house roofs miles away from the ruined cities.

OTHER POWERFUL FREAKS OF THE FRIGHTFUL FLOOD..

The whirling motion of the gigantic flood eddies had put the wreckage into a confused movement at times resembling the sea when agitated by irregular storm waves crossing and repulsing each other in different directions, many statues had been turned around by the pressure of the flood waters and a large piece of rock had its former position changed to that of a mound and carried from its former place. This disastrous flood was about three hundred miles long and fifty miles wide, and though they caused the havoc the Abbeannians did render all the aid they could for the stricken cities especially in rescuing the marooned persons which were in the path of the flood sweep.....

THE WISE SPREAD DESTRUCTION OF OTHER PORTIONS OF MC-HOLLESTER AND MARCUCIAN REGIONS.

Indeed the flood had advanced upon this region with a most odious horrifying and deafening uproar, and had the inhabitants of many of the cities in the path of the flood realized their danger before it came no such loss of life would have occurred. The flood had poured across the whole two regions and crossed the whole section of the country within three days, and no one can have any idea of the almost preternatural fury with which the devastating floods could show its terrible force. At every point of the flooded districts the flood had advanced and came rushing forward with the most tremendous speed and crashed its way through so many cities, that it carried every massive ruin, and large swirling seas of wreckage with it.

SAVAGE PROUDRY OF THE RAGING RAVAGING FLOODS.

After three durations the flood had become so vehement and the crash and uproar of destruction so frightful, that the most massive houses shook, and the flood fairly tore dense districts to pieces in the flooded cities. Many houses in cities and towns were swept off their foundations and carried off by the flood, and crushed by the swirling avalanches of wreckage that was crushed against them, the maelstroms of destruction swirling on, with a roar like the worse thunder, the flood spreading far and wide, every city seemed to sway and as the flood progressed toward the town of Garries Square and the large avalanches of wreckage borne along with the flood swirled against the houses, the wooden houses was shivered to fragments as if by great explosions, and the timbers swirling against one another made a rattling and banging that was terrific like the worse musketry fire heard in the Battle of Gloriosa, while simultaneously a strong chemical action seemed to take place in the atmosphere, which gave out great quantities of sulphuretted hydrogen gas. The flood seemed crazed with the frenzy of destruction and advanced through the city of Garrie square with a mad and furious uproar, and the inhabitants who were harrowed in the houses were terrified to see the terrible flood of water and wreckage swirling in the water and avalanches of it go dashing with a great crashing and banging through all the streets, charging furiously like the avalanches of hell. The flood pushed forward the wreckage in the streets and past houses still standing forced swirling cataracts, tossing the wreckage about in a frenzy, and down went all the houses in that vicinity with a horrible roar. The flood tore through the city of Garries Square like a million furies, sweeping all the massive lower store stories of the bigger buildings and smashing all the wooden buildings, and raising a frightful commotion.

Indeed the furious avalanches of wreckage was fairly lashed into pieces, and no rapids and waterfalls could be as violent as this mighty flood. Every wooden house no matter what size gave way before the onrushing streams of water and wreckage, being carried away like boats, or smashed to pieces amid a great clamor. The awful swirling avalanches of water and wreckage plowed its way through all the streets, the fury of the flood throwing the debris forward as swiftly as a train runs, the storm of water tearing through the whole district with a most stupendous uproar, and indeed the flood carried hundreds of tons of wreckage away with it to the river.

There was no barrier which could check the avalanche of water and wreckage whose onrush was so irresistibly that a barrier went to pieces like a cake of snow in hot water. The wreckage in the main float swirled in all directions. On and on the flood had progressed, smashing overturning and crushing to atoms everything in its path seeing to abandon everything wholly to rage. The flood really had fits of fury beyond anything known seeming to abandon itself wholly to rage, having for four days been exceedingly dangerous, the swirling wreckage having been dashed furiously and violently against the remaining houses which also gave way making a great bustle and clamor. The roar of the outburst of the flood itself as it settled toward the city of Jorie was like the sound which is heard at the moment of the approach of a severe earthquake followed by a tremendous growling cannon adding like roar. The instant the inhabitants of this city heard this tremendous sound, and noticing the frightful darkness started up in alarm rushing in all directions and for the upper stories of their dwellings, many even not having time to get away from the onrushing flood.

This fearful unearthly sound produced by the roar of the approaching flood was heard within a distance of ten miles and seemed to awe the very heavens and at this peculiar noise of the flood, which echoed the throughout this city, the people trembled in their upper floors and watched with intense anxiety the approach of the water wall. The flood poured through the streets of this town with the most energetic fury bellowing most lustily, and tearing away every small obstacle in its path in the most ferocious style, rushing wildly through all the streets, and overthrowing or tearing loose all the wooden buildings with a crash or flooding every story, and scattering the wreckage in perfect whirling whirlpools. The flood was fierce in rushing through North Avenue for here the waters sped through with a murderous roar, mingled with the shrieks of those in the houses sped through with a murderous roar, and here all brick buildings were leveled by the force of the current. Everywhere the murderous uproar of destruction was repeated. A certain man far out of reach of the flooded district had just burst into his house almost speechless with fear, and a moment later roaring fearfully loud and wild wildly a tremendous avalanche of water mingled with a sea of wreckage crashed against his house, swelled by other whirling masses of wreckage, and his house, with him and his wife and children immediately went to pieces, all perishing while at other places whole masses of women and children were dashed about among the floating timbers yelling, screaming and crying for aid as if they were mad.

The horrible uproar of the flood increased very rapidly, whole walls of houses being torn to pieces and all the chances of destruction. Everywhere

In the whole path of the flood the windows of wreckage was scattered so badly, and thrown so heavily against whole sections of buildings in the towns and villages that they would give way into a heap of ruins, the flood of wreckage tearing through street after street and causing terrific devastation, the crushing pressure of wreckage literally smashing hundreds of men women and children.

A LITHEAL SEA OF CHAOS, AND MULTITUDES KILLED? DROWNED, OR MATED.

Big avalanches of wreckage poured against all houses in the towns swirling furiously against the buildings as though driven by tidal waves, big immense foundation stones were hurled about by the flood, multitudes caught in the wreckage were thrown and swirled about among the wreckage, the very skin being scratched from their bodies, many having their skulls fractured and the rest were lacerated or le lacerated na badly.

In the meantime the flood tore furiously through Garrison town with a most dreadful uproar the din being so heavy and terrific, and the crash of falling houses being so continuous that it made a dreadful and indescribable tumult. Houses everywhere in the path of the flood was giving way before the tearing force of the onrushing flood, buildings were rent asunder with the greatest fury, and such was the violence of the flood currents that nothing could withstand it, the flood tearing through all the streets and squares in rushing torrents, and here a thousand houses in an hour went to pieces, and in the flooded regions the flood and wreckage was one vast sea of chaos roaring with dreadful fury, while still the southern and northern horizon was all illuminated by the lurid glow of burning forests while clouds of smoke at times looked like clouds of blood.

As the raging flood progressed through and over plains and country it tore loose hundreds of tons of rocks, sweeping them now here, now there, the wildest confusion caused by the flood ensuing everywhere. With a terrible roar on a big maelstrom of wreckage was thrown upon the last massive array of houses in this city the flood and rushing winds of wreckage dashing them to the ground with all their inmates who screamed shrilly in their death agonies.

At the same time the flood poured through the town of Jennie T ory Ridge and its streets were soon smashed in the sea of swirling wreckage. After the flood had receded here many of the dead later on were found with their bodies half covered with mud, their eyes starting from their sockets in all the expressive horror of a violent death. Some have been drowned when overwhelmed by the onrush of the flood before they could reach safety, which showed the speed with which the extraordinary flood advanced, upon them. At the first approach of the crushing avalanche of wreckage and water no one could have believed that the end of the universe was near.

ly the fury of the water rushing it forward the wreckage appeared to be highly highly irritated, which waved and roared in every direction as it advanced and bore down upon the houses. For a time a big obstacle remained to check the wreckage and floods onrush but it soon gave way before the irresistible pressure of the flood mowing down building after building all the houses in this region being crushed to atoms. The atmosphere was filled with sulphurous gases and torrent upon torrent roared through all the streets sweeping down everything in a savage manner, and one of the wreckage windrow got caught in an eddy and was scattered in all directions. The flood at this point cleared the city out completely. On progressed the flood at a most furious charge rushing on with a terrific din and carried avalanches and crush ing them against the houses furiously, and with an awful roar the flood went through Hanson's street tearing every house to pieces here and dashing the inmates here in every direction. The main flood continued on with the most greatest fury. Whole tons of brick work was precipitated to the ground by the headlong pressure of the flood in a headlong plunge, and the fury of the flood fairly carried all the wreckage before it at a furious speed, and dashing clouds of it in all directions in the most violent manner, breaking up even the wreckage to pieces and crashing away whole lines of houses,

In its headlong sweep the fury of the flood being extremely fierce and dangerous. Miles upon miles of jagged lines of houses had been smashed to pieces and the avalanches of wreckage destroyed more than the watery flood did. The flood rushed furiously through the western section of the flood line and here in the country one of the biggest orphan asylums stood and the horror of the inmates could never be described and their only chance was the upper stories into which they hurriedly flung themselves as the water came pouring in torrents into the cellars and other windows to avoid the rush of waters that would ensue.

And it was high time that they did for the next instant with a deafening roar the horizontal torrents of water and wreckage and mud and debris of all descriptions rushed through the region with a withering roar and struck the orphan asylum with such force as to move the house several miles down to the roaring river despite the firm foundation of the wooden structure and finally riving the building into ruins and every savior one lost their lives. The wreckage of this building was scattered in every direction. One torrent of wreckage collided with another a furious maelstrom ensued, thus maelstrom heading in a small farm building and the building was also shattered to pieces and all the inmates lost their lives.

APPALING DARKNESS, AND STRANGE MYSTERIOUS LIGHTS.

Never before was there ever seen such a frightful darkness which looked all the more hideous by the glare of the colored lights of the distant conflagration and the hideous aspect of the rushing and ascending colored clouds and colors of flickering lights made the scene wonderful and beautiful but nevertheless was an object of terror. The flood itself had assumed an indescribable fury and the swirling avalanches of wreckage continuing on in a perfect sea hurled itself against the buildings of the flooded cities in a perfect fusillade and this made such hideous rattling noises when the wreckage clashed together in assailing the houses with irresistible pressure that the effect was something awful and could not be described being enough to deafen multitudes, the wreckage fairly darting forward, wheeling around in all directions and even pursuing each other with a great uproar.

The hundreds of torrents of wreckage fairly undulated like the waves of the sea for many leagues in extent some windrows having the depth of the flood itself, and indeed the flood tore across the whole region violently dashing the wreckage to great sweeps, all the plains were flooded by water and floating wreckage and houses for a hundred miles and the great floods of water rushed on with indescribable fury and in the distance where the fire was raging strangely colored clouds seemed to pass under the main canopy of smoke filled at times with a golden vermilion glow light, these clouds also uniting and multiplying and swelling into one vast field of myriads of strange colors while vivid flaring lights shot across or through them like long furrows, and glittering flashes like blue fiery arches seemed to glow along the eastern horizon to disappear and to again flash forth in living luster while the many strange shapes of clouds were lighted up with many strange colors.

When hitting the town of Wayne the fury of the flood had broken loose upon her with irresistible violence mingled with a storm of most savage roarings plaintive howlings, rattlings, and shrieks of the overwhelmed, the groans of the unfortunate injured and all the appalling tumult being added with the shrill serpent like hissing of dashing rain, and the most horrible roar of destruction which stunned, horrified and almost drove them insane.

Whole districts districts of buildings were split into many fragments the floods tearing through the lower stories of every building with the utmost fury. Whole forests of trees were withered, wrenched uprooted by the current of the flood, houses which in the twinkling of an eye it shattered into ruins, thousands of men and animals which were carried off by the flood and killed or drowned or dashed stunned and bleeding against the walls of swaying houses.

Meadows of grass was fairly withered torn up by the current of the flood and it was estimated that the violence of the water that the wreckage of houses itself was scattered forward at the rate of sixty to seventy miles an hour and the flood made dreadful sounds that would never be forgotten.

Hundreds of blocks of buildings were literally rended to pieces in the flooded cities or dissolved into windrows of wreckage, and the flood was a sight that probably the very angels would never forget had they really ever witnessed it. After the flood receded here the whole region of fields plains, and meadows was fairly covered with immense stretches of wreckage, and the number of mangled multitudes of men women and children, was a terrifying and indescribable sight, and the lower districts which was also being swept, and clouds of wreckage was broken into small pieces, and was time and again swirled among the houses of the flooded cities and towns. Bodies of children were even rended in pieces.

Savage grinding noises issued from the swirling windrows of wreckage the grinding sound being as it seemed perpetually restless, and mingled with the roar of the flood. Indeed all the wreckage slammed against all the most massive houses still standing the avalanche of wreckage mingling with these buildings in vehement throes, and outside the cities the wreckage spread out in dense streams and sheets of timbers and furniture while the very world seemed to be raised by the titanic uproar.

Hundreds of thousands of houses fell to pieces and the fury of the flood the swirling wreckage actually fighting in titan throes with the flood as it seemed until at last the current scattered it.

MANIACAL DESTRUCTION CAUSED BY THE FLOOD.

In the force of the flood the wreckage fairly darted forward a thousand yards a second, they swirled, they seemed to soar straight toward the clouds, the thunders slashing violently against each other, the maelstrom of destruction being maniacal. They were immense streams of debris rushing in drunken rage swirling away anyhow, and tons of wreckage collapsed into splinters in their collision with massive houses, which fell apart like monstrosities spasmodic at once heaving like a wild hellish sea a thousand times confounded and like anarchy, a regular hell sea of wreckage and water gone mad. Houses were literally torn apart, ripped wide open, beaten into a pulp smashed into kindling wood, annihilated. The furious torrents of the wild death flood crushed hundreds of thousands of buildings, and whole districts or thousands and thousands of houses became a frightful hell of destruction and worse maelstroms of wreckage worse than any ever seen before rushed forward and the shrieking uproar of the death flood

CHAPTER ELEVEN. KING GANNON'S TERRIBLE REVENGE.

AVANLACHEN CREEK. AUGUST 14, 1916.

No one can have an idea of the fury of the flood which had already extended for the distance of three hundred miles across, and for days and days the shrieks of the unfortunate victims could not be described. The immense flood sweeping on and on, had swept down upon every city in its path without any means to resist its mighty force, and no one had escaped from its ravaging fury despite their exertions to get up to the lower or higher hills, and the wild floods having pressed onward with appalling swiftness had enveloped the multitude of villages, and scores of cities, making frightful sea of floating wreckage.

So sudden had the flood come that there had been no warning of the danger, and hundreds of thousands of lives had been lost. Avila Avalanches of wreckage had swept also through the cities and towns, and scores of thousands of children themselves, and at once sprang for the upper floors of their dwellings, but before they could even ascend one single step, a great surge of swirling water had overwhelmed their homes, crushing them into wreckage of tearing them loose from their foundations, and sweeping the houses through the streets and out into the main flood sea, bit sheets of wreckage having crashed forward with an appalling uproar and for days and days from the very heart of this frightful sight rang the cry of thousands of drowning persons. The current of the waters had at times torn the wreckage mass asunder, and thus scores of thousands who had taken temporary refuge on the floating wreckage lost their lives, as timbers and other material parted dropping then into the swirling waters. Indeed cracking shrouds of wreckage rashed everywhere, sweeping down upon towns and cities, and wrapping thousands in the people in agonized death.

It was a regular seething hell of destruction, and so swift was the rush of the flood that it had scattered the houses about like a hurricane.

THE WHOLE NATION EFFECTED BY THE ABBIEMANIAN WAR Re BATTLES OF MORTENSTON. JULY 19th, 1916.

Indeed the onrush of the Abbiemanni at all portions of the invaded country had been so irresistible and violent, that with making desolation, fires, and floods the whole nation of Glandelinia was fairly effected by the Abbiemanni raid and invasion, and already predicted hundreds of desperate battles had been fought during the invasion itself.

Gannon's army was still confronted by the great glandelinian armies under general Phellinia Z Tam Tamerline at Mortenston, and many of the christian generals in Gannon's command knew this fierce glandelinian general and his ways of fighting and never hoped for success in coping with his army all of whose were Mc-Hollistinians. Gannon was aware of a cover the long delay in the advance of his army and that under Hanson ylvina, and learning of the failure of Everett True's army to force Ambrose Fuller from Potlie gazeosa and Arolanobis, he decided to try and force his own way past Phellinia Tamerline.

He had heard a good deal of this wicked Glandelinian general, and of all the horrible scenes his armies had committed, and decided to show this wicked enemy of god that he and any other christian generals could worse one than one Tal Tamerlines like him. He decided to crush him at all cost and so when the weather appeared to be at rest, he caused a violent demonstration to be made on the central lines of Phellinia's army and then moved his whole army forward by degrees, as if intending to pass upon his whole line. Phellinia Tamerline believed it was only a demonstration being made by King Gannon, a demonstration, of which he had repeated and repeated during all the days he was checked, and so had said to his fellow officers;

"That King Gannon is afraid to fight me. That also shows that god also is afraid of me."

But this wicked man reckoned without his host. For an hour already a frightful assault of twenty six Abbiemanni divisions had already been going on, and Gannon massing all of his heaviest artillery, started to pour a perfect perfect barrage upon the whole Glandelinian center. Phellinia was surprised indeed, but nevertheless he was confident that the assault was only a new demonstration to test his strength, and he massed all the men possible upon the point of assault, and after two hours passed, he soon realized it was more than a demonstration for a terrific concentration of assault was thrown upon his center, while other Abbiemanni forces were storming his right wing with terrific violence, and still others were moving around to turn it.

Being finally awakened to the reality of the situation Phellinia prepared for resistance in earnest, and crushed back the christian charge after four hours desperate fighting along his center, but all the most desperate and frantic efforts to hurl back the christian assailants along the left wing was just now impossible, and the christians threatened to carry the position. On account of the severity of the cannon fire along the christian line, the glandelinians after repulsing the assault along the center did not counter charge, but Phellinia brought up his own artillery, but found that the artillery fire of the christians was so severe and wild, that though he had over 456,789 guns he could only get a hundred into action and that these were soon disabled though placed far apart.

Phellinia now realized his mistake, found out that Gannon was only or had only been waiting for time and opportunity to hurl upon him the wildest assault under cover of an annihilating artillery fire of great intensity, and what was worse for him all the guns he had were useless as he could not get them into position to reply.

At eleven o'clock in the morning, after King Gannon's barrage had continued for four to five hours without any intermission, the Abbiemanni were surprised to see a monstrous flood of graycoats, yelling like a hundred million demons come surging toward their lines in a wild rush that was paralyzing to behold.

All the machine guns and a small field pieces were lined up at once and opened upon the enemy, with terrific effect, but for a time it did not take any effect on the wild Mc-Hollistinians who came charging upon them like a raging tidal wave, and almost carried the first line of works before the infantry could get time to open fire. The first line of christians fell back swiftly to the second line of works, before the monstrous wave of humanity, and then when the assailants were within three hundred yards, opened fire with machine guns in a perfect simultaneous discharge, and added it with three tremendous discharges of musketry all along the line, and terrible gaps were torn everywhere in the enemy's lines.

Some of the glandelinian columns halted and returned the fire, other divisions flowed back in fragments, but the remainder rallied and came on once more. Again their line was cut to pieces, and they wavered but once again they rallied, and poured up clean to the muzzles of the guns where they were shot and cut down in hundreds of thousands, and finally driven back with more terrific slaughter.

Gannon in the meantime was bringing up his left wing in full force to throw against the right wing of Phellinia's army, and Phellinia perceiving this made all efforts to check an hurl back the assault should it come. King Gannon however was delayed in the preparations of this assault, and the enemy then thinking it was not coming after all thought that it was only a show demonstration were less prepared than they ought to have been, and when the assault came it threw the whole right wing of the glandelinian army into frightful confusion, and after five hours terrific fighting it was rolled up ten miles, where it again made a stand, was cut to pieces, and routed with the loss of three hundred generals killed and wounded.

The disaster to the enemy had been terrible and Phellinia in making efforts to keep his other two wings together was killed by a shell burst, and many of his officers went down mangled and bleeding. Finally King Gannon massed his whole force against the remainder of the glandelinian army, and after four hours more of terrific fighting, as able to crush the two remaining wings of the glandelinian armies, and in the evening the whole christian army was carrying all before it. Hundreds of thousands of thousands of prisoners were taken by the Abbiemanni and Abbiemanni and ten generals were captured.

Cannon how however was not finished. General Mortenson had arrived with his own army of glandelinians and after many hours of terrific fighting, and hard work, the christian troops were checked, and the scattered glandelinian divisions under Phellina Tamerline rallied, to repel the christian success, just as Phellina Tamerline hearing of the loss of his main trusted general came up with the remainder of his own army. The battle however ceased early that next morning, but nevertheless Cannon had gained thirty miles on the enemy and was closer to general Hanson than ever. However he was determined to press his advantage at no matter what the cost, and later in the day attacked both Glandelinian army armies simultaneously and with tremendous fury, massing the heaviest columns against the foe in series upon series of head headlong assaults. Every assault was repulsed with terrible destruction, but then when the enemy rushed forward to counter charge they suffered alike in men and of officers.

The battle was a regular drama of horror, a seething charnel hell and charges were numbered by the score and each lasted many minutes or by the hour. Finally cannon massed half of his whole force against the two Glandelinian armies, and crushing the left wing or of Mortenson swept upon the other columns under general Benton, but here Bentons Mc-Gollestonians offered the most serious resistance, and finally the christian troops almost winning at this point was finally forced back across all the ground they had won.

Cannon in the meantime cannonaded Mortensons whole central line, and hurled other tremendous assaults against his left and right, and kept up the frightful assaults with unceasing fury, crushing line after line of the foe. The firing on both sides was something fearful, but despite all the devilish losses the charges never ceased until some important points had been gained and then Mortensons force was finally forced back two miles from its works, and the army under Phellina was rolled up for another ten miles in the greatest confusion and Tamerline himself severely wounded.

In the night Mortenson and Benton made the most desperate efforts to regain the two miles of lost grounds, and the bloodiest battle of the invasion in this section was on.

Ten times with the wildest fury 10,000,000 Mc-Gollestonians stormed their way against the christian lines, amid a million cannon like crash of masonry all along the line, and yelling and shrieking like so many demons upon the christian line, in that fearful inferno, was torn themselves, reeled back, rallied, and came on again, and though crushed and mangled, with their dead and dying lying in monstrous windrows, again rallied to the charge and finally after preternatural fighting of four hours duration in a blinding median of slaughter finally reoccupied a portion of the works, but could not break the main christian line.

Terrible indeed was the din of the terrific conflict. Cannon massed during these assaults three hundred thousand cannon against these enormous Glandelinian waves, and tore them to fragments every time they came on to the attack. Benton and Barclay Francis made these assaults, and Mortenson directed them. All night long the tremendous battle raged without abatement, but no efforts of the enemy was successful, and those who had reoccupied a portion of the works were soon driven out by a strong concentration of Abbieannian troops in the morning.

So fierce had been the firing along the opposing lines that night that all the trees had been riddled with bullets, leaves brought down by the million, and blades of grass was almost cut down as if with a lawn mower. The glandelinian losses was terrific over 5,290,000 in those desperate essays alone, and the christian losses almost twice that number.

The battle had again ceased with the coming of daybreak, and finally it was observed that the contest was really over. Though the enemy did not retreat and defiantly maintained their position, Cannon had progressed over forty miles in those two days of bloody battle, and this was a good satisfaction.

Hanson, Everett True and even Evans finally heard of this great struggle which was a drawn battle, and felt relieved when it was learned how far Cannon had progressed in his terrific charges. This battle was called; "GAINING TERRIBLE REVENGE." For twice he had crushed Tamerline's army, and drove it clean from the field, and he had showed Barclay, Benton, and Mortenson that he was able to show them all the fight they wanted too.

Hanson himself had some considerable activity at single point with Manley which also lasted two days in frightful and horrible carnage but the effect was very small just now upon the enemys lines and Hanson had withdrawn from the attack after having lost about 6,789,998 men killed and wounded. Evans himself had continued onward in his advance, and was now more southeasterly, than southerly and this was alarming Johnston Jackson Manley, who feared that it was the intentions of general Evans to come around upon his rear and place him between two fires.

Indeed for the christian side the war was now progressing in very much such in their favor. True Cannon had been unable to break the enemys lines but he had nevertheless been able to force and press it back to the distance of forty three miles in two days bloody fighting, and thus he was able to declare that he had won some sort of a christian victory. But he had not gained sufficient progress to help Hanson any and he knew it. So he was bound to make a break in the enemys lines at all cost, and also to revenge his affliction that he suffered during his childhood day. After four days of laying quiet a large force of Concentinians suddenly appeared to his relief whose leaders gave him word that Abbieannian was sending forward into Glandelinian more armies to carry on the bloody war to a speedy finish.

Cannon in his advance into Glandelinia had blown up thousands of million dollar bridges on the enemy, and inflicted such heavy losses in public and private property that it was a miracle that Glandelinia held out so long in suppressing the furious invasion.

All the movements that Evans was making was serious and threatening to general Manleys armies, and the armies under general John Manley had been so badly outmaneuvered by the Abbieannians under John Evans that he saw it was utterly impossible to reach his brothers army at Hon Catherine. Indeed it is very disputable who are and were the worse enemies that the three Manleys ever had. But indeed general Evans proved himself to be the worse, the one who no glandelinian army no matter what size could lick, or outgeneral, and who could never be frustrated in any conditions. He had Manley tried by various means, of wireless, and telegraph, to get news about the movements of these menacing christian armies under his personal and most dangerous enemy of all, but in his march Evans had destroyed all means of constant communication with all glandelinian sources, wrecked bridges, and smashed all before him in his advance.

Geraldine Miller will in this story will always be memorable in Abbieannian an Annals because of the splendid victory achieved there by her troops in throwing back the wildest glandelinian onslaughts ever known in warfare who if they had won at that point would have crushed Evans who fought the battle and would have been again in Calvernia in another month. At first after twenty four hours of sanguinary fighting in which over 3,456 christian color bearers lost their lives, and the mutual main losses were dreadful in the extremes and with eighty four generals killed and ninety six wounded, the first Abbieannian line had pressed were driven back by overwhelming numbers, but while all was in confusion Concentinians and Angelinian machine gunners were hurried to the place and immediately took up the defenses in the vicinity of twenty eight $45,578,988 dollar bridges, which flushed with victory at first the wild glandelinian hordes were striving desperately to cross. The Concentinians and Angelinian artillery men served their guns with skill and great coolness, covered the crossing of the Abbieannians, slew twenty thousand glandelinians per hour, and then blew up the bridges while hundreds of thousands of glandelinians were on them destroying the lives of every one of them.

The main Abbieannian line fought doggedly to hold the foe in check in the meantime, and Evans having arrived to the scene with the remainder of his army hurled the forces into the fight and after another day of bloody fighting the crack divisions of the glandelinian army hundreds of them were frightfully cut up and mangled, and were thrown back in the greatest confusion. Other great stone and steel bridges worth millions of dollars to Glandelinia were also blown up by the Abbieannians while they were crowded with glandelinians, the Abbieannian machine guns having played with the most deadly accuracy on the enemys ranks both before and after the destruction of these bridges which nullified all efforts to get over the series of rivers, along and between which the great battle raged.

After the glandelinians had been forced to retreat from Geraldine Miller the Angelinian and Abbieannian troops not waiting to build pontoon bridges, crossed the very rivers on the damaged stone and steel bridges, with the aid of scaling ladders, which brought the armies up to the top of the undamaged parts, and they spanned the gaps with gangways.

The Angelinian Holy City called Gloriamia has a ways held a warm place in the affections of Abbieannia and Angelinia, and also Calvernia, because of its association with the visit of many angels of god, where the story of Joan Of Arc and other events of note, besides the Angelinian Bishops residence there, and of governor Vivian and Hansons, and to all the art lovers in the world it has been a place of great pilgrimage because of the majesty and beauty of the many famous cathedrals there, there have been about eight hundred of these most beautiful churches, and the Sacred Heart Cathedral was the most splendid of all and a wonder and loved place of all the world. And it is probable that no material damage in this whole Glandelinian-christian Angelinian war had so aroused the indignation and reprobation of the whole world as that inflicted upon these noble and holy Cathedrals and of the destruction of the Popes Places, and and his threatened danger. Even at the start of the war this noble and holy city of Angelina the pride of God as well as the world had been under the fire of glandelinian batteries for over two years before the Aronburgs' damnation of horror came, and every glandelinian defeat in battles during the war was the signal for a fresh outburst of hell shelling. The whole city as described before besides hundreds of others and many villages and towns had suffered terribly from the concussion of the Aronburgs' gun battle and all these towns were still in ruins though with characteristic energy the people since the foe invasion was now smashed to pieces, were bending every nerve to reconstruct the ruined cities under the direction of eminent architects a plan of housing and systems of boulevards having been planned which makes it believable that it will result in the new towns and cities being more beautiful than they were before the frightful war.

After the invasion of the foe had been broken and all the glandelinian armies thrown out of Calverinia and Angelina large processions of Calverinian and Angelinian children had been seen led by parents and friends, and under guards, through these cities to attend a ceremony commemorating to the Gloria struggle, and the sight would indeed have brought tears to the eyes of any one.

It was the thoughts of the ruins of beautiful Gloriamunia that had made Hanson refuse to have the beautiful glandelinian city of Fountain Of Fire De La Greece spared, and he did right too. King Cannon had also committed frightful havoc during his advances into Glandelinia and so had all the other Abbieannian armies, and Northern Glandelinia became veritably a "No Man's Land."

Evans in continuing his advance had almost lost his own bearing, and finally when he had halted, at night time a portion of his troops were fired on by Abbieannians, and there no doubt would have ensued a tremendous slaughter, had not the mistake been discovered in time. As no christian armies had been within sight for a long while, King Cannon's army had been expecting attacks of the foe all around, and so had Everett True, into whom Evans had collided. Evans had however changed his course again, leaving a portion of his army to reinforce Everett True, and made a forced march southward, it being Evans' intention to march for the city of Lady Deeds and concentrate there for a time, and then move on again with redoubled vigor and a strike the rear of Hanley's army at Hon Catherine and throw it back upon Hansons and crush it for good and all. After three days laborious marching, and meeting six times a day fierce opposition from various glandelinian armies Evans finally halted near the Snow plume gap, and also at Snow flakes gap, and there he concentrated his army so strongly that the scattered glandelinian armies in this region dared not attack him for fear of frightful disaster.

Evans seized every railway and dodepot in this location, and also all the farms, and clogged up two of the rivers so as to dam them up and set fire to all the haystacks in the region, capturing thousands of cows, pigs, and hundreds of horses, and burning down the farmhouses. During the long march of general Evans' army, Violet and her sisters, had observed much of the scenery of the glandelinian country, and decided that it was very much like the scenes in Angelina, though the regions was quite warmer than Abbieannia itself fairly scorching in the day time. They wished to see more of the country but just now Evans did not think it safe for the little girls to go outside of the lines, and in truth it was not safe for the enemy's bands of cavalry were roaming everywhere, and there was certain chance of their falling into their hands, and being slain in cold blood. How long Evans had intended to halt here no one knew, but after a day had passed and still he did not press on, reports came on that the scattered armies of glandelinians were only an advanced party of a main force which was already concentration upon Evans, and at first believing the rumors to be a false falsehood, and that same one was only trying to scare him into hastening on his advance too quickly Evans went out scouting, but saw that no such reports were false, that a great force of the enemy lay before him though who it was under he could not make out. Nevertheless he was not alarmed. He had a greater army, more reinforcements was expected any day, and having full confidence in God, and so why should he worry. But never theless he was bound to find out who the main commander was.

He sent separate scouting parties further on, and closer to the enemy's lines but these could obtain no information for him, and he for a time gave it up without any more thought.

Violet and her sisters wished to find out for him, but by their uniforms Evans knew that they were the fierce Mc-Hollistinians, and so did not let them go at all, and had them watched, and under orders not to be allowed under any conditions to just now to leave the lines. He was in great dread, for though he did not know for sure those glandelinians they were, the dress, flags and head ware of the Mc-Hollistinians made him think they resembled the glands linians under general Germania vivian. However he had scouting parties out all day, and finally sent one of his best secret service men out to enter the enemy's lines and find out who the commander really was. Dangerous as was the mission the soldier did succeed in finding out and getting away, though detected, and after he had shot down over a score of his pursuers.

Then he entered the christian lines he was brought before Evans who asked him how he had succeeded on his mission.

"Why general here is your opportunity to punish your worse enemy," said the soldier. "To day I was face to face with a glandelinian general who you will know."

"Who was he?" asked Evans.

"GERMANIA VIVIAN."

"Germania vivian. I thought so but did not make out for sure. Did you learn how strong his army is?"

"His army is equal to ours but if you hasten quick enough you will be able to push him out of the way. His artillery is three days late, and he is impatiently awaiting its arrival so he could crush you in a general battle."

"Thank indeed for the information my boy," said general Evans. "You have discovered something great indeed."

Evans moving this to be the truth from all reports that scouts also brought in decided not to wait any longer, and within the next morning, started his headlong advance. General Germania seeing that Evans meant to push his way through, and that he would under no conditions stand for any interference withdrew his army enraged to fury over the delay of the artillery. Evans pushed after the retreating glandelinian army in full force, trying to overtake and force him to turn and fight, but Germania put such obstacles in his way that many times Evans was checked, and failed to overtake his worse enemy of all.

In the meantime the division with the artillery had been delayed through impassable floods raging in the region they were attempting to cross, and by the time they reached the location where Germania had been moving, they suddenly fell in with Evans' army. To resist was suicide as they were overwhelmed a score of thousands to one, and the troops and troopers in charge of the artillery either were captured, gave themselves up, or fled in a panic leaving in the possession of Evans' army a toll of 456,799 cannon and millions of rounds of ammunition. And Evans captured all this without a blow besides over 500,000 prisoners.

This was the greatest and most successful haul that Evans had ever made during his service in the war and violet and her sisters hearing of it were excited with joy and admiration. This was indeed a terrible blow to general Germania vivian who had thus lost every piece of an artillery, and there was no means to obtain any other for a very long time. Germania saw that his only safety was to fall back to rejoin general Hanley, whom he had separated from in his efforts to oppose the headlong advance of general Evans' army.

During the forced march Germania's army had met with disaster upon disaster, which showed indeed that nothing out could do the Abbieannian army any good. Twice three or four strong divisions of Abbieannians had like swooping cyclones rushed his rear capturing many divisions of prisoners, and many provisions and wagon trains fell into the hands of the christians. It was evident to Germania though many of the other glandelinian generals did not realize it as yet that the war to glandelinia was lost, and many of his officers were for surrendering their arms, but Germania was confident of escaping and pushed on with headlong speed, and on after he crushed the christian army. A division of Abbieannians swooping far ahead of Germania's army destroyed all the bridges that crossed every river and thus cut off Germania's retreat in the direction of the rivers. Then during a halt through some unusual cause and which was fitfully unknown a frightful explosion occurred among Germania's lines, and three hundred thousand lives were wiped out in an instant.

Germania vivian was half frightened, frightened over his condition and did not know what to do. To make a stand and oppose so immense a christian army was suicide, and so he kept on retreating, sending appeal after appeal to Hanley for reinforcements. On and on pressed Evans' army, and time and again squadrons and divisions of Concentinian or Abbieannian cavalry descended like avalanches upon the rear of vivian's army capturing a terrible toll of prisoner prisoners, and once a large force of infantry having him by having gotten around by a swift dash, caught general Germania van guard and cut him off almost entirely from Hanley himself.

Germania perceiving his peril was desperate, and being forced to halt his jeopardized army, suddenly struck the christian lines who tried to cut off his retreat a staggering blow at the battle of The Annals, and was successful enough to break through, though he had to resume the retreat with greater speed. His loss in this conflict had been upon him terrible, and his army was so badly diminished, that Manley who perceived the danger did make efforts to throw larger armies in the way of Evans advance, but it was too late now, it being just like throwing a leaf in the path of a wild tornado and expecting it to check its wild progress.

Manley was however, determined to stand his ground nevertheless and not fall back as long as possible resistance could be had but the glandelinian columns sent by him to oppose Evans advanced forces could not check the christian progress at all, and were forced to fall back step by step and so all seemed possible to Manley that resistance was in vain.

All during the time of the headlong christian advance Violet and her sisters had trying experiences that would try any ones bravery though of course it was full of human and fun at the same time.

During the first day of the christian advance against the new forces thrown forward by Manley to Germanias aid, a large section of the christian line under Richard Kinderdine had been suddenly assailed by a force of Mollestinians who had strove to check the christian advance at all costs.

Well the Abbeannians had been taken by surprise, and driven into some confusion, but near by the scene, was a large farm for hogs and even wild bulls. Violet and her sisters saw a way to surprise the enemy themselves, and without saying a word to Evans of what they were going to do, took the chances in their hands and first let loose the swarm of panic stricken hogs and swine which pouring through the advancing glandelinian columns tripped many of the men, and then to make matters worse Violet and her sisters let the wild bulls loose and these came tearing among the glandelinians charging and bellowing in every direction. The glandelinians had now three foes to fight, the Abbeannians wild hogs or boars, and wild bulls and though they shot many down bayoneted many of the hogs which showed their own wild fury by tearing and biting many of the men, were finally dispersed, but the bulls were too many for the glandelinians who finally became panic stricken and a rout of the most exciting description occurred.

Thousands of the men leaped the nearest fences, other swam ran into the stream, others climbed trees, and were captured by the Abbeannians, and the remainder too precipitate flight in all directions, some tripping one another, and fighting even among each other in their furious endeavor to get away from their new enemies.

It was the most complete rout of a glandelinian division that was ever witnessed during the whole war, and as it was found out that Violet and her sisters had been the cause of it all, they were praised and cheered by the soldiers, who laughed a with them over the joke on the glandelinians and rode them on their shoulders.

Evans however soon was offered serious resistance by the new forces of Glandelinians who had suddenly halted their retreat the glandelinian general Strabovates repenting of his retreat when he heard of the progress Evans was making, and Semirais supposing the position of the glandelinians undiscovered suddenly led on the wild attack. But in vain was the contention when the main force of the Abbeannians came, up --dreadful was the carnage.... The glandelinians fled and the life of their leader pierced in the arm by a bullet and in the shoulder by a shell fragment was only saved by the fleetness of his horse. During this battle called Arlett, Violet and her sisters in the first confusion of the frightful attack had been separated from the Abbeannian soldiers and the wicked glandelinians with a shrill passionate cry and yell, had rushed after them, some on horseback and some on foot, bearing down the opposing reeds in their way, while the little girls vainly attempted to effect their escape. For a short time by inflicting serious losses Violet and her sisters had hopes of eluding their pursuers, as the glandelinians perceived a swarm of Abbeannian snipers on the top of the nearest trees about twenty feet high, and three in circumference menancing the glandelinians by their voices and scout gestures while preparing to fire and shouting to Violet and her sisters in which direction to run.

The foremost glandelinians shrieking with rage made a spring for the trees firing as they did so, and a number managed to take some of the trees down but fortunately without hurting the men who slipped among the reeds. The party of glandelinians followed the retreating men foaming with rage to the rising banks of the river, the men firing again and again and crying loudly; "Glandelinians, Glandelinians" until closely pressed by their pursuers, both the Abbeannians and glandelinians came upon the top of the slope almost simultaneously where a fresh party hearing the yelling were prepared and instantly fired a deadly volley as the glandelinians appeared shooting down fairly at once. The others simultaneously had turned upon Violet and her sisters with increased fury, and the little girls in their eagerness to escape stumbled and fell, the huge pawns of pursuers running past them, Jennie braving her arm and ankle in her fall.

As soon as the Glandelinians had passed Violet and her sisters arose and limping with pain attempted once more to retreat, but the glandelinians turning around rushed to the attack, one of the men flung his sabre in his hand and the next moment Violet was struck senseless to the ground. Her situation appeared hopeless but her sisters went to her defense with such wild out fury that the Glandelinians were driven back by their wild firing. Fortunately for Violet and her sisters a large force of Abbeannians who were advancing at a terrific charge in counter attacking the glandelinians arrived in time to hurl back the glandelinian assailants, and a large swarm arrived to the aid of Violet and her sisters, and these glandelinians were soon put to flight. The Glandelinians after this had made three more savage charges and in their wild headlong onrushes they had went clean through large portions of the Abbeannian lines that any one would have pronounced impenetrable, but they had been repulsed with tremendous slaughter, and so fierce was the struggle at close quarters at every one of the three terrific charges that every combatant on both sides had their trousers go torn, their coats buried by exploding cartridges, hands shockingly torn by fierce wrestling, and scores of glandelinian columns had been shockingly mangled and shattered to mere pieces. After the glandelinians had been driven back in panic the other columns of the glandelinians took up their own positions and in the afternoon made the longest and most furious charge that Evans ever saw, they fairly hunted the Abbeannians as to say, the one tremendous onslaught starting at eleven o'clock and lasting till nine at night making for both sides the most horrible losses, but finally the whole wave of Glandelinians who made the attack were thrown back, and cut to pieces, and the Abbeannians then rushing on carried all before them, and cut down with their murderous fire scores of thousands of the wily foes.

This dire disaster to the enemy, proved to them that no effort whatever could stop the progress of the advance of the great christian army under general Jack Ambrose Evans, and the glandelinian general Avis pentonia though he threatened and renounced the christian army under Evans he nevertheless was compelled to fall back day by day without further opposition.....

In the meantime general or King Cannon "Proclaim a boast envied at the progress the other christian armies were making, and enraged at the long check he and Hanson were making, became more impatient and having already received heavy relief reinforcements, decided to make another attempt to force his way past the enemy's lines who were confronting him. Without the slightest warning, and as sudden as a tremendous tidal wave sweeps upon a shore full of people a mighty Abbeannian surge 11,000,899 strong came tearing upon the whole left wing of Phellinias Tamerlines forces who were stationed at Bunte Bar clay. The enemy offered frightful resistance to this great Abbeannian wave but Cannon had in the meantime sent forward another which had come on nearly within reach of the heels of the first wave, and resistance was in vain. The whole left wing of Phellinia Tamerlines army was cut to pieces, the survivors thrown into confusion, and the number of prisoners that were taken was tremendous.

Six times Phellinia Tamerline massed a strong concentration against these two assailing Abbeannian waves, but this time there was a different change. Aliviolent attack two hours later came sweeping upon his right and center with the same and utmost tremendous fury, and after frightful resistance for four hours his center was crushed and rolled up beyond rally, while his right wing was turned and outflanked.

Overwhelmed by fearful Abbeannian tidal waves of men Phellinia Tamerline was again compelled to withdraw, hoping however that the other glandelinian armies stationed near by would come to his aid in time. They seeing the great confusion and the withdrawal of Tamerlines army came up as quickly as possible but Cannons army had been more prepared this time, and met them with a devastating fire that carried all before it. Ten times the glandelinians made desperate assaults to retake the lost ground and ten times their columns were wiped out, divisions mangled and cut up and the survivors thrown back clear to their own works.

Later in the evening general or King Cannon massed his whole force forward in a general onslaught, and carried the enemy's works at nine o'clock winning a complete victory, and making the way clear for him at last.

The news of this conflict and its result reached both Hanson and Evans, and also Manley heard of it. Evans and Hanson were glad, but Manley was apprehensive, and feared now that to hope to hold Hon Catherine or Pristie Toe Stations any longer was out of the question. Cannon was also his main danger now besides Evans, and he did not not know what to do. He however drew back to him all the scattered armies he had sent out to oppose Cannon and Evans and Everette True, and thus the two other commanders were left a clear right of way, when before they had been unable to advance to Hansons aid. Cannon had twice revenged his child hood tragedies, and in a terrible manner, he had even endangered the enemys cause exceedingly, and had opened the way for Everette True to march around to make a junction with Evans and general Vivian who were both moving to flank Hanley and throw his armies back on Hanson and destroy it if possible....."Violet and her sisters felt happier since the news of Phyllis Taylor's crushing defeat, and of the way Cannon had opened the way for not only his own advance but for Everett Trues as well. Hanson Vivian had at first decided to try his own luck at smashing back at Hanley for revenge of his series of defeats at Easter Starving but in view of course of the intentions of general Evans, and so notified Hanson with this letter which he telegraphed, and which took three days to reach him!!!!

"GENERAL JACK AMBROSE EVANS.
COMMANDER OF THE ARMIES OF ABBIRANITA, AND ABBIRANITA.

"My dear and loving friend;

"It's my purpose since Cannon broke his way through a portion of Hanley's lines, to try my luck and strike my way toward Bristle Toe station. If you think it is a wise movement let me know before I begin the attack.

YOUR'S TRULY

HANSON ANDREWS VIVIAN"

Evans read the note for several minutes and then during the first halt of his army wrote this note in answer to general Hanson Vivian and which was also sent by telegraph!!!!

"DEAR GENERAL, HANSON:

I think it is wiser to wait for a while at least. I'm moving my armies around Hon Catherine to strike the enemy on the rear, and throw them back upon yours so we both can crush him and scatter his army like the leaves in a forest during a hurricane. I expect to get there by the end of next week at least. I'm arriving near the town of Lady Deeds now.

YOUR FRIEND,

GENERAL JACK EVANS.....

Hanson was surprised at hearing this and did not know what to make of Evans' progress, and looking into the situation with the help of geography maps which Hanson had in his possession he saw that Evans if not discovered too soon could never fail in his movements. Indeed Evans was taking good good precautions that Hanley would not discover his real intentions and to help Cannon was doing the same kind of destruction. All communication with other Glandolinian armies with Hanleys, was being cut off by Evans, who was downing every telephone and telegraph line in their paths of advance, ruining the myriads of railroads, destroying the tracks, and making all kinds of obstacles in the way of coming reinforcements. So Hanley Hanley could not obtain any information even of the whereabouts of the entire Abbiranian army under Evans, and so all was being so completely done, that no news of any kind failed to reach him and in the rear of the advance the damage was being rapidly repaired, so as to be able to communicate with the advancing christian armies. Fierce efforts had been made by the enemy to recover the severed wires and telegraph wires and many were the severe and petty battles during this one long advance, Cannon alone being forced to fight three hundred and sixty five small battles in one week.

Evans himself was drawing nearer and nearer to Lady Deeds and as this was the first time that Ambrose Fuller himself was hurrying his main forces to oppose general Evans' advance in that direction and save this most important city from capture. So the enemy in the meantime were throwing up well fortified works in the location of this threatened city, with the purpose of never giving up no matter what the cost, and Evans learning of this action of the preparations decided to go on more cautiously and to risk disaster to prevent the loss of the city.

To Violet and her sisters it was the most exciting advance of their whole lives.... They had seen and witnessed day after day during the christian advance numberless attacks here and there upon the christian army while it was advancing, but witnessed the havoc caused by the christian armies, while advancing and advancing, and thought now the Glandolinians were getting a good and sound punishment that the whole nation would never forget in a long time to come..... Evans however fearing that Violet and her sisters overcome with excitement would do something rash, had them more closely guarded, and did not want under any conditions any one of the guards to allow them to them to go out side the christian lines whether in motion or at a halt. They protested vehemently to this but he only said;

"If you Violet and your sisters realized the peril now as I do you would be glad that I'm doing this, and would congratulate me instead of scolding me. Any way I cannot help it. I'm responsible for anything that may happen to you little girls, and this also makes me more careful. The enemy you know from the fierce attacks my armies have dur suffered every day during the advance are swarming in heavy parties everywhere, the whole region is alive with glandolinians of all kinds, and so it's up to me to protect you no matter how I do it. You don't realize my favor now but some day you will and then you'll come to me and ask me to be more strict yet."

However Violet and her sisters did not as yet realize the facts of this but nevertheless they kept within the lines because they did not like to commit acts of disobedience, and to sneak out of the christian lines, was something they would not dare to do even if it was to save on themselves, for to do so when they realized they were not allowed to go they would if discovered be charged with desertion and be punished. So they said no more about it though they longed to go through some exciting experiences. But their desires were to be satisfied and more than they expected. And already twice during the advance in two desperate battles Violet and her sisters had went through exciting and trying experiences, and yet were to go through more. During the evening when Evans was forced to halt when news came that a portion of his lines was meeting fierce opposition, from as it seemed a portion of Ambrose Fuller's army, Violet and her sisters who had went pretty far and close to the christian line of breastworks, saw something something like the form of chickens darting about the lower portion of trees near by and plying their glasses saw something which made them realize that they must sound a warning, and off they dashed firing their pistols in the air as they did so. And immediately following came a perfect surge of Gargolian birds all on horse back yelling fiercely and endeavoring to overtake the little girls and shoot them all down. It was not evidently a party just sent to take the Vivian girls, it was more like a surprise assault at this quarter of the army, and the little girls reached the main line just in time to give the warning, though their dresses showed to the christian generals they met a myriad of bullet holes.

The Gargolian surge was first met with a terrific fire from artillery, which strewn the plains in front of the christian works with mangled corpses of men and horses, but as the second portion of the surge came on unchecked, the infantry then let loose with a storm of musketry, and then drew back to cover just as the machine guns let go and tore holes a mile wide in the Gargolian column.

Confused by the unexpected succession of deadlier fires the Gargolian columns who as violet the first recollected, but they gradually reformed and came on again. Again they met the three succession of dreadful fires and were again frightfully torn up and with their dead and wounded lying in monstrous heaps where they all recoiled once more. Ten more times the Gargolians repeated the assault, and though this was only one of these daily attacks which had been made on the advancing christ in armies, this one was more fierce and progressed more like a general battle.

Violet and her sisters had witnessed the whole struggle which lasted all day from the beginning of the evening, having been unable to sleep on account of the rattling din, and in the morning as the christians were resuming their advance, Violet and her sisters going along with Evans as formerly saw to their own risk a swarm of men in gray going through a large wheat and corn field as if panic stricken. The distance to the fields was treacherous but the little girls had been eye sight, and soon a tremendous uproar of musketry told them that it was another of those petty attacks which the enemy continually made to stop the christian army on its advance, and try to delay it if possible.

It however was remained there for a while from the horrible din of redoubled increased firing Violet and her sisters had believed it was becoming a general battle.

Today Violet and her sisters were in more greater peril than they wished to be or ever expected to be. The enemy realized the progress of the Christian advance at all locations of the national security, and how far the line of Abbeismian order have already advanced, were bound all the more to go at there for little girls and slay them at all costs. Thus it was one of the main reasons of the cause of so many attacks have made on the Christian army during the advance and so Evans suspected this always kept the little girls closer to him and guarded himself and them with a strong body guard. Onward and onward progressed the Christian advance under all the attacks except handons, but just now Evans, Everette Trues, and Gammann were the only ones strongly opposed as no more battles had occurred elsewhere for a long while since the great storm of battles that occurred at the start of the invasion. During the advance of Evans army a large force of Gammann on horse back rushed the van guard of the Abbeismian army in which Evans and the little girls had for a fortunate left before it happened. The van guard was crushed by the attack but held its ground until a portion of the other divisions came up, then the Abbeismian cavalry charged the Gammann and drove them back with heavy losses. Evans formally led the van and it was fortunate that he or the little girls were not there at the time of this desultory attack which had been very severe and sanguinary and caused both sides terrible losses, and one general was killed on the side of the enemy. The enemy despite being dispersed by the Abbeismian cavalry came to it again and again and only desisted when the approach of the main body made them fall back toward the main Glandelinian army which was retreating before Evans advance.

Evans was annoyed by these continual attacks and decided to stand no further into interference in this way. He halted his army at midnoon creek for a short rest, and placed Violet and her sisters near to his headquarters. Fatigued by the long riding on horse back and completely covered with a dust from head to foot the little girls donned bathing suits and went in swimming with many of the soldiers. They had just finished their bath when at one section of the Christian line the enemy again sallied forth to make of their petty attacks, and Violet and her sisters by only hiding themselves under the water until the first wave of assailants passed over saved themselves from capture or annihilation altogether. Then as the firing receded in the distance the little girls left the creek as quickly as possible having redressed themselves, and seeing that their little pistols were well loaded sped on toward Evans head quarters. In this location they were startled to hear the heaviest firing of all during the advance yet and looking in the direction saw that the whole region was in possession of the enemy and that indeed a terrific struggle was going on.

To get back there with the enemy in possession was impossible but the little girls seeing other points clear worked themselves carefully up the creek until they found themselves within the main portion of the Abbeismian line, and here they met some generals and told them of the danger, that Evans head quarters was in possession of the enemy, and that the attack of the enemy seemed general.

It was high tide that Violet and her sisters had observed this scene and the Abbeismian generals immediately rushed heavy forces to that location which soon reversed the attack of the enemy and drove it back with heavy loss.

At other portions of the line the attack was equally as fierce as it was even more successful and for a time all efforts of the Abbeismians was unavailing, for they could find no means to hurl back the gigantic attack. The firing was fearful and terrific and the struggle seemed to be so violent that Evans who was further off to the left at the tyrant hearing it sent in for words of what was happening, while continually only sending forth troops and artillery to stop the progress of the enemy which seemed so damned wild and savage.

Soon the new forces and artillery arrived under general Baldwin and these opened a terrific murderous fire upon the enemy which tore their whole assaulting line to fragments and sent the survivors flying in total rout and panic.

But later on fresh columns resumed the assault and now Evans realizing that it was a general battle that was on, hurried up other portions of his army and seeing to it that Violet and her sisters were placed in a better location brought up all his artillery and soon these broke into action with a roar that stunned all who heard it and which shook the ground like an earth quake. A great onslaught was made three times by the enemy and repulsed with a loss that was a massacre instead of a battle, and then a wave of Abbeismians 23,000,000 made the wildest charge that these Glandelinians had ever witnessed. They managed to repulse the charge after four hours of horrible fighting, and then came on to make one themselves. Then and again in three thrice the forces of both sides surged back and forth, and crushed one another with the most frightful loss of officers and generals and terrible was the state of the torn and battered battle lines, soaked in the blood of their many color bearers who fell in such frightful numbers as to make the world appalled to hear it. At noon time the battle had increased in frightful fury and at one thirty a great assault of the enemy was made with redoubled fury and volence and for three hours steady the million cannon fire roar if of masonry firing a surprised King Gammann and great Everette true who were over fifty miles away and that much from each other at that.

The progress of the battle became wilder, kindermine fell seriously wounded, and Rowell Duster Johnston's right grand division was cut to pieces with the loss of all the generals and every regimental commanders, and not a flag bearer survived. The slaughter was horrible but still the fury of the battle increased and Evans realized that Ambrose Fuller was throwing in all his efforts to crush him, that it was no more a series of petty attacks but a frightful battle of volence that startled him and the little girls themselves.

Even Evans knowing now how violent the assaults of the enemy was determined to force his own way through the assaulting lines at all costs, and soon hurled his strongest divisions upon the enemy. The battle was now redoubled to ten fold fury, and fearful onsets made by the enemy almost met success at many points of the line. Evans rallying his main forces until an appointment determined to learn how great the strength of Ambrose Fuller's army was and so sent scouts out in all directions to the scene but these on account of the fury of the battle raging so wildly everywhere could not get through the region at all and returned with the reports that the approaches to the enemy's lines was untenable.

Violet and her sisters had wanted to go but Evans did not like to trust them upon this dangerous errand but finally as he was assured by some inward feeling that God would protect them he decided to yield as their entreaties were so irresistible, and how could he refuse such beautiful little friends when God himself made him know through an inward feeling that the little girls would safely return. So while the battle was growing wilder and wilder in fury, and while the assaults of the enemy was becoming stronger and stronger and while the artillery and masonry of both sides was firing in a madman of damn damnation Violet and her sisters disguised themselves and set out through a glen far out of reach of the battle rampant madman fury.

But where ever they went they met charging columns of Glandelinians some going and some coming, and here and there a great explosion of a shell would tear a whole column asunder. Violet and her sisters realized it was impossible to go through this region just now, for even if they escaped from the enemy the shells here was exploding in a perfect salvoes and there was no telling but that they would be killed. And the way leaves were falling and the way the music in the air was screaming the little girls knew it was a storm of bullets from some hidden Abbeismian force and so realizing that an assault was going on here also they changed their direction, and continued on toward the south.

However Violet and her sisters met some retreating Abbeismians at this location who told them that it was impossible to get to the enemy lines and that they must give up their mission. This was true as Violet and her sisters soon realized, but then they had clever heads believe me. They decided to trick the enemy. Putting a squadron of Gargo lians they rode up to them as if in hurry and as the men stopped them and demanded where they were going Violet said:

"We are beaten back by an overwhelming force of Abbeismians. The battle is lost. If Ambrose Fuller has about 55,000,000 men we are safe."

"Oh in" laughed the Gargolian leader not recognizing the little girls. "We are stronger than that don't you worry."

As the squadron passed on Violet saw an envelope sticking out of the rear pockets of one of the cavalry officers, and pretending to follow them for a certain distance and to converse with the men on the subject of the great battle going on Violet in the meantime unseen by the rest slowly and carefully drew out the envelope and stuck it inside her waist.

But the officer had felt the document leave his pocket and seeing Violet snatch it, grabbed her at once.

"So after a while you are spies." Hissed the leader. "Here give up that envelope or Gargolian though I am I'll cut you down. We all hate spies and we hate our own are the Gargolian girls."

But Violet's sisters had suddenly drew their own guns and covering the whole party with their weapons backed off, Violet going first with the papers in her hands.

The Gargolians were only ten in number but they did not dare make a dash and when the little girls were at a considerable distance by the soldiers suddenly started in pursuit but were unable to overtake the little girls.

And she forthwith handed the paper now devoid of its envelope to Evans. Evans opened it and was surprised for it was just the desired information he wanted. It ran as follows:-----

General Post Exam. '11

At other points of the line he had bitter opposition, and the dead and mangled bodies of men during a bloody battle. Blizzard did the situation and consisted from the gladiolus. General took on the adventure of a man. Sullivan Mountain, visible also for the other and said that his troops from a war school in Florida. Resistance.

"Call your general." Was Evans reply to the messenger. "To see his cannons, and then to charge headlong with the lay-out. The entire line must be forced and those three towns taken at all costs." When they reached Princeton the battle was in full array it being now broad daylight. Evans at the front and on the right of the line swept his human waves down the Hudson and Mc-Hollister roads and as those after news and horrible fighting drove back the Mc-Hollister columns in a roller of rifle and cannon fire, Evans heard the shout and yell of gullies. Hanson's men as with Halden leading the van they charged in from the river. A company of jaggers and of light Mc-Hollister indian dragoons in the front of the storm of firing on both sides rushed to strike. There was fierce and most savage fighting in the streets for four hours but the attack was so strong, overwhelming, fierce, irresistible, irresistible, and well calculated that resistance was futile. General Rahl (quibbled) the Mc-Hollister commander aroused from his revels around his troops and made three of the most heroic charges ever witnessed in any battle before, the carnage was terrible, the city resembling an inferno, but in the last bloody charge the gladiolus commander was killed, and in a few minutes more all was over. 10,000,000 prisoners fell into Evans hands, and this important division of the gladiolus army was cut off and destroyed.

The news of Princeton alarmed the gladiolus of the main army, and Aberdeens Commander sent seventy million 70,000,000 of the best troops to hotly contest the ground against the Abbiecians who were in hot pursuit of the remainder of the retreating gladiolus army. Evans who had now received some of his south and divisions, drew back his left wing which fought desperately, and Aberdeens reaching the scene found the whole Abbiecian army awaiting him on the other side of the street. Noon was falling and Abd Aberdeens feeling sure of whipping Evans and driving him back decided that he would not risk an assault until the next morning. Many lessons had not yet taught the gladiolus a general that it was a fatal mistake to give even half an hour to the great Abbiecian soldier opposed to him. During the full Evans' main large lines, took a series of roundabout roads which he and his officers had already reconnoitered, and marched a portion of the army to the rear of Princeton, while he left the others to engage the enemy along the streets. There he struck another portion of the gladiolus army and fairly annihilated it, came down upon the rear of the main line. A most sanguinary conflict ensued and raged for five hours in the bloodiest and most savage struggle, but the whole gladiolus army was broken out to pieces, and defeated losing some 15,486,366 men and the enemy was forced to withdraw out of the trap into which he had fallen. Hanson himself when he heard of this great blow struck by Evans said that it was the most brilliant campaign of the war. With a force again much smaller than that of the enemy, like at Marie O Oshorne Evans had succeeded in striking the gladiolus army in two places in one day, with superior force at each point of contact and crushed the enemy. At the north of Princeton he had the benefit of a surprise, but south of it the second time he struck the blow he was between two hostile armies weaker than the ones before the outgeneraled Aberdeens could get up with the main army. Then when the main body of the Abbiecians and Angelinians under general Vivian arrived, and the other scattered armies also came up, and added by heavy reinforcements Evans was strongly overmatched the enemy and a rain it was a continued flow of the gladiolus hosts.

The close of this war in gladiolus was the darkest time of the war. Everette was just destroyed the gladiolus army at Cardenia Gates, and his two formidable lieutenants, General Milton Bryant the light horseman and General Fergusson the skilled general had destroyed and scattered many other armies of gladiolus without a battle, and so many floods of the red dragoons rode hither and thither and all through the region that no gladiolus now dared lift their heads to oppose them, and while the north eastern section of gladiolus lay at the feet of Everette. Everette True as he started through it with his army, there was no more organized force against him and joy indeed the cause of the wicked gladiolus was really hopeless. Evans was still away alone to the rear of general Hanson's main army, and he was at once aware in his own mind that he could not turn his back on his brother John's army to stop retreating, and Evans Evans with all his force at Non Oshorne.

Evans was heading directly for the town of Lady Decia. There was an ever increasing force of the enemy but who it was under no one could obtain, for the reason was just then out of the question.

Violet and her sisters, however went out to find out their themselves, having been allowed to do so and having obtained the permission of general Jack Evans. They came within view of the enemy lines at six o'clock in the evening, and as it was growing dark on account of a severe thunderstorm that was fast approaching violet and her sisters saw in the direction of the enemy lines a series of queer lights of various brilliant color, colors, and as they viewed them carefully they increased abundantly, and so the little dare-devils decided to investigate these lights and see what caused them. They had advanced a certain distance when all of a sudden came a loud cry:

"Halt who goes there friend or foe?"

Knowing that the Angelinians and Abbiecians never challenge but surprise any travelers they knew they were unexpectedly upon the picket lines of the enemy, and immediately crept into hiding.

"Who goes there?" Repeated the voice.

Violet and her sisters kept silent. Then out from a clump of bushes appeared a soldier in the gray uniform. He looked carefully around and seeing no one went back to his hiding place.

"We cannot go on ahead or get back the way we came unless we surprise him and make him a prisoner." Said Joice. "We'll have to creep upon him and assault him while he's off his guard."

So Violet and her sisters quickly separated and circled closer and closer to the guard, and then all of a sudden the little wild cats sprang upon him and bore him to the ground his rifle going off in the air as he fell. He yelled and cursed, and blasphemed but it did him no good. Violet quickly gazing him with his hands hankkerchief and Joice and Jennie tried his feet with his long overcoat and some ropes they had carried with them for a certain purpose and had just hid him and disappeared themselves behind a thick clump of shrubbery when a swara of men came rushing up.

"It's funny there's no one here." Cried the officer. "Where in the country I put here?"

"He must have met with foul play." Said another officer for "For I heard his rifle go off, and here it is lying on the ground."

"Some one is trying to enter our lines." Cried the first spoke. "Search everybody everywhere here."

The men started at once prodding the bushes, and all looking through the fields near by but not a trace of a spy could they find and they soon returned to the officer disappointed.

"We must have succeeded in getting into the lines then." Said the officer who was a captain. "The lines must be watched. I'll arouse the whole camp and have them on the look out for them. If general Brancejaw knew who was within our lines he would have him shot."

Just then one of the officers who had been standing close to where the little girls had attacked the sentry, picked up something he saw lying on the ground.

"It's a ribbon belonging to some little girl." He said. "I thought no children whether our own or the child slaves who may have escaped would not dare get near our lines or those of the dirty christian dogs." He said showing it to his superior. A private bustle immediately stopped and picked up a small white handkerchief handkerchief and read the name of "Jennie Vivian J."

Of course he did not know the Vivian girls but when he showed it to the captain he cried out:

"Good Darn the luck. It's those dod-rasted lubberly Vivian girls again. We are doomed if we do not catch and slay them."

At once the men were all excited, and the search was started anew, while the officer rode on an into the lines to arouse the camp. But violet and her sisters had overheard the name of the main general which they had wanted to learn, and that being enough for them, and now realizing it would be impossible to enter the enemy lines without being captured or assassinated, the little girls had cautiously and carefully stolen away from their hiding place, and while the enemy were searching every part of the nearest location to the camp for them they were already on their way toward the christian lines, and in no time had run hotly into a party of Abbiecians.

"Where have you little girls been?" Asked the leader.

"Evans allowed us to spy on the enemy once more and learn who their main leader was." Said Nettie. "We are on our way to tell him."

"Well you had better hurry up with it then." Said the leader. "He is going to start to advance, and you little girls have been gone for two days. How far is Lady Decia?"

"About sixty three miles." He took the train going and as he said. "Said Joice.

"Is it really that far?" Asked the general. "The it'll take us a long while to get there."

Violet and her sisters then went on toward the main lines and being warned by the sentries soon reached general Evans's headquarters and finding him told him who the general was and how far the town of Lady Dole was.

"I know the distance alright," said Evans. "But I'll get there in a week if possible. I'll make a forced march, and arrive before the enemy can reinforce too strong. I fear Abernethy will reinforce him, and I'm afraid to make separated movements to crush him if he tries it. I must cut a mass through Lady Dole and shall."

What the mutual nations suffered on account of the glandeo-Angolinian war.

The greatest disaster of the whole glandeo-Angolinian war, did not mainly strike the opposing nations, but those who had not taken any part on in the war and those who no matter what side they took. The nation of Abbieannia suffered in food matters only, and in industry. But others, Christian or not Christian, for Angolinia, or against her in the greatest severity, suffered fearfully in industry, trade, traffic, and minerals and food matters, coal mines, and famines of all sorts, in food and materials. Calvernia the main sufferer however, on account of the frightful disaster and devastation which startled the world provided most provisions of food and materials to the Christian nations and any nations during peace times, and while up to the frightful storm of warhell at Francis At Lanta, and Mildred Greenburg the first two bloodiest bloodiest battles of the entire war the Christian losses in money and provisions substances was over eighty trillion of dollars alone, while the innocent onlookers suffered the losses amounting to hundreds of trillions of dollars. And what was the main cause of the losses?

VIVIAN WICKY AND McWHIRTER JENETTE. AND SUBMARINES IN THE BAY OF VICKERY AND ANGOLINIAN SEAS.

These hellish ships upon waters sank thousands upon thousands of ships laden with provisions, for Angolinia when not knowing the menace of the McWhirther seas, the ships ran boldly into these hornets nests of the sea all of whom were glandelinian submarines.

Scarcity of food and provisions was also Abbieannians lot to suffer, and material of every kind, and prices for the pint of butter amounted to from $5 to $10, and apples and all kinds of food or fruit had outrageous prices, not graft, or a money-making scene, an elsewhere, but a real war price because they were so scarce, and a rich man was lucky if he could buy a simple orange for the price of a dollar. And finally before the fall of McWhirther, where again and again terrific battles had raged with such fury as to make a regular scene like the war of the worlds, it was impossible to obtain any kind of fruit altogether.

Prices in everything went sky high, and this was one of the first chief causes which speedily brought Abbieannia into the war. In many nations all the factories had closed, on account of the war, and need of provisions, and scores of millions of working men and women were jobless and were rendered desperate for want and poverty.

SADDENED CALVERNIA!!!.....

In all however the main and victims of the far furious war were the children of these nations, especially in Calvernia, where children lived lives of the tortured in hell. In Calvernia and Angolinia only were the substances of candy and toys made. With the closing of McWhirther and Vivian Wicky and the seizure by the glandelinians of the Boy King and pleniglovesman Islands, all such provisions stopped entirely, and more so when all Angolinian and Calvernian sea and river ports were seized and blockaded by the enemy. Grown persons also suffered from the candy and sugar famine, and worse of all some of the nations were threatened with general famine in all substances and many suffered without fuel during the hard winters.

The whole world suffered the effects of the raging war. Building materials was scarce outside of wood, and erection of brick and stone buildings stopped. All sea traffic was stopped, glandelinian ships were interned, and not allowed to leave and those coming were not also allowed to enter. The other horrors were the sorrows of giftless Christmas days. And practically this latter was the saddest. This part of the tragedy started with the seizure of the McWhirtherian fortifications, the city of Aronburg, and also that of Vivian Wicky and Federal, and of the closing of their ports by the glandelinians at the outbreak of the war.

Vivian Wicky is the largest city in the world of this story. It has one hundred million inhabitants and covers an area of over one hundred miles. The McWhirtherian fortifications were built by the Abbieannians during the frightful glandeo Abbieannian war of 1841, and was for the remainder of the many years following completed by the Angolinians and Calvernians themselves.

Thus the enemy had secured a titanic stronghold, which had in other wars before been able to hold the whole world at bay. All the fortifications combined at the outbreak of the glandelinian Angolinian war had 365,997 heavy ten inch guns, and on over a million combined in all other kinds of guns. Through the fault of overconfidence, the Calvernians had not guarded this city and long line of fortifications facing both sides of the mouth of the McWhirther River as well as they should despite entreaties, advice, and warnings of the national guardian Governor Hanson Vivian who had wrote to the Calvernian government:

"Your neglect to fortify the forts of Vivian Wicky is dangerous to the national great war is threatening your very doors, for our armies just now have failed to invade Glandelinia and are now driven out and scores of glandelinian armies are pouring into Angolinia, while fleets of enemy warships are moving through the Calvernian seas to seize the sea ports of Calvernia. You had better take advice in time and have the fortifications of McWhirther occupied before its too late.

Governor General Hanson Vivian

But they had not heeded his advice and thus when the war was still young but had progressed with evident success on the part of the enemy who were then forcing Christian nations to submit to the McWhirther seas, the whole southern part of Angolinia, the city and fortifications were seized by the foe, the sea ports of Calvernia was also seized, and all Christian ships of all nationalities interned and the captives and crews brutally jailed and murdered during the great Norma and Julo Gallic Reign of Terror.

With the cutting off of the world from these sea ports by the glandelinians, all commerce, with Christian nations stopped, and all Christian happiness too, and the seizure of McWhirther and Calvernia so close to Abbieannia was a move made by the glandelinians that made Abbieannia fail that she had been perfectly mortified, as it was something to her like a man coming up to another man and grabbing a cigar out of his mouth and throwing it into his face. Abbieannia was enraged and prepared for immediate action. It was only in the countries of Angolinia and Calvernia that Christmas presents were made, and through the terrible achievement of the McWhirtherian seas, the sea ports of McWhirther Vivian Wicky Aronburg and Federal were able to transport all articles across the glandeo Calvernian seas. Some hope could have been obtained by means of the sea ports of Angolinia and other sea ports of Calvernia but these dared not venture their ships forth on account of the many fields of glandelinian war rivers of the sea.

This was the cause of the high price of goods in Abbieannia the suffering of the other innocent nations, but probably the worse of all was the great famine of toys and all kinds of other Christmas presents.

ABBIEARNIA'S MODIFIED, USANE LING EFFORTS TO REDUCE
 MC-VOLUNTARY JEROMEITE. 1944 1/2 1944

The whole world also was surprised and startled and appalled over the news of the wars, saddened, a hellish fury, and hellish ferocity, and of the fiercest struggles and most consuming fires that every record, and the wild storms of wars devastating horror, but were more shocked and interested when they learned through wilder news of the series upon series of desperate and obstinate attempts of the Abbeismians to recapture the Mc-Whirtherion fortifications and the cities of Aronburg and Federal, and of how when they fell, and also Julio Gallo and Jorma, how the fall of these cities, caused the most frightful carnage along the Aronburgs run at Glorinda Agency miles northeast of Julio Gallo. They learned of the world shaking bombardments the many other still fiercer conflicts raging throughout Calvernia and Angelina and the first bloody wreck of the hapless, gladiatorial cause along the north portion of the Cedronian run during the bloody battle of Glorinda. At this while the fate of all families that children loved as well was in full sway, and to add to it came the severity of foods and fruits, and then altogether threatening pestilences and general famines among all smaller and large nations, when Abbeismians and others had to all with provisions sent in ships - protected by a squadron of battle ships, and tormented boat captains. Indeed those were dark sorrowful days. Abbeism's almost lost her former - at the first series of vehement and violent attempts to take Mc-Whirther Aronburg and Federal becoming blood - failures, and the sight of scores of hundreds of Christian - marchers in one day's conflict torn to pieces with cabins wrecked sailing into her waters for remains and to unfold the wounded and alive persons of a continuous - ion of evil tidings of the bloody war. They returned too for Abbeismians wondering the aid of other nations and to take place about the fortifications of Mc-Whirther with their battered guns, and all time but imperial glory for two weeks over 1,600,000 guns were thundering away in a hellish clamor while shocks the coast of Angelina and Calvernia for the full length and turned out for Abbeism a great victory. With thanks or Zittman refused to allow the ships to retreat - the hellish beating, outside the sea before the fortification while he

Near by was a deep ravine and into this the children plunged. The Nettie following as quickly as possible, and just as they went a high explosion tore everything before it just where they had stood for a few minutes before.

"The glandolins must have observed us," said Hattie to the boys. "I heard a shout and saw a flash of light. I was only a few yards off." And she ran on.

"Ten and—BOOM! A high explosive shell landed within two feet of the edge of the ravine and the little girls were half buried in debris and dirt and after some difficulty got themselves out of the mess.

"There is no safety anywhere," said Daisy. "We must leave the hill at once or we'll go to heaven quicker than we could count on."

They immediately left the ravine while in the location where the battle was raging they heard an increased volume of sound, and a storm of fierce shells. They rushed down the hill as fast as possible, and reached the base without further adventure, and started off for the left of general Evans' line. Seeing another hill just as high and more wooded, Violet and her sisters started up this. They advised Hattie to go back to the line and receive better treatment for her wound, but she insisted on staying with them saying:

"We can work better together. And why should I back out just for a wound in the shoulder. It's better than a broken arm or leg."

They reached the summit and viewed the battle while in hiding saw that the enemy was making no further progress, and that one assaulting line which extended as far as eye could see was riven and torn in many parts, and was giving way, and then upon them rushed a long line of red and purple who mingled with them, and then all was smoke and flame, mingled with a horrible crash and roar, and a chorus of horrible yells combined on both sides.

Looking elsewhere, Violet and her sisters saw the wild play of the line of Christian batteries, heard their tremendous clattering thunderous roar, and saw long surges of the enemy, some charging forward, in a matter of flame and smoke, and others broken into fragments, giving way and saw also that every portion of the Christian line seemed in action.

To them the din was terrific, awe inspiring and unspeakably wild and savage. Some times they saw new activity at other quarters, and long waves of purple rush forward under a storm of bewildered rattling shell fire, and receding a gray wave disappear into the inferno like woods beyond. This scene they watched closely, and after waiting forty minutes saw the Christians return but only a mere handful of men, and followed closely by a tremendous column of graycoats, aided by three other long waves.

"Reinforcements for the enemy," cried Violet. "I must signal to Evans."

She told her sisters what she had seen, and they signaling to the boys on the various other hills got them so alarmed that they readily signaled to the Christian lines.

BOOM, BOOM, BOOM, BANG, CRASH. Five shells landed on the hill where the boys were seen to be thickest, and many were observed to fall and rise no more.

Starring and the others who were with the little girls and who saw it one by one in horror. They expected shells on their own side and so ducked under cover but nothing occurred though now the hill seemed to be under a particular bombardment and the surviving boys were quickly swarming down on all sides of the hill, as Violet and her sisters had signaled to them to retreat, and not feeling face annihilation. Evans' officers in the ravine had received the signal and after the assailants coming from the woods were torn up and repulsed with dreadful losses in officers and men the most fierce and frantic efforts were made by the Abbeccians to take those woods, and Evans seeing the attempt massed a number of inactive batteries to shell the woods, and Violet and her sisters from their hiding place watched the scene and soon from the far on other side they saw issuing a column of glandolins troops overtopping. In minutes came on to make a storming counter charge in mass. Right in the middle of the field the Abbeccians halted and allowing the glandolins to come closer met them with a deliberate and murderous fire which tore their whole line to pieces, and the column after furiously closing with the Christian line, finally gave way, and the Christian line rushed forward into the woods and disappeared.

Looking elsewhere with her classes Violet observed a certain high ridge opposite her lookout station and observed to her horror that a whole glandolin battery was being massed upon them.

"We are discovered," she cried to her sisters and companions. "We must leave. The foe are massing a whole battery upon us."

With a cry of indignation and almost apprehension the little girls and boys quickly sped down the opposite side of the hill. The men at this the last seen on the top of the hill with terrifying fury and shells burst like popcorn in a shower. Violet was stunned by the shock while still near the summit and Jennie tripped and fell headlong. They were in peril for if any of the shells exploded too close they would be done for. Starring and Frank took the chance in their hands and rushed up to the little girls.

Another shell exploded close by and Starring who was sitting flat on his back was severely wounded. Frank sprang out to the other boys and tried to help his companion but he was also hit by a shell fragment and rendered helpless. Jennie had managed to rise to her feet and crawled to the side of her sister. Seeing what had occurred she covered the other boys in a body rushed up to the fallen friends, and managed without trouble to get them to a place of safety, and then from a tree top John signaled their flight to the Christian lines. In a few minutes a large force of glandolins was rushing toward the hill, and a Angelino seeing them shrieked a warning to her sisters. The other boys on an adjoining hill saw them moving up the sides of that hill and signaled to the Christian lines. Evans himself observed the signal and made the order sides of the hill so untenable for the enemy that to rush up was an impossibility, and then a division of Abbeccians came forward, caught them hand to hand and drove them away. Violet and her sisters and the wounded boys were rescued and taken off toward the Christian lines.

In the meantime the assault had been exceedingly tremendous. While the enemy was on the whole Christian lines. Along the Christian center nearly a hundred glandolin divisions one after another had made an attack in daylight, and within four hours had all been torn in pieces, it being as if the same number of men or rats had been attempting to swam the rear of a line of ships. But nevertheless the losses on both sides were terrific, and there was danger that Evans' left wing would be rolled up. He was anxiously waiting for the other wing under general Vialon to hurry and come up before the enemy would overwhelm him, for the more numerous the wicked glandolins were reinforcing the more they were concentrating against the whole Christian line and on both sides.

While the slaughter along the chief inn center was at its height the glandolin general pronounced was killed, and four sturdy throes of his best generals fell dead or wounded. The assault that was raging was of the wildest description, and Evans feared that it would soon begin to fail on his lines and sent a messenger to hurry the advance of general Vialon's army. He heard also that two of his dear little friends had been wounded, and two of the boys also, and a few twenty of them killed, and many others wounded, and knew then it was exceedingly dangerous to allow the children to do any more so time just then, for the enemy's artillery men and sharpshooters had their eye on every hill within the Christian line on the Christian side, and no signal's action could survive there. He never the less nevertheless determined to try to take the enemy and bravely occupied all these hills with his unequalled troops, and drawing up the remaining batteries hurled a storm of shot and shell upon the enemy's line in the distance, and many other cannons turned those upon the rear of the assailants and cut down the glandolins in such frightful numbers, that the survivors huddled at their losses gave way in confusion, leaving the Christian line just as solid as before.

Long the rear however the assault of the enemy still continued, with the same unabated fury, and now Abbeccians taking main command of the attack, as his best aiding man had fallen directed a tremendous assault upon those lines of hills. The main portion of this assault was directed upon the two hills which Violet and her sisters and their boys had had completed before. Again and again waves of monstrous waves stormed their way up that series of low hills, and again and again their whole waves were shattered and driven back crushed and mangled, and hundreds of officers in that first frightful carnage readily gave up their lives.

Both sides seemed to hammer the heavens to pieces with the din of their crashing artillery, and the crash and bang of exploding shells was doubly terrific. Underneath the offered the best of the forces to the hill and he looked the number of the enemy and did not see the onslaught of general Brenon's divisions of glandolins.

Under the devastating fire of the artillery the men of the Christian line were carried to the position, but their line was so badly torn that they finally withdrew, the Christian counter charge stirred with the glandolins and cutting down the whole line sent the remainder flying down the other side of the hills. To assault the hills on the rear was indeed for the main Christian battery covered this position and sent them on their way. The glandolin line was broken and the Christian line was saved.

But at an earlier part the great general Abbeccians were busy by obtaining a foothold on those hills, and he in consequence sent half of his artillery and a few more still heavier guns, and a few more orders not to fire but to keep the batteries. To protect the Christian line from the onslaught of the glandolins the great general Abbeccians sent a force of men forward, and under the hand of the great general Abbeccians the glandolin line in confusion

When they were in the middle of the battle and in full swing, Violet and her sisters had went out on the ground, and within a short time saw a column of men far to the north east and hurried their horses forward. The column was about a mile away, and as they followed on Violet and her sisters could hear the noise of the battle again as it was resumed. Reaching the head of the column Violet screaming the officer asked her whose army it was.

"But where is papa now?"

"My father, general divisions!"

Said the officer, "He knew of your guard's defeat in the struggle yesterday and sent a portion of Gammou to his aid."

"What do he thinking the enemy would do after his recent defeat?" Asked the general.

Evans then realized that he had made a serious mistake and so decided to take his address. He kept up a desol desultory advance and the enemy expecting that he had fallen back retreated slowly northward toward Han Khatathia but continued stubbornly every step of the way. Soon they were within sight of this great glacially formed city. If the enemy falls here surely the way for their aid is lost.

the affiant for and see what it is all about. It sounds suspicious.

1. The first step in the process is to identify the problem or issue that needs to be addressed. This involves gathering information and understanding the context of the problem.

Evans hearing the distant roar of battle in the east increasing quickly brought up his own lines and had them ready as quickly as possible. Evening however dawned and all firing ceased for the present. Evans had established his lines however, and having with him now the full army under Cannon, though the latter had not yet arrived, he sent out scouting parties to see what was doing with general Vivians army. They soon came in with the report that general Vivians army was further south, and still held at bay by Stanley not knowing whether to attack or to stand his ground, or to retreat.

Evans pondered upon the situation for a while and then finding where Violet and her sisters had gone said to them when he found them:

"For duty's sake I request you to go to general Vivians army and see how he is getting along. If he is in any danger do not come to report to me but send in your report to me by telegraph or have him do so. Go now before it is late."

The little girls at once went off and learning that they may face perils on the way disguised themselves. Just as they started off toward the country and picket lines, they heard far off to another location the sound of many brass bands of cannons and wondered what was wrong. They learned from reports how far the Christian lines were under general Vivian and also the direction and started off as fast as their horses could go. It happened to be a safe trip however for no enemies were close by. They found general Vivian and general Vivian, and so without any adventure they easily came within sight of general Vivians lines. They were recognized by the first sentries despite their disguises and were admitted into the lines.

When within the heart of the lines the little girls asked their direction and then asked for the whereabouts of general Vivian their father.

"He's gone out scouting and we do not know when he will be back." Answered one of the officers. "He don't know what to do because the situation of our lines is so very bad. Some of the other armies further north of Hon Catherine will have to break the enemy lines sometime or we'll be cut to pieces and routed."

"We were sent to find out your conditions by general Evans." Said Violet cleverly. "And you have told us what you wished to know." "We'll telegraph to him if we like."

"You had better wait until general Vivian comes back first." Said the officer.

The little girls decided to do so and so went into the headquarters which the soldiers pointed out to them. They had not gone in yet however for soon there was a collision of horses, outside the wall and in came a party of enemies.

"Oh general! Grief one of the officers. "Your beautiful little daughters are here to see you. They have been sent to you by general Evans."

"It's good news indeed." Said general Vivian. "But what is all that commotion?" "I hear it!"

"I don't know your excellency. I've heard it for the last week hour and it seems to grow worse."

The general with his staff quickly entered and seeing his dear little girls advanced then saw by and all the other generals did so too. They explained to him of their arrival and he telegraphed to general Evans thus:

"YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL EVANS:

I have been checked by the foe since yesterday and Hanson advises me not to attack but to remain on the defensive until I get advice from you. I failed to tell you that day on account of Hanson's standing in my way, but nevertheless we are just heartily in the battle of Hon Catherine or Lady Deeds. Our forces are growing stronger every hour as the reports say and we'll soon crush the wicked enemies of God. Keep us your good wishes and we'll win alright.

YOUR BRISKED GENERAL VIVIAN."

They had talked for the 14th day. The girls and their father had been over his first defeat and they had been told their father of his challenge of his enemies and how he was victorious when he discovered the truth."

"I don't know him." Said general Vivian. "It's no fun to progress so far as he did and then to have no victory at all. But he will be able to win the great prize for it later on. So don't feel bad about it now. We'll soon hear the news of a great battle now."

Our General receives the report from general Vivian and is a note to him about his challenge.

"TO GENERAL VIVIAN.

FORCE YOUR WAY THROUGH JOHN HANSON'S LINES AT ALL COSTS. I'LL send all the reinforcements needed, and have to win.

YOURS TRULY EVANS

So in the morning general Vivian already started forward toward Hon Catherine to the soldiers crying over and over again and saying:

"On to Hon Catherine. On to Hon Catherine. Down with the enemies of God. And again the battle was in full swing.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN.
THE PROGRESS OF THE FRIENDFUL GARRUITS AT NON-GATHERING. DE LA POERRE, BIRMINGHAM.
A STRUGGLE INWARD AS SEVERE AS DOUGLAS ZOE HAD KNOWN.....

As general Vivian's army started to advance the largest portions of the Glandelinian army started to fall back slowly, opening fire all along the line as they did so, it being a fire so terrific in the throats that general Vivian for the present present horrified at his losses halted his advance, and withdrew the forces back to cover. He however had all his own artillery massed to repel any onslaught that the foe would make and wrote to general Evans that the enemy just now showed too strong an opposition and that an advance against the enemy's lines without terrible slaughter was completely out of the question.

Evans had in the meantime made the same attempt to advance, and had found the same opposition and had halted his advance. In receiving the note from General Evans he had answered that he likewise had been forced to halt and that the only thing to was to do was to launch a most terrific attack and bang the enemy's lines to pieces, before their advance could be resumed. Evans had also prepared his artillery, and these instead of being prepared to repel any intended attack of the enemy, opened with terrible fury upon the enemy's lines all of a sudden and the roar of nearly 345,000 cannon almost shook the Abbeidanians off their feet

The enemy's guns replied with the same vigor and for an hour the most terrific artillery duel of the war in Glandelinia was on. Shells fell and exploded everywhere in perfect annihilating barrages, which made a din to out rival the eruptions of Mt. Galverine ten times, and the noise was so shocking, and the concussion so severe that most of the men could hardly stand it. Terrific losses were inflicted by the confetti rain of bursting shells, which canopied the sky and landscapes with smoke and flame, trees were shattered by the thousands, guns blew up by the scores, monstrous and great explosions occurred by the hundred within the lines of not both sides, and the din again sounded like a sky of worlds dashing themselves to pieces against each other. Evans advised general Ivan to open his artillery upon the enemy, general Ivan having heard the great din where he was, and obeying he did so and the crashing uproar was still more redoubled as the Glandelinian artillery shot back a fierce and sullen reply, and the scene was similar to the effect along general Evans' lines.

Both sides plied their cannons with night and main, and seemed to try to annihilate their artillery batteries. Explosions set seething fires among the dense foliage of the woods in this location, and portions of the christian lines were compelled to withdraw to better cover out of reach of the flames. Next to Clorin this was the most terrible combat of artillery in the war there now being over 678,999 cannon in action on the christian side, and over 587,000 on the emig's making in total 1,245,999 guns that were roaring, crashing, and booming in the most horrible cannonading thunders ever heard since Florida.....

Evans and his artillery general directed the fire of all the great guns, and also directed in the moving of the infantry out of range of the Clandestine cannon which was committing incalculable damage. Fully two whole hours this tremendous artillery duel continued without intermission, and then grand gradually it lulled, and died down to utter silence.

"vans prepared themselves whole force for a tremendous attack upon the enemy lines, and all his officers received the instructions to go at it like hell and smash and wreck if possible the whole Lawlessian center under general John Hanley and also destroy it too if possible. They were to start forward at nine o'clock in the morning it now being seen thirty the artillery duel having started before four.

At nine o'clock the whole column of Kindermans about 10,000,000 strong deployed into many serial brigades, advanced to the attack. They formed a long and solid line which stretched, from Onion Creek, across the Bagdian Pan and to the other side of Non Catharina a line nearly forty miles in extent.

Most of the Abbeindian cannon were covering the advance of Kindermindes army, but half of the of the glawdelindian artillery along this opposing portion of the Masonic lines opened upon the attacking columns under Kindermindes. The line crossing the region of Onion Creek was mangled and torn to pieces by a shattering fire of glawdelindian artillery, and fell back, but the other two portions of the immense line still continued on, and the christian artillery men seeing the havoc caused in the central portion of the advancing Kindermindes column increased the fury of their own cannon fire dropping shells at the rate of a thousand within fifteen minutes along the enemys lines.

the lines their beautiful flags flapping in the breeze. One by one they would drop as a color bearer fell but never sank to the ground. Evans knowing it was folly to have Kindornie try it alone finally sent other large divisions under the command of of Roswellian master Johnson, and Fredrickson. Henryson and these came on in the same extensive columns.

The more heavier columns did Evans send forward, the fiercer grew the intensity of the Glandolinian artillery fire, and so dreadful was the pace in their ranks that the generals of the advancing lines ordered their men to move on more swiftly, but to take every advantage of protection, and not to fire, but to charge with the bayonet.

On and on pressed the Abbeaundin line and still fiercer became the enemy's artillery fire, untill driven to anger Evans again let loose with all his batteries and once again did the frightful clamor swell upon the air like before.

As Vandermine's first line approached the enemy lot loose an additional all deadly fire with machine guns and long lines of musketry to which the first line of Abbiecunians who were advancing between the two main Abbiecunian columns responded in their return, and their own fire tore and gapped the enemy's lines in a way that was terrifically amazing. The officers of the main column warned their men that the work must be done with the bayonet and their muskets were not even loaded, and moreover so strict was the orders and the discipline that no one was allowed to leave the ranks, and when one of the men did so an officer promptly ran him through the body.

No sooner had the enemy opened with musketry and lighter artillery than the main charging column broke into a headlong dash, and run, and in a moment the first line plunged into the abatis of fallen timbers which the gladiolians had constructed. On the left this christian advanced line was so roughly handled that no less than seven hundred thousand men of the 1,200,000 men were either killed or wounded, but as the two main columns came surging up like two tremendous tidal waves, they burst through the down timber in the face of the most terrific musketry fire, and in their desperation the enemy set fire to the foliage and trees to check the wild charge of the Abbieannians, but in vain over the works they poured, swirling right through the flames and all slashing right and left, and using the bayonets and lances with deadly effect, and though the wicked Gladiolians fought well and stubbornly, cheering and yelling loudly as their most tremendous volleys rang, the Abbieannians pushed silently on to end the contest if possible with the bayonet. The Abbieannian troops swept over the whole line of gladiolian works in this location like a rushing wave, but to really capture these works was impossible just then for 'unley perceiving the desperation of the christian assault sent forth reinforcements to repel the attack, and the Abbieannians were driven to the other sides of the works where they made a fearful stand at again their wicked foes and tore every massive line of graycoats that came forward at the charge, while their signal corps kept signalling to the other forces to hurry up and join them. Swims in the meantime was throwing column after column to the attack intending that it should not cease, and placing more artillery he added their fire, and while thus engaged he sent for Violet and her sisters and said:

"You remember during one battle when you little girls slew General Bernard Dunn."?

"Yes," answered Violet.

"Well," said Evans, "I have here a captured note within my possession that testifies your work that day and by what I've read in this note I believe you little girls had better keep by my side every moment during this battle or you'll goin' go to ruin. The enemy are bound to get you now if they have to go through hell to do so. Prayer vainly if the one only thing also."

Violet and her sisters thought that Evans was right, for they had heard of this very danger themselves, and feared to be within sight of the very Glandelinians themselves, and decided to stay by Evans at the time during this battle..... They watched the frightful storm of shells falling among the Christian batteries which were firing with might and main upon the Glandelinian batteries, and heard the cheers of many of the cannonners, and also the shocking explosions which occurred every moment.....

They longed for the cruel war to be over, and how they did pray that it would be. They were tiring of the war and its miserable effects, and sometimes believed that the Christian cause would never win until any more motion than of hard fighting.

Where ever Evans went the little girls went also, and toward seven o'clock in the morning it was reported, that Kindermine, and all his supporters who had been in possession of the Glandelinian works were being driven back by overwhelming numbers, and that a large surge of the Glandelinians were coming forward to assault the whole Christian center at one time, and that many of the Glandelinian generals had received orders to see to it that Violet and her sisters were assassinated on the spot, and their guardian also.

Evans hearing these rumors of Kindermine's withdrawal did not at first believe it, but going out to see Violet and her sisters following him he saw many large streams of men firing to the southward and looking back in a headlong flight.

Realizing it was true he went forward at a dash bidding Violet and her sisters to do their best to rally the men by the use of their presence and words and actions while he did his own part. It indeed was

Kindermine's army that was retreating and the supports, for against them strong masses of Glandelinians had been thrown and suffering from a fire too murderous and destructive to withstand the Glandelinians had been forced to fall back, but they were not in confusion or panic as Evans had supposed and as he and the little girls came upon the scene, instead of meeting a division of men in confusion or disorder while retreating, they found the whole force retreating, but stubbornly and fiercely contesting every step of the way and the firing was so terrific that Evans advised Violet and her sisters to go further back to the rear before they would get hit by any of the bullets..... Violet and her sisters felt like staying, but never theless they obeyed, and away they went following to the front of the retreating columns Evans in the lead, determining to prepare his line for the coming attack, and also to telegraph to Hanson that the battle of Bon

Don Catherine De la Poir Forestfort was on in general, and to watch any movements that would be made by the other Glandelinian army under general Huebaum's aid.

Evans and the little girls continued on but keeping in sight of the retreating columns to the rear. Sometimes they would be seen to halt and pour in a fiercer fire upon the enemy, then break ranks and continue the retreat, but never getting demoralized or confused, and to Evans it was evident that the Glandelinian columns who were advancing against the Christians under Kindermine were meeting with little loss.

"How are you going to stop the advance of those Glandelinians?" said Violet who had observed through her glasses the full fury and obscuring charge of the vastest Glandelinian surge they had ever seen since Florida. "The Glandelinians who are coming are mighty strong in force, and can probably crush your center unless you can get it ready in time."

"Something will have to be done mighty quick," said Evans in answer.

The Glandelinians are mighty desperate so since we have forced their army so far southward during our invasion and it seems as if it is placing you little girls in the greatest danger, besides putting the Glandelinians to the most desperate fighting ever seen since the war began.....

They had now reached the main section of the Christian lines and Evans giving orders for the artillery men to depress their guns and cover Kindermine's retreat, went forth to straighten the lines and prepare them to resist the foe's charge. Violet and her sisters stayed with him riding horses and galloping around where ever he went, watching his movements and advising his orders. Kindermine's forces soon came up and the main line broke and let the Christian columns through, the other portions opening fire upon the assailants with their artillery, and machine gun fire. This checked the onslaught of the Glandelinians for a short time, but as Kindermine's troops had passed through, the Glandelinians rallied to the charge and the battle was resumed with redoubled fury. Violet and her sisters were warned by the other officers to keep their distance from the main firing lines as now the firing on both sides was becoming so terribly terrific, and the losses were horrible in the extreme.....

Violet and her sisters at once proceeded to general Evans' headquarters, and from there viewed the surge of approaching Glandelinians and decided to keep the eyes on the wild assailants and see those commanders lead them. Francis and William were with them, and they felt horrified at the noise of so strong a battle that was now raging, and begged Violet and her sisters to take them away from it all.

"Don't be afraid," said Violet. "Those Glandelinians who are yelling like an army of devils and shooting right and left will never force our lines if Evans can help it."

Violet and her sisters constantly kept their eyes on the whole scene, saw the whole surge come upon the Christian lines in a welter of slaughter, go back wangled and torn, and rally again and return to the charge. They saw this scene repeat time and again, the whole region beyond became like a roaring inferno of hell, shells burst closer and closer in a perfect hailstorm which terrified William and Francis all the more, and it was all that Violet and her sisters could do to quiet them.

They were startled themselves at the prodigious fury of the Glandelinian attack, and wondered whether the Christian line would stand against it or not. Finally they were so sure of the results. The Glandelinians had been massing stronger and stronger against this portion of the Christian line, and finally Violet and her sisters observed that there was an overwhelming concentration going on all along the line, the uproar of the conflict had redoubled in terrifying violence, and finally it was seen that at the extreme right of the line within sight of general Evans' headquarters that the irresistible force of the Glandelinian onslaught was forcing back the Christian line in great disorder. Fearing that the Glandelinians would come their way Violet and her sisters warned all the officers within sight, and telegraphed them selves to Evans who was to the main right of the Christian line just then telling him what was going on. Then watching for further events they saw suddenly to the right a perfect swarm of Abbeismian waves of men rush upon the apparently victorious Glandelinians from an unknown section of the woods beyond, and these fell upon the desperate Glandelinians with great and horrible slaughter and drove them back across the works, and down to their own lines. Again the Glandelinians rallied to the attack and came in even more in increasing numbers, and general Vivian himself who was also heavily attacked reported to general Evans headquarters at once about the situation and this is what Violet received who answered the instrument://////

URGENT. J. A. EVANS:

I have made a great attack on the enemy's lines, but they have repulsed my forces at all points, and I'm getting worried, for they are assaulting my entire three wings with all their strength. Aberdoenia however was killed early in the severe fight and I am hoping that I can stand ground. If possible send to help as I'm overwhelmed by a force of Glandelinians who appeared at another quarter. The battle is fierce and sanguinary along my lines, and my losses are becoming something terrible in the extreme and two thousand of my heaviest cannons are disabled. Twice a portion of my extreme right wing had been rolled up and general Greenburg is mortally wounded.

URGENT. VIOLET.

Violet at once sent one of the messengers with the telegraph telegram to Evans and the surveying the scene in the distance they saw that the smoke of artillery had increased still more and that the uproar was becoming murderous all along the line. Then they were startled by hearing the tinter going off again and answering Violet herself got this down:

"To who ever you are answering this instrument; report to general Jac Ambrose Evans that there is a strange but overwhelming column of Abbeismians moving around the Columbine Grounds at Bon Catherine Lady Beede, and this division is making an advance that seems possible of turning Evans' main right wing should the blow be struck. Warn him before it is too late. If you could imagine only how terrific the battle is becoming you would marvel indeed. It is becoming a holy terror. The slaughter is frightful."

URGENT. VIOLET. KANDER.....

and as the little girl got this note Violet and her sisters started sobbing and even William and Francis by crying out: "They have broken the line, and a swarm of Landolinians in a perfect wave are coming direct for Evans headquarters."

"We must get out of here then as quick as possible," said Violet. "But we could not dare go outside," said Angelina. "There are scores of thousands of Landolinians coming on a horse like run and they could kill us at once and be tear us fairly to pieces with a storm of bullets. We are trapped."

They were indeed in a very bad and poor lot. William and Francis were so frightened that they hid under a bed. Violet who was quick-witted, at once notified Evans by telegraph that a surge of Landolinians was coming to break his headquarters and that he was trapped. They were trapped as escape was impossible. A surge of Abbeismians appeared and gave the Landolinians a volley that rapped the whole group but their could not stand before their wild charge, but while the main section of the column retreated, a few remained made for the house, as their leader realized that Violet and her sisters were in the building and that they could not escape in time without being shot down, for on their appearance the enemy would open a fire that would annihilate all before it.

They rushed to the house to defend it against the assassins, and Violet reached it and entered with the screaming Landolinian flames just at their very heels. The attack was violent on the house, but there were over six hundred Abbeismians now in the building and they poured upon the enemy a destructive fire that galloped their ranks frightfully. As the main line pressed on, the Landolinians remained behind to force the building and gain possession of it and so after a slight halt the attack on the house was renewed. This very reckless kept up a continuous barrage fire upon the house with artillery, some went back to fetch artillery, to batter it down, while others pressed forward with blazing flags with the intention of setting the building on fire.

But the Abbeismians picked off every one of the Landolinians who made that wild rush toward the house, and the Landolinians were so astonished at the great resistance that they halted their attack and waited for the others to come back with the artillery. The roar of battle raging elsewhere could be plainly heard and the uproar of the firing outside the house and the answering fire of those inside the house. The fire of the besieging Landolinians however was deadly and every man who dared show his face at a window, or who stepped to the door to fire, fell dead or wounded and already over a hundred Abbeismians had been killed, and nearly two hundred wounded. Any of the wounded who were able returned to the forces outside of their firing or reloading the empty pistols for their comrades. Finally it became evident that the Abbeismians were exhausting their ammunition, and the Landolinians still waiting for the guns realized it and made a sudden wild rush forward. The Angelinians and Abbeismians kept on firing until not a shot was left, and then as the Landolinians swarmed up to the door doors and tried to break in through the very windows on the first floor, the defenders met them with pikes, pistols, knives, and bayonets, ever using every obstruction against the doors to prevent the Landolinians from breaking them down.

The assault was wild, terrific, and savage. Three Landolinians at a time would appear at the window and leveling their pistols shot at those inside, and would be bayoneted in return, and the pikes were so full of dead and mangled, and so full of powder smoke that it looked as if a great mass of soldiers was going on. The obstinacy played against the doors for a long and unreasonable time as it seemed to the Landolinians to resist successfully. Their attacks against the doors, not even the heaviest hits or battering rams would break down the doors, and all those who tried to get in the lower windows many of them were were bayoneted or cut down at the hands of the Abbeismians who cursed and blasphemed the Landolinian names while they fought the raging hell legion of flames, stabbing, clubbing their pistols and clattering the head of many a Landolinian, and running one after another through the heart with the bayonet.

Even though out of constant ammunition as they were it was evident to the Landolinians that to force the building was in vain, and finally after four hundred of their comrades had been slain by the Abbeismians and 2,345 wounded, the remainder withdrew, and the leaders ordered the artillery to be opened on the house. Violet and her sisters who had not joined in the fray alone had quantities of ammunition, and to tell the truth as long as the ammunition of the little girls held out not a single Landolinian could fire a shot. The Landolinians were surprised at this great resistance and finally there was heard an order from the main leader:

"Fire the main house - a number of you men with fire batteries soon as the place goes redoubt the attack and we'll capture the lot of them."

But not a cannon could be fired, for as soon as a gun rushed to fire a gun shot from the little girls put him low. Again the Landolinians in a perfect wave rushed the house yelling like demons, but so fierce was the resistance that the slaughter was terrific. To tell it the house was a very large building with a broad and magnificent veranda all around, and when this attempt was made driven back by the bayonets and pikes of the Abbeismians the veranda was littered with dead and wounded Landolinians. The Landolinians soldiers again rushed to the attack and kept jammed themselves into an impregnable mass upon the veranda and even climbed the roofs of the veranda in swarms to assault those in the upper stories, but in vain fell from the roofs like flies under the blows of a flyswatter, and so strong was the Abbeismian resistance that again the Landolinians had to retreat and give it up. They were fighting not now for their country, home and friends they left behind them, but also for Violet and her sisters who were in their midst and they were bound to keep back the foe until they met annihilated. The terrible struggle for the possession of the house had already lasted half an hour, and now a change was coming elsewhere. The Christians who had been driven back were reinforced, and were being rallied, Evans was massing stronger divisions upon the assailants, and slowly but surely and surely the geyons were being hurled backwards, and finally the Abbeismians with a shout rushed like a torrent upon those who were assaulting the building, shooting the Landolinians down by the hundred, and driving them in a scattered groups before them like herds of frightened sheep, shoot them down by the score at every step, and forcing many to throw down their arms and surrender.

At all points the attack of the foe which at first had been a keen and active successful was now being driven back, and Evans was also starting to bring up his main line, to drive back every portion of the assaulting line of the foe and make another strong concentration upon their own line.

Evans was even sending a large portion of his unengaged forces to help repel the Landolinians who were assaulting general Vivian's house, and was sending rating bigger forces to the support of his own main right wing which was heavily assaulted. Thus the Abbeismian soldiers defending the children in the big building had showed their valor, and what Abbeismians really can do even when driven out of ammunition by constant firing, and how they could resist an assault at even tremendous odds.

At every quarter of the line the battle was raging wildly, the firing on both sides crashing and roaring like a hundred brilliant cannon, and Evans and all his officers, were dashing back and forth at various parts of the line, giving frank orders, and seeing to it that the men had plenty of ammunition, and that no more breaks were in the lines and if there were to close it right away.

Violet and her sisters congratulated the many brave Abbeismians for putting up such a desperate defense in the house for their sake, and they realized also that the way of fighting among the Abbeismians was nothing like the shrewd ways of fighting with the Angelinians. And it soon just the Angelinians fighting for the place, there was no doubt the building would have been forced very long before this, and they no doubt would have been slain. All Abbeismians were trained in war ways and military fighting since they were little boys, have been instructed by even their parents on how bravery and superior fighting always drives down to despair the worse enemy of God, and so being well trained to all kinds of hardships, and knowing all ways of fighting, it was well known what it was to contend with an Abbeismian. One Landolinian could in his fury of fighting seem to be ten to a squad of Angelinians, but to a hundred Landolinians, one Abbeismian who seemed seemed to be a roaring lion when a hundred small mice would be trying to escape him.

The Abbeismians were now pressing forward first slowly, and then swiftly, their lines sweeping through the smoke confused masses and breaking up the whole line, and driving it back in confusion. John Farley all this time at first did not know who his adversary was, though he saw the Vivian girls were within the Christian lines. He had supposed that he was opposing the advance of general Vivian's army, but when he learned that both general Vivian and Evans was concentrated against him, besides the strong armies this the fierce Charles and King Cannon of Abbeismians he was worried, and advised general William Farley's brother to abandon Bristol as a position, and retreat, and that he would cover his retreat, and if Evans still he could get safely away from them. But William Farley was also engaged at Bristol now station two fierce and angry battles might at the same time, and so really if there were any bloody conflicts were lost the war was lost also and Landolinians would be so badly whipped that they would never recover from the shock of defeat. Farley then that in John Farley realizing it fought with the utmost fury of desperate despair, and knowing that Evans would probably annihilate them with drove upon Evans a headlong attack, before Evans could prepare his own line for the battle to be renewed the opposite way. General Evans was also severely wounded. His army had twice in quick succession advanced against the Hellenes for opposed to him, and again the glandelinian resistance had driven his army back in confusion and with frightful losses to their own ranks. The woods in front of the battle line were all on fire, trees were everywhere were shattered by shell explosions, and pierced with bullets, and the scene was truly a hellish one. It looked worse than even the frightful valley of the Shadow of Death in the Pilgrims Progress. General Evans had suffered the reduction of many of his brigades and divisions, a regiment of fifteen hundred men in various divisions and brigades told the horrible story of the conflict, by having only less than three hundred men left, flags by the thousands were torn in tatters by the frightful tempest of bullets sweeping along a space of an extent of four or three miles, and so many color bearers were shot that it was too terrible to relate, and all the while the smoke of gunpowder was so thick for many miles in width that hardly any thing could be seen at the distance of fifty feet.

Other general divisions and Evans were as equally as severely moved, and now Everett True was coming up with his great forces, Cannon moving on at the advice of Evans to support general Evans' army. Fiercer and fiercer the conflict was raging, and whole lines of the enemy army so r address of them went every time they charged forward were torn to fragments and swept back in confused masses.

Violent and her sisters were again with Evans watching the muffled scenes of the Hellenic conflict, and were so engrossed in the oncoming battle line that they did not realize that again a portion of the Christian line was forced until they saw a swarm of perfect Gargolians on foot rushing toward them with the most fearful obscene yells ever heard before.

They seemed like demons possessing the air with millions of barbaric screams. Quickly the little girls warned Evans and wheeling their horses started to dash away. There was a flash a scorching murderous roar, followed simultaneously by the whistle of a storm of bullets, and Evans horse and every one of those of the little girls sank to the ground while three generals riding with the column fell from their saddles riddled by bullets, and an uttermost a whole line of retreating Abbieannians as far as eye could reach and three feet wide sank writhing and rolling on the ground.

This was followed by fiercer yells, and along came a sweep of a Hellenic Hellenic charge, and Violet and her sisters with Evans raced for the main line Evans ordering the artillery to annihilate the glandelinian tidal wave.

As he was directing the battle elsewhere an officer came up to him and cried:

"General the glandelinians on the right are bending us back. I just received this telegram from general Rudolph Resendale."

"See to it that Everett's True supports my right with as much force as possible." Answered Evans. "I'll direct operations where ever I can go. I'll up and do not delay as every moment is precious."

A shell exploded quite near them at this moment but no one was hurt though they felt the shock of the frightful concussion. A madened a screaming uproar came from everywhere along the firing line which now never ceased and so many of the Hellenic Hellenic were falling that indeed it seemed as if they risked complete annihilation. It was evident however before all the Christian generals along this portion of the Christian line that it was impossible to stop this wild charge of the Hellenic Hellenic.

That it was impossible to stop this wild charge of the Hellenic Hellenic. They came on like a charge of an army of giants and immediately the left grand division of the central wing was hit the hardest and driven into panic and confusion and completely rolled up with numerous losses to boot. This division threw the remainder of the Hellenic wing into disorder and the whole line began to flow back toward the rear despite all the efforts of the general officers to rally them. One whole line of Abbieannians who refused to give way though facing an overwhelming numbers, and nearly ten miles long met annihilation, and their general Hero Hunkardonia was killed as he refused to surrender when overpowered.

The disaster placed the whole Christian line in jeopardy, and Evans who was at another quarter of the line did not know what happened when he heard that he was being beaten. He immediately changed his orders about the movements of Cannon's army, and telegraphed to him to return and help repel the enemy. In the central part of his line, but Cannon answered that to turn back was impossible and that surely then the battle is lost. The loss of the Christian generals was unparalytically terrific. General Jennings Hanson was mortally wounded in trying to rally his panic stricken divisions, and General Cannon was bayoneted by a Hellenic Hellenic, and General Gargolia, Power, Benjamin Hanson, Bernard, Wellington, Paterson, Paterson, and Beldonia were killed at one time when trying to restore order in their broken ranks.

The advance of the Hellenic Hellenic was irresistible everywhere, and general Hunkardonia himself was severely wounded, and his army annihilated completely, general Jackwick Baldwin was killed, and his artillery captured, and turned on the Christian troops with annihilating effects, and James Costello who was sent by Evans to stop the tide of disaster suffered the annihilation of his own command and narrowly escaped capture. Bernard Cannon and Theal Theal were severely wounded. Be d Beldonia came up with a division of 10,000,000 Abbieannians and Hellenic Hellenic and these were thrown in the path of the glandelinians and gave the glandelinians furious resistance, but soon this whole line was crushed to fragments, and their leader killed, and three quarters of the survivors were captured, and the remainder driven away like scattered flies.

His tragedy endangered Violet and her sisters. They were in the building at the time this happened, and it was all they and their two child companions could do to prevent themselves from being discovered by the foe who in possession of the building, and who were also looking for them.

Indeed the battle was terrific all along the line.

General Evans was trying his utmost to reestablish the central line of battle but all in this location was in wild confusion. He also realized the peril of Violet and her sisters, so for he knew that his headquarters was in possession of the enemy and a horror filled him as he realized what would occur if the wicked glandelinians ever captured them, and so exerted his utmost to bring up heavy reinforcements, while he ordered Everett True to come on with his forces as quickly as possible.

The reserve forces soon came up under general Schloeder, and these formed long and solid lines in the path of the enemy, and gave serious resistance, while Everett True apprised of the danger was hurrying up his forces to the rescue. Evans also concentrated other divisions upon the wild Hellenic Hellenic and now indeed the battle became general all along the line.

The firing of both sides was incessant and the onslaught of the enemy doubly violent. Feeling sure that these reserve forces could hold their own for two hours at least, Evans brought up Hellenic Hellenic divisions and hurled these upon the enemy in the location of the captured headquarters, while he ordered Jacob Baldwin to bring up his artillery which had been held in reserve. These came at the most critical moment and when in readiness, opened a driving cannon fire upon the glandelinians tearing their lines fairly into a thousand pieces. The Abbieannians were about to counter charge, when their officers cried:

"Hold it is not time yet. They are only checked not demoralized. It's suicide to do so."

Evans fearing a frightful loss of officers instructed all generals to be careful and now as he regulated the enemy's firing he realized that the battle was on in earnest, that the glandelinians were bound to sweep him back at all costs and prevent him from making a junction at Bristol and Station. And he saw through his glasses was hurling large bodies of troops from seemingly every quarter of the Hellenic line, and while he viewed the long lines of fearful firing, that sounded like millions of cannon in action he ordered general Maurice Costello to move his own forces to the right and repel the enemy there. Maurice Costello obeyed, and then up came the forces under Hero Canxin, and Beppo Hansen, and these joined in the raging battle with great pugnaeous fury.

Everywhere along the line the attack of the enemy was redoubled in fury the whole scene for miles was a scorching hell, and the slaughter was becoming awful indeed on both sides. General Hero in trying to reestablish a portion of his line which became broken and disordered was seriously wounded, and Evans had all he could do to prevent the line from giving way.

Fiercer and fiercer the firing grew, and Evans now drew up another division from the reserve line, and put these into the action, and send in another order for Everett's True for God's sake to hurry up.

Everett True was hurrying on his forces as fast as possible, and he finally came up and in the location where general Evans headquarters were, and after half an hour's preparation threw one quarter of his army into the action at once.

The moment was now terrible, and a great wall of glandelinians advancing from the southwest poured over the Christian line of works, like a tidal wave, but with a frightful pandemonium of curses and yells the furious Abbieannians closed with them, and cut down half of the whole glandelinian wave and drove it back pell mell to the woods beyond following the fugitives and carrying all before them. At this point the order was now given given to advance, and the whole Abbieannian line started to move forward, though although all along the enemy's lines there issued most terrible and destructive fire volleys of a hundred thousand a shot a second.

Evans saw the Abbieannian surge go forward, and issued a warning to the other division commanders as he saw how the enemy's firing was increasing.

He realized it was Hanley who was attacking now and not Aberdeenshire force. He tried to get in communication with General Vivian's lines and find out how the battle was going on there but for a while could receive no info in any direction whatever. Soon he learned that another general had fallen but he could not find out who it was, and incessantly inquired of the condition of the Vivian girls. They were still safe however, though the furious battle was raging on all sides of the house. They were hiding in a tunnel way in the basement of the building, for to stay inside the upper floors was impossible as bullets were even piercing their way through the walls by the scores of thousands and nothing could live up there just then, the foe having evacuated the building when not being able to find Violet and her sisters. Violet and her sisters heard the wild clamor of the terrific struggle going on outside, and heard the innumerable ear-splitting crashes of shells that were bursting ever & everywhere, and occasionally a shell would hit the house, and tear out a whole section with a tremendous roar that shook the earth beneath the little girls.

To them it was the wildest salvos of sounds they had ever heard in a battle since Gl. Cloirina and they thought sure that Evans was losing; for the enemy was all around them. How long they were to be prisoners in the tunnel they knew not but they did not dare venture forth, for by the noise outside, they knew that the glandelinians were still in possession of the ground, that the counter charge of Everette Trues Abbiecians had been driven back with great and tremendous loss, and that the Christians were not making any progress anywhere in recovering the lost ground. Finally as they listened in awe and excitement, they heard a redoubled outburst of heavy cannons, which shook the very nerves in their bodies, followed by a storm of explosive explosions assailing every where, and they observed that the tunnel way was being filled with powder smoke.

Proceeding the fresh outburst of heavy cannons came a series of the wildest yells the little girls had heard, and this was from the furious Abbiecians who had just then closed with the great Ab. glandelinians and surge which had assailed them, and which had repulsed the charge and was rushing forward these lives. The enemy had been driven clean beyond the building, but amid that inferno of shooting and slaughter, the glandelinians received suddenly heavy reinforcements, and they rallied, smote the Abbiecians line to pieces, and drove it back clean across the ground they had won with frightful disillusion.

Evans saw that even the reserve forces could not be able to hold out long, and had to at times keep himself behind a wide tree as the firing of the enemy was so wild and screaming in its fury that no one could have survived it who would be exposed and one of the generals who was near Evans was about to look aside from his position at a tree when Evans yelled to him:

"Keep your head behind the shelter you damn fool. Do you want to get hit. The enemy are firing like blazes and you ought to look out."

Just at that moment a general arriving on horseback fell at the very spot, horse and rider sinking to the ground in a shapeless heap. The battle was increasing to a still fiercer fury, and Evans decided to move up his whole reserve force, and concentrate all the artillery he had, and if this did not stop the charge, to withdraw to cover. To withdraw any forces from his two wings was impossible for they were as heavily assailed, cannon as it was reported to him, could not advance to general Vivian's aid, or go back on account of being driven back by forest fires set by the enemy to stop him, and Everette Trues who had now all his forces in the action had been severely wounded twice, and Maurice Costello received a broken leg in the bargain.

In the meantime Violet and her sisters observing that the tunnel was filling up with smoke came to the conclusion that the building must be on fire and decided to follow the tunnel and see where it leads to. To go back the way they came was suicide for the building by this time must be a furnace of flames. So on they went carefully, and soon found it opened out toward a creek, but here escape seemed nil for at this point was a line of breastworks in possession of the He-pollatinians, and they were firing in a fashion as if they could not waste their ammunition fast enough.

"We are trapped," said Joice. "Keep back William and Francis. For God's sake. If they see you, one of us they'll get us for sure."

Violet and her sisters keeping themselves in hiding, watched the firing lines of the enemy, saw surges of Abbiecians come and go, saw them go to pieces, and recall, saw another return to the charge and share a like fate. The crash of the glandelinian musketry was something terrible to the little girls, and sounded to them as if the world was blowing to pieces.

"I never saw such a battle since the invasion began," said Pettie. "And my goodness look how the enemy are firing artillery and musketry. You would think they had worlds of it to waste and still not be exhausted."

"But we got to get away from here some way," said Joice. "We cannot stay here all the time and sooner or later we'll be discovered, and then there will be more fun for us than we wish for."

"But how are we going to get out of here," said Angelina. "The enemy are in possession of the entire line of works at this portion, the woods are on fire elsewhere, and shells are dropping about this location like confetti and no way we could live in this region in a moment."

Violet and her sisters indeed did not know what to do in a case like this. The enemy within their view were now starting forward to make another attack on the Christian lines, and were surging forward like a great wave and as Violet and her sisters witnessed the scene they saw a series of frightful explosions in regular lines among the columns of the enemy, and where the bombs exploded there was many horrible gaps. This checked the onslaught of the glandelinians for a few minutes, but the survivors rallied, and pressed on with fierce yells. This looked to Violet and her sisters as if they would soon get an opportunity to escape, and so when the last glandelinian had disappeared northward, they stole cautiously forward.

"We got to watch out for the wounded glandelinians for they are liable to shoot us," said Jennie.

Violet and her sisters immediately reached the abandoned works, but suddenly up before them arose another line of infantry which had been lying down waiting for orders, and had the little girls not been quick enough in dropping they would have been done for for every man closest to them lived lately opened fire with machine guns and musketry. The only way to escape the murderous fire of the enemy was by keeping their slaves close to the lower sections of the works, and then when several squads of the glandelinians arose and started to go at them, Violet and her sisters arose quickly and bolted to the shelter of the nearest trees just as the glandelinians fired another volley.

"Catch them little brats," cried the main officer of in command of the line of He-pollatinians.

At once a rush of men swarmed toward the trees, but in the meantime Violet and her sisters under cover of a pall of smoke from the burning brush and trees had succeeded in getting back to the shelter of the tunnel and no where could the glandelinians find them, and at this moment this line of the foe had been ordered to go forward and help in the assault, and again Violet and her sisters saw an opportunity to escape.

"We'll have to look out," said Violet. "We got surprised by the enemy and we don't want to get surprised again."

"You listen to the roar of battle to the north," said Catherine. "The glandelinians must be receiving the fiercest resistance. Francis and William you keep close to us or you'll get captured."

Once again the little girls sallied forward, watching closely however that they would not be surprised again. They crawled forward toward the works this time and then dropping down on the other side, Joice alone peered over to the opposite side.

"It is clear," she whispered. "Come sisters."

Over the ten little girls went, and then over a lane covered with slain and wounded foes and seemed in peril for several of the wounded tried to grasp their muskets to shoot the little children, but again Violet and her sisters outwitted them by darting behind the nearest trees.

"If you fire on us we'll return the fire wounded though you are," cried Joice.

The little girls then worked themselves from tree to tree, watching the wounded glandelinians carefully, and every time one leveled his gun to fire they darted behind the works, or the trees and let him have it with their own pistols. All about Violet and her sisters a veritable sea of dead and wounded glandelinians lay, and to them indeed it was a shocking sight, but then it could not be avoided. Nevertheless the little girls were anxious to get out of the blood-rag and find their way back to the Christian lines. This was found to be a still harder problem.

For now they were on the side of the enemy, and out of any chance there was a good one of being shot down in ambush even for there was no telling; if all the glandelinians had went forward to the charge or whether a number had been left behind to look for them if they were seen, and they saw not the glandelinians there means telling what would happen.

They felt sorry now that they had left the shelter of the tunnel, but to go back was just as impossible for now a portion of the assaulting line of the enemy was coming back having been repulsed by the fearful resistance of the main Abbiecians line....

The return of these glandelinians placed them in still more greater danger, and for a moment or two the little girls did not know what to do. No cloth the trees was available, for they saw that shells burst among the tree tops as frequently as lightning flashes in the air during severe storms, and bullet were being rained upon the leaves by the thousands.....

but nevertheless the clever little girls finally observed a way. There was a large stream of water near this location which ran toward the christian lines, and being good swimmers violet and her sisters decided to trust to the river. So into the water they dived, and then they swam for dear life. They found that swimming uselessly was not to be done for the river had a strong current running northward and it carried them swiftly toward the region they wanted to go. So they let the current take them for ward while they rested themselves occasionally.

While they were thus swimming, they could hear the thunderous roar of the mighty conflict and wondered how it was going on, and whether it was more severe. They had been swimming for about fifteen minutes, when along the shore there appeared a swarm of Abbieannians who sat scouting at this point had seen them in the river. The Abbieannians shouted to them to come ashore. Violet and her sisters did so, and William and Francis also came. The Abbieannian leader asked them again and again how they escaped so easily when escaped had seemed so impossible.

As Violet and her sisters told them the whole truth, the Abbieannian officers told the little girls how fiercely Evans was attempting to rec over the lost ground in order to save them.

"Can we go to him now or is he too busy?" asked Daisy.

"Yes you must come to him right away," said the general. "I am and my men had feelings that you little girls would escape some way and decided to come out and look for you. And our search was successful. Evans if he is very apprehensive about you and fears that the enemy will capture you as he still thinks you are in the house."

THE BATTLE AT ONE GENERAL VIVIAN'S LINES.....

General Vivian's left wing for the morning's portion of the battle was the most heavily assaulted. Along this portion of the christian line the fury of the great battle was something terrible. The glandelinian forces under general picknell Hanley about 23,456,789 strong made a tremendous assault against the whole christian left. As never in his days since gloriana or during the battle itself had general Vivian ever witnessed such a frightful attack of the glandelinians. They rushed forward in the mightiest columns striking the right of the Abbieannian left wing a telling blow that fairly staggered it, but for a time it recovered from the terrible confusion and rallied to the counter charge but it was in vain to stop the violent attack of the glandelinians.

A portion of the Abbieannian rear on the extreme left had not been guarded well, no doubt General Vivian having forgotten to guard it and it also received a smashing blow from a division of glandelinians under general Mc-Hollister Wyletze, and as it rallied and rushed forward to make a counter charge, it received another terrible blow, that drove it into the greatest confusion, and after the most desperate fighting hand to hand this whole portion of the christian line was rolled up and thrown into the greatest disorder.

It had been both the intentions of generals Evans and Vivian to attack the foe and both had been seriously attacked themselves.....

When the most of these desperate glandelinian charges had been disasterously repulsed, a division of glandelinians consisting of the Zumermannians, Amarians, Amarians Curdes, Burds, Condemnancians, Mc-poll estinians and Cargolians numbering about ninety two million came forward with the most tremendous and appalling wild fury against the whole christian left wing, fifteen gigantic glandelinian columns were torn to pieces, by a devastating artillery fire along the Abbieannian line, but nevertheless the main portions came on with frightful yells, opening ranks for those who were falling back.....

Ninety two of these fresh columns dissolved into fragments, and the frightful hellstorm of charge, and one hundred and sixty six other glandelinian columns who met the full force of this sweeping christian fire, recoiled appalled at the horrible slaughter, and in this great charge which was also repulsed over three hundred glandelinian generals were wounded and over eighty killed, while six hundred eighty one christian officers had fallen killed or wounded.

When the enemy came forward once however to make a general assault of still more redoubtable fury a good portion of general Vivian's left wing was driven back in confusion, the left grand division of his wing was turned, and within an hour's time the whole wing was once more rolled up and the artillery captured by the desperate glandelinian soldiery.

To counteract the rout that to general Vivian a serious disaster was threatening. Everywhere along his whole line itself the enemy was attacking with the most wild fury, their big waves coming on in seemingly endless succession, for as soon as the first score of waves would be torn up and thrown back a frightful bloody repulse, the others would come on to renew the assault, and general Vivian felt indeed that the battle was lost for King Cano Cannon who had been sent to aid him sent him this discouraging note:

"YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL ROBERTY ANGELO VIVIAN:

Your friend general Jack Evans has sent me to lent you aid with my forces, but I'm fiercely opposed at Glance Station and harassed by forest fires and cannot advance. Evans also is in peril and wished to recall me but I cannot even return to him just now. I simply don't know what to do on this situation. The enemy is not so easily to overcome as we thought."

King Cannon.

When he saw his left wing in confusion general Vivian at first did not know what to do to retrieve the threatening disaster. The enemy were making a desperate attack along his center and right, and the fury of the battle was growing in intensity hour by hour. In the meantime while for general Vivian the situation was critically critical general Hansonia Galdlin was arriving from an unexpected quarter with many large divisions of the fierce Concan tinians and Abbieannians, and he saw that the christian left wing was being driven back, and so ordered his forces forward to its support while he determined to learn whose christian army it was that was being so furiously attacked. Indeed general picknell Hanley it was seen was bound to carry his point and though Hansonia barred the enemy's advance he drove his charge home again at many portions of the line, and amid the dreadful and madman the brave christian general was seriously wounded, and many other brave generals fell.

Realizing the situation general Vivian asked Evans for aid once more, and sent a note begging Everett True to hurry up his own attack against Evans center, and also sent a note asking Cannon to force his way at all costs and come to his rescue. The great attack that was being made by the glandelinians along the christian center was the wildest attack of the battle thus far, a long line of the foe many millions strong charging forward with the seemingly irresistible force of a raging tidal wave, but the christian cannon and musketry tore and gapped their lines, moved their officers down by the hundred and finally sent their ragged lines back torn and bleeding bleeding with their fallen lying in windrows for miles on the frightful battlefield.

But Hansonia was not discouraged by this bloody repulse of his grey great charge, and sent forth a fresh fresh column twice as strong, their leaders being under the instructions to force the christian lines at all hazards. This glandelinian column came forward with the noise and fury of a million demons mingled with a raging typhoon of world wide devastating fury, and though their columns and divisions were torn to pieces by the score and their main line torn to pieces also the survivors charged clean up to the works and over, and closed with the christian line, and engaged them hand to hand. The christian center under Westclox was driven back by the impact of the assault clean to their second line of works, and had the enemy pressed on immediately they would have gained a decided advantage, but they fell back under the cover of the works they had captured, and poured Upon the whole, the entire Christian center a most deliberate and destructive fire. General Vivian saw that it was impossible to retake his lost position just then, and so ordered his men to prepare for the next charge the enemy would make. After a few minutes the enemy came on to make a third charge to make a fierce effort to capture this second position. They were met by a deliberate withering fire that decimated their first divisions in front, and then the Abbeismian cannon let loose and committed horrible carnage at short range. For a whole hour this terrific assault raged, but finally the enemy retired sullenly behind the works and continued their most terrific fire upon the whole Christian line.

Fourteen more desperate assaults were made by the enemy in quick succession and though the glandelinians suffered horrible loss in the last of the fourteen assaults they did capture a portion of the second Christian position and held it against the greatest odds in a furnace of infernoes at the very points. Making fierce counter charges general Vivian threw his heaviest forces forward as incessantly as the waves of the great storm lashed ocean, only to see his most immense divisions come back in fragments and with every general and regimental commander down. In one regiment the flag of Abbeismia had drooped forty five times and as many color bearers had been shot to death before the flag was saved from the screaming furies of God.

It was indeed a most terrible battle the battle being severe all along the whole of general Vivian's lines, and probably more sanguinary than along Evans' lines as yet but nevertheless he was holding ground better than Evans was though his left had been driven back for three miles. His whole left was in a pandemonium of confusion was badly cut up, and hundreds of their generals had fallen dead or wounded in trying to rally them, and so many of the regimental flags had been torn to shreds by the mortal merciless storm of musket fire that it indeed was a strange but piteous sight.

The whole forest from the smoke of cannons and musketry of both sides seemed to be on fire, the explosions of shells seemed to annihilate every thing imaginable before it, and the din was simply simply terrific to think of.

General Vivian's left was indeed in a pretty bad fix for none of the surviving generals could rally it, and the main Christian general who was in command of that wing whose name was general Stanburg sent this note to general Vivian:

GENERAL VIVIAN:

"Your left wing if it is crushed and mangled and driven clean out of its position and notwithstanding all the efforts of the officers, as many of them have fallen and the remainder cannot do a thing. I have thrown reserve divisions to repel the enemy's charge, but they cannot hold, and a fresh army under general Hanson came up to our aid, but all his efforts are unavailing and we cannot do a thing, for the assault of the enemy is growing stronger and stronger every moment. If you cannot relieve us by reinforcements, we will have to withdraw."

GENERAL STANBURG.

General Vivian indeed was at a loss of what to do for he could not do a thing to rally the wing, and he believed that the battle was lost. He had sent notes after notes to general Evans asking for aid, but the messages never got there for all communications with general Evans and Vivian had been cut off by the enemy, and Evans himself had been trying to wire certain advices to general Vivian and could get no answer. The crash of the battle at every quarter was terrible, more like a hundred thousand St. Calverlines in eruption in this one place, and terrible still more it was to see one immense line after another of the foe to go tumbling against the Christian works and then to go back in shredded fragments, and leaving piles and monstrous masses of slain behind.

So many of the Christian generals had been wounded that general Vivian did not know what to do on this either. He had all his available forces in action already and now was forced to resort to his reserves. His condition that in his army was sad indeed, and general Vivian realized that he was terribly overwhelmed. Many of the divisions had already withdrawn on his extreme right grand division, and reports came in that all their regimental brigades, and divisional commanders had fallen, and that not a regiment had a flag, but only staffs, so terrific was the enemy's withering storm of musketry.....

To general Vivian the conflict seemed to be almost another Francis Atlanta in the starting point and at times the smoke of the firing along the Christian line was so unspokeably thick that it hung over the scene like a shroud. The right division of his left was threatened with annihilation, the army were in possession of the two lines of works, and the whole line was badly crippled, for the loss of men and officers.

KING GAMMONS FIERCE FIGHT.....

As to obey orders of general Evans King Gammon had advanced toward the location of general Vivian's fiercely battling lines, and all the lust for revenge of his misfortune in his earlier days and childhood, was burning within him as he thought of the fierce battle that was raging, between Evans and Stanley, and general Vivian and Aberdeensia. Aberdeensia had known that King Gammon would come to aid general Vivian and so had sent general general Gardner's glandelinians with an equal army to oppose him. For a time this glandelinian army could not make a successful stand against the attacks of Gammon's men as the two forces met, but in order to check Gammon many of the men set fire to the foliage and trees in the vicinity, and for a time Gammon had to withdraw his army to shield it from the onrushing flames which spread with amazing rapidity, and following this advantage the glandelinians came on to make a tremendous assault in double line, and so now the bloody fight between Gammon and Stanburg continued for four hours. The fire of Gammon's men was horrible, and scores of the glandelinian ranks rushing forward to the attack were torn to pieces, but their shattered columns reinforced by others rallied again and again and never ceased their desperate attacks which followed in endless succession the roar of cannon and musketry on both sides never ceasing a single moment and sounding like whirlwinds of explosion explosions going on continuously. General Stanburg fell dangerously wounded at the heat of the fray, but though a portion of his army was thrown into confusion at his dismemberment general Aberdeensia Schroederine took his place and after much work rallied the disordered lines and led them on to renew the attack. Indeed the battle along Gammon's lines was fierce and horrifying, twenty lines of glandelinians having been within the space of four hours blown to atoms, and within two more hours Aberdeensia's whole command was cut to pieces with the loss of all their general officers, and many flags, and would have been routed, if the survivors had not been by the fiercest efforts seemingly beyond human power rallied and met the onslaught of the Abbeismians with such fury as to turn the whole battle field into a devastating inferno of wholesale slaughter, and then after hand to hand fighting against terrific odds drove the Abbeismians back to their own works pell mell and from them capturing hundreds of thousands of Abbeismians as prisoners.

The firing was exceedingly severe during this part of the battle along Gammon's lines and had spread havoc among the woods the whole size of the firing lines, foretrees were splintered and shattered by shell fire, and felled everywhere by bullets which stripped every lower branch of their leaves entirely. During a lull in the enemy's attack Gammon had reformed all his strongest divisions and then to try and recover the ground he had lost Gammon threw against the enemy's lines the fiercest attacks he could muster.

All the available guns of Gammon's Christian batteries covered with a terrific barrage fire of shells all of the Christian onslaughts, to which the enemy for nearly half an hour were unable to reply, but while they massed all their smaller artillery upon the Christian assailants, they managed to bring into play the biggest guns and soon the uproar was tremendous, division after division of the Christians who charged forward came back with only remnants left, the main line of the Abbeismian assault was driven into flying fragments, and Gammon's officers had all they could do to rally the panic stricken Abbeismian soldiers. Gammon sent whole armies forward again and again to meet the wild assaults, but the main assaulting armies were again and again torn through and through by the blasting artillery fire of the enemy and as an intense musketry fire was added, the Abbeismian forces were once again driven into confusion and sent flying back the way they had come, their whole line having been hemmed and buckled back so far and finally the whole assaulting Abbeismian line was thrown into wild confusion, and in that one deep desperate dash millions had fallen on both sides simultaneously, and within fifteen minutes after closing with the Abbeennian line the glandelinians were in possession of all the Abbeennian artillery, and those they missed upon cannon lines, and sent charge after charge a mile long into their lines and threatened all who dared to make a counter charge to retake the guns with complete annihilation. General or King cannons with central lines on account of the serious crushing up of his right flank division which also occurred at the same time had nevertheless held firm for four to five hours to cover the possible reformation and retreat of the other demoralized wing, but so terrific was the attack of the enemy that nothing could withstand it and finally two divisions of the enemy turned the right and left of this wing, and bringing up more artillery almost infiltrated this whole portion of the Christian line and this portion of the Abbeennian line was also compelled to withdraw, and soon were rolled up in the greatest confusion.

The rest of cannons right wing then had to give way but cannon bringing up his reserves tried all in his power to stay the successful glandelinian advance in that seething hellstorm of carnage and devastation, and his reserve forces stood their ground against thirteen of the wildest and most savage assaults ever imagined or which could ever have been made in any battle millions having fallen on both sides at every charge cannons reserve forces finally gave way. The battle with cannons army indeed was something terrible and the whole region vibrated with the din and confusion.

During noon cannon had by the most desperate efforts rallied good portions of his shattered armies, and withdrawing still further from the remaining forest fires, got ready as the glandelinians came sweeping forward with the mightiest fury to attack the Abbeennians once more.

GANNON'S FURIOUS RAMP OF THE MARCH! THE GREAT MASSACRE OF GLANDELINIAN TROOPS.

Thousands of Christian artillery along this one section opened a terrific fire which at once seemed to pound everything to pieces, and as this fire was directed at the advancing glandelinian columns it committed incalculable havoc great masses of the glandelinians being shot down.

After an hour's terrific fighting the whole surge of glandelinians was hurled back with stupendous loss, and every column was shattered, but a fresh surge doubly strong rushed forward to renew the attack, and though the men in gray fell in thousands every moment the survivors reached the Christian works and surged over, and as the Abbeennians closed with them the fighting raged at its utmost fury, and tens of thousands of glandelinians fell per second before the bayonets, sabres, lances, and shots a close quarters, general Halle divisions of McCollestians being swept to pieces, and tens of their generals were killed or wounded, this glandelinian column retired in confusion but the main surge continued the frightful attack and though their comrades fell in such numbers as to leave a sea of dead and wounded everywhere, they finally forced the line at this quarter, and carried all before them.

Cannon he immediately threw all his reserves upon these wildly attacking glandelinians, and these Christian forces gave such incredible resistance that finally the whole surge of glandelinians being mangled and torn with fresh numbers of their columns down dead or wounded retired suddenly, their generals suetonis, johnston, pondice, clunco, Henry Gatus, and Penrayon Franklin, and Daniel Anglesay falling mortally wounded as they strove to urge on their glandelinian columns toward that inferno of hellish madmen.

After great difficulty these columns were rallied, under the heaviest shelling ever experienced, and being reinforced by Aberdeen, against rushed upon cannons whole Abbeennian line.

The terrific million cannon like masonry stunned all who heard it and after two hours of this repeated hellish scene the glandelinian surge was annihilated with great slaughter in officers and men, and twenty-three battle flags fell into the hands of the Abbeennians, General Scott cannon on the side of the Abbeennians was slain and so was Agricollie's course Cannon, while Galedon's Daniels and Reverus were severely wounded. The glandelinians then tried their luck with one cavalry and nearly 30,000 men rode fiercely like a thundering avalanche against the Christian line supported by a direct fire of artillery, but men and horses were mowed down by the wholesale columns and the remainder attacked by the Abbeennian cavalry who routed them with the loss of their main leader, Francislaw Gaud. But the glandelinians never gave up the terrific assault. Again another monstrous wave of glandelinians all McCollestians swept upon the Christian lines the battle was redoubled in fury and violence, and the right of the Christian force was compelled to give way, and finally Cannon seeing that he was overwhelmed had to withdraw to cover.

GENERAL VIVIAN ALSO GETS WAY BEFORE THE ASSAULTS OF THE ENEMY.

Long general Vivian's line the struggle was far worse than Cannon's now. The very heavens appeared to be on fire from the storm of bursting shells of both sides, an a storm of death and destruction seemed to descend upon both sides, and so thick was the smoke that the very forest and at asphere seemed on fire and hill tops were covered with blazing lines of the opposing sides, and so terrific was the shell fire of both sides, that all the grass of the plains, in which the battle raged, the grown growth on the hill sides, and everywhere else seemed to fly into space before the terrific explosions, and as general Vivian's whole line let loose a fiery blast of 100,000 cannon the exploding storm of shells of every calibre seemed to deform the whole glandelinian army, and so terrific was the din that to general Vivian it seemed that another battle of Francis-Antonia was raging. At one section of the Christian line the enemy had come forward in the greatest numbers, and like a shattering storm wave tearing over a shore and carrying tons of sand with it the foe line struck with terrific violence, and to make it worse the glandelinians were reinforced by other bodies, and when sixteen million of the Abbeennians had fallen at this one section did the survivors give way, but as they retired they fought like fiends incarnate for the possession of heaven and earth, and so terrific was the losses that the glandelinians suffered that their advance though victorious was slow and uncertain.

For a time yet the main body of general Vivian's line still remained firm heedless of the battering hellstorm of wild glandelinian onslaughts, and with their own cannon and masonry mowed the foe down in many whole lines, but again and again the glandelinians after recoiling rallied to the assault closing with the Christian line again and again with the greatest slaughter, and general Vivian's picket line Cannon on the side of the Christians fell with a mortal shell wound, and as many of his officers were already killed or wounded the Christian line broken and gave way before seemingly superior numbers, and all the severe concentration of troops that general Vivian made was impossible to hold back the frenzied glandelinian assault and he was forced to withdraw a good portion of the line. Aberdeen seeing that his assaulting forces were advancing successfully at many points of the Christian line, ordered a general advance of his main line which was in full sway by two o'clock in the afternoon. But this glancing attack of the glandelinians was useless to resist, though it took fourteen great assaults to force general Vivian back, and though all these attacks of the enemy were cut down general Vivian was compelled to withdraw from the field in the hands of the enemy for the time.....

VIVIAN'S SURVIVORS HURLED BY THE MARCH ALSO. A SURGE OF CHRISTIAN DISASTERS!!!!!!

Violet and her sisters were brought immediately before general Vivian who was directing his firing line, and my how glad he was to see them! He had given them up for lost, and now as they were brought before him he fairly hugged them as he never did before, and asked them over and over again how they escaped out of the house when it was so surrounded by the enemy, and while so many of the glandelinians were inside the building itself.

"There was a soot hole way underneath the building," said Nettie. "We staid for a while, until we saw the tunnel getting full of smoke and then we hurried forth, waited for the smoke surge to pass beyond the line of charge and then escaped by the river after being fired upon several times."

"You are certainly lucky children and I'm very thankful that you have escaped the enemy so cleverly," said Evans. "But I'm in doubt that we'll win this bloody battle. I have a good mind to draw away my forces and preserve thousands from too much loss."

"But we have seen that it can't be done now," said Angelina. "If you withdraw now you'll meet a disaster but you will never recover from it and the war will be lost entirely."

Evans took the little girls finally to a better portion of the line where he was sure they would meet with no encounter with a foraging party of the enemy and then directed his staff officers to see to it that no matter how strong the enemy's assault is that no portion of the line gives way. As Violet and her sisters were being brought toward the rear of the line, there suddenly came a tremendous earthshaking roar that shook the earth, and threw the little girls off their feet, and everything was hidden in black clouds of smoke.

"Something blew up," cried one of the men who had also been thrown off their feet. "Good God what was it."

"It was a army supply house for ammunition," said one of the officers who had seen the whole occurrence. "A stray shell had struck it."

Violet and her sisters and Lillian were surprised at the growing fury of the monstrous battle and hoped fully within their hearts that it would be no Christian defeat. As they were still going on toward their destination an officer came tearing up on horseback and cried to the men:

"General Vivian and Cannon have been driven back by the foe."

"Violet and her sisters did not know what to say to this but one of the guarding soldiers said:

"Go quickly and report it to go general Vivian. He must know."

The officer dashed off and finding Evans rushed up saluted and said:

"Your excellency I've a bad news for you. General Vivian's army cannot stand before the enemy's attacks. Both he and King Cannon's army has been defeated by the glandelinians under Aboliscanda. I fear your excellency that our cause is lost. If we cannot crush the enemy here general Cannon will never capture Bristol nose station."

Evans was shocked at the news but he said:

"I care not whether they surrender or not I'll curse any of my own divisions that will dare give ground without my orders. I've given orders for the officers to station all the wounded behind the firing line to shoot all those who will attempt to retreat. I'm bound to hold my lines together if I meet annihilation. To retreat if they dare." But you are committing folly. " argued the officer. "We cannot hold out against them and yet will soon as that I'm speaking the truth." "I don't wish to hear any contradiction," said Evans. "I'll not give way and there is no use of making any arguments."

In the meantime as the soldiers were bringing violet and her sisters Violet and her sisters to the rear of the Christian line, one of the soldiers saw to their surprise that far to the north was approaching toward them a long light blue ribbon.

Violet and her sisters saw the same thing and at first wondered what was coming when one of the officers cried:

"Quick one of you men go back and warn general Evans. A large force of He-Hollentians are approaching to strike our rear. Quick before they come."

The soldier rushed off to do his bidding, while violet and her sisters observing the same scene decided that nothing could prevent the blow and begged the man to hurry up as fast as he could. As the man disappeared the blue ribbon grew bigger and bigger, and finally as the officers sounded the warning by firing heavily in the direction and around the rear they warned Violet and her sisters to shield themselves behind the trees.

The glandelinians who were rallying coming swept on near or and as they drew nearer it was seen that they were in two sections.

One section were Zivrimmians, and the other were He-Hollentians and Aboliscandas. Their appearance with their long flowing hair or bobbed and curled looked like a surge of many little girls coming to attack the Christian rear. Wouldn't it be queer if it were so? As the Christian rear was preparing for them the line suddenly halted, and drew backward for a few minutes, but up suddenly spread out in groups and columns and then with a pandemonium of frightful din the yell swept up to the charge, firing as they came.

When general Evans got the report that the enemy were moving on his rear he became apprehensive, and ordered all the reserve troops from his other two wings to come up and resist the enemy, and dashed to that location himself and as he arrived within the scene he saw indeed that frightful annihilation was raging along his rear, that the rear had not been surprised and already though the assault had lasted only forty minutes over 25,000 glandelinians had fallen in dead and wounded but the assault continued with redoubled fury and as he dashed into the clamorous frightful inferno he viewed the firing more closely and saw that the enemy were determined to force his rear at all cost. The Christian troops were fighting in the hardest manner possible, keeping up a terrific musketry fire, and counterbalancing the enemy's with fixed bayonets, and the furious glandelinians tried all that men could do to crush the Christian rear, charging, and charging in the heaviest masses with terrific universal yells again raising their "Devil Yell" in terrifying discord upward toward the heavens and though the losses told fearfully on them they did not desert and Evans wished that the reinforcements he had sent for would hurry up and come before the enemy forced the rear.

The fiercest part of the conflict along the rear was at another section near where Violet and her sisters were in hiding behind the trees, where so many of the glandelinians were falling in such few minutes that it seemed too horrible to be real at any section a loss of heavy that the glandelinians were driven into some considerable confusion but the very bravery and example of their general officers were rallying them and finally they were pouring a terrific storm of fire upon the Christian troops who to save themselves from annihilation had to take cover behind brushwork and trees, and so fierce did the firing grow that an inferno seemed to break out here also.

Not once did Violet and her sisters dare move a hand or a foot as bullets whistled by the trees behind of which they were hiding in a screaming concert that was deafening, and so great was their peril that they prayed in assembly on bark and leaves and again smoke them in the face or fell on their heads.

It indeed was a terrible battle and one to test even the courage and nerve of Violet and her sisters. The glandelinian general Manley had sent his mightiest forces two columns each singly 10,000,000 strong to assault the Christian rear, and the whole battle line before the eyes of Violet and her sisters seemed to be a series of volcanic craters in eruption or forest fires sending seething clouds of smoke into the sky, the sheet of Christian musketry just now was unsupported by cannons sending a storm of fire upon the glandelinian waves, that tore all the mightiest glandelinian divisions to pieces who dared charge against the furious Aboliscandan soldiery, but notwithstanding the dreadful carnage four times more many millions of glandelinians charged forward with all their courage, and wildest fury, attacking the Christians even at close quarters, rushing the soldiers in purple and red, as if they were prize fighters, many closing and grappling and wrestling, blows were even at risk by fists, bayonets were used in a way to horrible to relate and amid the screaming roaring, avalanche of destruction the glandelinians on onslaught at this point finally swept all before them and the Christian line with all their biggest columns out to pieces had to recede and retreat in the greatest disorder. At several other points of the rear the Aboliscandas by their fierce bravery and fury managed to crush back their assailants but in the set series of hand to hand fights they suffered excruciating losses and were compelled to retreat.

Evans observed that indeed it was impossible to hold the rear from being rolled up without the reinforcements which seemed slow in coming up and fearing a disaster to his forces should the enemy press the attack any fiercer he was compelled to withdraw the rear portions of this great central wing leaving behind many cannons and lots of ammunition in the hands of the enemy. Violet and her sisters as the enemy forced the Christian rear had to abandon their hiding posts and ran as fast as they could with the retreating Christian columns. They heard the wild shouts of the enemy, heard and saw the great explosions which seemed to burst the earth asunder, and as the shells, and woods were fairly sheeted in smoke of musketry and bursting shells they saw that a large force of Red coats was moving up from another quarter, there was a sudden violent commotion that almost threw Violet and her sisters off their feet, and they saw the nearest line of the wild pursuers wither away into nothing, saw the remaining lines stagger and halt and then fade away in smoke and flashing flame, followed by a roar of musketry that shocked them still more, and down all about them fell so many Christian soldiers that they were horrified. Near them Violet saw a color bearer drop dead riddled by bullets, and despite the warning cries of the retreating soldiers she grasped the flag and swung it to the breeze when she was struck in the forearm by two bullets, and she staggered and fell to the ground crying:

"I'm hit."

Her sisters had gone on not knowing of her brave deed, but fortunately she was not seriously wounded, and was quickly rescued, for now the reinforcements had arrived and were rallying the retreating columns, under cover of a general storming musketry fire. Another man had grasped the flag out of Violet's hand and fell just where she had been picked up. Colonel Manley took it from him and started to retreat when three bullets entered his back and he fell forward on his face, the flag dropping and trailing on the ground. A captain seeing his fall rushed forward through the storm to pick up the flag when a bullet tore out his eye and he dropped mortally wounded. Several other men crawled forward cautiously to get the flag but not far and lay still. All the captains within view saw the fatal and futile attempt to retake the fallen flag and proposed that a column of men make a rush for it and fight for it to the last. A column of five hundred men were selected for the dangerous work and forward they rushed firing.

A roaring blinding artillery fire of the glandelinians who were now under cover tore through this column mowing down three quarters of their number, but one of the men had secured the flag and rushed away but a shell dropped him low and the flag once more trailed to the ground.

Violet other sisters had seen the whole performance and if it was not for the soldiers forcibly restraining them they would have rushed out and share shared a like fate.

"You little girls are becoming damn fools these days." "Roared one of the officers." "Don't you dare go out there. We'll get some one else to get that flag. How can you little girls expect to secure that flag when the enemy are pouring a withering fire across that plain that seems worse enough to kill even all the angels of heaven who would try to pass them."

It was now seen that a squad of glandelinians were approaching closely to the flag and at once the Abbeasians opened a withering storm of musketry and riddled those eight men with a thousand bullets to avenge the fall of so many comrades who had risked their lives in vain to save the flag.

"Our flag of Abbeasania with the Design of the Sacred Heart Of Jesus must be saved from disgrace and from being sacrilegiously used." "Cried the general who had viewed it the scene." "It'll take a whole charge to recover it. It's a dangerous attempt but we must do it. Forward boys. Double time."

With a yell that was terrifying the whole front line rushed forward and while the first portion assaulted the enemy some of the men rushed to where the flag lay. The glandelinians held their ground in that bloody plain very stubbornly as stubbornly as men could stand their ground against this charge of the most ferocious and savage character, and repulsed it and caused the flag to still be unrescued. The commanding general was killed.

Finally Joice broke away from the men who held her and creeping along the ground cautiously drew toward the flag. Seeing who was now trying to save the flag the whole Abbeasian line in this location opened fire upon the enemy as fast and furious shooting as quick as men could fire and loud, and inflated losses indescribable in numbers among the enemy in efforts to cover the brave deed of little Joice Vivian. Finally under this perfect musketry and shell storm Joice reached the flag. A bullet hit her in the hand and for a moment she lay still and then seeing that no one was abating her she grasped the flag, and turned slowly around, and started back toward the lines. Fourteen times a large swarm of glandelinians started to rush forward to stop her and met complete annihilation. A shell burst near Joice and wounded her severely in the leg, but she kept on, though suffering fearful pain. Then another explosion rendered her senseless, and the flag was no more nearer to safety than before, Joice having only gone back a few feet.

At once a large swarm of Abbeasians rushed forward, and while the rest fired at the enemy two men picked up Joice and the flag but dropped dead in their tracks. Threatened with annihilation the column of men dropped flag and crawled slowly back toward the lines.

"The kid was a fool to go out there." "Said general Rassendale." "We'll have to notify general Evans of this." "We have to get to have her and the flag rescued. Already four hundred thousand men have given up their lives in trying to save that flag. It's a disaster in deed and a tragedy."

Indeed it was a tragedy. Any men had fallen in trying to save that flag, and two of the Vivian girls violet and joice were wounded, joice seriously. This indeed was a most thunderous battle which for hours and hours already had raged with the most frightful fury ever imagined, and for the possession of that plain both sides launched many times the most violent onslaughts only to crush themselves to pieces against long lines of blinding artillery and musketry fire. The Abbeasians directed the hardest counter assault against the whole glandelinian front in this location but which ever way it raged it turned out as a great success for the wicked glandelinians, the flag was finally captured after all the efforts of the christians to save it and scores of thousands of the Abbeasians who rallied and rushed forward to get it back were cut or shot down amid the frightful struggle, and the main line was sent flying once again in general retreat with all of their biggest columns in tatters. Twenty five christian generals were killed and ninety wounded in this section of the bloody battle.....

In the meantime the glandelinians under general Pemberton Federal, and Marcus Hall, with Shoeman and Killchild was attacking other portions of the main christian rear but evidently without such great success and soon these four generals fell severely wounded in the thickest of the bloody fight.....

Cresio, Peerless, Baldwinson, Grossmann, Grosseon, Slater, Rheumatism, Allentine, Fendon, Concoroy, Standale, Marleyat, Stanovich, Richard Logan, Daimonem Dami, Pemberton Jennin, and Zimmerman were the ones who led the attack on other quarters of the rear, and indeed it was successful in this portion and poor general Evans did not know what to do when he heard that poor Violet and Joice were wounded, and Joice seriously, and he immediately went to see that they were well taken care of though he agonized them by saying that he would have given anything if they had not gone and done it.

At all points the sanguinary struggle was raging without a single lull and the enemy faced the christian deadliest fire as if it was nothing at all and continually attacked the christian line like a hurricane tears through a forest, and all along the line for the whole extent of the tremendous battle the scene was like some vast conflagration, and as fast as the mighty glandelinian columns were checked and mangled at some points the rest still pressed on, and again and again crushed themselves against the christian lines. All that morning long the battle had raged most fiercely and along the rear indeed the glandelinians for the time had seemed to gain the day and sweep the whole rear back in confusion but the main force of the rear reserve had arrived at this critical moment and though they could not drive back the wild glandelinian assailants they however finally checked their advance with great slaughter.

But it seemed impossible to drive the glandelinian forces back who opened as heavy a fire as they received from the whole Abbeasian line thinning the christian lines in the most fearful manner, and repelling every counter attack with success. The hundreds of thousands of christian guns made the most fearful and terrible havoc among all the glandelinian forces within range of their deadly fire cutting the widest swaths in every direction, annihilating every column, tearing whole immense lines down as they dared to rush forward, and fairly deforming the landscape. Even along the frontal part of the battle line one glandelinian general after another led his mightiest forces to the assault but only met with the most frightful desertion, the christian guns very time opening veritable volleys of flame and din, but as these glandelinian columns were shattered and broken, and compelled to give up the assault, other main columns swept to the storming, and though meeting the same horrible fate, rallied and continued the assault without the slightest abatement.

All along the whole line the bloody battle raged with the utmost steadiness of a blizzard storm, while at every point of the line the wicked glandelinians swept forward with the steadiness of storm waves against a mighty breaker, and it seemed incredible that the christian were able to stand their ground at any point the attacks of the foe was so violent, for at every sweeping assault whole lines of christians were cut up and thrown back for a mile, in a seething inferno of musketry and shell fire but nevertheless those who were driven were rallied by their commanders and returned to the fight, and held out against all these fearful assaults moving down the glandelinian columns by the score. Column after column of the glandelinians were routed totally, but they rallied again and again and red recruiting reinforcements resumed the assaults with frightful incessant fury.

One of the most noted points of this bloody battle was a death dealing stone wall where hundreds of thousands of glandelinians fell for every mad charge, they having at one point succeeded in driving the Abbeasians from an important portion of their position but not without serious loss, and as the Abbeasians retreated to the stone walls they opened a fire that tore up the whole line of assault and about one in quarter out of two thousand glandelinian generals fell here men on both sides were mowed down in thousands per minute and the firing had been something terrible. Had the christians been able to hold this stone wall the battle would have been immediately won by the Abbeasians but through some blunder the christians were unable to hold this line of stone walls their whole line was torn and swept back and about a mile, the glandelinians carrying all before them, until checked by the main christian batteries which poured a terrific hailstorm of shot and shell and canister upon the frenzied strikers who were yelling, glandelinian soldiers stopping their wild rush for a certain time. Both sides fairly cut their armies to pieces during this part of the bloody fray and already the glandelinian losses were frightful.

Indeed in this battle Violet's sisters had shown great bravery and done things which would have startled any man to witness, for while the Abbeonians were fighting fiercely against heavy odds the little girls acted daringly as color bearers themselves, and as the Abbeonians remounted charge after charge and went forward to counter charge themselves, the little girls had the courage to follow the Abbeonians and even every time fared better than their two sisters did for they came of out unscathed. Indeed the Abbeonians were braver and better fighters than the Angelinians themselves, always returning to the charge after repulsing one, and crushing whole glandelinian divisions to pieces, but they were astonished at the bravery of the little girls who showed that they though children dared to wave the flags in the face of the merciless raging foes of God who strove to show God that it takes more than His Holy subjects to win on them, and yet get smashed down for every charge they made against the christian line.

In the meantime General Evans had finally received the full force of General Everette Trues army, and so to reestablish his badly broken lines, and to recover all the ground he had lost Evans decided to redouble the fierce efforts which he did and with all the most furious violence that he could, throwing forward with the support of a devastating artillery fire the main left grand division of Everette Trues to center which however made the great battle rage with still more redoubled fury, the enemy repelling the newcomers and even making charge after charge in the face of uneven odds, and turning the battle field into a regular furnace hell of slaughter.

General Everette Trues losses were so heavy and horrible that they were never known but in the heat of the battle he suffered the loss of one of his best divisions of the army the main flower of his army who charged through an inferno of a gien, and in trying to rally the parts that were in confusion the generals Melford and Jennings were killed, and the divisions were cut to pieces by the drum drum fire of the enemy's artillery, and poor Everette Trues was severely wounded, forty eight of his best generals going down mangled and bleeding and that frightful storm of carnage.

Through the means of general McWhirther Brunelaw and McHollester Thompson who brought up heavy reinforcements from Everette Trues right wing, which though heavily attacked could spare troops, the center of Everette Trues portion of the christian line was saved from destruction, but the violent thunderous onslaught of the wild and savage glandelinians could not be checked and only increased in madlin fury, and Federal Johnston and many other of the glandelinian generals threw forward their mightiest armies, and finally won their ground after terrible slaughter fourteen times at close quarter though he himself was badly wounded.

At other parts of Everette Trues lines the battle was raging with a fury too horrible to relate here, though I can state that it was threatening to be one of the greatest victories the enemy was about to win in the whole war. Hanson Johnston Abbeonians were routed with the loss of one quarter of the command, and he himself was killed, general Brunelaw Vivian continued to make the most tremendous stand of all and who snote and tore the enemy's lines to pieces, every time they charged, was also beaten severely in detail, his division being cut to pieces, and scattered, and he himself captured. Had it not been for general Roswellian Gustor Feder who stood his own ground to the last and who suffered the loss of 1,112,553 in his slain general Evans army would have been seriously jeopardized in a violent and even be so crippled as to be useless for further resistance against so stubborn a foe of God, and the great war against glandelinia would have been lost right then and there. At this portion the glandelinians had won a most sweeping victory carrying all before them and even changing the christian retreat into a total rout.

Indeed along Everette Trues routed lines the glandelinians had attacked in a frenzy of violence and savagery crushing down all opposition in their path but at other portions of the line the severity of the deadly christian fire carried all before it sweeping whole plains full of men to their deaths within an hours time, General Pitty on the side of the foe was killed, Potatoes also, Meldonia Jensen was wounded mortally, black Brooks who led the wildest of the charges, in which his men seemed to be ravaging manines was killed as his division was annihilated, Imperial was killed, for the same rash attempt, Gattlingburg, and Rima were mangled by a miskey market volley, Jackson McDonnla was wounded severely in the thigh, and general Coughman, Shooman, and Kauffman were wounded at many places. General Marcorinia Costello, Helen, Valdona, Hubbardsetting, Meldorf Bell, James Windowson, Memie Bookle, Pumpant, Parbeck, Rainer, and Kindermbina Dolson fell dead beside the christian lines as their divisions were reduced to fragments and routed with the loss of all their reinforcements. Indeed it was a great and fierce battle.....

The battle of Hon Catherine De la Poer Herostford was a battle twice as fierce as any of the greater ones already having raged during the glandelinian division or worse than Fountain of Pinono De la Greeco and many McHollester McHollester Run put together in one days fighting, and though Everette Trues army suffered a crushing and disastrous defeat through the surrender of several christian divisions the main line of Evans army was still holding the ground amid the furious battle while all the efforts known were being made by Evans and many officers who could be spared to rally the divisions under Everette Trues while Charles Brown and general Starring forces which were the last held in reserve were sent forward to check the enemy's driving success with parks of artillery. As these two new forces stemmed the advance of the enemy it cannot be described how inconceivably violent the battle now became and the shells fairly fairly honeycombed the battle field with craters, setting forest fires, and so terrible now was the losses of the glandelinians at this point that it was believed that they would be checked, but Evans warned all the generals anew "For Gods sakes to be careful" As losses in the best generals was becoming so heavy as to paralyze his strength and cause a serious disaster to the army of God.

It was three o'clock and still the battle raged on with unceasing fury. Evans had lost one hundred and forty nine generals already, and as Charles Browns main line of artillery got into action the cannonading thunders of artillery all along the line made such vibrations that hardly could the soldiers keep their feet, and now to daunt Charles Brown, and Starring, the enemy got mad, and made some of the most wildest and most furious charges ever seen during the battle up to this time, and though their whole lines were cut to pieces and rolled up again and again as the Abbeonians counter charged in overwhelming numbers, other long and ex massive lines in gray came on anew driving the christian lines back as if before monstrous irresistible tidal waves only to melt into fragments before the deadly christian artillery fire. Brown already lost ten generals and he raved with fury and angry and anger and threatened curses on the others who would dare recklessly expose themselves. One of the main tragedies of the battle now was the severely wounding of Jennie Vivian who had become too excited to realize what she was doing and who had rushed out in the midst of the fearful firing to grasp a flag that trailed to the ground, but she was successful and brought it back. It was a great rejoicing to the glandelinians when they heard a false report that three of the Vivian girls had been mortally wounded, but general Gal Cannon on the enemy's side had fallen and their losses was growing worse every minute. The terrific storm of shells on both sides was scattering the woods worse than the fiercest Abbeonians typhoon could have done and the extensive series of windrows of wreckage was literally intermingled with the myriads of dead and wounded of both sides.

During the frightful fury of the battle each of the Vivian girls had been largely forgotten, and so none of the surviving little girls knew of the wounding of their three sisters, until they managed to get together again and then missing their three sisters a soldier told them what had happened. "Oh good God I hope they are not badly wounded," said Nettie. "Where are they placed?"

"Don't know," said the soldier. "The battle is so fierce that everywhere there is wild confusion."

Violet's sisters immediately went forth to locate their three wounded sisters, and no sooner had reached reached a creek when all of a sudden there swarmed toward them a yelling horde of Gargolian Kurds on horseback hurling a shield front of steel toward them. Violet and her sisters had escaped many other dangers were fortunately but it seemed this time that this was going to be their worse experience. Nettie and her other sisters immediately stepped behind a group of trees, and opening fire brought down on enough glandelinian glandelinians to check their wild rush, but they had to make good their escape for they were given very little time.

And the worse of it was that the little girls were on foot and the enemy were on the swifts swiftest horses that Violet's remaining sisters had ever seen the glandelinians ride before.

"Quick," said Nettie. "We'll dive into the stream. It's the only way to escape the enemy for if they catch us we will not come back to tell what happened to us."

As soon as they reached the river the little girls divided in and swam across as fast as possible, and reached the other side before the pursuers who fortunately were only armed with sabres could wade in after them.

"Who over those little gutterships are they certainly can swim." They heard an officer among the glandelinians say.

"Aw thats not surprising." They heard another man say. "They are none of those dogmated Vivian girls and if they get away from us we are lost."

The soldiers urged their horses into the water and swam after the little girls who by this time were scrambling up the other side of the bank dripping with their clothes soaked.

Fortunately for the little girls just when they were about to be overtaken a party of Angolan horsemen suddenly rode out upon the glandelinians and dispersed them after some severe fighting hand to hand. The others who kept out of the fight picked up the little girls and hugging them close naked them who they were.

"When they learned the truth the men were surprised, and immediately went toward the location where Evans was commanding a portion of a division he was trying frantically to rally. But so fierce was the conflict raging at every point that for a time it was difficult to find general Evans and the soldiers were about to despair and give it up when they finally came upon the region and finding Evans rallying the command successfully, though the whole region was nothing but dead and wounded soldiers, and smoke and flashing musketry. They rode up to general Evans and saluting said: 'We have rescued these vivid girls who were pursued by the glandelinians who were Gargolians and on horseback. We came upon the scene just in time, and we rescued them though the enemy gave us a hot fight to capture them from us.'"

Evans was apprehensive over this news, and taking them under his care, he cheered them up telling them that their three sisters were not seriously wounded, and would be aroused as soon as the doctors finished dressing their injuries.

"They will be soon with you again as they are not too seriously injured as to be confined to the beds." Said another christian general. "They had narrow escapes though and the whole army will soon hear of their gallant heroic heroism." "

"Could we go to them now?" Asked Jennie.

"I don't think we could unless you want to go through more peril and excitement." Said Evans. "The portion of the christian army which has them in possession is cut off from us by the enemy and you would have to go through their wildly assaultin lines to go to your sisters."

"We don't care we'll risk anything to find out sisters and to be with them again." Said Angeline. "It would seem mean and ungrateful to desert them in their time of need, when they have been so good to us when we were in trouble."

"But it's exceedingly dangerous." Warned Evans. "In that location the enemy are putting in the deadliest fire, and no one could cross those those glens or go through them and live. So had better wait until the assault can be repulsed in that location and then go. If you go now it will be like attempting suicide."

"If it's that bad then why not send a large reinforcement and crush the assailants." Asked Nettie. "We got to go and will not wait. You must do it or we'll go now. We don't fear the dangers, and would be willing to risk anything to a cheer them up."

"Sure I'll make a passage for you dear little girls if I have to annihilate the assailants." Answered Evans. "So you must, and you shall, and I'll see that you can too."

Evans knowing where that portion of the christian line was cut off, drew up extra forces from the left rear reserve army of his left wing, and as fresh artillery was placed in that location and opened up a million salvos of cannoning thunders long lines of Abbeannians charged the glandelinian front from an unexpected quarter, while another division of Abbeannians came down upon their flank with all their might and fury, doing incalculable damage and smashing the enemys lines into tatters. The sudden blaze of firing along the glandelinian front during this unexpected attack was exceedingly terrific in the extreme, but at this location the charging columns of the new christian forces could not be checked at all, and the glandelinians were driven back in confusion leaving a fair passage for the remainder of the vivid girls to go to the other side of the christian line.

"Go now quick." Cried Evans. "Don't lose a moment."

"Yes before the enemy rally again." Cried one of the other christian officers.

Jumping on the nearest horses the little girls bolted like the wind and fairly tore across the meadow and headed full speed for the glen. The nearest glandelinians saw them, and realizing the intention of the sudden attack from an unexpected quarter opened fire at once and seeing that their aim took no effect started off in wild pursuit.

"Get them damn old fools before they ever too take the little girls who they are after." Shouted one of the officers to the machine gunners, and they immediately opened fire, and every man with horses and all sank in a rolling mass down to the ground, and profanities, blasphemies, and curses from the baffled enemy.....

In the mountain the other glandelinian forces were starting to rally, and Violet and her sisters seeing the christian forces coming back, in confusion decided to get out of the glen before they got in the torrent, and if they failed to do so to rally the demoralized christian troops themselves come what may. They now fairly made their horses fly. BANG! BANG! BANG! Three shells exploded a couple of yards away from the little girls, and then a bullet concert started above them.

"The enemy are firing at us now." Said Daisy. "We got to make it quick or they'll kill us without our chance of every seeing our wounded sisters who are on the other side."

On and on raced the little girls, while the retreating christian troops came nearer and nearer, firing at the foe as they retired, and to the ear of the little girls there was a horrible pandemonium sound. It seemed as if all the noises ever heard in hell were resounding in every direction behind them, the yells of the enemy, the battle cries of the Abbeannians, the tumult of bayonets or lances, the crash of musketry, and the violent thunders of cannons mingled with the booming and banging of thousands of shells. The enemy also was coming fast, and it was seen that a force of glandelinian cavalry were fighting like fiends against fiends, in their desperate efforts to break through the retreating christian lines, to pursue the little girls, and that the retreating Abbeannians were fighting with the fury of St. Michael and his angels to withstand them and prevent them from doing so. The little girls knew however that these glandelinian horsemen were glandelinians and in due time would succeed in breaking through, and so they looked over their little pistols as they raced onward and saw to it that they were well loaded.

Then suddenly far behind them there was a roaring shrieking storm of the wildest yells, and looking back the little girls were surprised to see about thirty six hooded Zimmermanians coming after them from the south, while a force of eighty glandelinians were approaching from the west to intercept them.

To allow them to do so would be fatal and so Violet's sisters immediately let the nearest portion come within pistol range, and then opened fire incessantly, dropping a glandelinian at every shot, and slaying the leader also. The glandelinians alone had not received the fire from the little girls as they had been too far away as yet but the little girls quickly taking advantage of the confusion caused among the Gargolian hordes, immediately raced off northward, keeping their eyes on the column of glandelinians.

Suddenly a long line of breastworks loomed up before the little girls, and though they appeared apparently deserted, a long line of red coats suddenly sprang up and opened a destructive fire, and down fell every one of the glandelinian pursuers, with their horses running wildly about in every direction. Violet's sisters immediately dashed over the breastworks, and halting close by asked one of the men if they knew where their wounded sisters were.

"You have quite a ways to go yet." The officer in charge answered. "See the enemy are coming again and so you'll have to stay here until we can drive back their next charge. You have only crossed the meadows. Over yonder is a large glen. North of the glen is your destination. If you can make it you are all right. But I doubt it if you can alone. I'll have to send a big force of cavalry with you as the glen is a regular ambush even if the main forces of the foe are driven back for many glandelinians lurk in the tree tops among the foliage and fire down on all who they see. I fear you'll never make it even with me up for you little girls would be the first targets."

"But couldn't the cannoniers shell them snipers from the trees?" Asked Gertrude Angeline. "We got to go and see our sisters. No matter what we'll face."

"It cannot be done effectually." Said the officer. "There are too many of the damn trees, and it would be an hours work to even drive the foe out of the glen itself. You had better try by passing the outskirts of the glen and not go through it. For you will not reach the section alive if you do so."

The retreating christian forces were now coming up and they recoiled behind the works, while closely following were long lines of the furiously yelling enemy. Violet and her sisters were immediately dismounted from their horses by a volley which killed all of them, and so to save their own lives the little girls had to lay close to the works, and not dare raise a head. They were in a dangerous position indeed for here they were alone to the very works and if the enemy started a storm of shelling well goodnight.

And of millions of the glandelinians came surging forward, all along the line, and as far as within the view of the sight of the little girls they could see column after column of the enemy come forward, and fire heavily upon the christians defending the works, records in fragments, come on again, and recoil, but never gave up and it seemed to the little girls as

The assault would never cease, and within their view the battle raged with inconceivable violence and fury. All about them the soldiers continually fell and the Christian cannon within the breastworks which were firing in the most terrific bombardment made a terrific universal clatter or roar far and wide and the little girls had to stuff pieces of handkerchiefs in their ears to prevent themselves from going deaf from the deafening din. It was the only time in this war that the Glandelinians within the view of the little girls fought so desperately as they did, and to the little girls it seemed as if the Christian losses far exceeded that of the furiously attacking Glandelinians, and now a surge of the foe to the surprise and apprehension of the Glandelinians fairly surged above the works, and at once closed with the Christians. Fortunately this gave a lull in the furious firing and the little girls immediately got up and though assailed at once by a score of Glandelinians fired wildly right and left shooting them down one by one, and then made a dash for safety. A Glandelinian officer raised his gun to fire at Gertrude Angeline but Nettie saw the movement and dropped him with a bullet in the lung.

As they ran onward the little girls saw that the Christian troops were being pressed backwards by the foe, and as they saw two generals fall they thought it high time to beat it and they did, pursued at full cry by seventy of the fiercest men with hair lit like little girls. Ten of them outran the little girls and attempted with wild frenzy to run the little girls through with the bayonet but they were readily shot down. An officer rushed at Nettie and grabbed her by the throat, but she only screamed defiance and filled with the excitement of the very battle herself battled fiercely with him and shot him down before he could choke her.

While the little girls were thus retreating, there came a frightful volume of thundering sounds behind them and suddenly among the retreating Christian lines shells fell and exploded like confetti, and so many exploded all around the little girls that they thought they were done for.

Fortunately as the Christian troops were being scattered and dispersed and as a force of the enemy were about to fire a volley that would surely slay the little girls, a new force of Abbeemianians appeared through the haze of powder smoke and opened fire bringing down one line of the foe, and then counter charging with demoniacal yells, and while Violet and her sisters were regathering their scattered senses a panorama of horror was prevailing everywhere within their view, millions of shots being exchanged every minute and also within their view there was starting a heavy concentration of Glandelinian troops against the Christian lines, and when it seemed about to throw them back, and cause the retreat to be renewed, the little girls heard the noise of horses and wheels and saw a long line of artillery come dashing up and they immediately threw themselves flat as they were hastily unlimbered, and soon a frightful storm of crashes seemed to come from everywhere, and looking toward the enemy lines they saw the Glandelinians slowly retiring their biggest columns showing many wide gaps, and explosions, which made an earthshaking, ear-splitting crash.

Oh how the little girls hoped that the assault of the enemy would be repulsed in this location so they could go to their sisters, but not quite so as yet, and they were only to have worse excitement than before.....

Everywhere the little girls could hear the roar of hundreds of cannons, the crash and roar of millions of muskets, and pistols, the tumultuous yells of the combatants, the ring of steel on steel, and could see the ranks of both sides being frightfully cut down. But the enemy were slowly pressing forward again, and a shell exploded above a tree top showering the little girls with sticks and leaves and a big branch which fell narrowly missed their heads.

The Glandelinians were again making some exceedingly violent charges against the Christian lines, and though for a time most of these assaults were of no avail Violet and her sisters continued their own retreat to the rear to take shelter behind the second second line of works for now they were so tired out from running and so badly wounded that they could hardly go another step and they could fairly feel the wild beating of their little hearts. The Abbeemian line meeting frightful destruction were slowly recoiling, some being swept back panic stricken, and the enemy were coming on with a savage and horrible wildness, their surges following one after another in quick succession, and as the assault was made on the second line of works, behind which the retreating forces had taken shelter, whole brigades and divisions within the very view of the little girls were practically torn to pieces, or wiped out entirely, but still millions after millions of the Glandelinians had come on anew assailing the Christians all along the line, and so heavy a fire that they put in as they neared the works each time that the Christians fell in such frightful numbers, that Violet and her sisters realized what would be their own fate if they once stuck up their heads only an inch, and now stern stern commands issued from every officers;

"Don't keep your heads down or you'll all be annihilated."

This battle to the very little girls themselves seemed to be one of the most bloody of the war especially next to Grandville-Atlanta and Glorinda. So then the firing along this portion alone seemed to rive the world and the leaves flew from the din. Now a most terrific assault of the greatest violence and fierceness was being made by monstrous waves of Glandelinians, and Violet and her sisters were horrified for the firing of both sides seemed to be turning the whole last battle field within their view into a terrible volcano of flame and din, and now as the firing on both sides roared like a thrillion cannon the enemy's line recoiled for a certain space and then armed their way up to the works, the Glandelinian assault becoming so irresistible that Violet and her sisters were frightened when they saw a portion of the Christian line to the left give way in confusion, and as the main line was in danger of being outflanked, it had to recoil also. Violet and her sisters being again assailed by Glandelinians on every hand. The soldiers this time went to their defense and covered the retreat of the little girls and as soon as it was safe the officer nearest to the little girls said;

"Better beat it entirely to the rear for safety little girls. It's hopeless now to reach the other section of the Christian line for we are being beaten, and cannot drive back the assailants. Go before my men are scattered by the force of the enemy onslaught, or the Glandelinians will shoot you down like wolves."

"We'll never give up our intentions." Said Gertrude Angeline. "O we will no matter what the cost." And she and her sisters went on in the rear but watched for an opportunity to change their direction and make for the glens which they still observed in the distance, though so much smoke was pouring from them that they seemed like burning forest fires, and from that a terrific uproar came which was fairly stunning, the crash of cannons and the wild madman of musketry, mingled with yells and screams of every different description.

They finally got far to the rear of the slowly retreating Christian lines and seeing a number of horses standing near by unfettered the ropes around the trees mounted the horses and went off for the direction of the glens and within ten minutes, reached it and saw a most awesome sight indeed.

Just in time a force of reinforcements arriving was checking a frightful and bloody Glandelinian storm, but it seemed impossible that the Christians could hold their ground very long, for the wild Glandelinian assault was raging with such tremendous fury that the Christian cannons were being ploughing the enemy ranks through and through, the enemy losses being exceedingly heavy probably over 34,000,000 fell in these bloody glens all that the battle was raging, but the enemy was also making the fiercest havoc among the surging Christian lines with their own cannons and musketry.

A crushing down the fierce counter onslaughts of the Abbeemianians, and the firing fairly tore the barks of the trees off, and unsaved many of the trees completely. Fifteen Glandelinian generals had been killed in directing the onslaught through the inferno of these bloody glens, twenty seven had been wounded, twenty four seriously wounded, and two dangerously wounded. The Christians at this point had concentrated all the available guns in their desperate efforts to stop the maddened hammering onslaughts of the enemy which seemed about to annihilate all before it, hundreds of cannons of every make being concentrated incessantly upon the assaulting Glandelinian columns, and much havoc Violet's sisters never witnessed before, whole portions of the enemy's main line before their very eyes being torn to fragments, and the Christian lines being torn in return, and it seemed to the little girls that both sides were trying to annihilate one another, and hardly any of the trees could be seen so thick was the smoky inferno of battle....

As Violet and her sisters drew nearer, and observed that the wind was clearing the smoke somewhat, they suddenly saw a monstrous column of Abbeemianians surge heavily against the Christian lines, and though they were moved down in the most frightful numbers by the chains of thundering Christian batteries. Three million other Glandelinians in charging against a Christian battery to the right had fallen into an ambush and within the view of the little girls were being threatened with annihilation and so started a withdrawal. Violet's sisters hoped that this would make a serious break in the enemy's assaulting line and cause them to withdraw, so that they could get through this glen and go to the other side of the Christian line, but however this terrible blow did not daunt the main Glandelinian forces who were being led by generals Roswell Foster Smith, Godwin, Lapping, Ludolph, Pades, Edith Richard, Legation, Emma Westbrooke, Rodato, Robert, Harding, Roswell, Robert Westbrooke, Corklind, Randolph Miller, Reeves, Richard O'Donnell, Fabbie, Sciloredino, and Schloeder.

hose glendelindian forces charged the christians with terrible fury, retreated, closed upon them in desperate hand fighting, and retreated amplifying a christian army which pursued them, had destroyed many more of the divisions of the Abbeismians during the rally. Violet and her sisters or Violet's sisters (a mistake indeed) were bound to get to the other side of the christian army or die and so boldly and without any fear they started to race toward those smothering glens.

"Come back here you little fools." Cried one of the officers. "Come back here. Are you going crazy or what?"

And the din of the firing, Violet's sisters did not hear the shouts of the officer, or the men and the officer fearing that they would certainly go to their deaths ordered a permit and forty Abbeismians raced madly after the little girls and finally overtook them.

"What is the matter with you little girls." Cried the leading lieutenant. "Are you so going to commit suicide that you not like this, or has the noise and fur of the battle driven you crazy?"

"We want to get to our sisters who are wounded on the other side."

Said Gertrude Angeline. "We know the way and we are going to go."

"Well you are not going to go through the glens if we can hold you." Said the lieutenant. "Come back with us and don't be fools for no one could go through those glens and live."

Violet's sisters saw nothing else but to obey, and they were brought back to the rear of the firing lines the general riding up to them and saying with a serious look:

"I'm going to report your rash attempt to general Evans young ladies.
You were going through hell and fire when you made that rash and it's a damn right miracle that you did not get killed by the fire of both sides. Where are your senses and what was the intention of that desperate dash?"

"Our three sisters are wounded, and we are going to get to them if we die for it." Said Gertrude. "Evans knows that we are going to try to go through the glen and so it would do no good to report us."

"Oh you it would too." Said the commanding general. "I know he told you to make the attempt but not while the battle is raging. You had best in those glens. You'll at least have you watched closely and too that you don't do it again. It's your responsibility if you are killed.

It was through their own fault that they were wounded. They did the same rash dash thing that you did. It's not us, it's you. You are the enemy, or work your way around the glen if you like. But if you make that dash again for the glens we'll stop you if we have to shoot down your horses and wound you in the bargain. Better be shot for instead of letting the enemy murder you in cold blood."

Violet and her sisters saw after all that it was folly indeed to try to pass through those glens, and so they decided to work their way around the rear on the general suggested, and then make a dash for the other section of the christian line. So they rode on slowly but then they came back and asked the general to send them a guard of cavalry men to escort them on the way.

"Right." Said the general. "I see you are not losing your senses after all. I love you little girls more than I would love my own children, but when I see you make such a rash attempt it's no wonder I get angry and scold. Were colonel Sanders. Take your squadron of cavalry and guard these little girls as they go around the glens. Hurry off with them before the enemy sees the attack. The firing is growing worse and worse. Hurry up."

The colonel rushed off to obey his command and soon appeared with over three hundred of the finest Concentric horsemen, all armed with repeating rifles, and long sabres, besides lances, and he closed the little girls in the middle of the column as if they were prisoners, and as the little girls started forward gave the command forward and soon the whole party made the first storm of shot and shell overhead, and the standards flying in the front were doubling toward the silent portion of the glen to make a long dash again.

"Where do you little girls wish to go?" Asked the colonel of Gertrude as he rode along side of her.

"Our three sisters have been wounded." Said Gertrude. "Violet and Jennie and Jodee for the reason of this thing to save a flag which got captured by the enemy. Evans told us they were in the army across from the glen, and told us to go when opportunity presented itself. We got doubtful of it then and tried to go through the glens whether the battle was over or not. When general Sanders' command came we stopped no more. Sisters, glendelindians from fairly mixed with us and threatened to report our rash attempt.
If we were indeed but for the fact we would forget ourselves. Will he really report us to Evans?"

"Indeed he will." Said the colonel. "Now you'll find it better to dash for the other side of the glen. If the battle is over, then you can report us to Evans."

329. Little girls you would have perished without my dash.!!!!

"Violet and her sisters did not say anything more for a while than in Violet's sisters but followed the colonel a few men as quickly as they went toward them. They were almost bewildered by the dense confusion of the nightly battle, and hardly did not know what they were going for the smoke that hung over the region and dense and intermingled objects almost like a thick fog, or like the soft fall of a blizzard. Nevertheless they continued on with the colonel until they reached the other side of the glen, and the colonel suddenly shouted a warning to the right.

"Hundreds of soldiers in the broad valley, close in on the children and if the glendelindians upon fire, don't hesitate to kill the attacking army."
The troops of the christian army continued to dash on smiling, neither and nearer to those threatening trees. Some of the glendelindians saw their coming, and also the little girls with them, and decided to catch them to be ready and give the christians some a volley.

On dashed the squadron of the christian cavalry, reckless and ready to return the well expected fire of the enemy but lurking in the trees tops.
The glendelindians now started to fire, and two of the Abbeismian light hairs fell from their horses while a score of the privates were hit. The troops and answered the fire with a tremendous crash of rifles and down a good number of the glendelindians at the same time. Then from a hidden place had been hid down by the graycoats in the lower parts of the glen came a solid shot which drashed through the column of men causing confusion and killing three men and two horses.

"Keep cool everybody." Shouted the colonel. "We must guard the children. Forwarding and danger if we are not careful."

The soldiers waited, and dashed on faster than before. A bullet took away a Evans' horse's head, a bullet hit gathering horse, and another it hit before the animal fell one of the soldiers grabbed the little girl and drew her onto his own horse. On and on dashed the troops firing back in return at the soldiers, and now for the rear they observed a force of Mc-Hollanthian cavalry coming on in pursuit, and approaching at a tearing gait.

"If they come too near we'll have to clash with them." Said the colonel.
"But if we clash some of you men will have to combat with the children, and risk the dangers along, for they must not be in the midst of the conflict for it will insure certain destruction for them."

The officers all understood, and as their men dashed on faster and faster, they hung on behind and watched the fast approaching little girl on horseback. They were good riders too but the Abbeismians and the Mc-Hollanthian soldiers seemed to keep their distance between each other, the two not smiling on the fugitives, nor neither the Abbeismians drawing away. Suddenly a severe volley was exchanged between the two running parties, but no one fell. The Abbeismians in part the last line of troops belonging to the glen, but were not past the soldiers, for many lay wounded in the lower brush and occasionally a man or a horse fell dead or wounded, but none of the little girls were hit as yet or wounded though J. Catherine had three bullets holes in her dress, and Nettie had the tip of her arm torn off by a missile.

The Mc-Hollanthian soldiers however were advancing silently, not yelling or shouting as generally the enemy, but they kept up an incessant fire now as they saw that they could not get nearer to their fugitives and shot down three lieutenants, and one of the privates within a short time.

The fire was sold returned however as the colonel ordered his men to reserve their ammunition in case they would have to come to close quarters.
How many of the glendelindian soldiers there was the colonel did not know, but they seemed to be a superior in numbers, about twice their strength and the colonel was very loath to clash as yet.

But now another party was approaching from an opposite direction and proved themselves by the r their features to be the fierce glendelindians, allies in the form of their hair but different in the form of uniforms and color.
The colonel saw that an engagement was unavoidable and so he halted his column in a square formation and sent on fairly men with the little girls to continue the race. Then forming lines the two opposing sides came on with fierce yells of rage, fury, and derision, and closed in a frightful and most desperate mêlée. The design of the soldiers had been seen however, and while the glendelindians were attacking the christians, some of those not being able to get into the engagement went after the fugitives a tearing gait.

The soldiers who had compassion of the victim girls saw the Mc-Hollanthian coming and some of them immediately dropped back a little and opened a withering fire upon the foremost of the wild warriors now moving their and a man at one volley, and driving the remnants into confusion. This gave them some delay and they dashed on to join the others but the remaining "lance lancers" immediately renewed the fire and several of the christian soldiers toppled from their horses, and the horse carrying Catherine and Nettie sank to the ground.....

able to go on ahead and hold them. It was not so very far to the town of Lady Decie, but nevertheless general Evans did not wish to take any chances, of sending the little girls out alone when there was no telling how many of the enemy were about, and what they would do when angered by their many failures during their efforts to suppress the irrefragable christian invasion.

Violet and her sisters mounted the fleetest ponies and rode on ahead of the troops and silently the soldiers followed as fast as the little girls went. After a few minutes riding the leader of the Abbeonmian cavalry rode up along side of Violet and her sisters, and said:

"How far is the town of Lady Decie?"

"About ten miles north of Mon Catherine," said Violet.

"We'll have to make a quick run for it then," said the colonel. "I see a large force of the enemy cavalry coming far to our rear and they seem to be following us."

Violet and her sisters looked back and saw that it was true. A large squad of the Mc-Hollensteinian horsemen were approaching far to the rear, and they were coming a-trotting too. But it seemed possible indeed that the ferocious Glandelinians would easily overtake them, and the little girls told their fears to the soldiers.

"If they come too near and we cannot elude them, then we'll have to turn and fight," answered the general.

The cavalry forces of the enemy were speedily gaining on the soldiers, and so Violet and her sisters were advised to halt which they did, and within a few minutes they were closely surrounded by the Abbeonmian soldiers, and the retreat was then resumed. The wicked Glandelinians saw indeed that the Vivian Girls were in the midst of the column, and though they did not know for real what the intention of the christian cavalry or the little girls was, they were suspicious nevertheless, and lashed their horses to the utmost, trying frantically to overtake the christian host.

Surveying the pursuers, the Abbeonmian general observed that this time an overwhelming force of Glandelinians was in pursuit. The Abbeonmian cavalry men numbered about ten thousand, and it seemed as if there was about fourty thousand Mc-Hollensteinians coming.

It was indeed the most tremendous odds, but nevertheless the general was bound to keep his distance as long as possible, and if he could not elude his pursuers, he would stand and fight, and send a messenger to Lady Decie for help.

On came the Mc-Hollensteinians yelling, and fairly blaspheming, like the fiends of a hell and the more the Abbeonmians tried to lash their horses the faster the Glandelinians came on, and it was evident to the cavalry general that there was no escape. He had it in mind at first to send the little girls on ahead with a squadron of cavalry, while the remainder would stand and fight, but he realized that a pursuing body would be soon as cooperated from the enemy and would go after the little girls and overtake them in short order.

He really did not know what to do for there was even no escape for them. He nevertheless decided to fight like hell as it is called and turning to colonel Madden he said:

"Hide with a 'll haste to Lady Decie. Lady Decie and get help.

Hurry as fast as you can."

He gave a similar order to another soldier, to go to Evans lines and get help from there. He then continued on his retreat for several minutes more but spreading his men out in line formation, and then suddenly wheeled his first line, and came down upon the surprised Glandelinian pursuers with a shocking crash. The Glandelinians had not expected this at all, and in the melee the first of the Glandelinian cavalry force was driven into confusion, the Abbeonmians fighting like fiends, dashing through their lines again and again, cutting down so many of the men that the survivors recoiled. The remainder of the Glandelinian cavalry still coming on spread out in long line formation, and advanced, firing carbines and pistols, and then with a tremendous roar of frightful "Devil Yells" closed with the whole Abbeonmian line, and Violet and her sisters saw nothing but a tempest of darting sabres, clashing carbines and pistols and a storm of lances crossing one another while the wild tumult was something terrible.

Three times the line of the enemy was cut up and thrown into confusion and three times the overwhelming Glandelinian soldiery came crashing upon the Abbeonmians, who proved themselves to be expert at the sword, and downed the Glandelinians by the hundred. The Mc-Hollensteinians fought with a raging ferocity that was savage and cruel, but for a time despite their tremendous numbers they could make no headways, and breaking from the melee, the christian cavalry continued its retreat for about one quarter of a mile and then wheeling closed with the Glandelinians with redoubled fury, and the slaughter on both sides was terrible. It was no skirmish, it was simply a terrific battle between two great cavalry forces, and both as fierce fighters as the other.

In this desperate struggle for the possession of violet and her sisters, where thousands of horsemen with their horses were working together each exchanging deadly blows, and each shooting at one another, and felling each other in every possible manner and every voice raised to its highest tone, in shrill yells, and hark, and curson, there were rapid successions of feats and incidents that would astonish and amaze and horrify, far beyond the conception of any one who has not had the singular good luck to witness the cavalry conflict.

In these individual struggles among the two cavalry forces every mode was used that could be devised to oppose the progress of the adversary, and amid all the various scuffles the fighters even came to fistfights, and those dismounted by the deaths of their horses, actually leaped over each others heads, and darted behind their adversaries legs, tripping and throwing, and fairly settling it among themselves, and such a confused mass of desperate fighters was rushing together again and again and clashing their sabres together, or flinging and stabbing with their long lances, and firing point blank that it was without a possibility that a man could at times hardly see each other for the dust that they raised. Violet and her sisters were indeed surrounded by the fiercely battling men, and so furious was the fighting at close quarters at times that it was a serious wonder that not a bullet struck the little girls. After fighting fiercely for quite a while and breaking the enemy's line all to pieces before the other body of Glandelinian cavalry came up to the rescue of their comrades the Abbeonmians broke away once more and swiftly courted their dash for the direction of Lady Decie, and again the overwhelming column of Glandelinian horsemen pursued wildly.

They thought that the resistance of the Abbeonmians was over, but the Abbeonmian cavalry general knew how to combat with a force overwhelming in numbers and the enemy's leaders were to be fooled again. After trying to place the distance between them and seeing that it could not be done the Abbeonmian column again wheeled around, before the pursuers were prepared for the shock, and crashed among the demoralized Glandelinians like a whirling cyclone of debris.

The Glandelinians were oh overwhelming but before the sudden and unexpected renewed attack the foremost part of the column was driven into a panic, and the Abbeonmians cut their throes their ranks shooting down their wily foes right and left, but the main column of the Glandelinian cavalry came up to the rescue and made a charge that tore its way through the whole Abbeonmian column, and so heavy was the losses in dead that the Abbeonmian cavalry had to draw back.

The general saw that if help did not come soon all would be lost for it was impossible to hold out successfully long against such overwhelming numbers. His force of Abbeonmian cavalry men could be annihilated, and then what would happen to Violet and her sisters who could not get away now at all unless the conflict was won in favor of the christians. The Abbeonmians fought fiercely as they drew backwards, but the odds were so vorably against them, and they had already lost over 3,000 men to that of the enemy's 5,578. The general decided to try and resume his retreat again, and the if possible select his swiftest men and have them dash off with the Vivian Girls. It was true they would be pursued, but there was an even chance of getting away than by remaining with the main body when so heavily assailed, and so break away again he did and resumed his retreat, but while the troops were dashing on he gave orders for a number to surround the little girls more closely and when the melee started again to dash on toward Lady Decie with the little girls. There was some hope anyway for now the town was in sight, and also the distant christian troops would hear the sound of the cavalry fight or see it anyway and come up in time to save them all. The soldiers followed out his orders, and then as the main body wheeled and faced the enemy once more and closed closed with the Glandelinians in a most desperate struggle, those guarding violet and her sisters, about five hundred in number dashed frantically on. At once a large party of nearly the same number of Glandelinians separated from the main body, to go on the chance, but was delayed somewhat by fierce opposition, but finally the pursuit was on in general.

The pursuers fired wildly at the fugitives bringing down a score, but the survivors returned the fire, and down the same same number of Glandelinians.

The fiercest part of the cavarly fight now took place while violet and her sisters were holding tight Lady Dea Decie. The Glandelinian pursuers over took the Abbieannians guarding violet and her sisters, and closed the close with the Abbieannians with the most desperate males ever known in fighting of such character before. and in which the Glandelinian lieutenants and captain were met in mid carr career by the Abbieannian captains Wheland and Glonskinon, all fighting sabre in hand with the most savage fury. The Mc-Hollensteinians were less than the Abbieannians in this part of the melee but in their rage of fighting they overwhlmed the christians and bat them back and back again, driving them well toward Lady Dea Decie, and pursue ing with utmost fury to capture the Vivian Girls and finally succeeded annihilating all of the christians who stood to their defense.

These Glandelinians had recieved no orders to kill the Vivian Girls on sight from any of the Anleys or other generals but nevertheless would have right then and there but the opa captian interfered saying:

"No not now. We'll hold them for investigation and kill them if they proved themselves to be as dangerous enemies as we feared. They were going to Lady Decie to bring the second army of Evans to his rescue and thank goodness we have frustrated that. We'll have to signal McAnley a warning about this and some of you men do it right away. Evans army must be destroyed or routed one or the other. Hurry up. We'll take these little girls along with us and send more troops to crush the opposition of the other portion of the Abbieannian cavarly."

Several of the men proceeded to obey while the rest with their fair captives rode away toward the fiercely battling lines of the enemy. It was learned by the Abbieannian general that the Vivian girls had been captured, but he was powerless to go to their aid for his losses was terrific, and he had to retreat before the overwhelming numbers in a scattering rout, help having not come, as either man had failed to reach Evans, or Lady Decie.

Some of the fi fugitives escaped the enemy and reached Evans fiercely battling lines, and reported to the first officers they met that the cavarly forces had been vanquished with almost annihilation, and that violet and her sisters had been captured. This news reached every office then directing the fiercely battling christian lines, and through some reason of the news about the capture of violet and her sisters it threw a good portion of the christian line into confusion, and a rout of the most disastrous consequences began. Officer after officer fell trying to rally the panic stricken columns, and no rout was so terrific before another the Abbieannians, and the Angelinians who were still standing ground could have almost laughed the Abbieannians sick.

Evans learned of the capture of violet and her sisters, and of the disaster within his lines, and hurried up big forces to bathe them in the path of the enemy but every effort, and precaution was unavailing, for the enemy pressed on as a ship does against a raging sea, and it was of no use, and men and horses, and artillery men were cut down in such frightful numbers that it looked as if a massacre was going on.

Amrose Fullerton's division of 5,678,000 men was thrown against the surging enemy, but was crushed to fragments, and could not stand its ground at any point, Fullerton being killed, and every regimental and brigadier commander fell. McWhithers, and Dennings divisions were put in, and shared the same fate, with the loss of their commanders, Great Heartings was annihilated when caught in bad ground Jams Costello, and Bernard Cannon was killed, and many other generals fell.

Evans was heart sick over both the disaster, and of the news of the capture of violet and her sisters. Any of his officers realizing their horrible losses begged him to fall back on Lady Decie and resume the great conflict from there. A general came dashing up and told Evans that a half of the army was broken into pieces and in full retreat northward, and that the battle was surely lost. Evans at once sent for word for all fugitives to be stopped, commanding general Ban's Bandiergome to stretch his army across the path of the fugitives, and then he ordered other divisions not in action yet to go and repel the fugitives themselves and rally them. Nearly half of the Abbieannian army had given way in all directions and a most frightful panic had set in, worse than any panic seen among the enemy at McAllister Run, or among the christians during the scenes of routs at the battle of Glorinia. Evans right grand division under Getty Mc-Hollisterine, and Lowell Drummer alone held its ground, elsewhere the rout was complete, but nevertheless it was evident that this could not hold out long either for the enemy was pressing the attack with the most frightful fury of all. Evans brought one division after another into line and placed into position to repel and rally the stream on of oncoming panic stricken fugitives, and soon the stream of fugitives came, but their rush was as irresistible as the enemy's charge, and nothing could be done as the panic spread and soon all were flowing furiously to the rear in the wildest confusion ever seen among an army of christian before. And among the Abbieannians too. Evans was apprehensive, but he saw that strict orders were made to preserve all the artillery from capture, and most of the cannons not being withdrawn to the rear was placed into position to threaten the Glandelinian pursuers, but these were readily useless and had to be withdrawn and toward evening the enemy was in possession of the whole field, and Evans was cut off entirely from Lady Decie, while reports came that a Glandelinian army having discovered the intention of the vivian girls going to Lady Decie with the cavarly escort had attacked the christian army there furiously and was driving good portions of them back also crushed and mangled.

Evans Army indeed had suffered a crushing disaster, and a bloody failure. One quarter of his army was killed wounded, or captured, all of his most reliable officers were slain or wounded, and the Vivian Girls were once again in possession of the enemy. Evans seeing the outcome, and disheartened at the irresistible fury of the enemy's wild headlong attack, finally withdrew his whole army, and withdrew it with as much order as it could feeling sure and knowing that the battle was lost, that against the wicked enemy of God had vanquished even him with great loss, and gave his army the greatest thrashing, that any christian army had ever suffered in the entire war itself.

It is true that during a second melee with a sudden appearing force of Abbieannian cavarly that violet and her sisters had succeeded in getting away and were picked up by a party of retreating christians, but their return though it comforted Evans did not lessen his feeling over the defeat, and he blasphemed the Devil and all of his angels for it.

Though he was withdrawing his army at many quarters the enemy still persisted in their attacks, and toward nine o'clock Evans himself recieved a very severe wound, and was helped to his new headquarters to which he had self selected during the halting of the main retreat. He was attended to by his physician and then he recieved the news that violet and her sisters were once more within the christian lines.

At first he did not know what to say, and was half angry, and half glad, for he blamed almost them for the disaster that had occurred, and when he they were brought before them he said kind of gently but with a meaning of his feeling in his words:

"I heard that you and your sisters were captured. Violet, is that true?" "Yes," answered violet.

"Well how did it come that you were captured, when under the escort of 10,000 cavarly men, and such good fighters?"

"We were overwhelmed by forty thousand Glandelinians," answered violet.

"The general of the cavarly realizing it was hopeless to stand before the Glandelinian cavarly who proved themselves the better fighters, sent us on ahead with five hundred men, who were attacked and annihilated by our pursuers and we were captured. If it had not been for the arrival of another body of cavarly who annihilated our captors we would have been slain. They brought us back to the lines after being pursued for four hours. We heard that you were worsted, and could not believe our eyes. We now know that the war is lost."

"Either you little girls or the general is to blame," said one of the other generals. "He and most of his men finally escaped, and had you remained with him to the last, instead of going off you would not have been captured. It he two of you are to blame, you little girls, and the general. And you all shall be held for account. Ain't that right your excellency?"

"The general shall be held for it but not the children, and don't you dare threaten them," answered Evans. "It's not their fault. It was under his obligations to not let them out of his sight a moment, and yet he rushed them off under a small escort when he saw he was being beaten. If it is true that this occurred, he shall be for forfeited of two months pay, and be handed from his command for two months also. I told him not to let them out of his sight under no conditions."

"But it was not the general's fault," said Jennie. "Had we not stayed with him during that fierce conflict, with a cloud of swords swishing about every where, and lances flying here and there like straws, and shooting going on wildly right and left we certainly would have been killed, and many narrow escapes we had during the battle too. He thought it was safer and hid us go."

But this did not soften Evans for his defeat was stinging him, and he decided to them that no excuses would save him from the consequences, and then ordered the officers to redress the wounded three, and desired the others to remain with him until their return.

3294. "Vans there is not such a thing as can't do it!" Said Angeline..

"Can't do what?" Asked Evans.....

"In this battle," Answered little Evangeline.....

"But it's already lost, and the news of your capture which spread among my lines I'm blame for it." Answered General Evans. "My whole army has been swept back, and there is no chance to rally the forces until late y to night."

"I and my sisters can rally them if you'll let us." Said Gertrude Gertrude Angeline.

"Yes and get shot." Said Evans. Generals by the score have tried to rally them, and are already killed or wounded, for the enemy generally pick off those who try to rally the Christians. So you would face the same danger. I've even tried to rally them, and could not do it. If I expect to resume the conflict, or expect any success I'll have to wait until tomorrow, when I can get my armies reorganized.....

"I believe you are spoiling us Evans dear." Said Hettie. "If it was a man you would send him to rally the army and face the enemy whether he wanted to or not, or whether he was afraid or not. But us you are simply afraid to leave our out of your sight. We could rally them easily, and not get in the enemy's way either. Go on Evans say the word. Permit it before it is too late."

Ev Evans felt that it was true that he was too much afraid of their safety and wondering a little finally said:

"Yes I guess it's true. If the retreating men see you they will realize you little girls are safe and not in the hands of the enemy, and you can easily rally them. So go and make the try but for God's sake keep out of range of the damn guns of the enemy. Your experiences at Brimmo teaches me a lesson and I don't want nothing like that to happen again."

The little girls waited long enough for their other sisters to return, and then off they dashed for the region where the battle was raging. Fortunately for them the troops were not retreating any more, and the sight of them coming so suddenly at first surprised the soldiers, but realizing they were safe they spread the news quickly and within an hour the whole army learned that the Vivian girls had escaped from the enemy, and several of them quickly brought them back to Evans. The army had been partially rallied by the officers before the knowledge of the return of the little girls had been known the officers having said over and over again:

"The Vivian Girls are captured it is true, but if the enemy has them we shall show the assassins that we can commit horrible slaughter too. If the little girls do not return butcher all your prisoners."

So by the time the little girls had started forward to do the work which would have been perilous indeed they had found three quarters of the army already rallied, and were standing their ground against the repeated attacks of the foe. When the little girls returned they gladdened Evans by the good tidings of the rally, but then he feared and probably knew for sure that all hopes to win the battle and capture Hon Catherine was out of the question, for his army had suffered a disastrous defeat in the beginning. His only hope was to make a fierce and more desperate stand the next day and save his army from destruction. Then when he had succeeded in holding the raging enemy at bay he would then retreat out of the way of disaster and resume his advance when opportunity again presented itself.

He also wondered whether the report of the disaster to his army at Lady Decie was true itself, and placing General Dargwinia Greenburg in main command of the army, he went himself to find out, taking a force of men with him, and allowing the Vivian girls to come along as they longed for adventure, and feared the enemy no more than a lump of candy.

Evans had with him a large force of cavalry, and a extra force of dragoons numbering fairly 500,000 men on the fleetest horses, and armed like the most desperate of pirates. Let the Mc-Hollestonians come and make an attack if they dared.

UNDER A HOT FIRE, GENERAL EVANS TURNS UP A BRIDGE.

As Evans was nearing the region of Catherine Dennie near Lady Decie he unexpectedly came upon a large camp of the enemy in the darkness, had a severe brush with the enemy, and was forced to retreat toward the Easter Starring river across of which there spanned a long and powerful steel bridge bigger and longer than even the Brooklyn at New York and worth over ninety trillion dollars.

The great bridge was fully in the centre of the Glandelinian camp at that, and the Glandelinians were specially watchful to guard against surprise, for there was no telling when a raiding party of Christians would come around and destroy the bridge, and they feared also that lest their Christian foes should destroy the bridge, it would cut off their own part of Manley's left wing, and cause a turn in the events of the great struggle still going on at Lion. Catherine. DE. A. BE BOER HERESTFORD. The bridge lay under the guard of a series of well fortified Glandelinian batteries, with a whole regiment of troops ready at a moment's notice to turn out and defend it. The guns of the protecting batteries were always kept clear for action and the bridge was also protected by a series of abatis, of which last defense the Abbeismians knew nothing. After having escaped the Glandelinians whom they had engaged with in the main outskirts of the camp with the loss of nearly 78,000 men in killed and wounded Evans and the others kept on up stream stream with the utmost caution, and by good luck passed unnoticed a series of Glandelinian lookouts below the bridges.

Evans foremost portion of the force galloped across the bridge, and seeing the Abbeismians coming the first regiment opened a withering fire, but the Abbeismians recovering from their surprise galloped on, the foremost of the ranks returning the fire, and then the soldiers on the opposite shore opened fire at the Christians, and some of the cannons began to roar. The rifle balls were singing around Evans and Violet and her sisters, but they continued the dash across the bridge, though Evans men fell by scores, then he heard the bustle of the men around the other side of the camp, and the noise of more great guns as they were got ready.

Everywhere the Glandelinians were running up, and scores of Mc-Hollestonian soldiers were swarming down from seemingly every where to aid in repelling the Christians and prevent them from crossing the bridge, which they thought was unusual, to think of a Christian force to dare cross a bridge in the face of many guns, and right in the heart of their own camp. The flash of thousands upon thousands of muskets made a scene like so many bright fireflies, unobscuring the darkness, and the droning bullets always came thicker through the dark night, and sixteen shells swept the foremost of the Abbeismian ranks, and the bridge was already covered with thousands of dead and dying. Evans still sat upright on his horses back guiding and controlling the troops by voice and signal, and saw to it that the Vivian girls were well protected.

Despite the desperation of the melee the Abbeismians gradually got across and upon Evans orders three of the men had gotten under the great bridge and setting a huge mine under the structural structure left the mine and instantly exploded it by shooting it with bullets and just as a pathling run on a raft in the stream was fired point blank at them not ten yards off and still failed to hit them.

Where one quarter of the bridge was there came an eruption of debris and smoke and water, and then one after another came more wreckage and smoke eruptions and down tumbled the whole bridge, with the thousands of dead and wounded on it. The raft was fired at accidentally by one of its own covering guns and sank simultaneously, and thousands of the well Glandelinians who had been on the bridge were for their lives, many of them sinking or being captured by the Abbeismians.

Evans continued on in his retreat having lost heavily in men and horses, and a large force of Glandelinians started in pursuit. How many of them there was Evans could not make out but nevertheless he had to keep his force from another serious encirclement at all cost, if he was ever to reach Lady Decie. The storming fire of the pursuing enemy was awful but nevertheless he and his men bent their wits about them, and soon managed to out run the Glandelinians, who had to fall back as they saw they could not overtake their enemies. In the pitch darkness Evans could not have no idea where he was, nor could Violet and her sisters who were now close beside him, and when sweating from their exertions, and their horses too exhausted to run another foot they finally reached Onion River, and halted but a few hundred feet below a gun battery of the enemy. For a whole hour unconsciously they remained within easy musket shot of where their foes were still swarming about the region, and for a time so intense was the darkness, darkness, that they hardly dared move.

Then the column of Abbeismians managed to slip unobserved into a dense swamp, and near another camp of Glandelinian soldiers they saw a long pontoon bridge crossing the Onion River, and with equal stealth and daring they managed to steel across in the face of the enemy, and then blew up the pontoon bridge just as the Glandelinians having seen them by means of light started in pursuit only to be halted by the ruined bridge, as the river was impassable at this point.

3296 But Evans Evans was a long distance from Lady Decie as yet, and as the night was darker on account of the sky being covered with heavy rain clouds the troopers could hardly see a foot ahead of them. Evans felt that he would give anything if the clouds would only clear up so that the stars could afford a little light. He did not know which way he was going, not, and his army had been traveling for some distance further on, when a long line of tents suddenly loomed out of the darkness, and he halted his men and fearing they were Abbieannians, and knowing the command the christian soldiers had received in case they heard any one moving toward their camp from an unexpected direction, said to violet and her sisters;

"Cheer the christian cause as loudly as you can."

Violet and her sisters did so fairly screaming the cry.

At once there was a rush of feet, a mass of moving forms swarming everywhere, and then camp fires flared up suddenly, and exposed to them all a vast camp of Tripolygonidians.

"It's Evans and the Vivian Girls as I live." Cried the officer in charge of this part of the camp. "Has there been anything wrong?" He asked as the troopers were led within the lines.

"Yes I was worsted to day at Hon Catherine, and heard that my army was cut off from yours." Said Evans. "I sent a messenger to bring on this army but it he never reached here. I had also sent the little girls under escort of 10,000 soldiers but they could not get here even with that many, the enemy seeing to it that they did not, and they were captured, though how they escaped it is hard to tell. I heard your army was routed during a sanguinary conflict here during the day. Is that so?"

"Routed?" Said the leader with a quical expression. "Routed and whipped by the enemy! Why general you must have received a false report. We did not even know a battle was raging, and we did not as much as have to fire a single shot all day. We heard the queer noise at Hon Catherine all day long, but did not think a battle was raging."

"It was fearful." Said violet. "And Evans was worsted. He hopes however to resume the battle to morrow, and if you will but advance your army to night we'll be happy. We don't believe now that the battle could ever be won, but without your support Evans cannot hold on without meeting destruction to his army and we got to do something to prevent it was occurring."

"I'll start the advance immediately." Answered the leader. "How far is Hon Catherine?"

"My army is about thirty miles north of it." Said Evans. "I was closer during the battle, and got driven back that far. Your army has a march of about ten miles I think. If you advance them in series bodies I think you can concentrate it upon my whole line of assailants as quick as needed. The battle is still raging, but my men have rallied somewhat, and Greenburg has taken my place until I return."

"It's up to you to lead the advance though." Begged Violet as the Tripolygonidian general went off to give the command.

"I am going to." Answered Evans. "And it's going to be a forced march too."

It took some time however for the great second army to get ready, and it was not until nine o'clock that night before the advance was started.

The cavarly forces took up their position in the rear, while the dragons took up as the advance guard, and general Evans and violet and her sisters went along with the van guard. The advance was swift enough, but the enemy in the meantime had learned well enough the reason of the destruction of the bridge, and the appearance of the Abbieannian cavarly, and where they had been headed for, and so every step of the way the Abbieannians met fierce and terrific resistance, and a regular advancing battle moved on from Lady Decie. However unable to see properly in the dark, and not knowing how strong the army of Abbieannians were that was advancing, the Glanlelinian troops did not dare make a general onslaught, but while they retreated they kept up an incessant withering fire every step of the way, and the whole region blazed with the flashes of musketry like blast furnaces, and the clattering uproar was terrible.

At the commencement of the enemy's receding fire, violet and her sisters had retired to better cover among the advancing troops, and saw all the flashes in the distance, million of them, and it put them in mind of so many giant fire flies flashing and vanishing swiftly through the dense darkness, only to reappear again, and when ever many muskets went off in a bunch it appeared like the will-o-the-wisp.

Evans saw indeed that though the Glanlelinians at this location were were retreating, he was nevertheless meeting the strongest resistance, and did not know whether it was wise to push on or not, for he feared they would bring up the whole army, and cause serious trouble at a place where where it was not exactly wanted.

Evans decided to halt his advance for a while, but violet and her sisters realized that this was just what the enemy wanted so that they could crush his second force before he could advance to the rescue of the other, and they earnestly warned him not to halt but to press his advance all the harder, and not stop a moment. Violet and her sisters and Evans himself had been counselled by many of the under officers to go to a better position of the advancing columns, for the receding fire of the enemy had become more and more stronger in intensity, and despite the darkness, men were falling by thousands all along the line.

It was also raining now, but by means of compasses Evans generals knew which way to go and soon a portion of Evans army had gone quite around and came down on the flank of the opposing Glanlelinians, and making a wild and roaring charge, fairly cut down their ranks by the score, and scattering the survivors in a total rout.

This left for Evans a way to be open, and they got clear past the enemy's resisting line, and soon were being aided by others, for now they were coming upon the main army which had been formerly driven back. The battle which had advanced from Lady Decie that night to the other christian army had lasted fully four hours, beginning at nine o'clock and ending a little after twelve. It was midnight, and the battle had also continued to rage along Greenburg's lines, but only in a desultory fashion as in the darkness the enemy could not make direct attacks, and it had been mostly severe long range firing, with cannons and musketry.

As soon as Evans ret turned Greenburg was hastily relieved, and Evans took command of the whole entire army, and immediately prepared for another general battle.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN
CONTINUATION OF THE FIGHTING AT THE "MANNY'S" ARMY IS CRUSHED AGAIN. THE DEATH OF THE CAPTAIN OF GENDARMES "MANNY".....

"MANNY" had heard of the arrival of reinforcements for the army under the command of general Jack Ambrose Evans, and so as soon as the faintest signs of daylight came, started the battle anew, and hurled the most tremendous onslaught against Evans' whole line. Violet and her sisters had witnessed this wild and tremendous assault of the enemy, and within an hour's time the scene they witnessed along their own point of view was horrible and shocking, beyond description. More than 10,000,000 Glandelinians lay in front of the christian works which had been defended so fiercely for that whole hour by the terrible Abbeasians, and on the sides of a rise of ground they also lay thickly strewn, and despite it all it was amazing to violet and her sisters indeed to see the enemy despite their horrible losses, to continue the most desperate assault of the battle the Abbeasian artillery men handling their guns in the most splendid manner, and as Baldwin cooperated with energy, he managed to strengthen the rallying christian column who had recently been driven into a confusion by this wild sort of assault, and also managed to direct the most destructive fire of all his own guns, not only with great skill and bravery, but with such good effect that the enemy was held at bay along his own lines.

The front of the attacking glandelinian waves was horribly torn by the tempest of shells, and canister, and so terribly had the column of assailants along Baldwin's lines suffered that when they attacked again in a petty manner their losses were increased so fearfully that they began to waver, and fall back, but nevertheless Baldwin did not allow a counter charge, as he did not think it prudent to do so as yet.

Along other portions of the firing line the Glandelinians made a simultaneous rush of the wildest fury of demons million fold, and screaming and yelling like thrills of tortured souls and demons together, and making a roar as if all of hell, and the end of the world was appearing at the same time closed with the christian army under general Brunelaw and the demoralized christian divisions at that point was driven back with heavy loss, but an immense gap was made in the enemy's line, the broken christian divisions were soon restored by reinforcements, which Evans brought up from his extreme right, and for a time the enemy were held at bay, though Brunelaw hurried for the assistance of more artillery, declaring that he was still hard pressed.

The struggle was now more desperate, onstant and merciless than the two days before. All along the line at other portions the enemy had pressed to the attack with the most terrible fury, and though checked at some points, managed at others to leap over the works in possession of the Abbeasians, and for a time possess themselves of the intrenchments, their advance and attack at this section being somewhat more restless, and going on they finally reached a second line of works held by a portion of Glandelinians men and who having by this time discovered the disaster to his first line of works, threw forward his main forces, and gave stern resistance, and wave after wave of the glandelinians were raked through and through by the terrific fire along the whole Abbeasian line.

Along the point where Violet and her sisters had witnessed the terrible Glandelinian onslaught, the Mc-Hollistinians, and other glandelinians had rushed forward with great impetuosity, and though by counter charging several times, the Abbeasians tore big series of gaps in the gray lines, they could not check the survivors who made the most desperate and titanic efforts to drive out the Abbeasian defenders, and within a few minutes of the children, the Abbeasians were soon retreating at this point before the concentrated attack of the Glandelinian forces, who were pressing forward with irresistible force and fury, and now the attacking divisions of Glandelinians survived the sharpest fire along the other portions of the Abbeasian line.

Violet and her sisters could not make out, for broadside after broadside, of shells and as later went through their waves with the most deadly effect terrible than thunder, this and again, a portion of the enemy were every second and tearing up and pulling the whole line. Air sorted upon series of a dozen immense gaps were torn through the whole line of the attacking foe at this location, and all about Violet and her sisters who were hiding in a small cave the shot and shells shrieked in wild fury, and exploded with a deafening salvo of explosions, the minutes passing, and whistling like a furious whirlwind windblast, as they picked Abbeasian soldiers within sight of them by the hundred fold per minute. Violet and her sisters seeing how furiously the attacking foe were advancing, now realized that the problem of the battle was really going to be an Abbeasian defeat, and even now a little more and the Glandelinians would succeed in driving the christians from their works. The carnage indeed was appalling.

The glandelinians came surging on with the most frightful yells, and went over the works within the sight of the little girls, and as the main gray line appeared through the thick smoke and closed with the christian line the scene of hand to hand fighting, was sublime and in twenty minutes nearly two million Glandelinians were either killed, or wounded. All the efforts of the foe to sweep the christian lines back right and left was for a time failing however, their own ranks were going down by the hundred, men were being picked off as fast as they rushed on all along the line, and as the carnage steadily increased as more swarmed to the assault, and as the struggle became most pertinacious, the enemy's generals led forward thousands after thousands of battalions, at once being determined at all hazards to capture the works and drive back the furious defenders.

At all points the Glandelinians being heavily reinforced was redoubting their exertions, and though their foremost columns were withered away as fast as they swarmed before the cannons, the survivors continued the assault, and so fierce was the discharge of musketry on both sides, that the smoke became terribly dense, and for a time it greatly hindered the aim of the Abbeasian riflemen, and seeming to be relieved of the pressure of the assault they slackened their firing, and the foe seeing that they could not drive back the Abbeasians by dashes and wild charges, crawled forward under cover of the smoke, and reaching the works, suddenly raised a storm of horrible bloodcurdling yells, that was universal, and charging furiously, and valiantly up to the very muzzles of the guns swarmed among the Abbeasians, firing right and left, mowing mowing down the red coats as fast as they made at them, clubbing their muskets, like wild men, and using them as baseball bats, the glandelinian indeed in the fight at close quarters, being so overwhelming, at this point that they had the best advantage of the Abbeasians, and made horrible use of their bayonets, and pikes, and the immense column of assailants which had already occupied the works, partly swung around, and took a portion of the Abbeasian line on the flank. Abbeasians and Glandelinians went down by the score of thousands before the bayonets and clubbed musket butte butts, and still more faster, before shots of muskets at close range, all of the artillery horses of the Abbeasians, and all the gunners were cut down and now there was not a single christian officer in sight all having fallen in that needless inferno.

A hundred and fifty generals had fallen, and now as the Glandelinians seemed to have full sway and as the whole line of positions for thirty miles was fairly choked with Glandelinian troops, the Abbeasians having swiftly given way, and as an overwhelming force of Osmanian Kurds under Ismer Nylats was pressing forward like a roaring cyclone that annihilates all before it, a large section of batteries, under Brunelaw Bavarian Zimmermann, and Augustine St Calrie was quickly brought up to a slight rise of ground in the rear, unharmed as quickly as possible. The massive column of Glandelinians thirty miles long was pressing forward, the guns opened at close quarters with double charges of canister, being fired again and again, and though the line of the foe was was fairly torn to innumerable pieces, until only large groups were advancing or recoiling, all the artillery men had fallen.

Yet with frightful slaughter that it too terrible to describe the Glandelinian assault had been frightfully repulsed, with dismissal of the assailants, and as the slight calm came fresh gunners took the places of those who had fallen mowing the retreating enemy down in masses in every direction.

The first desperate assault had raged at white heat, the enemy's line along the whole of Evans' front having been torn to pieces, and cut down, the artillery and musketry all along the line ploughing their line of the foe through and through, the Abbeasians having stuck to their position this time like all the foul fiends of hell, and leeches, and seven hundred pieces of artillery along the Abbeasian center lay unworked with their muzzles protruding over the works, cut and hacked by the frightful storm of bullets, and the horses belonging to all these guns lay near by riddled by bullets and splashed to fragments. Hundreds of thousands of the dead and wounded Abbieannians had been torn to pieces, sliced and cut up in the same manner as butchered children by the furious storm of fire along the enemy line during the mass attack. During the full Greenwald Division had come up to the support of the Abbieannians, preparing to go into fierce and bloody action. The Abbieannians were bringing up more artillery and after a lull of about an hour the attack of the foe started again, and now Abyssinilian forces rushed deep into the fierce and bloody action, which now increased with more terrific fury, the Abbieannians themselves closing their shattered ranks, and settling down to their task. The first, second, and third divisions of the Glandelinian assailants were cut to pieces, but the losses of the Glandelinians was frightful.

Manley had worsted Evans in the long and bloody action at Hon Catherine, but at such frightful and unspeakable losses that he could not stand it any more, and what remained of his once vast Glandelinian army had already concentrated at this point and having planted their torn and tattered flags on the once abandoned works, where they had stayed until shot to pieces like in a man's hand battle before by the storm of bullets. Truly the battle was a complete victory for the enemy, and Evans had to acknowledge that he was severely beaten, but nevertheless Manley's army had been crushed, by his losses, and despite his victory, great as it was the war to the cause of Glandelinia was lost, for it was only a success that enabled Manley's army to escape the destruction that threatened it.

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS IN A BRUSH WITH MANLEY AND SEVERAL OF HIS GENERALS KILL HIM AND FOURTEEN OTHERS THE REASON WHY."

When the battle had ceased in the morning, and while Evans was withdrawing from his positions at Hon Catherine, Violet and her sisters happened to be in the rear of the retreating Christians, and saw a horde of graces pursuing a n Abbieannian priest, who was trying to escape with the Blessed Sacrament in his hand. Violet and her sisters were horrified, and for getting their own danger, returned to the defense of the priest without any support of soldiers. Manley and thirteen generals was with these trouble makers, and the Glandelinians had gained on the fugitive priest, and tore him to pieces with their bayonets. They grabbed the Blessed Sacrament out of the dead man's hand and scattered the contents all around, and trampled on them as cursed and blasphemed in the most vilest manner, and did other vilest things. Violet and her sisters had been too late, to save the priest, but in a rage they opened fire on the Glandelinians and deliberately shot ten of them down dead.

Some consternation arose among the survivors, but Manley seeing who had fired at his men, rushed upon the little girls with a wild curse, and struck poor little Jennie down from her horse with a terrible blow of his sabre, wounding her severely and dangerously.

He turned to rush Violet but she swept aside, and struck him a blow in the eye with her pistol butt crying;

"Take that you rascal and enemy of God John Manley. I hate you you abuser of our Lord."

Blinded by rage he rushed Catherine to strike her down with his sword just as other officers were coming up. Catherine avoided him, by a full rush and put a bullet neatly between Manley's eyes. He fell from his horse dead, having been killed instantly. Realizing what she had done, she quickly with the help of Joice lifted bleeding little Jennie on her horse and started to dash away when another of the officers rushed them. He came right up with Jennie and struck at her a sweeping blow with the keen edge of his sabre. Thank God the blow missed, and she deliberately shot him in the heart, and as three others dashed at them, the little girls also opened fire moving the three down, and eight others who rushed at them.

Two other generals rushed upon the little girls firing their pistols point blank, and though Joice was severely wounded in the hip by a bullet she remained on her horse, and alone brought these two generals down mortally wounded. Then in the confusion they dashed away, as fast as their horses could go, and the Glandelinian soldiers pursued with indescribable wildness, firing insanely to shoot them down, but missed, and before they could overtake the little girls, a party of Abbieannians having seen the commotion had returned and smothered the Glandelinians with their own sabres massacring every one of the pursuers, and capturing general Germania

Vivian who was among the pursuers, treating him as roughly as a dog treats a cat. A perfect host of Glandelinians seeing the commotion came upon the scene, and charged upon the Abbieannians, but Evans along having seen the whole occurrence, put in his own forces, and cutting the Glandelinians to pieces, withdrew the others safely within his own lines. He did not however realize what Violet and her sisters had done, and so asked them here after to be careful and not linger so far behind the lines. Germania was brought before Evans, but Evans would not see him, and demanded the men to go. "Get out with your damn old Prisoner" and retired a enraged and disconsolate to his new headquarters, and seeing to it by directions that his lines should be strenght strengthened in case the enemy renew the battle.

The whole Glandelinian army was disconcerted when the it, learned that Manley and fourteen general officers, had been killed by Violet and her sisters, and so great was the disorder that it could not be described, and general Innocence who took his place to command the army, at once withdrew southward, and Evans learning of it wondered why. Two days later when he was preparing to move his army cautiously forward, one of his generals came up to him, and said as the doctor was dressing the wounded little girls, "Your excellency general Evans I have surprising news for you."

"Surprising news?" said Evans. "I bet I know what you are meaning. The enemy have retreated."

"Yes it's true the enemy have retreated, but for a very good reason." Answered the soldier. Violet and her sisters, have actually shot down Manley and fourteen of his generals."

Evans stood aghast.

"You don't mean it?" he gasped. "How does it come that you hear this?"

"We found it out through the signal stations we captured at Goomie Candorine." Answered the soldier. "A priest carrying the Holy Eucharist had been torn to pieces by a horde of Glandelinian soldiers, led by these generals, and the contents of the Chalice scattered around. Violet and her sisters shot them down for it."

"I must see the little girls." said Evans utterly confounded.

He at once started for the house, the officer following.

Evans entered with the colonel who he really was, and went into the room where the beautiful little girls were. Drawing Angeline to him and looking at her very seriously he said;

"What occurred yesterday after the battle?"

"Nothing why?" Asked Angeline not understanding the question, having forgotten the incident for the moment.

"Who was it that shot Manley and fourteen of his generals?" Asked Evans. Angeline gasped in surprise.

Then she told the whole story.

"Well if you ever." said Evans when vehemently. If you beautiful little girls were small Glandelinian sergents I would have not been any more surprised. You little girls are certainly wonders. And so it was Manley who cut Jennie down. Well it serves him right the dog of a man, and now he forfeits for his rash deed. Committing a sacrilege right within the face of my whole army. You little girls committed a deed which will astonish and paralyze the whole Abbieannian army with amazement when it is spread around. The Glandelinians I'm sure will keep the distance from you little girls hereafter I'm sure. You have proved yourselves to be regular hunters of Glandelinian elements if I have to use the words. And what will Hanson say when he hears of it?"

Jennie severely wounded as she was did not feel any way a bad about it at all and almost laughed about the experience, and her nerve was not shaken a bit. It was

"It was the most exciting clash we ever had." She said. "We saw the graces charging after the poor priest, and forgetting our own danger, or forgetting even to call for assistance, rushed to his assistance, and shot down a number of Glandelinians after they committed the sacrilege, for pure revenge over the insult to God. Then Manley first rushed me and cut me down. Wounded as I was, and though I was lying there I would have shot him myself, but he rushed between me and Catherine as he attacked her, and she killed him that very moment. We shot down many of the other generals and a large number of privates, and got away before that they could overtake us."

"And after all your prayers for his evil conversion." said Evans almost smiling.

"We done it in our defense." said Catherine. "We were sure, have slain us if we had not shot him, and the others. He went into the trouble himself. And as our prayer for him is all a mistake. It was for Johnathan Manley we were praying for and not either Johnathan or his wicked brother. We did nothing about it, but nevertheless we helped the two of us well. I wish a viper. Catherine shot Hanley right between the eyes. I saw the blood come from the hole as he fell from his horse."

Indeed the whole army are long heard about the deed alright, and there was great excitement among all of the men. And finally I realized that the vivian girls were more desperate than a tiger when assaulted, and the Glandelinians here after would have to realize it. Evans expected to see of it in placebonds which would have a probably been set up by the foe or at other times, of great delays by these fair little creatures, but there was no such writhing, and the whole nation of Glandelinia seemed to take it quietly.

But General John Johnston Jackson Hanley did not know of it yet, and when he did he was stricken with both sorrow and rage, and for a time he said nothing. It was rumored during the meanwhile that Abyssin Kile was also mobilizing her whole strength to help in suppressing the Glandelinian resistance for though the christian advance into Glandelinia had been victorious and irresistible the number of furious battles had been something terrible, and was exacting a terrible loss for both sides. Johnston Jackson Hanley who was appointed by the Glandelinian King to take his son's place declared to the ruler that it was in vain to resist the christian tide, any longer, that surely the war was lost, and that it was exacting a useless and inhuman toll of lives, which benefited him and the others nothing.

But the wicked Glandelinian king was stubborn and obstinate. He wrote back to Hanley's declaration, , , , , ,

"It seems indeed that the war is lost, but remember that we can win, and we must win, or those dirty christian dogs will end forever our old child slave trades, and probably take away our nation entirely: our son John Jackson Hanley has been assassinated by one of the Vivian Girls called Catherine Vivian, and fourteen of his general's besides. The names of the fourteen generals runs as follows: Generals Crew, Compress, Costelloes, Costelloe, Clarence, Norton, Cook, Chamberlaine, Costelloe, Consoe, Cooper Bicknell, Carlton, Lieberman, Callindia, Cantlin, and Cantlene. It is your loss and it is your duty to revenge your loss by upholding the country's cause to the very last, and show the christian dogs, that you can revenge the fall of your son. And I myself will give to you or any of the generals, or privates, the greatest sum of money probable for the destruction of those little vipers, of the christian armies.

THE END"

Evans in the meanwhile was advancing forward toward the vicinity of Bristle Toe station, and four days later after the last crushing battle he received a large army of Abyssinians. Evans was more confident, over the situation was now clear that he had lost the battle of Hon Catherine's, for his defeat was a severe blow to the enemy and not himself. Had he won all probabilities to capture the city of Hon Catherine would have been out of the question and the victory of John Hanley's army, made the Glandelinian armies at Bristle Toe station less cautious, and Evans realizing from evident facts that Hanson himself had fought fiercely at Bristle Toe Station at the same time the battle of Hon Catherine was raging, and that again Hanson from disasters happening to his army had failed decided to do the work himself and force the enemy out of the region himself, if he had to blow the whole Glandelinian army into hell to do so.

All this while Evans had not paid any attention to the prisoner Germania Vivian, and had forgotten her altogether. Violet and her sisters had seen his capture, and decided to find out if they could see the little Glandelinian general, and find out if he would change.

In asking the guard however, they got the answer that Evans forbade any one no matter who it was to go near the prisoner, and so they went to consult Evans on the matter. They told him about their attempted visit, and Evans said:

"By heavens I have forgotten all about that prisoner. You little girls will have all the opportunity to see in yourselves to night when we make halt in our advance. I wish to see the rascal myself, and settle matters with him for good and all. I have not forgotten that Brigano affair."

That evening the halt of the whole christian army was made, and Evans gave orders that the prisoner was to be brought before him. He waited for fully fourteen minutes before the prisoner came, escorted by over twenty men.

"He's a devil." Said one of the guards. "He gave us resistance when we summoned him to come out of the prison camp, but we got him to submit though it took twenty of us men to do it."

"He won't change a bit." Said Evans with a scornful laugh. "Well Germania Dear I see we meet again. How about that Brigano affair? Do you still remember it or have you forgotten it?"

The prisoner was silent. "Where is Violet and her sisters?" Asked Evans of one of the orderlies. "They are outside watching a swarm of Balgiglovesean serpents flying high in the air." He answered. "Bring them in." Ordered Evans. "They wish to see their wicked brother Germania Vivian, and I guess their wish shall be granted."

"I don't wish to see them." Retorted the captured Glandelinian general sullenly.

"I know you don't want to see them." Answered Evans. "But I'm not disposed to grant any favors to you and so don't mention anything on the subject again or I'll haul you around like a football. Mr Vivian. I shall have the little girls come to see you, not of your wish, but of theirs." In a few minutes the orderlies came back and in with him came the pretty little girls. They saw him standing there with a sullen look in his face and eyes, and then Violet said:

"You are a prisoner in the hands of the Abbsianians Germania and if you will listen to reason you'll become a better man, and regret the deeds you done for us. We speak to you not for our own sakes, but for yours because you are our brother. And you will I know surely reason with yourself if you know the nature of the Abbsianians. They all know what we suffered at Brigano, and it is lucky you are your capture is not as yet known. We refused to allow the Abbsianians who captured you spread the news among their comrades, and if they had disobeyed us, you would have been cut down like a dog by a raving mob. But no one can shield you any longer, and if you don't listen to reason you'll surely regret it."

"To hell with all the Abbsianians." Hissed Germania. "Let them dare attack me if they will. I defy them and all in heaven."

"You may think you do but you will soon find out." Said Evans. "And if you utter any more blasphemies I'll run you through with my sword. Order lie, summon general Greenburg right away."

"Yes sir." Answered the orderly, and he went to do his bidding. There was a wait of fully fifteen minutes, and during the waiting Germania was about to sit down when Evans cried out:

"Keep at attention. You cannot sit down in my presence, you dirty cur of hell. I'll let all the Abbsianians know you are a prisoner within my lines. Then see if you will defy them. Your lot for punishment is in the island prisons if they don't tear you to pieces."

The great new general soon appeared, and Evans said to him:

"General do you recognize this man, this prisoner?"

The general looked closely and then said:

"It is the first time I have ever seen him your excellency. That is face to face."

"But do you know him anyway?"

"Yes it's Germania Vivian, the Glandelinian dog who attempted to assassinate my own children at Phantonburg, and who had been driven off by a party of Abbsianian in time. He also injured Violet and her sisters severely during the frightful battle of Brigano."

"Well." Said Evans. "The Abbsianians are at all ignorant of his capture, and I summoned you to come and take these orders from me:

"Tele. Telegraph to every general in my command to notify their men of the capture of this dog, and then to come to me in person, and have a look at him. I thought his capture, and long confinement on how bread and too cold water would have changed the rascal but I think indeed that he is past repentance. So I don't intend to keep him much longer. I wish to get rid of him, and the sooner the better. And I'll be damned if he'll get a trial. Here's enough evidence against him to fill a world of books. All the massacres of children was on account of his poison words. And I will see him dearly for it."

Evans after giving the order looked at Violet and her sisters expecting them to protest, but they did not move an inch, or even say a word. "Wait a moment general." Evans said; and then turning to the little girls he asked:

"Did you little girls not hear me give the order? What do you say?"

"As long as he does not care to listen to reason why ask us a foolish question." Answered Angelina. "The sooner the Abbeismians know how a prisoner the better. It's better he be punished as he deserves than to remain at large and cause us more trouble. We forgive him, and really feel it, because he is our brother, and would give a million toothaches to our Lord if he repented, but if he does not why let the Abbeismians come on. If General Greenburg does not spread the news about his capture we will."

Greenburg went to follow his orders, and while he was gone Germania Vivian was attended to, being confined within the building, until the results of his wounds were really looked into. When the Abbeismian army toward evening were conscious of the capture of general Germania Vivian, which they had learned through the recitation of their general and other officers, their excitement knew no bounds, and they were wild with joy and enthusiasm. The general officers, who had been summoned by Evans came, and while Evans had been waiting for the arrival of these generals he telegraphed this to general Hanson, and also to his brother general Vivian, and also to the brothers of Violet and her sisters, ///

"I have to report that the wicked Glandelinian general Germania Vivian has been captured by a party of Abbeismians during the battle of Hon Catherine. Manley and fourteen others of his wicked generals, had pursued a priest carrying the Blessed Sacrament, and whom he killed, and the Vivian girls going to the rescue of the Holy Eucharist, had been furiously assailed by Manley, whom they killed themselves, and the fourteen generals besides a number of privates. It would have gone hard with the dear little girls nevertheless if it had not been for the arrival of a party of Abbeismians who had went to their rescue, and who captured Germania Vivian. His offenses have been so serious that we do not know what to do in punishing him. Whether put him to death, or place him in the Island Prisons. He caused the Vivian girls serious injuries at Brigano."

GENERAL JAC EVANS."

Evans had been somewhat overcautious over the capture of his prisoner, and so had delayed his advance for about two days. He had received news that a new force of Glandelinians under Martineau was advancing to repel him, and prevent him from moving his armies, upon the others situated at Bristol Toe Station. It was too late for Evans to ever attempt to press his advance, which he soon saw. After two days stopping in his advance, Evans in going out on a scouting tour, found a vast Glandelinian army, confronting him, and managed to force out of some farmers, the prediction of whom the leader or general was. They told him but did not know how strong the Glandelinian army was, but Evans soon found out himself by making a dashing raid, and seizing a lot of prisoners who confessed that the Glandelinian army confronting him was ten to his one. To engage such a force of Glandelinians, who were all Mac-Hollatinians, and Zircosmians, was folly, and Evans decided to fall back further to a new position, on the Starring Run creek. It took a long time to follow out this movement, and during the movement, a portion of the enemy's division under Backerrank struck general Belfast Pavaras right wing a terrible blow, and would have carried all before it, if Evans had not learned of the sudden disaster and threw his forces forward to repel the attack made at this quarter. The slaughter raged for four hours, the Glandelinians making a violent and most tremendous onslaught, but though unable to stop the attack as he desired, Evans managed to withdraw the shattered columns to cover, and presented his full battery of artillery upon the attackers, which finally made them hesitate, and fall back. As this conflict happened near a town called Gooseland it generally got the name of the battle.

Later in the day the enemy resumed the assault with tenfold fury, and for a time drove all before it amid infernal slaughter. Destruction and desolation was everywhere, and the poor heroic blood of many hundreds of thousands of Abbeismians striving vainly to stand their ground against this superhuman onslaught, witnessed the battlefield of this terrible struggle, and Evans throwing forward three of his main grand divisions, managed to meet the desperate assault, sending a fire of musketry upon the enemy with such intensity as to cause all those who had reached the foremost Christian lines, to run back and seek shelter, and amid the sharp rattle and high explosives that burst in all directions the Glandelinian ranks resumed the desperate charge once more, and amid infinite all the Christian defenders, had as none of the Abbeismian artillery began to belch forth and soon the whole Abbeismian line which still stood its ground was broken down at the attacking foe. Wave after wave of the enemy under cover of their own gun fire, rapidly advanced over the broken ground, now rushing forward, with frightful speed, now dropping down to the ground to fire volleys, then forward again, now disappearing into ravines and gullies, and lanes only to reappear a moment later. It was frightful to watch them, rushing headlong into the very mouths of the Abbeismian cannon. At last, all of a sudden the Abbeismian gunners opened fire, and thousands of popping holes were torn in the attacking waves, but on they came wave upon wave, with irresistible force, the defending Abbeismians became fewer and fewer, and finally the few survivors fell mortally wounded before the tree trenches and after the Glandelinian waves had passed on successfully, all one endless stretch of dead and dying as far as the eye could see was revealed.

Thousands of machine guns defending the second line of works, hissed, the millions of blazing rifles spitted and cracked, with a deafening roar and the enemy's artillery broke forth with redoubled fury. The awful canopy smoke of battle rolled on in thick belching clouds, explosions were every where in deafening volleys, but on and on the Glandelinians drove, thousands falling wounded or dead but there was no ceasing. Over that tree less, grassless expanse carpeted with the scattered limbs of heroes and his flushed crimson with their blood they rush on.

Again the battle was won, again the enemy went all before them, and by night fall Evans had to withdraw swiftly and on the morrow most of his army was retreating northward before overwhelming forces. In meeting his two disasters, his defeat at Hon Catherine, and at Gooseland, Evans' army was badly broken up, and now again it seemed possible that the enemy would reverse the tide, and haul back the Christian armies from their native land and win the wickedest cause ever known. Evans did not intend to halt his armies for fear of another disastrous attack, and so he continued the retreat, but saw to it that the Vivian girls were well protected.

Evans had heard too that general Hanson, during the same time the battle of Hon Catherine had been raging, had made a fierce and most desperate attempt to cut his way through the enemy's lines, at Bristol Toe Station, and that he had failed at every hand. It was generally called the battle of Shoehorn Borronda, and it was one of the bloodiest battles of the war. For forty eight hours, the two opposing armies, not small portions but the two main armies, had surged back and forth in titan throes, charges followed each other in endless succession, and scores of regiments had been wiped out by losses every hour. Hanson would have won but he suffered the mutilation of his right grand division during the height of the struggle and had to withdraw. Then following a short lull the enemy had made a most purposeful assault all along the whole line, the battle again was renewed with redoubled fury, generals fell by the score, the privates fell in whole lines forty miles long, in three hours time, cowardly horses, during desperate close quarters fighting dotted the battle field like straws blown about by a tornado, men lay still thicker, artillery was disabled by the thousand, by a fitful storm of explosions, which seemed to tear the world to pieces, and general Hanson had to retrieve a serious disaster when his main center was crushed in, and rolled up for the distance of twenty eight miles.

This had proved to Hanson Vivian that general Ineburn Manley, was really the fiercest fighter of all the wicked Glandelinian generals, despite the rank of officership, and that no Glandelinian army was harder to worse than his. Hanson threw in forty three divisions, to stem the tide of disaster along his center, these forty three divisions were rolled back amid an inferno of battle, and all of their general officers, and regimental and brigadier commanders down killed or wounded, and every regiment had their flags shot to pieces, and the poles shattered by the fierce and snarling rifle fire.

Nothing could be done to stop the great assault of the Glandelinians, and so on that bloody first day Hanson had to withdraw most of his army to the distance of thirty miles, from his former base, and the enemy followed closely upon his very heels, and for three hours that night, renewed the struggle along the Pastor Starring, and raged one of the wildest onslaught ever seen in any battle since Glandelin. On the first day itself the struggle was more terrific, and caused more heavy losses for both sides, than the two days of the battle of Francis Atlanta combined, and in no battle in the entire war afterwards was there such a number of officers slain or wounded, of so many battle flags torn to pieces, by the infernal storm.

Backward to the Christian side, had the main command of the forty three divisions and he had been been brought to death by thirty Glandelinians who were Amerindians. Hanson's losses in the first day of the battle had been unaccountably estimated and though known was not revealed for fear of discouraging the other Christian armies then invading the enemy's country.

When the battle began Hanson had been advancing his left wing across the north branch of the great and famous Easter Starbuck, and this whole wing he had hurled at once against a good portion of General Vanley's army. For a while the attack had seemed to progress to the good fortune of the Christian cause, but Vanley had known just where the assault had intended to be made, and so had made such a strong concentration, that after three hours, he had managed to push back all the whole Christian line, thus assembling his, with a greater loss than the army that suffered at Logan Zoo Race Run. This great reverse was followed by a series upon series of onslaughts on the part of the enemy until the great success had been gained by the enemy as stated before.

On the next day Hanson had put his whole army into disultory action, every division making the most fierce efforts to recover all the lost ground and positions, but without success, and again General Hanson had met with disaster. His whole line had been swept back right and left, and was crushed, before he could throw into the action his second army, and so terrific and stubborn had the unequal contest become, that at first Hanson believed it would surpass the Glorinda battle but finally it ceased with another serious Christian defeat, and Hanson felt sure that he would have to abandon his positions on the former grounds, and retreat from the location altogether. When he had heard of Evans' receding a defeat also at Non Catherine, he began to feel more discouraged but nevertheless, he also learned later on that Evans was still pressing on nevertheless, that that despite his defeat he had wrested the city of Non Catherine from the enemy, and was advancing to put Huebaum in Vanley between two fires. But now Evans was defeated again at Goodwin and was retreating even faster than Hanson had done. Finally ashamed of his retreat, Evans decided to stand at Double Cross roads, and which he did, with his whole army. When he was halting his army, the enemy menaced him at certain times, but the majority of the army fell back, and Evans felt sure that the enemy did not wish to attack, and in the night withdrew to a strong position at a stream which had a hundred and fifty small branches, and which ran into the Erminie Run river. This stream was called the Cucucumbler, hundreds. Here he awaited the enemy.

THE BATTLE OF CUCUCUMBER HUNDREDS.

But they did not attack and Evans wondered why they did not. Violet and her sisters desired to go on a spring exploit but Evans knowing that about three or four of them had been wounded and that they had not recovered as yet was not willing that they should go, and also he dreaded the consequences, for one of the little girls had killed general Vanley and there was no doubt that something would surely happen that was terrible and shocking. Of course there seemed no excitement, about Vanley's fall, for all of the Glandelinians in every army seemed cool, and quiet, even the whole nation seemed to make nothing of it, but it was just like the great calm before the cyclone. Why would the Glandelinians bear the loss of their great commander, and not revenge it in some terrible way? And was not it probable that there was something in it, that caused the Glandelinians not after all the progress the Christians had made against them to reverse the tide in three successive and terrible battles, and whenever the Christian cause again with serious disaster and defeat. And did it not seem that the Glandelinian armies were mustering all their strength to repel the invasion with all their force and fury, and to attack the Christians with redoubled fury instead of standing on the defensive, as many other invaded countries in time of war. Glandelinia was the only nation that instead of standing on the defensive, made fierce and sanguinary attacks during the invasion of the Christian armies, giving the Christian armies no time to attack when in fact they ought to have been the assailants. And this indeed filled the whole world with stupendous wonder and even apprehension, for they feared that the Glandelinians were showing such defiance, derision, and stubborn despair that they would never be overpowered, not even by all Abbiennia.

After some debating on the subject Evans came to a final decision, and said:

"I cannot permit you little girls to go out now, and it's for your own good. Catherine killed general Vanley, in that conflict, and it has made for them more sure enemies than ever before, and to go and spy on the enemy after that occurrence is like going into the uttermost depths of hell, and then expecting to find their way out alone. So let the matter drop and don't be foolish. It's God who warns me to be careful in your doings, and it is for his sake also that I tell you not to attempt it."

They accepted his advice then and said nothing more about it. Two days Evans' army lay quiet, quiet, and then Violet and her sisters who were taking a bath in a small but deep creek, saw in the distance a large column of Glandelinians moving forward toward the right of general Evans' lines. Quickly putting on their underclothes, and wrapping themselves in the remainder without waiting time to put them on they raced speedily for the Christian lines, and reaching it at once alarmed the picket guards, who caused the warning by firing five shots.

Violet and her sisters then put on the remainder of the remainder of their clothes behind a bush, while the officers having been aroused by the warning shots, quickly went out to see what was up and this is what they immediately reported to general Greenburg:

"The enemy in advancing against our right in overwhelming numbers. Bigger armies ever seen advancing before since the battles of any fury in Glandelinia. Warn Evans, and notify all generals on the list. Hurry as any moment in precise. A violent attack of the most savagely description is about to be made, and the Glandelinians are all Zimmermanians, and Hohelsteinians. Artillery also being massed to support attack." Greenburg receiving the message went out to see for himself and observing that it was true, signaled the warning to all the general officers, and saw to it that all the artillery of the right wing was massed so as to pour a tremendous shell fire upon this overwhelming tidal wave of assailants.

By the way it looked most of the officers at first thought it was a severe demonstration but general Greenburg did not think so, and ordered that all precautions should be taken to meet the assault when it came.

Violet and her sisters having fully dressed, stayed close within view to watch the and approach if the advancing battle line of the foe, and thought that probably the whole Glandelinian army was massing itself against the right wing of general Evans' army. They felt nervous and apprehended a very over this fearful sight, and decided to seek him and tell him to look out for the foe advance seemed more threatening than they liked. So they sped off and loading some horses at once rode for general Vivian or Evans headquarters tent. They soon found him writing some orders, and they told him what they had seen. Evans at first could not hardly believe his eyes, but soon general Greenburg wrote an advice to Evans and sent it by means of a messenger, and as Evans got the message the first crash of the mighty cannons fairly shook the air. Evans realizing it was true bade the little girls to stay within his tent, and ordering the orderly to bring in the other two little girls, went to the front himself. All he could see in the distance as he rode forward was a vast field of smoke, and ordering general Calann to bring up his own artillery to support the center, he at once made for another portion of the line, but anywhere else no enemy was advancing and he wondered why.

He also wondered where general Vivian's army was, and that of general Cannon and felt that he would give anything if they were within halting distance so he could get them to take the enemy in the rear. The army he faced overwhelmed him ten to one, and it seemed too great an odds to contend with successfully and so he decided to avoid as much fighting as possible and and escape too great a loss when it was too dangerous to risk it.

He decided to send several scouting parties to locate the whereabouts of either general Vivian or Cannon, and not to come back until they found one of them. Then receiving signals that elsewhere all was quiet, he rode back to his headquarters tent, and then taking out in automobiles at once rode toward the direction of his right wing.

The enemy assault he soon found out by reports coming while he was on his way, was only desultory, and not general, and he began to think himself that it was only a demonstration to feel the strength of his army. But nevertheless he did not lose caution, and determined to rest there as quick as possible, and gave orders to every officer he saw on his way down to the right wing. The more further he went the more reports of the fighting he received, but no reports as yet proved the conflict to be anything as serious as it was feared, by the sight of the strength of the foe's lines, which he then had been advancing. The cannons had ceased firing, the enemy was receding, and the firing had been slight. Some of the officers believed also that it was only a demonstration, and so did not make much of the showy appearance, of the enemy. But as soon as he got there, Evans took in the situation. The enemy had withdrawn for the distance of a mile, all was still again, but stiller than ever, on Evans quickly observed a strange move out along the enemy lines in the distance, and suddenly saw far to the southwest, near another portion of the line which had advanced, a movement which appeared as if millions of men were running a mad race at once, and fairly striving to outstride each other, and simultaneously there burst a chorus of universal yells, that sounded simply terrific, and fairly tore their way with the din of blasphemy and shouts, screams and yells.

Realizing that something was going on Evans rode to another portion of the line, where the enemy still stood their distance, and then remarked to General Belfast:

"Have your guns ready when the moment comes." It is going to be a well prepared attack, and when it comes it will come like the avalanche of demons thrown upon us from hell. Be prepared, for I saw a portion of the enemy lines far to the west rush forward already. See the others are starting to run. Get the guns ready. Hurry."

Belfast rushed off to obey orders, while now a line of gladiators stretching as far as eye could reach, came forward, first at a slow trot, then all of a sudden at the same swift run as if they were fairly stampeding, and Evans rode first her to the rear, to take in the situation better, and saw to it that all the artillery was being brought up.

A terrible booming of big guns suddenly broke out to the west, and there increased rapidly and quickly, and suddenly following came a tremendous volume of sharp crackling reports millions in number, as if something was being hurled up inside the earth. Evans at once rode forward to view the western section of assault but everything was so a, smoke, and more smoke, and he could see nothing.

He at once, dashed back to his auto, and then dismissing the horse to an orderly set the machine a tearing for that direction. It was a long way off and soon he saw an officer rushing up on horseback with a sheet of folded paper in his hand which Evans stopping the machine took with a salute and a thank you.

"Go

"Come quick for Heavens sake. A wild assault of the most tremendous force is being made upon your main central wing. The firing is something, terrible, and though the first line of the assailants has been literally wiped out forty other lines are sweeping forward with the uproar of a thousand screaming avalanches, and the entire situation is terrible. Hurry and see the conditions, and decide what is to be done as to hold ground seems vain.

OR GENERAL, EVANS
TRUE."

"So that was the result of that first crush," I saw," said Evans.

"Here Colonel Belfast cried. "Watch for any signs of movements from other portions of the gladiatorial wave, and if something happens that looks like serious report to me. I once by wire wireless telegram believe this is going to be some battle and no mistake about it."

The excited officer rushed off to do as he was told, while Evans sent the machine full speed for that direction, and seeing a column of cavalry coming up, ordered them without stopping to go right to the center, and see if the Vivian Girls are safe. At once the cavalry went off, while to Evans there was nothing, but a whole world of booming reports, the atmosphere seemed intense from the din, and all this wild tumult the officers he passed seemed as calm as if there was nothing unusual going on.

"Ah, "

A high explosive shell exploded about forty yards in front of Evans auto and fortunately he ducked low in the car in time for a storm of shrapnel and dirt, and debris flew all about, and for a moment there was nothing but a cloud of the blindest smoke rolling all over the scene. It was a serious danger for Evans but his progress was checked in that direction for a large grating crater was left in the ground, and to go around with the machine was beyond him. Evans got out, and securing from one of the privates who had run up the fastest horse and he resumed his journey. The distant roar of the conflict was growing still more intense, and he became in a moment...

It took him nearly an hour to reach the destination, but fortunately the whole Christian line along the center had held its ground firmly, and though the assault of the enemy had not been thrown back, it was checked, but the conflict was still more fiercer, and the whole scene before his eyes seemed like a fierce forest fire. He gave orders to a cavalry force waiting near by, and ordered him to follow him. At once the whole party dashed off, and coming upon the whole Abhimanyu and Constantine cavalry, Evans ordered the whole force to follow him and with a tremendous yell of fury, the whole surge of horsemen dashed straight for the works of the Christian line. Realizing what was doing the infantry parted to let them through. Evans was leading a counter charge himself with the whole cavalry division he had picked up. The clash was terrific, and the whole column of cavalry riding forward with irresistible fury rode clear through the whole gladiatorial surge, rode back and fairly tore the line to pieces, and the wildest confusion. Scores of thousands fell in a single minute during that frightful melee, but for a time the Christian line was broken, and it seemed possible that the foe would be routed, and Evans decided to see what else could be done, to roll back the main line of assault...

In the meantime Martinique was secretly sending three quarters of his army upon General Evans right wing, while on the central line, and soon the whole right wing was assaulted by the most overwhelming numbers, and after four hours of terrible fighting swept clean from its own lines, and possibly, and so badly demoralized, that no efforts could again rally them. Evans learning of this disaster after his central line had held firm for all the day, finally withdrew his army, having again been beaten, and was disastrously killed the Evans and his in his service.

Another battle lost to the Christian cause, and Evans was driven still further north. As the Abhimanyu under General Evans was retreating, Evans had been somewhat to the rear with violet and her sisters, heard the crash of the battle, and listening this is what he heard:!!!!!!!!!!!!

John Hanley's body lies a wonderer in the pit,
John Hanley's body lies a wonderer in the pit,
John Hanley's body lies a wonderer in the pit,
His demons goes marching on.

The winds of hell are looking sadly down,
The winds of hell are looking sadly down,
The winds of hell are looking sadly down,
On the grave of old John Hanley.....

CHORUS

They were only only fooling
They were only only fooling,
They were only only fooling,
His demons goes marching on.

3.

He's gone to be a soldier in the army of the Devil,
He's gone to be a soldier in the army of the Devil,
He's gone to be a soldier in the army of the Devil,
His soul is burning on.

4.

John Hanley's guilt is loaded upon his back,
John Hanley's guilt is loaded upon his back,
John Hanley's guilt is loaded upon his back,
His soul is burning on.

Despite his resource over his defeat Evans and the little girls had to laugh when they beheld these verses but so bitter how hard they tried they could not find out who had been singing them. For four days Evans continued his retreat, and it seemed endless if the whole war was not lost.

Indeed it did seem that the Gladiolins were covering the life of the city. Evans and Hanson were not the only ones who were making progress. Reports also came in that many of the other Christian armies, in various Gladiolin were also making progress. The advance of the foe, without even being able to offer resistance, and it seemed a too all that was again the Gladiolins were coming to crush down the Christian invasion, and not only drive out the Abhennian invaders, but also carry all before them and win one of the most spectacular victories in the whole war yet.

Victory was looked for most by the Christian armies serving under generals Hanson, Vivian, and Jack Ambrose Fuller. If either these two could make any more progress, than indeed the invasion would be broken, and all of the Christian armies would be swept out of Gladiolin, worse than before during the early part of the war, and probably not a single man would reach Angelina alive at that. Gladiolin armies were gathering in terrible numbers and the Christian troops were being immediately overwhelmed. Evans himself saw the only way to avoid a continual retreat which would be disastrous, was to take a formidable and unassailable position, and so he decided to do so when the first opportunity presented itself.

But, just now to do so seemed impossible, for the victor of Gladiolin under Martineau was pressing his retreating armies hard, and finally, and gave it no more. Violet and her sisters, the women did not feel so joyous as they did at the first setting out of the invasion, and already they had themselves fairly begged Evans to do a wiser move, and that in abandon the invasion, stating, that they now surely believe that the great war would never be won, that Gladiolin was even now too strong for even Abhennian to overcome.

Evans surely did not know what to do so, he continued his retreat, northward, until he reached the final point of the Eastern Starving Gap, where the first great battle had occurred, during the first invasion of the Christians and here he halted the Abhennian army, and threw up formidable positions. Two days later the army came upon Evans was concentrating on Titan's Fair, the army did not deem it wise to attack him too soon. Evans without any opposition captured the great city of Titan's Fair and turned it over to the army.

It was a terrible catastrophe for the enemy, and caused a loss of 999,976, 543 and caused a terrible loss of life also for amid the ruins of the smoldering city were 355,000 dead. All women and children. The Gladiolin army under general Martineau was horrified over the scene which was before them also had witnessed, but they did nothing, and suddenly without warning early the next morning Evans hurled a wild and most savage attack against the whole Gladiolin army.

Within four hours, when the battle had swelled to a general fury Evans' smallest divisions were hurled back with terrible slaughter, but nevertheless, he had captured over three million prisoners, which were with hardly a scratch by the fierce Abhennian who Evans was unable to restrain their thirst for revenge for their four defeats recently suffered.

During the bloody action Violet and her sisters had come out about and observed just when the Christian armies were being routed, with frightful desecration, a overwhelming wave of Gladiolins came pouring out of the woods, and storm their way toward the whole Christian line. They saw where the assaulting wave passed, and observed the whole extent of the assault and as cannons and musketry crashed in frightful salvoes, Violet and her sisters, rushed down the hill, and mounting their horses raced to warn Evans that he was being taken in the rear.

They succeeded in warning him in time, but not quick enough to avert a terrible massacre, and in the frightful conflict ten mighty waves of Gladiolins extending for tens of miles were literally annihilated by the Abhennian cannon itself, and then from every point of the line the Abhennians swept forward with tremendous galleys, and cut the charging columns all to pieces, and carrying a 1,1 before them swept the whole line of survivors, back to their own positions, while all the Christian batteries roared and thundered in the most deafening crashes, and shells fairly tore the Gladiolin columns to pieces, every minute.

But Martineau was startled and surprised by this frightful turn in events, and while he was preparing for more assaults, Evans threw forward his ferocious battalions of Concontinians and Abhennians, against the Gladiolin center, and over across the whole front the Christian line poured like an overwhelming torrent, the artillery of the enemy crashed simultaneously all along the line, like the roar of a cannon, then the Christian line of assault moved, and then added by a terrific shower of musketry into the Christian line to pieces, and then with a dash of desperation the Gladiolins poured over their works, and along with the Abhennian first, and swept them clear from the field, but could make no head against the Concontinians and Abhennians who fought like so many birds, and the Abhennians now coming up the Gladiolins were cut down, routed, and shot up so frightfully that the survivors threw their weapons away and fled to their own lines in a frightful panic. With greater thrust with the Abhennians adding to the rout poured on after the retreating Gladiolins like a wild mob, and poured down across the works, but the main Gladiolin front opposed them, and the struggle was terrific in the extreme. At every point of the line 'at Martineau' seemed his mightiest divisions and finally he routed the Abhennians, and drove them back clean across the river with terrible dissipation. But Evans covering the assault with all his artillery, sent all the other available forces forward, and again the frightful conflict was renewed, along the whole three miles, and men and officers went down everywhere like leaves. Martineau was killed, but general Calhoun took his place and urged on his men to the utmost and toward two o'clock in the afternoon the assault was repulsed, and few of the Christian assailants came back.

The losses for the Christians was awful, but every assault the enemy made when following up their success was completely unheeded, and the enemy toward night fell withdrawn, silently, and ceased the bloodiest conflict of the Gladiolin invasion entirely.

Evans was jubilant over his slight success, and prepared his armies to resume the struggle in the morning. In the morning during the night Violet and her sisters had been up separated from her friends during the last miles of that day of the battle, and were on pins and needles, for where they were armies were searching all around the files, on a slope and perhaps a can full of debris and waste.

They had never been in such a ticklish position before, and though they were strange Gladiolins, Violet and her sisters, knew well enough that they would only be recognized, for who was the Gladiolin of any army, that did not have their pictures which Martineau had so recently published. All that time the little girls were within easy gunshot of the enemy, and finally when the conflict did finally cease, the little girls thought it safe to venture forth, and had just about stepped from their hiding place, in the darkness, when in the distance they saw flashes like fire files, and the trees which protected them was riddled by hundreds of bullets.

"Oh what shall we do?" cried Angelina. "They see us now and will go through all perils to annihilate us."

"We'll have to get away no matter what happens," answered Violet. "It's our fault for not staying closer to Evans or any of the regiments. We ran into the fire and so we must do our own work to run out again."

As they saw that no Gladiolins attempted to follow the little girls stole cautiously out of their hiding place, and crawled forward on the ground, stopping every now and then, to see if they were being followed. Three hours of this work brought them to the edge of the famous stream, and now they saw that to escape to the west was over, and the river they knew was too dangerous to swim across. Nevertheless they decided to try it, and in they plunged. They had fairly a most terrific battle for their lives, but helping one another they finally got across, and lay exhausted for a long time on the opposite bank. As they finally rose to their feet, they were surprised and horrified to find themselves surrounded by at least half a hundred fierce Ho-Hollolins, who had seen them lying there, and who had quickly rushed up to take them by surprise. To allow themselves to be captured was fatal, and to the surprise of the foolish little girls again dove into the seething waters, and swam down stream.

"Shoot the reckless little little devils," cried the Ho-Hollolins brandishing their spears. The men played, but expecting the volley the little girls had sunk themselves further down into the water and so they were unharmed. The Gladiolins moved about and about the bank, and firing only to wound their enemies who were on the other side, of the stream but the little girls could not be moved by the swift current, and so for several hours of the Gladiolins of this section, and were able to hide themselves under the dark arch of a bridge, and as the enemy came swimming up they hid under the arch, and were safe from the enemy.

"It's awful," said Violet. "We are in a most dangerous position. We are in a most dangerous position. We are in a most dangerous position."

"Don't be so scared," said Violet. "We are in a most dangerous position. We are in a most dangerous position. We are in a most dangerous position."

As the little girls tried to swim up against the current was again attempted, but they now found their strength exhausted, and so half drowned they rode for the shore, and reached it just in time. They were lucky enough to find a launch tied to a small wharf and this they quickly secured, and finding plenty of gasoline Violet and her sisters, as well as her sisters, started the engine and soon up the stream they were rushing for the distant shore.

and a complete of enemy attack, but on account of the darkness only to go down in whole units and more. Violet and her picture witness that this scene of this night was repeated at this hour. Violet happened on the sea area within bottom range, and it horrified the sea general's plan, but they feared that to retreat will mean annihilation now, and so they only urged their men on the faster, ordering the men to return the fire when within the market shot range. As to the enemy opened fire the red and green units soon began to drop in such enormous and frightful numbers that it seemed as if they were simultaneously lying down, while the enemy moving down with columns pressed on to success.

"Return the fire to all your forces. Give them yelling Glandelinian dogs all the hell they're looking for." Shouted the Abbeasian officers.

The Glandelinians had now drawn within easy range of the whole christian line, there was a tumult of flags and musketry, the Abbeasian lines seemed to have broken out into an inferno, and whole lines in purple purple, red and green seemed to go down together, amidst the bloody chaos of horror, and a state of hell black, the foremost notions of the christianity, moved and rolled, and the Abbeasians now started to press forward, when again came the cry of the commanders.

"For God's sake don't pursue like fools or you'll all be shot down. They're not driven back yet. Only checked."

Evans in the meantime saw this slight check the enemy was now receiving, and sent extra large forces to help check the assaults, attacking Bicknell's lines, and then observing the overwhelming numbers of the Glandelinian assaults he sent to general Kindermine who was now appointed to take command of a newly arrived corps of Abbeasians.

"I believe it possible that we really can't hold against them much longer. Will you please send for general Cavillan Johnston, and Fallon and ask them to come up with their wild battalions of Concentration and Abbeasian forces. Hurry before it is too late. I'll see to it that your forces are placed in a proper position, to repel the foe without a disaster...."

Kindermine decided to go himself and started off himself, when Evans replied up said:

"Don't go yourself. We need you too badly after all. Send a messenger to do it...."

So Kindermine at once dispatched a messenger with this note:!!!!

"To general Cavillan and Fallon, Please send large forces to the help of general Bicknell right away. He is overwhelmed by a tremendous Glandelinian tidal wave at Easter Starring. Fighting more fearful than ever now, and the slaughter is doubly terrific. Evans wishes you to hurry."

"URGENT....."

Fallon had been advancing his own forces toward the same location having heard the wild uproar of the battle, and observing that Bicknell was striving with might and main to hurl back a storm of assault against his lines, was doubly resolved that he should do so, and threw all his force upon the right of the Glandelinian tidal wave, throwing a portion simultaneously upon its rear turning it, and this part of the Glandelinian surge being cut off and suddenly thrown into confusion from being attacked on two sides, began to waver and fall back, hundreds of thousands being taken as prisoners. Shewan also came up with more troops under Evans order and went deep into the bloody action, and now the still retreating christian divisions were being rallied. The steady rallying of the whole Bicknellian christian line, and the steady concentration of reinforcements, filled the Martingus with amazement, and as Cavillan the Glandelinian general hoped for reinforcements he had to do so, for he was bound to drive back the christians still in further and prevent Evans from advancing to the rescue of Hanson at all costs..... Evans in the meantime seeing how close the conflict had become now advised Violet and her picture to keep away from the fighting line at all hazards, while he ordered Shewan with his 7,000,000 to move on and take the place of the shattered divisions while he withdrew Bicknellian divisions back across the river.

Ordinary divisions were also retreating before the pressure of the enemy attack, and from a high rise of ground Violet and her picture could plainly see the whole line of assault, and observed that five hundred thousand of the new force of Glandelinians were crossing the Easter Starring at another point, sweeping toward Brown's central lines, and facing at the same time a murderous fire from Bicknell's batteries.

"They are mostly all Mc-Hollistinians." Said Violet to her sisters. "And they are advancing in grand array, and in a fury that makes it seem impossible to stop. And two of the divisions are retreating before such heavy numbers of enemy as they are unable to withstand their assault. And I know it's such against the will of Bicknell. One of us must warn him."

They did by means of signals and seeing this incident Bicknell sent this note to Evans:

"I'm outnumbered ten to one by a fierce surge of Mc-Hollistinians, and must have heavy reinforcements immediately, or the battle will be entirely lost as I cannot under the world repel such heavy numbers any longer. Please hurry up especially your own field of artillery, as the foe are coming on like a storm wave and are getting so wild in the assault that nothing can withstand it any more. Two of the divisions are falling back."

"BICKNELL."

Cavillan in the meantime had received Kindermine's note, and though his staff protested against his intentions saying it was rash to stand against so strong a wave of Glandelinians he gave the order for the rush against the foe. Cavillan saying:

"We got to obey Evans or we will no matter how difficult the situation is. We have to check the enemy or the battle is lost and we will not be able to close on the Bristle Toe Station positions of the enemy. If we hold back from repelling the enemy, at the start the foe will soon overrun our lines, and make the whole world think that no christians cannot lick the enemy of God after all. I intend to check them despite the odds and even if I die for it."

He then wrote this note to Evans:

"URGENT. EVANS."

Bicknell reports he is overwhelmed ten to one, and it will be advisable for you to advance your entire force not in nation as yet or all will be lost. Two divisions of Bicknell's army are faint falling back before the foe assault and Bicknell predicts that he cannot hold out any longer. I'm going to his rescue as you asked me and probably my death, but I know my forces alone can not do the work successfully either, thus the reason I warn you to act wise and avert a threatening disaster that will bring on serious consequences."

Cavillan."

Cavillan had in the meantime advanced all of his forces with Shewan's command his right, and bringing up his artillery, Cavillan covered his movements by a sudden and most frightful camouflage, and then deploying his columns into line, first tore the advancing waves of the foe into fragments, with a storm of shot shell, grape and canister, and then ordered a counter charge. Adding the carriage with a fearful musket volley all along the line the whole christian force swept forward, and assailed the enemy with the greatest valour, and hurled back their foremost columns checking them still more, but though checked nevertheless the Glandelinians held their own ground stubbornly, fighting with devilish fury, and it was evident to Cavillan that he could not hold them at bay very long. Division after division of the Abbeasians swarmed forward to the counter attack, and back they were thrown shattered and mangled, and down their retreating survivors were mowed like grass.....

At this point the two forces were struggling desperately behind a window of dead of both sides, and hundreds of wounded were borne away every minute, the ground being strewn with dead for many miles.

Hordruden whole Abhianian line furiously repelled the terrific attack of the gland lancers, Hordruden himself was killed, and though he himself was determined to hold his ground at all costs, he could do nothing and indeed he saw as well as pickmell that the antirebelle and even though was lost to the christian side right then and there. Hordruden did a ' they could to keep up the courage of the men in it was of no use, the enemy was a holy terror in their assault now and yelling like demons the gland lancers finally swarmed over the works and trenches at all points smothering back the whole of pickmell's army and crushing it, the general himself being mortally wounded.

Evans was hurrying forward heavy reinforcements but now it was too late, Hordruden himself had to withdraw his division, and the reinforcements met a veritable tempest of men and bayonets, and all of the christian line was driven back mangled and torn, with their dead and wounded lying in heaps and though other columns went forward to revenge it they met annihilation with the loss of their leaders. Brown's division capturing all the artillery poured a perfect storm of shot and shell and canister upon the retreating christian line the victorious gland lancers rushing on like a victorious no' carrying all before them and capturing scores of millions of christians and twenty general to boot. Charles James Brown of the enemy side was killed, but it did not stop the wild advance of his men and all was soon wild confusion and retreat everywhere.

On millard's line alone did not press the advance after capturing it he trenches but kept up a constant firing five waves the ranks of christians down the gorge and prevented them from rallying, while to revenge a loss of their old leader Brown was increased the fury of the assault, and no reinforcing division of Abhianians themselves could stand before them.

Division after division of christians that tried to rally met annihilation, and when one christian line was completely withered, Evans saw that Guevillan the only leader of the assaulting column was bound to carry all before him even if it cost him his own life and while the battle and confusion increased everywhere Hordruden brought up all his artillery and poured into the ranks of the assailants a fire that was more terrible tearing hundreds of huge gaps in the enemy lines, but these were readily closed, and thousands of remnants of more christians became confused as their dead and wounded lay in monstrous windows.

Guevillan just now saw the confusion near the bodies of christians and gave the word all along his lines:

"Fix bayonets. Charge double file."

He was still met by furious heavily fixed bayonets, and crushed under the christian line and finally carried all before them for certainty. In the meantime general pickmell's soldiers of the new large force were greatly amazed to take it in the flank, and saw that Evans was depending his attack on a rally in a portion of his shattered divisions. Evans must not be at all. He said to himself, "It is not a danger who don't see foolish officers notice me. I'll show that flank attack alright on my own terms."

To see this the christians were all annihilated, and all of the common force most christians were retreating before the enemy in the wildest rout ever seen in any battle of the war, or any battle of any war that has ever occurred in this very world. While Evans was being compelled to withdraw other divisions to prevent the christians from being attacked the first two messengers sent for general riding reached him on the return, stating that neither general division, or common can come to his aid, that they were forced to retreat continually and without getting a chance to strike the enemy a single blow, and that every christian was in absolute and utter retreating before them, and that it was not in the least time to abandon the human or surrender to the gland lancers and sit over with the trouble and expense. "The had about general riding or any of them," Hordruden Evans "They must be willing to catch the war for they are all a bunch of cowards. I'll not abandon the human if every one in heaven would come down and command me to do so shut up and don't give me any advice."

At this moment general Hordruden's soldiers were riding

"Up."

"I've sent reinforcements but they cannot reach the scene of pickmell's death," he said.

"Go on! All general Hordruden's men to turn his cannon on all of the pickmell's men as possible," Hordruden Evans, "Hurry up before it's too late. I'll check the damn screaming wailing fiends of hell if I have to go with them to perdition from their damn souls. I'll hold you for reward if there is any falling."

The soldier charged and eddied out in five minutes all of the war within the christian line was coming; a veritable storm of fire of the events at pickmell's death was still and brilliant and annihilated it moving down the gland lancers line. Such a fire was poured upon them that for a moment the christian divisions of the foe being torn and shattered through and through resulted in a wild panic as the christians broke away, but the main line still came on as before like a screaming devil yell at their highest pitch, the order being full of God defying words, and blasphemies, and blasphemies, and they rushed the christian infantry defeating the cause with the fury of titans, there was an awful roar like a hundred million cannon, and the whole line was up to fragments, but up on a thousand and told lines, holding a huge wave with it, and again they carried all before them, a great Hordruden's line, and several soldiers ran, the foe pressed on and with the enemy one of the christian divisions for pieces, and Evans saw fearing that the whole army would at its quarter would not rally but annihilation withdrew all that he could of the main division to follow to the rear, and while the struggle was becoming so redoubled Evans, and the whole line was actually driven from the field Evans himself fell from his horse seriously and dangerously wounded.

This incident threw all of the other christian divisions into instant confusion, and within two hours, there was not a single christian soldier for the enemy to contend with, the whole line having fled in confusion.

During the terrible general Brown's pickmell's line had come up with heavy reinforcements and no did Hordruden Evans, he rallied an inch of the main christian column and quickly ordered them to better cover and advancing his right wing on the large christian line, the christian army the most serious resistance, and while a storming force of firing was in progress, he brought up his elite of armored men and then upon the christian line and tore it to shreds. He also advanced his own line still further and then learning that the main christian line was disabled, took personal command and decided to counter attack the enemy immediately as he to try and stop their advance.

"Now attack their right wing," Hordruden Evans said to his soldiers.

"It's too strong," Hordruden Evans said. "And a roaring tornado could sweep down upon them and sweep up those gland lancers and destroy them on their attack as I can see in the distance from no such smoke is supported by a line of the strongest batteries. The sure we are done for as there can be no checking that will not be very now."

"Well we can be on the defensive then and reduce their number when they attack us," Hordruden Evans said.

"We can't get to do anything," Hordruden Evans said.

"The right portion of the assaulting line is the only point where we can defeat them," Hordruden Evans said. "Their left is more strongly defended than their right or central portions, and the right I depend upon for a reverse. If not we can do nothing at all."

"I'll have it back to me in the defense," Hordruden Evans said. "Maybe by that we will be able to reverse every one of the ranks. See they are coming. For God's sake decide immediately general. They are coming as if all the devils were blown out of hell by a million eruptions of volcanoes. They are rolling and firing. I no I can see it at the end of the world is coming."

The attack came with terrific force, the enemy fairly stormed and passed with fury, the christian line like a million cannon on both sides, the christian line more fearful than before. Here the christian was surprised with complete and total defeat, then another general noticed from the point of observation that a portion of the christian center was being pressed back from their position. "I'll have it back to me in the defense," Hordruden Evans said. "Maybe by that we will be able to reverse every one of the ranks. See they are coming. For God's sake decide immediately general. They are coming as if all the devils were blown out of hell by a million eruptions of volcanoes. They are rolling and firing. I no I can see it at the end of the world is coming."

The little line became a wrecked, and Hordruden Evans said that they should hold their own, and seeing that the christian line was being pushed back like clouds of a 4th century there was a huge and the little line moved a man up with their flag, and the general seeing the signals and realizing that was a good sign on sent forward the remainder of the army on the double quick, while hundreds of christian were striving with the fury of a sea to rally these still christian divisions. The enemy was attacking in solid columns in a line like a formation and it indeed seemed terrible to see their impetuous assault which had recently carried all before it.

In violent and hot action but never pausing the course of terrible carnage, they saw that all the time and effort all within the battle within reason had been put, born, ingested, and all exhausted in a terrible manner. The side of both sides, especially before the point of picknell's column had to be, and from the terrible rain of cannon, itself everywhere in a terrible manner. Along picknell's line the enemy was still attacking with the most indestructible fury, and the Abbeonians who were still holding their ground were suffering such usual losses that it was evident that a long attack against the assault was an impossibility. The central main division of the Abbeonians of the Glendalians were in check but still the remainder of the attacking line being reinforced still more continued to press their advance, attacking in parallel lines, moving the Abbeonians down in many waves, and the firing along the lines of both sides, forests assumed such terrificity that all was everything became obscured in smoke. It was a frightful scene for Violet and her sister. Indeed on the carriage along general picknell's line was more horrible than it had been elsewhere along the christian line, the bloody struggle becoming fiercer and fiercer, as all the central divisions of Glendalians which had been temporarily checked now began to press forward once more, and general Charlesman Brown bringing up two thousand cannon. Let these loose upon the christians with a most deafening uproar, and as the first line came closer five million muskets broke into action in one simultaneous volley, and no more divisions of the Abbeonians were re-coiling as they were now down in whole swarms.

By now they had made all the most desperate attacks of the entire war to drive back the enemy assailants during this terrific battle of Renter Starring, but had failed, had been crushed and driven back with frightful loss, and suffered the loss also of over five hundred heavy weapons.

Victorious on the enemy were their losses was terrible. Generalians left grand division was shattered to fragments and Robert Knight Bannack now which had also stormed the christian line near Milton Den and Vanity Hill was almost annihilated by the christian fire. Picknell's a heavy relief to a lot of the pains which had not division after division to help in repelling the enemy assault and general Robinson's divisions of the Abbeonians were caught between two murderous fires, but nevertheless the christian counter assailants were forced to retire, leaving 70,592,222 dead behind.

The losses of the Glendalians for their threatening victory was awful but twice or three times more greater was the Abbeonian losses. A scene of more awful slaughter than ever Francis Atlanta of Logan Sea Run met together was along the Roman Run defended by 67,000,000 Abbeonians under Rudolph Heller and along picknell's line of 100,000,000 men. Picknell proved himself to be a more obstinate general than any of the christian generals known yet and his whole line fairly stormed with fire as the frenzied multitudes of gray lines came rushing on like screaming avalanches, and though thousands upon thousands of Abbeonians were fairly torn down by the fire of the enemy covering guns, the survivors only continued to hold their ground, repelling every assault of the foe, running away from division of the Glendalians but nearer and nearer over the enemy success for as fast as the strugglers a requital for the enemy they only resumed the assault with redoubled fury and without intermission. Scores of thousands of Glendalians' fragments immediately reached the christian trenches only to be wiped out, but the main line under the murderous fire of cannon and musketry tore onward, and threatened again to carry all before them, as they rolled up picknell's right wing.

But picknell was not daunted by this terrible disaster disaster for he threw forward to the defense monstrous fresh columns his own plucky new divisions in the enemy charging lines, and all was done to stop the charge, but amid the screaming undying battle, the enemy pressed clean up to the works, and soon the whole Abbeonian line faced a death dealing storm of musketry that tore the whole main line to pieces, and back retired the mangled, torn and bleeding columns and divisions, despite all that picknell could do to restore order. For four hours the struggle had increased before his right had been rolled up the christian general Rudolph Heller was killed, and Logan wounded, and his column facing an annihilating fire retired in utmost confusion, the general officers falling down by the score. The other main lines of ground were fairly obscured or littered with the bodies of the dead and wounded christians, and still a million of trees everywhere resembled the victory brooms.

The Abbeonians who were still holding their ground were lying down, behind rocks and breastworks, or trees and buildings and from this defense they continually tore up the enemy charging columns with a fearful gun and musketry fire, but without intermission the surviving columns of the foe kept on the desperate attack, and to make matters worse in due time new divisions of the picked Glendalians came up and used their own rifles, muskets, and cannons with the most faithful effects, cutting masses of the Abbeonians down as desperate their shelter, Logan Henson of the christian side a great general being mortally wounded, and as more and more divisions arrived for both sides at this location the firing grew fiercer and fiercer, and so fierce that the very boulders of stone and granite were dreadfully cut up by the tempest of minute balls, cannon and shells, which repeatedly brought to the destruction whole sections of Abbeonians, Angolians, and Glendalians together.

Simultaneously Heller's men driven from their works, had retreated to a long wooden hedge of weeds and thrown and other brushwood, two or three feet high, and these were so badly torn down by bullet storms, and cannon, that they shielded no one and so terrific was the losses of the Abbeonians that threatened with annihilation they again withdrew and three hundred big trees near here looked like victory brooms. Many trees even resembled sweeping brooms.

In the meantime as the batteries of both sides roared in the most incessant fury and deafening gradation it was seen that other portions of picknell's line was wavering, and later it had been found that 100,000 dead had been observed with their ears, legs, arms and even bodies cut away by the storm of bullets, and so frightfully dense was the smoke from firing that the whole scene resembled some gigantic fir forest fire.

Nothing whatever could check the wild onslaught of the enemy under Generalians, who was incessantly reinforced by Martinique army. Sherron reinforced the retiring Abbeonian columns in person and then he led them forward to the defense with colors flying. Rodney also arrived to picknell's assistance with seventy five thousand cannon, but it was soon that this time the enemy was advancing in overwhelming numbers, for though the seventy five thousand cannon now down whole divisions there were too many to now down fast enough to stop the charge.

Several thousand big machine guns had also been brought up and the frightful carnage and now opened fire doubly upon the attacking army, while all the other cannons now resumed their work at their guns when reloading reinforcements and more ammunition opening fire with terrific and destructive effect, and while they were doing the gray lines through and through general picknell changed his front, and sent many officers with cavalry to rally those who had been driven back. In the mean while the assailants came rushing on like wilder demons than ever, even though the artillery fire was kept up without intermission, and though all the Glendalians' cannons as themselves were all shot down many others took their places and on both sides the carnage became more horrible and increased in a frightful manner.

Perfect waves of the Glendalians rushed over the works shattering the christian line and to be torn to pieces by turn. The whole battle field was like a hell legion of demons gone mad. At the left of the field picknell's christian line the enemy had made attack after attack with unceasing fury and though each successive assault had been repelled and driven back, with the loss of scores of hundreds of thousands dead and wounded, the assaults had been repeated with such desperation and fury, and with such obstinacy that they finally carried all before them and again the battle surged forward with the enemy victorious along the other main wing.

These repeated disasters and appalling losses enraged picknell but he was not disheartened as his main columns redoubled their energy but as fast as the columns of Glendalians were dissolved in the face of this mad insidious fire, they had come on in ever increasing numbers and fairly committed a massacre when ever they closed with the desperate christian line. The enemy in this battle had made a fiercer charge than any seen in battle before shattering the whole christian line again and still again, and before they knew it the most faithful losses they ever.

The Glendalians calling like a hundred million cannon against the christian army as a fight and only saw the terrible carnage. The Abbeonians were demoralized, and as the generals still courageously kept their back to rally them they fell one by one. All of the broken and mangled columns were being driven out of the battle in a wide direction and finally they were driven out to the rear the enemy sweeping them up. The remaining small number of christian soldiers were scattered in all directions, some of them were killed, and others were taken prisoner. The christian army was now in a state of utter confusion and the Abbeonians were now victorious.

In the meantime the christian army was in a state of confusion. The loss of the christian divisions was so great that even the christian line of the enemy still number around the battle became three times fiercer than before, and increased some fifteen times with a peculiar fury. All of the christian army was now in a state of utter confusion and the Abbeonians were now victorious. The christian army was now in a state of utter confusion and the Abbeonians were now victorious.

"You little girls are terrible, engaged and set no more than to abandon the invention. Better application by finishing, they're raising with our heads to the fog." I've found out how to abandon the invention now with no such overblown mistakes and I'm well to provide, for not a single one would need a machine alive. We have started the final invention and now we have got to finish it. I don't think we notice how it turns out. But they worry about my defense. They do of course cause a serious situation to the cause, but there is nothing to be done. He said, "You've won the war. The future is only being finished." In my attempt to go to the end, and that is all. I would not abandon the invention now if I did for it myself. I've finished the machine, and now I'm going to finish it. "

Wiolet and her sisters did not feel that "to exist is crime, and to live when alone amounts to 'betraying' this to someone." If ever individual

Several Eugene men besides me have been several in our executive committee this morning, and it was felt to write to Dr. Spittle Tom Skiles and tell him what we had done. To present to you better than this, and to tell us how we proceeded so far to a new day. We had not a few men but not one of them, and other churches in the area, and in the county. We don't think this, and it makes me a lot. I would like to see the people understand the anti-communist danger, and the danger of it.

[illegible]

"After our long hard battle, we have to do with Abkhazians. We are angry, but we are not a criminal. We have to fight the Abkhazians. I said: 'Evil. If it did not affect the Abkhazians, the Abkhazians would have captured the city of Gori.' In a time of months ago, it is the old 4 months ago, the terrible battle of Gori. The Zoo has run and we are over two hundred miles north of the city, yet, and nothing to progress toward for others. I told you it was something to do with Abkhazians. But then I don't see where it can do a real leaders or even fight for their defense, because over the picture of your idea of a nation. I don't know, I don't know and I don't know for two days, instead of rushing on as I should have done. So as not to get into a situation. I'll

"No one can solve the mystery and probably never will. It's about as hard to solve as the dignity of a man," answered Evans. "But what ever it is it is causing disaster upon disaster, and only the destruction of her other personality can be doing it to a stop. Only then can we expect absolute success." "Not to a destroyer," said Richard Thompson some way, and capture and subvert that general Anthony Desmond Federal who was her only companion."

"I know he did it for I saw the report in the papers about it all." Answered Brown. "It's your duty little girls to shoot him down and kill him like deer, for many thousands are so to me of our Lord Jesus. Help me to help your little girls with that assurance of so many poor helpless children. We'll all get him Jesus deer, so no now don't cry about it. I know how it feels for your little girls to see such a crime, and by God it moves me deeply too. I have longed with heart and soul to send him to another place to be loved, and believe me you and I will."

Violat and her sisters in the canton decided to spy on the enemy no matter what happened, and so 7 or 8 out of the soldiers were armed they managed to strip just the canton, and leave the lines. However they soon found that to leave the Altiplano Indian was impossible for christian actually were running around everywhere, and so the little girls badly disappointed decided to return to the lines and did so. They soon also found out that to spy on the enemy was impossible and so they let the matter drop.

"Don't take no chances with ' ' the general Pickens' plan.' 'It's as treacherous as a snake and would turn on you without the least warning it."

"You'll have to bring the case before general Evans," said general Richardson. "At least they ought to send him to the Island prison."
The general was brought before general Evans then, but Evans would not send him, and gave the status quo. He did not care what was done to the wicked Hamiltonian general as long as he was put away somewhere."

"I don't like the way he acts." You had better have the man search him at once, general. He may have concealed weapons."

Gammillan was ordered by general Johnston Jackson Hanley by message to go ahead and attack the christian army, but he stated to Hanley that to assault a supremely impregnable position was suicide, and that he did not wish to annihilate his army. Realizing his mistake at last, Hanley repented of his deed, and wrote a message to general Martinique to return but he wrote back:

"I would have resigned anyway if you had not removed me from command. I realize what a cause I was fighting for and if I expect to save my soul I'll remain at home, and let the consequences come to you what they may. You are a wicked lot of rascals who are defouling your very country, and it's better for us if the christians do win and make a better nation out of us. I'll not come back to resume command, and by the time you receive this message I'll be far away on a voyage to Hickenville. Don't write me a gain. I'm your enemy and your whole darn cause to boot.

MARTIN MARTINIQUE."

Hanley was furious over this note when he received it, and gave orders and advises to all to see to it that the man would be pursued and placed under arrest on the charge of treason but his returned answer was from those who knew him:

"It's your fault general Hanley, and we cannot persecute or prosecute a general who opposes your intentions. You removed him from command without reason at all when he could win any battle for you that was desired, so not now take the medicine as we'll not do a thing to bring him back. He committed no treason. It's you that did and if you start any more trouble like that I'll report you to the king."

CHAPTER FIFTEEN.

THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF BRISTLETOE STATION.

IT'S CAPTURE.

BATTLE OF BRISTLETOE JUNCTION. HANSON'S MOST SEVERE
THE DESTRUCTION OF AUBREY FOLLERS ARMY, DURING THE SEVERE AND SANGUINARY BATTLE OF BALLARD'S RUN.

It was fully over a month since the great struggle at Denton Starring before Evans had been able to take command of the armies again. Since the invasion of Glandelinia up to this time the number of battles had been indeed great and now it was the month of September ten months since the frightful carnage at Gloriana.

Two more months Evans kept his army out of action through necessary reasons, it was too crippled just now to try and regain any of the lost ground, and he was waiting patiently for reinforcements that he had long expected. On December 14th Evans had already a newly formed army of 367,999,466 men and Gammillan had without any further fighting been forced to retreat all the way to Lion Catherine, and from it pursued closely by Evans and general Vivian also, with Evavette Trues army, and King Cannons. By the Fifteenth of December Evans was so secretly concentrating his armies south of Bristle Toe Station unconscious to the enemy. It was a glorious change of affairs, and all on account of caution, patience, and carefulness, and great gallantry.

And also because Gammillan did not dare oppose Evans. For this act on his part general Gammillan lost his command and general Madam Bubble was put in his place. General Vivian opposed Bubble, while Evans concentrated his army upon Bristle Toe Station. At many other points during these months there had been general quiet, for no battles had been fought, but nevertheless, there had been numerous skirmishes, and terrific raids, and forages, and work of devastation going on.

In the meantime Violet and her sisters had been working on the many mysteries of the Aronburg situation, and then suddenly they came to the facts of the conclusion of the tragedy at the battle of Emerald gun creek so long ago when a little girl gave up her life for the sake of a general whom she nevertheless had failed to save. They brought this situation before general Jack Evans and said:

"It's strange that she had the same name of our adopted sister Evangelina Aronburg. This seems to be the real part of the mystery. Ain't she the weak and criminal Aronburg child who was murdered?"

"No, my beautiful little saints I should say not." Answered Evans. "I can easily explain the mystery alright. She is no relation of the old children, your little adopted sister, and the beloved sister who had been so cruelly murdered, but from the family she came from she was also the last name 'Aronburg', she originally came to have that name through the case cause of her parents. I have known that little girl for three years and I saved her life and again to keep away from the firing line, but nothing whatever could keep her away, and on that day when that frightful battle occurred, she was killed by a Glandelinian machine gunner. Her death is never forgotten, and on account of her death the army will fight for more than any other. Her death was not accidental but an assassination as well as the assassination of the original Aronburg child, Gertrude's sister, and as well as the assassination of all the other children slain by the wicked Glandelinian soldiers. There is no excuse for the Glandelinians for this deed or any other, but nevertheless it has nothing however to do with the situation of the great Aronburg mystery. As she is no relation."

Evans lay before Bristle Toe station for some while, while he was preparing for attack, and simultaneously he was extending his armies, in such a fashion that he did whatever could come to general Robinson Hanley.

Violet and her sisters threw their glances could see in the distance the long stretches of the Glandelinian prairie, and also far to the right the well known and famous railway station. . . . They had a longing to go to the place and see their uncle once more, but they knew that unless a victory was won it was impossible, for to go through the Glandelinian lines under Hanley was suicide. They were standing by a fence overgrown with green shrubbery, and trees, looking like the prettiest fairies of Ireland when up galloped three of the Abbeonnanian generals, strange soldiers to the little girls, and between them they had a prisoner which looked very much like general Picknell the friend of Violet and her sisters. The generals halted when they saw these beautiful children, and felt touched in spite of themselves. They had never seen these little girls before, and at first had the suspicion that the children would have darted away at their appearance but immediately to their surprise the little girls walked over to them or rather flitted like little birds, and little Catherine herself said:

"General who is the prisoner you have. He looks like a Glandelinian general who had befriended us on many days."

"It's general P.D. Plausible." Answered the Abbeonnanian officer. "He are you little girls that you ask this question and salute me like a soldier does?"

"We are general Vivians daughters." Answered Catherine.

"You are very young for your age little girl." Said the Abbeonnanian general.

"And yet you speak as if you were a young lady."

"I am." Answered Catherine with a winsome smile.

"I know it." Answered the Abbeonnanian general. "But that is not what I meant at all. You speak like a girl of twenty one years of age and you look to be only eight. But who is general Vivian? We never heard of him before. There are at least so many Vivians that I do not know whom you mean."

"General Robert Angelio Vivian." Answered Catherine. "He is supposed to be the main commander next to our uncle uncle Hanson Angelio Vivian. We are known as the parlours of the nation, the Vivian girls, but as the 'Wild Cats' by the enemy."

"Oh you are the Vivian Girls!" He gasped. "I ought to have known it by your sweet smiling ways in the first place, but I have forgotten about it. Glad to meet you my dear little heroines. This man we have gave himself up yesterday, as he did not want to serve in the war any longer. He is being taken to headquarters to be transferred to the prison camp. He is a Glandelinian general."

Violet and her sisters decided to follow the general, and as the general knew the little girls could ride horses, he ordered the cavalry men who were coming up to dismount, at least eight of the men, but the little girls said:

"We will ride with the men, they need not dismount. It's all right."

The soldiers were all strangers to the little girls, and they thought at first that the generals had rescued the pretty little children from some skulking foe, and they insisted on dismounting, but to their surprise the little girls were on the horses backs behind the men before they could understand what had happened. How could such little girls mount horses even when wearing dresses like they did. They were not only awed, but flabbergasted and wondered indeed who the strange and peculiar little girls were. They chatted with the soldiers all the way as if they had known them for all their lives, speaking first, on religious matters, asking the soldiers, if they were taking good care of their souls, and so on, how they wished the war was over, and how they wished to know how to reach Hansons lines at Bristle Toe station. The soldiers answered every question bashfully, but truthfully, and one of them finally said:

"You must be the little Vivian girls we have heard so much about, for your ways of speech, your character, and features show it. Are you not then little children, the dearest flowers of the whole world?"

"I suppose we'll have to admit it in one way." Answered Jennie. "But how do you know we are flowers. Did you see us grow on a plant?"

The other soldiers laughed at this and another said:

"Tossy look out with your flattery. You can't get the best of those little girls. I'll be bound. They are really the Vivian girls. A right, and it's a heavenly pleasure that they are among us for once. But how come you little girls to be picked up here. Were the enemy looking for you?"

"They were not looking for us just now, though I don't doubt they are looking for us every minute." Said Jennie. "We were just surveying the scene far in the distance and saw through our field glasses the situation of the railroad depot called Bristle Toe Station. If Evans puts his left wing through that gap we are to the right of the station the war will be surely a victory in a shot this for us."

"Oh no you little girls were spying again." Said another soldier. "Where in the world did you get all the bravado?"

"We don't know ourselves." Said Jennie. "We were always like this since we ever became conscious that we were alive, and we seem to enjoy peril as if it was nothing but sport. At least it is sport to us to pursue or be pursued by the enemy, captured, and get away, with all their plans and other materials. But it did not need nerve to spy on them this time, as we never went anywhere near their camp. We observed the gap in their lines through our field glasses in the distance. That gap if once occupied would cause a serious disaster to Hanson Hanley and his army would be thrown out right away. It will take a fierce battle to do so however."

"Oh general Goodwill." Said the soldier suddenly. "The little fairies here have good information."

"Good information?" Cried the general. "What about?"

"They see a gap in the enemys lines, which if general Evans knows about he could easily capture Bristle Toe Station before general Hansons very eyes."

He The Abbeonnanian general Goodwill was surprised at this astounding news, and he was so shown and directed by little Catherine just where he could with his glasses see the gap which was exposed in the enemys lines.

"You little girls can take the opportunity and report it to him."

Said the general elated over this discovery. "Do you know where general Evans has his headquarters?"

"Yes." Answered Violet herself. "We are his charges. We'll let him know right as soon as we reach him. You soldiers whose horses we are riding can come with us if you like us so well. Will that be all right?"

"Certainly." Answered the soldiers in a chorus.

The little girls then changed their course, and sent the horses flying faster than usual. As they reached a small Glen they were surprised by a rush of gray clad soldiers, who immediately surrounded them and cried:

"Surrender you little child devils and surrender right away if you wish to save yourselves."

The christian soldiers felt the little girls were done for and with a sinking heart prayed, not paying any attention for the moment what was going on, until regaining their senses, they found themselves still riding, and looking back saw about twenty dismounted Glandelinians, horses running back and forth, and a number starting forward on a fierce gallop firing furiously. Looking at the little girls when they had expected to be excited excited if not scared, they saw them taunting the foe with their little handkerchiefs, and laughing until the tears ran down their rosy cheeks.

"Well I'll be." Cried one of the soldiers. "How can you little girls manage to get away so easily?"

"You mean how did the enemy escape so easily." Answered Jennie. "You boys must have been asleep that you had not observed the fun. Why we simply made a dash that was all, and upset them all."

The foremost of the Glandelinians were crying a tearing after the fugitives, and the soldiers, unloading their rifles, and started firing, but did not hit any of the pursuers.

The Glandelinians however who were really within the christian lines, but did not know it did not pursue very far, for all of a sudden a large force of christian cavalry rushed upon them from seemingly all sides, and shot down down every single one of them. They were the fierce and abysmal Glandelinians who will massacre any bunch of Glandelinian soldiers who they see pursuing child ren, no matter who the child may be. So ends the slight permit of the wicked once more, and in a few minutes more the main line of the Abbeonnanian camp was reached, and the little girls reached Evans headquarters.

Evans was busy at that moment when they came in playing with little William and Francis and when he saw the Vivian girls reappear he at once greeted them as he had always greeted them before.

"Evans dear, there is a great gap in the enemys lines to the west of the railway depot called Bristle Toe Station." Said Angelina. "If you can get a large force of your army into that gap you will easily drive the enemy from Bristle Toe Station right before our uncles eyes."

"Good that you little girls discovered this." Answered Evans almost hugging hugging her till she screamed. "I'll do it for your sakes anyway."

Hanson was stationed in his headquarters when a general officer came riding in and cried general Hanson there is a great battle going on south of here. Don't you hear the noise it's something terrible. Oblisten."

Hanson risk rushed out of his headquarters and listened.

A loud continuous booming roar as if many volcanoes in the distance were in action made his heart, added, by nightier roars, and all kinds of sounds.

"It's true," he said. "I wonder who is attacking, for I'm sure it's Manley's army that is being assailed."

After being informed of the gap Evans had went to the very spot where the little girls had discovered it and also observed that it was true. He did not wait until the morning for action as he had planned, but had immediately ordered his full force of cavalry to go in and fill that gap immediately, while he would send forward his whole right wing to its support. The cavalry did as was ordered, and charging across the open fields under cover of massed christian batteries, tore their way into the gap like a roaring cyclone and carrying all before it, without much loss, occupied all the space, capturing over 10,000 Glandelinian artillery, general Manleys headquarters, Bristle Toe Station, and the whole stretch of Easter Starring in that location, and soon after before Manley could realize what disaster had befallen his army, the main christian force had come up, and was in possession of the gap.

Manley did not learn of it until two hours later, and then he made terrific efforts to drive the Abbeonmians out, but another force of christians had arrived, all Angolians, and they put themselves in the way of the charging enemy and crushed the mighty assault in an hours time, the general of the foe whose name was Worldy Wisemann being killed.

Evans toward noon brought his whole army up and soon toward evening was engaging all of Manleys armies in the fiercest manner. The Glandelinians repulsed the attacks of the christians troops all that day with frightful loss, and put all their cannons in motion, tearing all of the charging lines to pieces, but Evans though he failed in carrying the main position, had possession of the gap and at night time he withdrew the assaults, and brought his army up into a better position. This is what Hanson had heard.

Violet and her sisters were happy over the results of their discovery, and hoped now that the enemy would be driven back. There was however no need of more fighting, Evans had been repulsed in all of his assaults, but never theless Manley did not dare maintain his position, for he knew who now confronted him on the south, and if he stayed much longer, Hanson would take advantage of it and close him in and then it would be all off.

In the morning Evans was between Hanson and Bristle Toe Station, but not an enemy was in sight. Evans notifying Hanson who had been the attacker, and advising him to seize the location right away, went off in pursuit of Manley.

Violet and her sisters were feeling less blue now for they saw that Evans had won some success again, and realized what would happen if the christian armies under general Hanson took possession of Bristle Toe Station.

When Manley made a halt on the 24th of december, Evans had to halt his armies also and prepared for another battle but Manley did not attack, and when Evans remounted him he recoiled still further to a stronger position. That night it appeared as if it was the most perilous duty for snorties that had ever been experienced as so many had been shot down by Glandelinian sharpshooters lurking in the tree tops near the christian lines.

Evans intended to crush the army under Manley as soon as possible, but many of his generals were against his attacking the foe too soon stating the reason that the retreating Glandelinian army had placed themselves in a very unsafe unassailable position and that to attack Manley now would bring a reverse that he would never recover from and the christian cause would certainly be lost. Nevertheless at first Evans decided to attack the enemy without delay but he found on scouting that all the facts related by his advisers was true, and to attack Manley in such a poor position would be complete suicide.

Nevertheless Evans decided not to be outdone in this way and startled however so a spirited artillery firing, which brought a severe response, but never theless no attack on the part of the enemy came and for a long time the two armies had already faced each other and now the season was Christmas. Christmas in Glandelinda is different than those in Calvernia. Calvernia is winter as early as October, Glandelinda from coast to coast is tropical and intensely warm in the winter as seasons. To the Angolians the heat was torture, but the Abbeonmians having a hotter country than any in the world made little of the Glandelinian summer throughout the year round.

During one of their exploits Violet and her sisters had a harrowing brush with the enemy and one of them who was Jennie had been severely wounded and lay still in bed though now Christmas was fast approaching.

"How is my little Vivian Girl to day?" asked general Evans, sitting down beside the small white cot, upon which repose, in a half sitting posture, the little maid of eight years of age was reading a story in the Bible. Her pale face, and half wasted face and hands, denoted the recovery of a most severe illness produced by her wounds, but the large deep blue eyes that were raised to the face of the great and mighty Abbeonmian general were bright with joy.

"I feel very well to day Evans dear," said Jennie, smiling happily. "The doctor says I can get up, and in a little while I'll be well again. Oh I'm so glad, because I've been in bed such a long time since your last battle at Easter Starring. It seems a whole year."

"But my little Jennie has been so patient and willing to bear her pain for the Love of our Dear Lord, that I'm surprised he has not taken you with him already," said general Evans touched in spite of himself, and gently stroking the golden curls.

"I have tried," answered the child simply. She lifted her eyes to a picture of the Holy Innocents hanging on the wall opposite the bed in her tent. "And I have asked our Blessed Father to help me and my sisters grow still holier. Oh Evans dear, don't you think I will be all right with my dear sisters in the Christmas procession, and also in the Christmas evening of the Blessed Virgin, and join the Children of God and Mary to morrow?"

The General Evans looked dubious. The Holy child was so eager that he did not wish to discourage her, but it hardly seemed possible that the little Vivian girl, who was recovering from a serious wound in her right lung could regain her strength within this short time still left before the beautiful ceremonies at the Christmas day which was on the following morning, but to be refused it would surely kill her right.

"I know what we will do dear little Jennie," he said. "We will start a series of Rosaries to day to the Blessed Virgin for this intention. She will I'm sure obtain for you a speedy recovery."

"Oh yes that will be fine," exclaimed little Jennie vividly, her big blue eyes lighting up. "I do so want to join in the Christmas procession, and join the little children of Mary, now that so many of my own friends are already in heaven."

Years came into the child's eyes, and a general Evans put his arms around her slender shoulders. General Evans left little Jennie to her sisters after a short time and returned to the Knights of Columbus building, and he at once knelt before our Lady's altar, offering up a fervent petition that she would obtain Jennie's wish. The hours passed quickly enough for poor Jennie, yesterday ever y hour she had become a little stronger, but the doctor was worried, because her little heart had become slightly diseased. As soon as the child was up he advised her to stay out of doors in the warm sunshine. This was a source of joy to little Jennie, who spent most of the time in the fields around the army plucking flow'ers and with the help of her sisters distributed them among the many wounded christian soldiers. On the day before Christmas eve she picked a large bouquet and sent it to the church in the army for our Lady's altar by her sisters.

During the last week before Christmas she was able to take them herself. How good it seemed to poor Jennie the first day she was able to be around again and re-enter the army churches. It seemed an age since she had been able to visit our Lord. She walked swiftly down the aisle, and knelt at the railing, as close to the sacred Heart of our Lord as she could get. How dear to that Divine Heart must have been the loving words that came so simply from the unpolished lips of the child.

Then Jennie passed on to the blessed Mother's altar, laid her frail offering at the feet of the statue, and kneeling down recited the Novena prayers. On Saturday the little patient visited the doctor, and expressed herself as feeling very strong. However doctor Larnson experienced eyes noticed the bluish shadows under the eyes, and felt the unsteady pulse with some anxiety. Mortally wounded she surely was, but she pleaded so eloquently that he had not the heart to refuse her. He would have raised her and gladly too, but he thought and feared that the disappointment might do her more harm than the participation in the ceremony on the morrow. So after a few moments of silence during which Jennie looked at him with anxious, pleading eyes, he gave his permission. With a cry of joy the child impulsively threw her arms around him and gave him a literal "Bear Hug."

"Oh doctor you are an angel," she said. "I will certainly pray hard for you to morrow. Oh I'm too happy for words."

The little girl looked positively radiant when she almost ran into Father Finney at the door of the Knight of Columbus Building. "Well what has happened to make my little Jennie so joyous?" asked the priest kindly.

"Oh Father the doctor said I might go in the procession to night. And I shall join the children of Mary." Was the answer. As the child entered the building or rather army church and took her place by the confessional the priests eyes rested on her lovingly.

"She is like a lily pure and sweet. Dear Mother of God make her your own lily to morrow and keep her forever unsullied."

The evening was perfect in the weather. The still deep blue sky was without a cloud, a gentle breeze sent the blossoms swaying back and forth in the distant fields, and the setting sun still bathed the landscape in glorious golden hues. I did not look as if a terrible war was going on at all. The main Knights of Col Columbus Building which was called the Church of our Lady of the Blessed Sacrament was transformed into a perfect bower, innumerable candles blazing on the altars and with the Urbs and other statues the statue of the Blessed Virgin was almost hidden by roses and lilies. At midnight the music commenced and while a hundred pure voices of children sang the beautiful Mass by one of the German girls, a little flower crowned and led by ten of her companions, kneeling at the altar and crowned first the Holy Babe, and then our Blessed Mother with a wreath of lilies.

Then a band of young girls in white with veils looking about their own bright faces, approached the altar rail. In clear distinct voices they recited immediately the act of consecration to the Immaculate Virgin vowing perpetual fidelity to their Heavenly queen and became the Children of Mary. The happiest of that privileged band, was violet and her sisters. Their little faces were fairly radiant. When the priest slipped the blue ribbons holding the medals of their over their heads, a thrill of joy passed over them, and they imagined they saw the mother of God smiling lovingly down upon them. Sole benediction ended the beautiful midnight ceremonies. Violet and her sisters bowed their heads in adoration. Never had our Blessed Mother seemed so near, they almost could see her standing on the altar, raising His pierced hands in blessing. And the little girls begged him in their childish ways to bless them and to keep them always pure and good, as became a child of Mary. Violet and her sisters were sorry and distressed was all about to be over. As violet and her sisters sat in the pew next to the christian generals who attended the little girls made a fair picture of the Blessed Virgin when she herself was a little child, with that rapt look on her face. The eyes of a violet and her sisters caught the eyes of the christian generals and smiled. The next instant a shot rang out and simultaneously Catherine put her hand to her side. Her face turning deathly white, and general Poleros hastily stopped forward and the little girl fell senseless into her arms. Simultaneously the priest who had been administering the Blessing, was seen to stagger, and fall to the floor. Just as the priest was being attended to they carried the little girl into the sacristy, while someone ran for the doctor. But Father Finney as he bent over the slender childish form and looked into the white face felt sure that earthly help of was of no avail. Her sisters were wild with grief. As the doctor came and took away her hand he found it bespattered with blood, and examining her he saw that she had literally been shot in the side of her chest, and that the bullet had lodged very close to her heart. Tenderly he stretched her until the little golden head rested on his bosom. A deep sigh came from the bluish lips, and the great violet eyes opened. They seemed bright with a light not of this earth to the doctor. She did not notice them kneeling around her. Her eyes were fixed in a rapt gaze beyond them. Then a radiant smile transfigured her white face and her lips moved.

Father Finney bent down to catch her voice, words.

"I am," she whispered. "I am my Blessed Mother."

The golden head sank back against the priests shoulder the long lashes swept the marble cheeks and the little hands fell helpless at her side. A moment of deep silence reigned. It was broken by the sob of her sisters. Father Finney his own eyes wet with tears reverently drew the veil back over her white face.

"Get gone," Evans said to one of the men. "Doctor do you think she is really beyond hope. Is she mortally wounded?"

"I think I can save her by a serious operation," answered the doctor.

"She and the priest were shot right down by some one at the same time."

Evans came up at the same time by the orderly and he knelt down beside the little girl who was really sinking fast. At Evans orders she was carried into the hospital tent, and the operation started immediately.

"He has laughed Evans before her sisters. "It's the greatest thing that ever happened. General Johnston how many prisoners have we in the camp?"

"About ten million."

"Massacre them all," thundered Evans.

"What?" cried the astonished officer.

"You heard what I said," answered Evans with a fierce pugnacious look. "I'll spare no damn fool officer or private. Massacre them all. Do it now. I'll have no contradiction."

Orders were orders and the general saw that he must obey though he relented faintly gave the order to all the fellow officers.

While the operation was in progress, a terrible massacre of glandelinian prisoners started. In vain they tried to escape they were shot or cut down by the fierce Abyssinians, who became like raving mobs. The only man who escaped this reign of terror was Germania civilian and because he had alone been in Evans headquarters at the time. And he was the one who had shot little Catherine down and the priest right before the altar. He had lain in quiet with the intention of preventing the progress of the operation and when he got the chance he shot the three doctors down while they were at their work and dashed away just as three of the soldiers saw him.

"at the damn accursed mile," I missed Evans. And mounting a horse he immediately led the pursuit.

"How did he escape the guards in the first place he thundered. "I'll shoot the cur down if I go to perdition. The fugitive was on a horse but Evans being a good rider fast overtook the man and seeing himself cornered Germania leveled his pistol. Evans saw the movement, and fired simultaneously. The report of Germania's pistols. Both horses sank to the ground, and Germania escaped into the deep recesses of the woods, and all the efforts to locate him was in vain. The would be assassin, and scoreless convict had literally escaped from the christian army without injury, and by him Evans had been hit in the shoulder. Though not severely wounded, Evans was in no mood to pursue further, but he nevertheless saw to it that his orders were obeyed, and within three hours time all of the glandelinian prisoners had been massacred by the Abyssinians who joined the Abyssinians in the frightful medium.

Manley had in the meantime heard of this frightful massacre, on account of the shooting of one of the civilian girls by Germania who had escaped and sending large forces of cavalry to go to his rescue to stop his pursuers. Manley early in the morning took the whole left wing of Evans army by surprise and after a terrific con. contest in which 23,000,000 men fell on both sides in four hours broke up the whole christian line, captured twenty million christians and massacred the rest. They had also captured over sixty thousand of the child slaves who had been rescued besides twenty priests, bishops, and army guns and before Evans eyes committed the cruellest massacre of these persons ever happened, before, and Manley defied Evans before God and all his angels to revenge the massacre, and following up his threat and defiance raging the night battle all along the line in the most desperate efforts to capture the civilian girls. Soldiers along the christian side went down by the five hundred thousand, and the losses of the enemy still worse in the firing of cannons tore the ground to pieces with shell fire, and drenched the heavens with the din.

Manley put all his forces in that assault, and though one life of attackers not complete annihilation, he hurled the sum of her forward, and crushed back the whole christian center, and carried all before him capturing many more millions of prisoners whom were massacred.

Evans frantically brought up all his heaviest reserves to stop this demoniac onslaught, and massed all his batteries, while he withdrew the children who seemed to suffer, and saw to it that Violet and her sisters were more closely guarded. It was terrible the night's onslaught, but there was no chance of holding ground, and the whole center was again crushed and rolled up for good, and many generals on the christian side fell mortally wounded. "Honor won a glorious victory, but he has yet failed to capture the christian girls. Evans was compelled to withdraw his army, and he retreated hastily toward Henrietta Junction, and notified Hanson that he had been defeated again and that he must be reinforced or other wise the christian armies would be annihilated and the vivian girls captured. While great parts of the forces were retreating, Evans commanded his main army to go forward, and repel Hanley. As he saw to it that Violet and her sisters and the other children would be taken over to general Hanson's lines.

Toward the afternoon the battle was resumed with redoubled fury, and while Evans was preparing for the deplorable departure of the little girls, he drew up his biggest guns and all the such as guns that could be massed, and let the enemy have the full storm of rolling point blank. It was a massacre of gladiolins guns and ships, and Hanson was enough now suddenly hearing the crash of so many guns, that seemed to make the heavens above his own lines go wild with din and clamor, though his lines were inactive, grew apprehensive and apprehensive, and ordered forward his armies just as he received the note sent by Evans.

A hundred thousand soldiers were detailed to take the vivian girls to the lines, while Evans sent general plannon to see that no armies of the enemy would try to intercept the escorts, and if so to report the matter at once. Hanson read the note, and realizing the situation hurried his orders, and also awaited the coming of the vivian girls whom Evans predicted were coming. Evans was now active with greater intensity his whole line was in action, and seeing that he could not hold out any longer he sent an other messenger to Hanson, that help must come as soon as possible or all is lost, as by the way the enemy was making an attack, it was evident that they meant to massacre all of the soldiers.

For wounded themselves were brutally slain by the enraged gladiolins who spared no one, and who having captured more children tore their very entrails out and flung them at the retreating christian soldiers.

It seemed possible that Hanley's army had gone mad with fury, for their wild assault never stopped despite the heavy fire the christian line was putting, but now as reinforcements were arriving from Hanson it did no good, and Evans was compelled toward four o'clock to withdraw again, and in no time the whole christian army, shot down by the millions were in terrible panic, and streamed toward Bristol too station in the wildest confusion that Hanson who soon witnessed it had ever seen in his life.

He sent division after division to repel the enemy, while he strove with the help of his officers to crush the enemy at other quarters, and sent swarthy forces to beat the panic out of the soldiers streaming so wildly to the rear. Even those those escorting Violet and her sisters were caught in this wave of confusion, and fled precipitately, the little girls think of it being abandoned by the panic stricken soldiers, and left to their fate what ever it might be.

Hanson saw that something must be done, and so he massed all his own batteries, and from Henrietta Junction, to Bristol too station, and along the Foster Starring, there was a perfect stream of cannon volleys, and shell fire tore the gladiolinian columns to pieces by the terrible thousands, but maddened by the din of battle, they struck at Hanson's line like thrillions of raving demons, and only went back sullenly when their whole line of assault over 45,678,999 strong was torn in tatters, and almost withered.

To Evans before this check it was a frightful disaster over expected, for his army had been scattered, the vivian girls narrowly escaping, and all his new generals Evangelist, Help, James Interpreter, Silence, Comforter, Watchful, Discretion, Piety, Prudence, Charity, Cedion, Jacob, Sinera, Shungur, David Goliath, Gath, Jeremiah, Faithful, Peete Josie, Knowledge, Experience, Sincere, Great Grace, Good Confidence, Hopeful, Honesty Wine, Sagacity, Jack Meray, Reliever, Gains, That's-that-which-is-good! Hanson, Contrite, Holy man, Love-saint, Penitent, Hall Lucie, and Valiant for truth were all mortally wounded, and Evans himself was able to boast of fifteen severe bullet wounds.

Hanson saw it was impossible to rally the scattered army of christians, and allowed the stream to the rear. Night for the time closed the bloody and merciless contest, but early the next morning the battle was resumed with ten times the greater fury, and this time Hanley directed the fiercest assaults against Hanson's whole line. He did directed the center of his most desperate attack against the line situated at Bristol too station, and carried it after fighting of the most savage character.

Three hundred divisions were thrown against Hanson's main center, and terrible indeed was the battle now. All day long it raged with the most frightful fury. Hanson's lines were driven out of its position, only to re-grasp the lost ground, but not without terrible loss. "Honor he ever was bound to sweep all before him and finally toward evening he did. Hanson's army overwhelmed Hanley's ten to one, but it was as if Hanley overwhelmed Hanson a hundred to one. In trying to rally the troops Hanson received a bullet wound just where Catherine had been shot, and he was borne from the field in the most critical condition. His army also was completely routed, and scattered for scores of miles, an untold number of prisoners were captured by the enemy and slain, and the enemy did not stop the pursuit until they had fairly scattered the whole christian army, keeping up the driving pursuit for two weeks, until Hanson's army was beyond rally. Bristol too station was retaj retaj, the enemy was in possession of many of the works, and had regained one hundred miles of the lost ground. Ambrose Fuller's army had come up in time to join in the fray, and he had himself given Hanson his most severe wound.

Violet and her sisters, themselves had been fugitives, having been scattered even from each other, and for those two weeks, almost starved and had to pick up food on the ground. Where Jennie and Catherine were they did not know but they felt sure they were slain, for they had been left behind in the pain panic and Violet and her poor sisters realized probably they would never see them again.

It was a frightful state of affairs. The army from the sight of a christian soldier. They certainly were in great danger, and they had to disguise themselves as gladiolinian peasants to escape detection, and the way they were questioned for every place they passed, sent a thrill of horror through them.

They laughed at peril many times before, but now they wished they had never went into gladiolins with the christian armies. They had a foreboding in the first place that the christian armies would meet a serious disaster like this and now the fears had come true.

"We are lost and the whole cause is lost!" cried poor Violet in despair. "Our two sisters missing, probably dying, our prisoners, and we far from refuge of any kind, and the two mighty christian armies are more greatly scattered than Hanley's was at gladiolins. I tell you sisters we'll soon see the enemy invading the countries of Calverbia again. And you will see if I ain't right."

"And this to happen to add to that sorrow committed by some one." Said Angelina. "Shooting our sister and the priest down at the altar. That was awful. To wonder Evans caused the prisoners to be slain."

"Yes and I believe his massacre of the gladiolinian prisoners, made Hanley's army to wild that this occurred." Said Nettie. "We are lost and that's all there is to it. We are scores of miles from any other christian armies. It will take many months before Evans' army is rallied and regathered again. And still I still longer for Hanson. And he was shot the same way as poor little Catherine, though I have heard he is in a more critical condition, and will not live."

"Oh our poor uncle." cried Peat. "We did not know he was mortally wounded." "Who told you this Nettie?"

"I saw it." She answered. "Ambrose Fuller shot him down."

"I knew this would happen in the first place." Said Evangelina. "And if we don't reach the refuge of some christian army soon we will never live long enough to escape the foe."

The little girls had reached a certain farm region when they came upon a small batch of tents which loomed in the distance, and going forward cautiously they surveyed the tents at a distance.

"They're gladiolinians so be careful." Whispered Violet drying her eyes. "We won't go near it at all. Better starve than be captured and slain. by the wicked foe."

They made a wide branch of the tents and continued on northward and then entered a dense woods. Here at least for a while there was shelter and they laid down and cried themselves to sleep. Indeed it had been a fearful time in events for the christian cause. All the other christians armies had still been retreating, general vivian, and cannon wisely kept their distance from the gladiolinian armies opposed to them, and general Vertette's army at all retreated from the foe. There was no good luck anywhere, and every christian army had been hurried back for all the distance they had won without any further battles.

The very world realized that the war seemed lost to the christian side, and some of the nation's began to advise the Abbeauminian governments to be on the winner's side, and lay off from gladiolins before it is too late, stating that no nation could conquer mighty gladiolins now for it was too late.

For three days Violet and her sisters were horrified fugitives in the wilderness, their only food being berries, the, and, and the water they brought down from the trees. Very little water they were able to obtain and at times they were so exhausted, and thirsty that they could hardly move a step further, and had to suck on tree leaves to relieve their parched tongues. To ask for shelter was in vain for they were in the heart of the dense country, far from any Christian army, and yet they must do something or other wise they would perish. They never ceased prayer, praying that it did no good to pray at all for here they still were. The only creatures they saw in the wilderness was the wild deer they saw occasionally, and dangerous animals of every description, even tigers, were abundant, and fortunately the little girls never encountered the fierce and bloodthirsty Glandelinians. Bloodthirsty Glandelinians, who were different than those north in California and destroy all human beings within their reach.

It was indeed a perilous wilderness, and not only was there great danger from all these wild beasts, but every hour the they had been set upon by Chalkin Glandelinian warriors, who were really scouring the region for them, as Hunsley had known of their escape, of their wanderings, and was bound to capture and destroy the little girls.

At last reaching a small wooden pathway the little girls were suddenly surprised by seeing a swarm of horsemen coming, and they wore the Californian uniforms. Despite the uniforms they were the little girls did not trust the soldiers, and immediately darted into a hiding place. Three of the men saw them dash into the hiding place, and rode immediately to the spot, and finding the children who were unarmed immediately dragged them within view.

"Look who we captured colonel," said the men who had seized them. "They appear to be peasants but by luck they are the pretty children of Heaven. I'll be bound. Let's use them as our nannies."

Violet and her sisters screamed and tried to break away but the men held them all the firmer while the rest of the party came up and halted.

"What are you beautiful little boys doing out in this woods all alone?" demanded the colonel.

Violet and her sisters did not answer a word, and the colonel said: "You children are peculiar to me. Tell me who are you and what is your purpose in this wilderness. Tell me or I'll let the men give you a good flogging with a switch."

"We are lost," said Nettie.

"Lost! How come you who are peasants and who ought to know the whole country around about be lost. It's a black handed lie. You are little girls disguised as boys, and if I'm not mistaken you are spies. You will have to come along with us and give a better account of yourselves. Why the idea. Telling us such a fib. Here get on the horses, and mark my words if you try to make a break you won't hesitate in shooting you down."

The little girls obeyed at once and impatient over this the men forthwith hustled them on their horses, with no little gentleness, and then the column of horsemen continued on their way, but instead of northward as the little girls expected they went on southward.

"Off with these clothes," said the officer and the girls. "You have your own underclothes. Go on and don't delay about it either." Violet and her sisters had to obey but they never felt so humiliated in their lives, for all they really had on was their thinner inside clothing, and when they had followed the instructions the soldiers were surprised at the strange and appalling beauty of the little girls.

They are extraordinary children, and I believe we are making a mistake in being harsh to them," said the Captain surveying the beautiful little girls. "Some children. Don't be fools. We are not devils and won't eat you up. Tell us who you are and why you were found in this wilderness."

"If we were to die like dogs we could and would tell nothing different," answered Violet. "And if you are telling us the truth you would not dispute us either. You men look like Californians but we doubt you are. You are Glandelinians. I'll bet imposing as Californians."

"Indeed we ain't no Glandelinians," retorted the captain grabbing her gently by the arm. "We see our own mistake now and believe you. But how come you to be lost in the wilderness. We are anxious to know."

Violet told him all that had happened.

"Yes we know of that serious disaster," said the captain fiercely.

"It was general Hunsley's fault really. He did he wait until morning, and let the enemy attack him. I belong to general Henry Dargers army. For children must have been fugitives for many days. But now don't start to cry. We can see that you little girls are mighty hungry, and as soon as we reach camp we see what we can do."

The cavalry rode onward, and after an hours riding came within sight of a long line of tents in the wilderness, and soon a number of redcoats were rushing up, and demanding who the fair prisoners were.

the men shrugged their shoulders with the answer;

"They didn't tell us."

Violet and her sisters were helped to dismount for they were faint with hunger, and a hasty meal was immediately prepared for them. The soldiers did not know what to supply them for clothing, and so after they had finished eating, they brought the little girls before the general as they were. He knew them right away.

"Well boys," he cried. "This is indeed a surprise for me and all of you. I suppose you don't know those little girls but I do. They are the daughters of general Vivian."

All of the men gasped in surprise, and then all surged forward to offer their sympathy and congratulations, and one after another many of the soldiers cuddled and embraced the little girls so tightly that they almost winced from pain.

"They were unhappy however for all that and crying as if their hearts would break out," said;

"We are safe, but we don't know what has become of poor Jennie and Catherine."

"Ha, ha cheer up little dears, you are only crying over spilt milk," laughed the good nature. "Surely god would not let them come to harm at all. They were brought here safely to me by a large column of Abbeabukilians who never deserted them, and who when pursued slew all the pursuers every time they appeared. They are both recovering, and so you won't need to cry any more. And think little girls another good news. All of general Hunsley's army was not routed. Only a portion. My brother August Darger was advancing in the region at the time, and he came up with the army he had took Hunsley's place after he fell, covered the retreat of as many of the soldiers, as possible and withdrew the rest of the badly beaten army in good order. Over a hundred miles of ground has been regained by the foe but we never should let that worry us. We'll win again. All we look for is the recovery of Hunsley and Evans who are in the hospitals in Angolia to which they had been sent."

Nevertheless the little girls were fairly run down by their experience and they were allowed to go to the bedroom of the generals and get a well needed rest, where they again cried themselves to sleep, with poor Jennie and Catherine. General Darger had all that meanwhile sent troops out by the thousands and those who had picked them up, and had been on the hunt for Violet and her sisters, but though they picked up the little girls, had not recognized them at first, and so supposed them to be mere Glandelinian children who were prowling around the region to obtain information for the enemy. General Darger was sorry for the little girls, and did not know at first what to do. To three of the little girls he gave him own bed, and slept on the floor, and made in it as comfortable as he could for the little girls. It was a tragedy that had happened to them all right, and he felt a lump arise in his throat as he the next morning bent over the fair children whose cheeks were still tear stained.

Jennie and Catherine had recovered thanks to the goodness of providence and had been reunited to their sisters after many weeks of separation. He did not wake them as he intended that they should sleep as long as they could. He had heard tremendous news about the disaster to the two non-sterous Christian armies, and had felt terribly about it. Two armies had been beaten severely by a vastly inferior force, their two main commanders wounded and millions of prisoners even massacred by the victorious foe. The whole of Abbeabukil had heard of this tremendous reverse in Glandelin, and the government was at a loss of what to do. General Vivian also having heard of the disaster was flabbergasted, and so was King Cannon and he advised general Vivian by message to have the little girls sent immediately to Abbeabukil before it was too late. In the note to general Vivian he said;

"Your excellency general Vivian."

The armies under generals Evans and your brother Hanson, Vivian have been disgracefully defeated, with exorbitating losses and scattered widely in every direction, and disorganized in the most terrible manner. I have heard of the Glorinda disaster to the end enemy at the end of that battle, but the defeat of the Abbeabukilian armies under Evans and general Hanson as wild reports show was ten times worse. It even seems as if all is lost, but nevertheless we can try now if opportunity takes its chance. I do advise you to have your little daughters taken back to Abbeabukil before its too late, for I'm positively sure the enemy will at last slay them yet. Don't be a fool, and do as I advise. The enemy are bound to get the little girls and I'm sure they will get them. They were nearly captured during that last great and frightful struggle. Surely there will be a chance for the enemy yet if you are not careful about your poor little daughters. And even now they are fugitives, and general Darger is trying his utmost to locate them with his vast cavalry forces. And what is the matter with your great old Will Zimmerman? Why don't he do something, and try and retake Trieste too, and recover all the ground regained by the Glandelinian armies. Surely he is the man who can do the winning. Can't depend all upon general Evans."

KING GANNON."

In the meantime evil forebodings were hanging over the whole scene of war. All of the Abbeismian armies had heard of the ruthless massacre of christian soldiers during the frightful battle of Henrietta Junction, and were fully aroused beyond describing, especially the plight of violet and her sisters aroused Dargers army the worse. Darger did not think of starting anything but a day later after the Vivian Girls had entered his own lines, he could see the threatening attitude of his men and decided that it was right any how to let them have their way. It was Dargers wish anyway to see it done for reparation of what the scenes had been in northern Angelina and throughout the whole of Galverinia. His army were all Abyssinians, killians, no Abbeismians, men who in a fury were impossible to restrain, that no officers could do anything with, and though they were brave, their looting looks and actions were suspicious to da Darger and he knew that trouble was brewing indeed. Finally he said to all his officers:

"I see how the army of soldiers in my command is doing. They no doubt have been aroused over the plight of the poor little girls more, and of the massacre of women and children, men and priests, and soldiers during the battle just waged at Henrietta Junction, and so I wish you to tell them, then that they are at liberty to do what they please, on this situation, but that I do not want them to harm Glandelinian children unless they cannot convey overt it. But whatever they wish otherwise, tell them go to it with all the fury they can muster. Here after I'll not object to anything if possible. If we are to worst Glandelinia as this war we will have to resort to the harshest methods. We have not been following out our commands in the first place, and one one tenth the damage has been done in Glandelinia compared to that done in Galverinia alone. So tell them to go to it when ever they wish. I'll do all I can to help them at that."

In the meantime he went to see if the little girls were yet asleep, and found them getting up, and dressing themselves. He sat down by the bed and taking poor Nettie and little Violet in his arms said:

"The men are aroused to fiery fury over the plight of your little girls, and there is no telling what will be done. I have told them to go ahead and resort to all the fury they can. We have not done our work well anyway." Indeed Violet and her sisters had a beautiful Christmas day. Witnessing two bloody, and frightful disasters, made fugitives, for two weeks, and having the true knowledge that they would be separated from their parents for a terrible long time and also from each other because they both had been severely wounded..... They received no gift gifts, because none could be obtained, and yet they bore all this meekly without a murmur different from the many millions of children who had no christmases for over three years, and who complained bitterly about it and cried their eyes out because they had received no gifts.

All of the soldiers felt sorry for poor Violet and her sisters, and did their best to cheer them up, giving them gift gifts of their own kind, and telling them that soon their faithful friend general Jack Evans would come back again to resume command.....

In the meantime a debatement was held between the councils of Abbeismian and Angelina, on which proved himself during the war to be the best of all the christian generals. Any he had their opinion of opinion that Will Zimmerman was the best able commander of the lot, despite his rank, that general Gannon was next to him, general Vivian came first of all and that Danson and general Evans was the weakest generals of them all. Through examinations of the outcomes of the war, it was seen by the various battles taken notice of, that general Jack Evans had been more responsible for and it was also held that if it had not been for the doing of general Evans, Danson and Robert Vivian, the invasion of the enemy's country would never have happened again, and that the enemy would have won the war at the very battle along the Archange Run.

Thus they came to the conclusion that whole three were alike not greater than either one, but that general Evans alone proved himself to be the worse enemy Glandelinia ever had. The debatement had been held for the reason of the various passages of the christian invasion, and that it was intended to remove the christian general responsible for the disaster that had occurred. But no one was found guilty, it was realized, by predictions of all newspapers of all nations of the sudden and frightful fury of the Glandelinian soldiers, that during the invasion of the christian countries, in the early parts of the war the enemy had allowed themselves to be overwhelmed in every battle, because they had been wise wisely retaining most of their best fighters, the Mc-Hollesstinians, Omarians, and Zimmermannians at home, and these were thrown upon the christians in full force when the invasion had gotten considerable headway, and that these three kinds of Glandelinian Glandelinians the worse of all the fighters had put up such furious battles that only the armies under the two Dargers, and Will Zimmerman never lost ground. At all other points the invasion was really completely broken, for the christian armies already having broken across the Angelinian boundary line, and that a new invasion of the christian countries was threatening. Zimmerman and the other two generals with their armies were in dire peril, and had been advised to withdraw from the enemy's territory before all the Glandelinian armies came and concentrated against them in all their most overwhelming numbers, but the three generals were determined not to back out under any conditions, being confident that if the others could not push the game through to a final end they could and would at whatever cost.

THEIR armies were no doubt enormously large, large enough to repel large Glandelinian armies, should they attack them, but to hold out against the besieging armies, should they lay siege to the christian armies, was as it seemed in the eyes of the Abbeismian governments an impossibility.....

Knowing that the invasion of the christian armies was completely broken, by the furious resistance of the enemy, the Abbeismian governments, and those of Angelina started work at once. After the battle of Galverinia was over, and when the invasion of Glandelinia started, the many armies of Angelina at the orders of Gannon and King Gannon of Abbeismian had remained at home to repel another invasion. The christian armies, liberated out of Glandelinia, and so when the news spread of this great disaster which had already happened, the Angelinian armies started at once to flock in toward the holy lines, while all those who were in the northern parts started to move forward to take their places. Galverinia was aroused and became apprehensive over this turn in events, and so Abbeismian being anxious and surprised, and also embarrassed before the world that her own troops should be thus handled, decided upon more decided action. She had already the rest of her enlisted men well drilled, having during the invasion sent 200,000,000 men into the struggle. The rest had remained in Galverinia to await developments. Now as the rumors came of a threatening defeat, the whole remainder was ordered to start forward, to help their comrades, and through many Angelinian towns poured the Abbeismian armies, while also apprehensive Abyssinians were mobilizing her own armies to their fullest strength, and sent provisions by the shortest route through Angelina, aimed to the succor of the starving ones.

So though the invasion of the christians had at last really been broken it did not seem to benefit the Glandelinian cause any, for it only aroused the so-called christian countries enraged in this bloody game, and all one force of the nation poured forth through Angelina and were on their way to the boundary line, with the intention of pressing on in the invasion until the enemy of God was crushed.

Violet and her sisters having remained their normal happiness and learning that generals Danson and Evans were speedily on the road of recovery, felt better, and felt more like seeing the thing through, though at first after being taken in by Dargers army the little girls had the strong inclination of offering to go back to Angelina, and thence to Abbeismian, but not see any more of it as long as it seemed as if God's enemy was going to have the upper hand. And when they heard, that Abbeismian had only sent a portion of her armies, before, and was now sending all the armies of men that had enlisted, and that they were pouring in tidal waves for the boundary lines of Angelina, their spirits returned, and they felt like laughing and playing again. Darger was so confronted by the Glandelinian army under general Caluso Aberdeonia, but this general had delayed attacks against this formidable christian enemy so long, in spite of entreaties and threats and commands, from the Glandelinian governments that at last his command had been withdrawn, and general James Smith was giving full command of this Glandelinian army. He tried to draw general Darger into an engagement, and would have succeeded, but now the government knowing what had happened to the other christian armies, ordered him to wait, until all the other Glandelinian armies not engaged would come up surround Darger and help him force the christian general into a surrender. Darger knew the scene of the glandelinian authorities, and decided not to allow himself to be outwitted, in that way, and so he continually kept all of his eagerly awaiting in many parties, to watch every movement of the enemy, and for every movement reported Darger made movements also which flabbergasted the wicked glandelinian generals of the army confronting him.

Violet and her sisters watched the movements of the great christian armies under Darger with awe and amazement. How different he worked than general Evans or general Hanson. No wonder that Darger was a formidable foe. The glandelinian general, Smith was too slow in his actions to satisfy the glandelinian governments, and so he was also withdrawn from command, and general William Schloeder was appointed to take command. He was a formidable foe to the christian armies, though in earlier days Darger and this glandelinian soldier had once been the best of friends, and there had not been hardly a single day or night that they had not seen each other, and had good times among each other.

It was dull days for violet and her sisters. They were alone in a strange strange army, Evans was far away in Angolinda, slowly recovering from his wounds, and no one knew when he would be back, Hanson also away from the armies, and in Angolinda, and his armies still scattered. Violet and her sisters indeed felt lonely and did not even know what to do with themselves. They wished themselves back in their home in Abyssiniana where they had been that time when with Evans before the great and bitter war which was raging now, and also wished that Hanson, or their father had not gone into the strife but had stayed at home. Time and again the tears would fill their eyes, when they thought what had happened to general Jack Evans, and they prayed that he would recover quicker so that something could be done. Within this time they had heard that large portions of Hanson's, and Evans scattered armies had been partially rallied, but that they had not heard of the other divisions yet, and feared they they had fared badly, or been annihilated by roving glandelinian armies and slaughtered. They asked Darger daily for good news but he heard of none, told them that all he heard was that the Abyssinian armies pouring toward the boundary line of Glandelinia and Angolinda had stopped advancing, and that general Hanson's army and that under Evans was without a head, and that it was rumored that William Schloeder by orders of general Vivian through the decree of the Angolinda government was to take command of the two leaderless armies, for there was no telling but it may take many months that Evans would return to resume command of Hanson's army.

This was indeed discouraging news, and later Darger himself was shocked by receiving a note from the Abyssinian government stating that he must abandon the invasion if he valued his army. He answered back,

"No one is to give me orders but general Hanson only. If he orders me or the others to leave the enemy's country I will gladly do so, but not with out orders from him will I do so. I appreciate your good advice, but then I'm going to stick it out no matter what happens. I depend upon Zimmermann to change the scene since he is to assume command of the armies Hanson had been formerly commanding, and if he carries better advantage against the enemy, then I would be a fool and a big goose to abandon the invasion. If you think it is better to do so state your intentions to my superior either general Vivian or Hanson. Without their orders I cannot do anything."

General Henry Darger.

Later on when he learned who the new glandelinian commander was Darger became saddened, because he did not like to clash with his long time friend, who though still fighting on opposite sides, were as firm as friends as ever. Schloeder however did not know who at first commanded, the christian army opposed to him, but he soon learned that the Vivian girls were in his power.

In the possession of the Abyssinians and determined to see into the matter himself. Violet and her sisters were out in a small creek by a wayside and taking a crack in the water, when a large party of glandelinians approached led by general William Schloeder himself. General Schloeder had a red flame in his hat and a ferocious bull as big as a Minotaur charged upon the glandelinians with fury. The soldiers became panic stricken and fled, and the general was badly jeopardized. He was an enemy it is true, but it did not make an difference to violet and her sisters. Jumping out of the creek, the little girls at once rushed to his aid, flinging their own red cloaks which they hastily wrapped around themselves. Seeing the red the bull was still more infuriated, and charged with terrific ferocity right for the little girls, who saved themselves by diving into the deep water which saved them from the bull who dared not try the deepness of the water. He however turned his wrath once again upon the general who had no time to escape but again the little girls were at their work, and this gave the general time to draw his pistols and after five good shots he brought the infuriated beast at last. In the scuffle the little girls were slightly injured, but nothing minor to scratches and small bruises.

The general looked around him in amazement, and then at the little girls. Here these little girls, unarmed had saved him from the fury of the bull, while the party of soldiers with him armed to the teeth had fled to safety leaving him to deal alone with the fierce monster. He had always been a decent general in the first place despite his long service in the glandelinian armies, and he had heard a good deal about the little girls and their ways, and how they had eluded many times their wildest pursuers. At this moment the men still cowering returned one by one until all were there. They were going to make a dash at Violet and her sisters.

"There are the Vivian girls." Cried one of them. "Let's kill them and bring their remains to Manley."

They would surely have easily done it, and cruelly gitted the little girls but just as they had surrounded the little girls Schloeder cried out; "Who has a hair of your heads, dies like a dog. All of you men are cowards black hearted cowards. You had good good feet when the bull attacked me and while you left me alone to the damn beasts mercy, these little girls saved me at their own peril. Get back in ranks and leave them alone."

The men sullenly obeyed, but with downcast eyes as they realized their cowardice.

"This shall be reported to the government." Said Schloeder. "I'll have no cowards within my lines. Your penalty will be death for your desertion in time of peril."

He was about to turn and resume his march when noticing the little girls he said;

"You little girls have gained my everlasting friendship for your deed. I don't know what to do on the matter though for I would like to have you little girls alone with me as prisoners for you are great spies. But it would be ingratitude to take you prisoners so you had better hurry away before any other party of my troopers come along. But would you mind telling me who is the leader of the christian army. I heard he is general Henry Darger a friend of mine in early days. Is it true?"

"Yes." It is general. Answered Violet.

The general said no more but doffed his hat to them and went his way. Later about two days, Violet and her sisters managing each to get a newspaper the glandelinian news were surprised to read this article

"General William Schloeder the formidable glandelinian general and a fighter whom no christian army ever mastered against us for truth could whip has resigned his command because his adversary general Henry Darger commanded the christian army. It is blamed on the Vivian girls more because they showed off before him by saving him from a wild bull which they no doubt place there on purpose as a bait. Glandelinia has lost the last of our best generals on account of that little set of devils in beautiful forms, whom has gained this general's everlasting friendship and a reward of $456,789,999 will be given to the first man who shoots these little brats down in ambush when not conscious of danger. Their interruption must be stopped."

KING GLANDELIN OF

"So the glandelinian king thinks we put the bull on purpose does he?"

Said Jennie. "Well he is certainly mistaken. He said that just to make slander against us. We know that he resigned more because he would not fight against a friend he loved so well no matter if he is a christian officer. And he acted wisely for doing so. A brave friend who fights a fight even even in time of war is no friend."

Violet and her sisters went at once to general Darger and one of the little girls showed him the article. It indeed does seem strange indeed that these little girls could act so familiar with every christian general no matter who over he is as if they were their own daughters, but no good were these little girls that all of the generals had wished ardently that they were their own and always received them gladly. Darger loved violet and her sisters as strongly as Evans did though he hardly had them in his embraces embrace as yet.....!!!!!!

General Darger was surprised when he saw this report in the paper, and was also glad for a friend had refused to fight a friend, and had also forbade his wicked soldiers from harassing the little girls at the same time.

"It's good news," said general Darger. "But just the same you had better look out for yourselves. The enemy will surely try to get you now since the reward is so great."

"But rewards were offered for our capture all the time, and they never got us yet," answered Violet. "We do take care of ourselves. We know the rules of Manley despite the fact we shot him. He does not slacken up and we are on the watch. The foe would give anything to destroy us."

It was evidently perfect to general Darger that there was nothing whatever that could daunt the little girls, and he did not know what to make of their bravery at all. To him the little girls were not mere children. They seemed children with natures beyond comprehension, and whose bravery out-rivaled the fiercest lions, nay a score of tigers could not have the fury that the little girls could show when aroused by so many wicked Glandelinians as to they had done so often before. He also almost feared the little girls himself. Pretty indeed as the prettiest angels, graceful in every form, but their looks showed indeed what they really were, and there was a peculiar light in their eyes which showed danger lurking there. Many of the Glandelinians when they saw the little girls, had did not with a little dread, and there is no doubt if it had not been for their reckless officers urging them on, they would have turned tail and bolted at the first sight of the little girls.

They were always conscious that no time could they ever be or even stay the little girls. Even the worse of the Glandelinian generals wondered who indeed were these children they pursued so often with fierce and desperate efforts to take or slay, and yet with no success whatever, and only lost many of their soldiers during the pursuit. Darger indeed admired Violet and her sisters, and at their first appearance he had been overawed, but nevertheless he had not been like Roswell Buxton Johnston, overawed, and had moved to them on the very first moment they came to him.

He had longed to fold them in his strong arms, but this he did not exactly have the nerve to do, and yet he felt the desire almost irresistible. He had heard every detail of the experiences of the little girls now before him, how they outwitted the enemy so often, how much they suffered how they had been almost assassinated at the bloody battle of Brigano, and hundreds of other things already described in the story. He wondered how they could have endured it all as they did. During the early part of the morning he asked them many questions, about themselves before the war ever broke out, and many other things over described or not described.

Then he asked them just for fun to see what the answer would be, which of them all was the worst worse for the foe to tackle.

"Gertrude Angelina is," was their universal answer, before Gertrude could say a word. We were really good girls, more than angels she called all the time, every day of the war, and though missing for a long time never was a prisoner as we had heard when false rumors told about her capture. We know of her depredations because we read it in the papers, and she fairly terrified the enemy who strove with greater efforts to catch her than they did us, and never succeeded in doing anything to her when they did take her."

"I don't like to brag about it, but to be honest, I'll have to admit that it is all too true," said Gertrude. "It's my bravery that brought general Vivian to me. I'm a good and holy father to adopt me as one of his own and include me as one of the dearest of little girl friends. But then I escaped all the misery when they did not. They suffered, while I suffered once when spring on the enemy, and getting out unharmed by four desperate assaults, when I killed and escaped from just the same. Their lives were harder than mine and so they deserve all the credit and not me."

"All of you are just as good," said general Darger, "I wish to draw the little girl into his arms. This is the first time that I ever saw your little girl's face to face, but nevertheless I knew both general Vivian, and Hanson his brother when we ourselves were children. We were content to be, ever known among the children there, and never once in our lives had a single cross word."

"My sisters never quarrel quarreled either," said Gertrude, speaking for them herself. And neither have I ever quarreled with them, except one day unintentionally when not recognizing them I came near shooting them as Glandelinian boy scouts. They had some difficult work proving to me who they were, and only their disarming their disguises before my eyes changed our cross words."

"But it could not be helped," said Violet. "There ain't a single one among us that can't be too careful when so many wicked and wicked enemies are hunting for us. It showed that you were careful who you were meeting with, as well know ourselves from experiences that the Glandelinian boy scouts are more dangerous than the Glandelinian soldiers themselves."

Violet and her sisters felt at home with this great Christian general who they had only seen this first time, but just the same they wished that general Evans was well again, for they missed him more than ever now, as well as both their uncles and father. General Vivian's army was really another army not driven out of Glandelinia but his was further north than any of the other three. But early that morning the little girls had heard that a portion of the Abbeinnian fleet, bearing toward the boundary line, had swopt down across, and that general Vivian was having his army increased so in immensely that he had to send an appeal for the help of more generals as he alone could not perfectly command so great an army as he had now. And he had received in the shortest time possible forty six well commissioned general officers, many who having been wounded during the war and who having recovered with returning, especially all who had been wounded in any of the battles were well enough to return to resume command, and soon general Vivian himself had the biggest army that any single Christian general ever had before, bigger than any army that even fought at Florida.

Hanson's army had been rallied, and so had those under Evans, and these two being formed into one, and being also reinforced by Abbeinnians, was still commanderless as Zimmermann did not like to take the place of general Evans, but from his own hospital in the city of Pandora general Evans wrote to Zimmermann this telegram:

"My friend general William Darger Zimmermann;

Outside of myself or general Hanson, and Vivian there is probably no better general than you. Be wise and accept the rank of officer office given you. You have proven yourself a great soldier, and deserve this best of commissions. It's my wish and Hanson's, and even general Vivian's, and the dear little adopted sisters of mine that you assume command, and push on to recover all the ground that I have lost. I have been whipped again, I must admit it, but then it has cost dear to the enemy, and I know from true reports all around the world, that the enemy are only on the last stages of desperation, are badly played out, and that improbably another six months they will themselves be laying down their arms and begging for peace and mercy. If you are the friends of my little sisters, their two real good brothers, and of the two holy generals who I trusted more to you than any one else you will take the command. Abbeinnia herself depends only on you general Zimmermann for success, and so I advise you to go ahead and assume command. It will do you good too, and probably you'll get the chance of taking care of the little girls until I return."

GENERAL JACK AMBROSE EVANS."

Getting this telegram from Evans was the final. Zimmermann immediately assumed command, and did not lay idle either. He immediately started forward, making a strong advance and so thickly was the Abbeinnians pouring behind him that his very army seemed to the Glandelinian army as opposed to him to have no end whatever.

Violet and her sisters were happy when they heard that Zimmermann had taken the command of the armies and that he and their father both were advancing again and that the enemy was retreating before heavy and over-whelming numbers once again, and that many armies were also also preparing to pour over the boundary line. General Darger advised Violet and her sisters each to write a letter to Evans, and they told him that they did so, and were expecting an answer from him, and even Uncle in a few more days.

"We asked him to hurry and get well again," said Violet. "We told him and even Uncle and told him to come safe in your lines, and that we hoped that they would soon come close enough to that we can be together again and never be separated. Till"

In fact it was the last time that general Hanson or Robert Vivian, and Evans would be separated from these dear little girls. Glandelinia was really driven to the last stages, and it was evident that no more successes would be won by her for now the armies of Abbeinnia and Angelina together with the Abbeinnians and Glandelinians were meeting across the boundary

Due to reason the broken human, Darger desired to make an advance, but he got no orders to do so, and so had to wait. The enemy carefully would not attack him because his army was so heavily armed, and as Darger did not advance against the nothing doing he could be done.

Later on, while the armies under Zimmermann and the others were lagging to advance again, Darger received reports that general Lord Van Gloom who had taken general y William Schloers place was making strange movements, and Violet and her sisters who had been out scouting saw the same movements, and reported it to the other Christian generals themselves. Whether the enemy intended to attack or not, Darger did not know, but nevertheless their movements was certainly suspicious, and so general Darger decided to have the enemy watched.

Darger was not conscious that Violet and her sisters were scouting on the enemy, and so going out on a scouting tour. He suddenly came upon the little girls in the act of signalling a new movement which they had observed among the enemy's lines.

"Why what are you little girls doing out here?" He said. "Are you the persons that are giving all the warning to my officers?"

Violet and her sisters were surprised at his sudden appearance but nevertheless they answered him right enough telling him all the truth from start to finish.

"You little girls are peculiar indeed," He said. "And don't you feel not the slightest fear of being discovered by the enemy? You know they can destroy your lives even at this distance."

Violet and her sisters surprised him still more by giving a chirping laugh.

"We know no fear but of God," answered Violet. "Why should we fear the wicked enemies of God? We never did before, and never do now. It's our duty to scout on them anyway, since the government generals forbid us to spy and so we went on this scouting tour."

Darger did not say anything for several minutes and then he said: "You little girls are I believe responsible for every victory our Christians have won during the war, and the papers had said so too. What are the names of the enemy are making?"

"Just look and see general for yourself," said Gertrude Annelise. "I think that they are intending to give you battle."

Darger watched the enemy movements carefully and then said:

"It's a heavy demonstration they are making. I'm positive they are trying to draw us into attacking them. I will attack them, but with my artillery only if they act too suspicious. Better we allow you little girls and return to the lines before the enemy—"

BOOM! BOOM! BOOM! BOOM! BOOM! BOOM! Two shells exploded close to where they were all standing and the horse general Darger was mounted on staggered and fell, the general hurrying just quick enough to prevent himself from being caught under the horse's body and all.

The general however was not injured, and quickly jumping on his feet up to the little girls to hurry for safety.

"Jump on behind me," shouted Violet. "We'll make a get away before they fire their guns again."

The general did so and away the whole party dashed and just in time for two more shells exploded just where they had been before. The artillery of the one enemy tried to get the range of the fugitive, trying to follow them with the shells but in vain, they escaped, and soon they were within the Christian lines, and Darger gave warning to his officers to be on the lookout.

"It's a demonstration they are making," He said. "But Violet and her sisters were out scouting on them, and I got out too discovered them, and a short conversation, were discovered and had to dash away for my very lives as the enemy let loose their cannon upon us, though it seems only to be merely a demoralization, just the same don't allow those dirty Glandelinians down to take any of your commands by surprise."

Violet and her sisters had indeed discovered the movement of the enemy, but it however was a preparation for attack for the enemy did not think it wise or safe to storm general Darger's lines just then. Violet and her sisters listened for several hours expecting to hear the sound of firing but nothing happened, and just then an officer came riding up and inquired for the little girls. He was shown to their place and he asked them and gave a letter for each of you little girls, one from general Hanson, and another from Evans and general Vivian."

"Oh the kids," cried the little girls as they craned the precious envelope long.

The soldier then saluted them and left the room. The little girls opened the envelope and read the letters first to themselves and then to each other. Evans and Hanson told the little girls that they were asking quick recovery, and also that the Abbeinnian, Glandelinian, Glandelinian, and Glandelinian armies were pouring over on the Glandelinian boundary line, and that it was expected that the war would soon be closed. They also stated matters of love and affection, and many other things too long to state here, but the letter from Hanson or general Vivian meant their father was home!

"I

"To my beloved little daughters;

"I have found out that you little girls escaped capture when the two Christian armies were defeated at Glandelinia and have reached general Darger's lines safely. I'm perfectly thankful to God and the Blessed Mother that they have guarded you so safely here, but I'm worrying about some things. General the Abbeinnian King advised me to send you little girls to Abbeinnia, and I thought I would write and let you know about it.

"For my part I do not wish to do so, as you little girl I know do not want to go, but Hanson fears for your safety, and I really don't know what to do. Since the invasion of our armies, and the frightful defeat of the Glandelinian armies, at Legum Zoe Rae Run, Francis Atlanta, and Glandelinia the Glandelinians have become filled with the stubborn fury of desperation and despair, and so greater ferocity in battles than before, and have massacred hundreds of thousands of the Christian soldiers who were prisoners among them. I have written to general Ambrose Evans your good guardian about the advisement of general Hanson, and see what his opinion is. If Evans approves of it I believe you little girls had better take the best of it to Abbeinnia as soon as possible. But wait until he writes of it. Not sooner.

Your loving father

General Robert Vivian."

Violet and her sisters were astonished when they read this letter, given in person to little Jonnie his most favorite, and though they at first felt strongly opposed to going, they did not wish to disobey, and probably King Hanson would be right. Something might happen to them, if the Glandelinians win the war. So they decided to wait until general Evans wrote to them on the matter, and if he advised them to go then all right. They showed the letter to general Darger.

"If general Evans advises us in the next letter you had better do so," said general Darger.

"We would have to do so," said Violet. "It's not that we don't want to leave Glandelinia. But if we run away from the country, just because of danger are we not playing the game of cowards. Any one else may tell us to go we won't but if Evans says so I suppose we'll have to, for they will send for us anyhow."

So they waited patiently and nervously for the next letter, expectant of course what would be the report. The letter came soon enough however but it was not from Evans.

It was from general Hanson and it ran as follows:

Dear little voices;

"I got word from Evans that General Hanson of Abbeinnia advised general Vivian to have you little girls withdrawn from Glandelinia on account of the threatening situation. I've already wrote him, that if advises are to be given, it must be to me. He and I and my brother are the best of friends, but I do not want any orders given to general Robert Vivian who is to give orders, and not to take. NO, do not leave Darger's army. It will be cowardice to do and the whole world will think badly of it and lose their consideration for you little girls. Stick to the post no matter what happens. If danger becomes too great, then of course we'll come ourselves and remove you and then no one can think anything.

Your uncle
Hanson viv' an."

This letter cheered the little girls up. They knew that Hanson always knows the best and so they decided to follow his advice hereafter.

HOW GLANDOLINIAN SEA POWER WAS BROKEN FOR EVER.

Chapter 25. September

In the meanwhile while the first portion of the bloody christian invasion had been in full progress, severe conflict had raged around the western and eastern coasts of the country of Glandolinia.....The first great sea battle was fought before the town of Cartage-Sargonda, when the Abbeannian admiral Assurine rained his fleet of six thousand battle ships, and three hundred dreadnaughts and tried to storm the fortified harbor. He had kept up the attack on the fortifications for three weeks, but he lost sixty three ships and 10,000 men and with this immense loss he had to retire. Struttan equally Captain Xerxes annihilated the giant Glandolinian fleet under galunis at the battle of spartanda, where the Glandolinians lost in drowned and slain over 45,000 men.

Along the western Glandolinian coast in the great Glandolinian harbor of Kaerkyarann the Abbeannian fleet under Pyloos was destroyed, and a few miles further south simultaneously a large glandolinian squadron under Flandonia blockaded the harbor of Sandemmer into which an Abbeannian fleet had sailed until the great admiral Zimmermann arrived with his fleet and annihilated all the glandolinian ships. The survivors had to land in the quarries of Abbeannia. Only a few broken glandolinian dreadnaughts returned ingloriously to their naval base.

Along the southwestern coast the Abbeannians once smashed the Glandolinians at Kolynoss. The last of the glandolinian fleets were reduced to ashes or sunk in this quarter by the rains of the Abyssinkillians. The first wonderful sea battle of the southern coast in the Mc-Whirbidian seas was the struggle for the seaport of Archbades, whose fortifications and shore batteries threw a storm of huge projectiles upon the Abbeannian boats, and set the wooden war cruisers on fire by means of burning glasses, firebombs, and fire rafts, and sinking many ships by such submarines and lifting them out of the water and throwing them on the shore with the aid of huge iron cranes. It took the Abbeannians fully four weeks to conquer this sea port which contained a terrific fire of a hundred cannon with unceasing fury, but the Abbeannian admiral managed to protect his fleet in the glandolinian harbor by a fourfold row of anchored cuthans on which an army of cannons reloaded the enemy and blew battery upon battery into the air and tore the fortifications to pieces. This proud glandolinian sea port lost all the ships out of 56,789 dreadnaughts except in this thundrous sea fray and the whole city had sunk into ruins before it surrendered. In killed and wounded both sides lost 67,990.

Admiral Golbert a few weeks later had exterminated the famous Glandolinian fleets at the seaport of Grete Caesar, and also defeated the Glandolinian fleet at the north of the Eruinde, in the northern coast of Glandolinia, and who also steamed along the whole coast, toward the eastern seaports, and defeated and annihilated the Glandolinian fleet which fought against him at gardenia town and two days later in another desperate sea fight gained a final victory over his enemies. At the battle of glandolinia Cape both sides had fired like furious cannon battles for thirteen hours tearing each other's ships to pieces, and both sides drew off completely. Simultaneously the glandolinian border pillaged the glandolinian coast in the west as well as along the southern and eastern coasts, burned the city of Etrading, and plundered other towns and villages.

Along the northern shore at the town of Gellie the Glandolinian fortifications for three weeks held against the besieging fleets throwing a storm of fire bombs, and sending thousands of fire rafts down upon the attacking fleets every day. The poisonous miasms were thrown upon the assailants who tried to land and also scorching and millions of human beings, and here lives were also piled down upon the Abbeannian assailants, and though the Abbeannians were again and again driven back panic stricken all this did not save the city from the fury of the Abyssinkillians. After a long and terrible struggle the foe lost more than 23,456 ships out of 24,000, 15,000,000 child slaves were set free and 1,000 liberated from the Glandolinians. The Glandolinians lost over 11,000 boats and 3,000,000 in dead and 2,000,789 in wounded.

One of the most desperate of the sea fights raged in the bay of Pasha where Zimmermann with his fleet finding the glandolinian squadrons opened the battle at once. During two whole days and nights hundreds of thousands of guns roared in titan clangors. Zimmermann's flagship the Abbeannian ran aground, twenty other Abbeannian battle ships were badly damaged, the Glandolinian flagship the Hickenville was crushed ten war cruisers were set aflame, and three of the Glandolinian admirals lost a leg, an arm, and his head. Zimmermann's flagship exploded, ten Glandolinian ships surrendered and only four ships escaped. And all this occurred at the very first start of the struggle. When the battle was at its full height the struggle was terrible and the main glandolinian admiral Francois St Glare was killed in the terrible duel of artillery ensuing from both sides, an artillery duel which killed all the fishes of the sea in the region of the watery battlefield. The conflict was finally a victory to the Abbeannians, and the Glandolinian fleet was annihilated.

Since then, up to the time when the invasion of most of the christian armies had been broken, the sea had been quiet from thundering of guns.

Dargers army still lay inactive, and along the whole northern part of the country no action was going on, though armies were advancing and retreating here and there. Violet and her sisters were impatient to hear news from general Zimmermann, but the enemy had refused to struggle any more for a while but had continued to retreat, and kept dragging the new christian armies further and further into the country, when if they had stood ground instead of retreating they could have held the invasion at bay after having broken it. But most of the Glandolinians did not like to contest ground against Zimmermann and his other scattered armies now under commanders as fierce a fighter as himself.

General Vivian was also advancing without meeting opposition and excitement prevailed everywhere. True enough no matter how hard they fought or no matter how bravely, the Angelitians, and even the fierce and never beaten Abbeannians had met with disasters upon disasters, and had been reversed in successive many times, but to Glandolinia it was nevertheless a hopeless case. The wicked win first, the good God gives a hard licking in turn. So with the monstrous christian armies who through out the main part of the war had waged so many battles in Northern, Southern Western and Eastern Calverland and Angelinda from coast to coast. They had made a second desperate invasion into Glandolinia, the invasion had been broken and most of the apparently victorious christians hurried back across their own boundary, except the Arids under the Dargers, Zimmermann, and General Robert Vivian, and back they had come tenfold stronger than before and now with seemingly irresistible force. The invasion had been several and seriously broken but did not stay broken.

Finally general Darger got the order from the wounded Vivian general to press on himself and so he decided to start his army forward as soon as possible. Two days later after receiving the order Darger started his whole army on the march, but had to soon stop as the enemy confronting him was different than the other Glandolinian armies and would not retreat, but threatened fierce opposition.

General Darger received reports that the actions of the enemy was very menacing and so he had to halt his advance, and then further on had received rumors that no portion of the enemy's army had given way when he had started his advance, and had he tried to continue his advance a terrible battle would have raged without reason or preparations.

Darger decided to push on however and so early the next morning moved a large part of his army forward to show the enemy that he was bound to advance and that he would not let all hell stop him. Violet and her sisters who had been out scouting knew from what they observed that the Glandolinian army opposed to Darger would never retreat without a serious disaster to their own side, and seeing that Darger was moving forward a great portion of the army went further on to scout better and saw that the enemy were massing strong batteries of artillery, and also crowding before the advancing troops a multitude of infantry lines and cavalry.

Voices who had the fleetest horse rushed to the nearest signal station and signaled to the christian officers what she and her sisters had seen, and then riding back to her sisters gave them directions and off they all went to signal the warning to general Darger, as they knew what a fighter this Glandolinian army was. They were all Mc-Hollistians, all old timers who fought under general Calverland-Sherman before he resigned his command.

They managed to warn him, and so he halted the advance of the force that started forward, and started a scouting tour himself. He first went alone then encountering the little girls they all drew as near to the enemy's lines as possible and examined the whole position. The line of works extended almost for many miles away as far as eye could reach, and it seemed that possibly the enemy was stronger than the christian army under general Darger.

THE BATTLE OF AYA MARIA. A CHRISTIAN DEFEAT, ONCE AGAIN AND THE LAST FAREWELL, DISASTER TO THE WHOLE WAR. DARGERS ARMY IS ALMOST DESTROYED."

Two hours later to the surprise of general Dargers an overwhelming force of the enemy led by general Banderline made a sudden and desperate assault upon his whole entire line at once and cut the first line of christian infantry to pieces in the shortest time possible.

At first the fiercest charges of the glandelinians could not force back the human barrier. The battle however within two hours after it had begun raged in deadly earnest, and in counter charges both sides plunged at each other with awful ferocity and committed regular massacres, but every time the enemy got the better of the christian troops and hurled them back with still greater loss. Dargers realizing the ferocity of the attack started massing all his available batteries and fresh forces to the defense of his position, and while already seventeen hundred christian cannon were moving across immense gaps in the enemy lines, general Dargers right wing was rallying the portions driven back in confusion, and then three grad divisions followed by a strong supporting column of savarly charged furiously upon the Glandelinian assailants.

General pressed the Abbieannians and Angolians and along with the surprised Glandelinians, but they were gradually brutal hurled back by christian numbers.

The Glandelinian artillerymen had in the meantime dug up all their artillery light and heavy and these opened with great intensity ploughing the whole christian line through and through, and suffering terribly from the sanguinary loss the Abbieannians at many points started to retire from their positions, and the Glandelinians completely reckless went onward and drove all back to the distance of ten miles within an hour's time. The other section of the Abbieannian line fought like millions of tigers for blow to blow. The Glandelinians had brought up their full batteries and a full ten thousand Glandelinian cannon was now in action causing dreadful destruction among the christian lines. General Dargers 10,176 guns opened simultaneously upon the enemy without effort whatever, and as three divisions of Abbieannian infantry dashed across the farm grounds to repel the assault from there they met a most killing fire which tore their main line to fragments, and simultaneously a division of Angolians who threat end to assail themselves guns on the brow of a small hill faced annihilation right then and there and had to recoil. At the same time on to the right as if moving straight against the right grand division of Dargers army pushed forward the Glandelinian battalions of death. Then over the works as if impatient of the strife at long range rushed all the Glandelinian veterans with fixed bayonets. The struggle was now more deadly and became a wholesale massacre, and in the meanwhile general Hendro perceiving the command dash of the left wing of the Glandelinian army signalled to general Dargers to have his own main batteries shell these assailing waves of men in gray. The artillery along other portions of the christian line thundered continuously, and fearful was the havoc among the charging Glandelinian surges but with a wild soul thrilling cry the Glandelinians continued to rush on and into the shattered ranks of the Abbieannians they burst firing a series of murderous volleys point blank and then closing with the survivors death death and ghastly wounds with their sabres bayonets and pikes at every stride. The Abbieannian veterans after fighting with the most terrific fury ever known imagined before and having no success as the foe continually concentrated heavily against them, broke and fled as if from the men throwing away their firearms in the fearful panic as they flocked back to the rear of the line. Then with the most terrific fury the Glandelinian savarly dashed rushing through the Abbieannian lines in their headlong charge, throwing horse and rider into awful confusion and causing the most terrible carnage ever seen inflicted by Glandelinian savarly before. As the whole line of entire Glandelinian savarly moved on in their irresistible attack, another part of the Abbieannian line with still holding was desperately assailed and made such a furious and stubborn resistance that the advancing Glandelinian cavalry and infantry nearly swept it out of existence after a terrible struggle.

General Hategood was in command of this immense charging wave of Glandelinian troopers and infantry, and one half of his wave was steering quietly to the rear of the christian line. This gallant Glandelinian officer who had been in many severe conflicts before and who had come face to face with general Evans in one great battle had noticed a good position of the rear to be weakened, and the idea came at once to the Glandelinian general that to strike a blow here at once would immediately end the battle and crush the christian army beyond rally.

General Hategood made up his mind to strike the rear of Dargers army at 3350. While doing so, and so ordering the wave to radiate the attack along the several positions of the christian lines he pushed the rear under along the brow of the lowest hills under cover of dense woods. General Hategood had his eye on every part of the battle field. The attack came upon the rear unlight and though the whole line stood its ground it was completely annihilated and the Glandelinians pouring now from two directions at once placed Dargers small army between two fires. The Glandelinians charged with such fury that they forced many of the shattered Abbieannian columns in between the furious Mc-Hollistinians under Evans, and the surviving Abbieannian army was thrown into a confused mass, hundreds of thousands throwing down their arms and surrendering even to their Glandelinian foes. Then before general Dargers could rally his men the Glandelinian savarly came dashing upon them with pistol and sword, and general Dargers seeing it in vain to rally and reform his shattered division yelled as he beheld the slaughter of his forces;

"RETREAT. RETREAT. And dash this way. All who can."

About five hundred thousand of the Abbieannians rushed out of the frightful frightful holocaust to death after their general who was fleeing toward the higher hills. Pursue them and capture the living girls. Yelled Evans as many of the Abbieannians close by fell upon their knees with their hands upraised as if in prayer and pleaded for quarter quarter but received none. The remainder of the christian army which had been almost destroyed was swiftly pursued. General Dargers now was now starting to advance with Evans far to the front already when a Glandelinian officer came galloping up and cried;

"Hold hold. The main commander orders me to tell you to charge a stronger or stronger greater position in the rear of that hill and take the remainder of the Abbieannian cannon planted there. Our gallant forces have taken the heights and the fortifications on the backs of the Aya Maria and all the Abbieannian divisions driven from it are retreating in the wildest confusion and panic toward the nearest hills. He wished to have their retreat cut off and have Dargers army surrounded as quickly as possible. Hurry hurry."

"Oh heater is praised." Yelled the Glandelinian commanders as they threw their swords aloft and caught them again. "Hurrah boys hurrah, and dash with me in full gallop toward the artillery still in possession of the christian dogs. The Glandelinians will strike a telling blow for Glandelinia. Now hurrah for the cause boys. Long live our King and country."

And loud and piercing was the Glandelinian "Devil Yell" sent up by the Glandelinian savarly men as they dashed away, while down on the panic stricken Abbieannians from the adjoining hills rushed the regular Glandelinian divisions surrounding Dargers army completely.

The Abbieannian battalions backed by the remaining battery of guns repelled the Glandelinian charge but Hanson's Mc-Hollistinians made a precipitate dash at the bat batteries, and while the savarly were pressing the Abbieannian line on the left sending forth thrilling yells of victory at every stride and pouring a furious fire into the confused multitudes, causing a fearful panic the Abbieannians though overwhelped in numbers could not withstand that brilliant assault and they broke and fled toward the remainder of the retreating army in a shameful and utter rout.

The christian division under general Violatline had lost 117,000 in this frightful battle which only lasted six hours. Jennings had lost 200,000, Joice St. Clare 175,000 and Glandelin 250,000. Generala Revillon, Mc-Gunn, Mc-Cantler and Donald had lost 500,000 and general Hanson Grentheart, 185,222 in killed and wounded and 28,000 in prisoners who had been ruthlessly slain by the wicked Glandelinians. General para Hot Lie Francis had lost 211,000 and Lord Eriest and Lord Child 312,222. Under nine lost 345,000 in killed, and 500,000 in wounded. Paterwin lost 400,000 in killed and wounded and John Evans Hanson 100,000. Two other generals Overtherton and Baldline lost 350,000 in wounded and 100,000 in killed. Frank Rob lost 170,000 in killed and 300,000 in wounded, and the rest 3,400,000. The total loss was 3,764,444 in killed and wounded alone. 3,000,000 had been made prisoners leaving a final total of 75,764,440. The Glandelinian loss in killed and wounded was 10,555,447.

Surrounded as his army had been Dargers by means of most desperate efforts had extricated it out of the trap and got over the hills easily but he had lost all of his artillery, 55,799,999 muskets, and 10,000,000 pistols, and over three quarters of his army which had been 73,000,000 strong the smallest of Abbieannian army then in Glandelinia. The Glandelinian army opposed to him had only been 73,000,000 strong and had so disastrously defeated him.

It was however through the cleverness of General Darger that his army had been saved from capture or total destruction, and also it was on account of his maneuvers that enabled him to prevent the Glandelinians from laying hold of Violet and her sisters who were seized at the serious moment of the outcome.

Darger had less than three million men and with this cannot be continued his retreat northward, in a desperate effort to make a junction with General Vivian before another Glandelinian army would be thrown upon him for the other had been too badly weakened in the battle to persevere while in that critical condition. But there was dire danger that greater armies of Glandelinians would be thrown in his way, and so he stopped not day or night. It was a disgraceful defeat, and one of the worse in the war for real, and still it showed that the situation remained just the same.

Darger continued his retreat for a long time, and finally unpursued all that distance he reached the Angelinian boundary and came into contact with a new and big Abbieannian army under General Dra Broadway.

In the meantime it was held that the invasion ought not to be resumed that these disasters showed that it was too risky, that Angelina and Abbieannia ought to remain on the defensive but General Hanson still laid up stated before the council who were by his bed that to give up now was real disaster.

"There is something to blame for the disastrous defeats that our armies are suffering," said Hanson. "And it is that the Abbieannians are too slow with their big forces. In the war of 1914 they pushed forward broad belts the biggest armies that could ever be mustered, but now at the first start of this invasion they only throw in the first mobilized divisions and this gave the enemy time to mobilize their reserves which when in addition showed that the Glandelinians could really muster a bigger army than we could ever produce in a century's time. But no matter what the situation that invasion must be pushed to the end. Another cause of the reverse is that my orders or General Vivian's and Evans' was not obeyed. Instead of desolating the country as I told to, they go on fighting battles after battles, when I know a storm of desolation would be more effective. Such orders are going to be enforced hereafter and disobedience means death. It's been Evans' decree and he told me too that though I'm chief commander he'll tolerate no interference from no one. Disobedience means death and so I'll confine his decree. The invasion shall be resumed come what may and I'll have no disputing it either."

"No then continued; "Those generals who commanded under I My Brother and Evans are fools. They saw when passing through California what the Christian countries suffered at the hands of the enemy during the Glandelinian invasion and they vowed vengeance and yet all they do is make forest fires and floods which do more harm than good. To hell with the forest fires and floods if they are made alone. Ravage the towns and cities as by cannon. Spare nothing no matter what the beauty. Beauty in that country is the devil in disguise. We are letting the enemy off a easy after all we suffered, and indeed the whole world is laughing at us. The Abyssinkilians were the only ones who continued the devastation. I do not blame the Abbieannian soldiers or the Angelinians. They wanted to do it I know because they are complained that when they started destruction their generals would stop them. It's the fault of their leaders who are too damn soft hearted. Of course we don't wish for what they generally call 'Revenge'. Revenge is wicked. But it is the only way to terrifying the enemy into submission. Keep desolating their country and you will soon see how quickly the enemy will submit and how easily we'll end the war. Order all the Armies to again sweep into Glandelinia and to desolate to their hearts content. Now your dismissed."

A NEW VISION OF ANITA ARONBERG.

A little after General Darger's army had been swelled by the new comers, Violet and her sisters had proceeded along the beautiful creek bank of the Embute, called Plunderline river they perceived a peculiar looking child sitting down by the nearest tree. She looked unusual in her appearance, her dressing was strangely more like the celestial regions for she only wore a small white robe, which was sleeveless, and wore what seemed a peculiar set of diamonds on her head which sparkled like fire.

Violet and her sisters proceeded toward the strange child slowly, and getting nearer Gertrude Angelina held back and motioning to her sisters said;

"It's little Anita Aronberg as sure as I live. It's my dead sister."

At first Violet and her sisters became awed and were almost afraid to approach nearer, but the stranger conscious of their near presence arose to her feet and was bolder than before they realized what had happened.

"It's little Anita Aronberg whom you saw once before the battle that raged at Glandelinia." Said the child. "I was sent by the Blessed Mother to warn you little girls of a personal danger which will threaten you if you do not do as advised. Cannon proposed before to sent you to Abbieannia. Don't go for it will be your real doom for the foe will hear of it and send thousands of secret service men to slay you. They will succeed for how can the Abbieannians know who is intermingled with them when the assassins are in disguise. If you wish to avoid this peril do not go."

With this the child smiled sweetly upon them and then was gone. For a time the children were so impressed at seeing Anita Aronberg once more that they could say nothing, and did not know what to do. But nevertheless they decided to keep the vision to themselves and tell no one at all. But several Abbieannian soldiers had witnessed this scene and a scout had reported it to his officers who they had seen and soon it was known along the whole Abbieannian army that the Vivian girls had met with a celestial child and they were bound to follow. Darger had decided to try his luck once more and not allow his defeat to discourage him a bit. He decided to advance but Violet and her sisters did not know it and so were surprised when he gave them his word and told them of his intention. He alone as yet did not know that the little girls had been in connection with a celestial being. Violet and her sisters hoped that he would get better success this time and prayed that it would come. Violet was about to ask the general a question when a officer came up and saluting handed General Darger a message. Darger opened the sheet of paper and read;

"General Darger;

"When you begin your march once more carry a storm of ruin in your path and do not spare anything whatever. Ruin and destruction is the only means for you to retrieve the disaster you suffered. And why not ruin their country. Look what the enemy did in California and Angelina. Go at it like hell."

GENERAL EVANS."

"What now you tell to do now?" Asked Violet."

"Burn and raze the enemy country." Answered the general grimly. "It was an order from your guardian General Jack Abrons Evans."

"Are you going to do it?" Asked Hattie.

"Do what?" Asked the general."

"Disobey the order!"

"No indeed I will not." Answered the general. "You little girls don't wish to see me do it I suppose. You are too soft hearted."

"We are not too soft hearted." Said Jennie with a sob. "We would be glad to see it done." "Then tell it to us."

While the general was preparing the big army for a long and tedious march he telegraphed to other armies close to his which proved to have leaders of not much account to come and join him as quick as possible and reinforce him. It was his purpose to obtain as many troops as possible and then to make a swift drive or advance for the region of Bendokor Run a small stream, where the climate in summer was so hot as to be nicknamed the little river of hell. If successful he would cross his advantage immediately and unhastily, and make an attack upon the little town of MaryGold and thence go toward the town of Maininda. It was his purpose alone to recover not only the ground he himself had lost, but to make an example and show that he could also retake all the ground lost by the army driven back under Evans and Hanson during the series of bloody battles around Bristol Station and also to make a drive for the city of Glandelinia and thence to the sea coast and crush the resistance of the foe himself. He laid his plans before all the officers, and in the night started his advance, each division going independently of its own so as to be able to move almost simultaneously. Toward morning the whole army was on the march, and Violet and her sisters were with General Darger, and with his staff telling them everything they observed, and answering all questions asked. It was not the biggest Christian army ever formed since the war began that was advancing; and the army was under the guiding command of three thousand generals. Darger was in main command and General Goodhope was his lieutenant.

But he was so fearful of a landing which he decided to keep close to the shore and of danger for the little ships that he was in the end of the day.....

But general Darger found no Glandolinian army to oppose him, and he finally began ordered to halt by general Vivian who wished to make a junction with him as soon as possible. But from the southeastern part of the country two Glandolinian armies one under Spoofendool and general Heidecock, and the other under general Grainsberry were advancing between Bendebooger and general Vivian's army with the full intention of preventing any such proposed junction between the two christian armies.

Darger discovered this and ordered his army to extend between the two sections to prevent them from striking general Vivian a blow. It was his intention to receive the blow himself. His maneuver was made and soon the two Glandolinian armies having made a junction found Darger between them, general Vivian and strongly entrenched at Bendebooger. It was the purpose of assault had assailing the christian line right away, but the Glandolinian generals not knowing the strength of the mighty christian army before them, and knowing who their adversary was, and that he was a ferocious fighter decided to wait for a better opportunity. General Darger was determined to join general Vivian however and when he received a more urgent request to do so, he notified general Vivian the condition of the situation, and decided not to let the enemy strike him a blow after all but to strike one himself.

The enemy was still advancing with the purpose to extend their own lines still further, and this action on the part of the Glandolinian generals made Darger angry and suspicious. Working in his earlier days for the General he knew full well the actions and maneuvers of a General, and watched the enemy at every point closely. It was evident that the enemy intended to strike around his rear, and so general Darger strengthened his rear and formed it a front instead of a rear.

The foremost portion of the enemy came around in a perfectly good swing, and made a most bitter attack upon that whole portion of the christian line while the other columns were thrown heavily upon Darger's center and left. A very cruel and bloody conflict began, and while the struggle grew in full progress Darger gave commands to every commander to throw all their available divisions to the support of those attacked, and then went to see how conditions were along his right. So strong was the assault of the enemy that it seemed from the noise as if a wild German typhoon was raging, mostly from the din of the terrific "Wall" of the ferocious Glandolinian assailants. However this time Darger's army stood well on its own formation and the enemy indeed found serious resistance.

General Weatherspoon was hurrying forward eight divisions of fierce Zimmerrmannians, and these with the wild fury of a roaring cyclone threw itself heavily against the christian left and for four hours the most desperate battle of the war that Darger had ever fought was on. Both sides contended for the most position like so many insane demons and the losses of the Zimmerrmannians was unusually heavy but nothing seemed even the fury of hell and all its damnation could stop their headlong rush and over the works they surged with fierce and deafening yells and battle cries and closed with the christian line with a terrible shock.

This whole portion of the christian line was thrown into instant confusion by the irresistible pressure of the Zimmerrmannian wave, and they could have been rallied nevertheless, had it not been for the fact that unexpectedly a large force of Mc-Hollsteinians and Condorians was moving well around their flank. Like an avalanche sliding down the mountain side they struck, cut their way clear through the massive christian line, and threw the whole column of Abbeannians and Abyssinkilians into an uncontrollable panic. Back they went fleeing pell-mell and it seemed indeed that the battle would be won by the enemies of God right then and there. But in the frightful melee general Weatherspoon had been killed, two other generals were mortally wounded, and general Weatherspoon was disabled with a leg so badly crushed that to save it was impossible.

The losses of so many officers demoralized the Zimmerrmannians and Mc-Hollsteinians, and their consternation gave Goodwill time to bring up reserve forces, and these were thrown in overwhelming numbers upon the apparently victorious assailants, and threatened with annihilation in that bloodcurdling inferno of battle the enemy withdrew in confusion themselves and the other christian troops being rallied, the whole line was able to be reformed, and the remainder of the Glandolinian onslaught at this point was swept back right and left, and the whole Glandolinian right wing was rolled up and driven clear from the captured works, and back to their own position with murderous loss and three more generals killed, and twenty mortally wounded, and among them was general Grainsberry.

At other portions the wild battle went on with varying fortunes on both sides. Along the whole christian center and right the firing was fearful, but as yet the battle raged on for a while without any commanding whatever. However the assault of the enemy was becoming stronger and a stronger along these two wings, and so the artillery had to be brought up, and only when threatened with destruction did the enemy finally desist in their reckless attack. At the same time the battle still raged with ferocious fury, and all the efforts of the army to hold firm the christian line at this point was unavailable. Darger managed to pass the strongest concentration upon this point with his oncoming reserves, and the concentration became so great that finally after fighting desperately for five hours, and making five successful charges in which five hundred thousand Glandolinians fell in each charge the foe withdrew from the attack, and Darger's army counterattacked his lines which had been badly thrown out of shape.

This part of the conflict had lasted only five hours and three quarters along the line and along the rear alone the enemy had lost 25,500,000 men killed and wounded, while at other points the losses had been still greater ranging as far as 33,456,666 in slain and wounded making a total of 58,956,666. Darger decided to renew the battle himself and strike the enemy, but there was no need to. Seeing the strong forces concentrating against him Spoofendool decided he had enough for a while and toward evening retreated southward, and left a clear path for the approach of general Vivian's great christian army. The losses of the christianians was only 10,000,999 in killed and wounded prisoners and missing.

But what cheered general Spoofendool was when toward midnight he received heavy reinforcements under general Molaison. He therefore made preparations to resist general Darger, and also sent a call for more troops from other portions of the advancing series of armies. They came toward morning and again general Darger found himself heavily attacked. The battle was on again with the most terrific fury, but this time general Spoofendool did what he did not do the day before. He held all his other parts of Glandolinians in reserve and threw his whole force of Zimmerrmannians, and Mc-Hollsteinians upon the whole entire christian line in the most violent assault ever seen by general Darger before. All the christian artillery was mowed down by the assailants and their fire tore line after line to flying fragments and dislodged all the oncoming waves like a roaring cyclone of damnation, but when the foe threatened to give way all the Glandolinian artillery broke loose with a tremendous thundering roar and carried all before it with the heaviest shell fire ever seen in any battle of the entire war itself. Everything was torn and shattered by the storm of hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of exploding shells, and all of general Darger's breastworks was ground to sea earth and his whole line threatened with complete annihilation gave way before the combined assault of the fierce soldiers and the Glandolinian artillery which ploughed the whole christian line through and through and tore hundreds of avenues in every massive line of the entire fighting army.

So cruel fell by the score on the christian side, and general Good was killed. It was impossible to stand before both the artillery fire of the enemy and the desperate assault of the Mc-Hollsteinians, and despite the fury with which the enemy fought the Mc-Hollsteinians were the first to be driven back, only to recoil again, but nevertheless the Zimmerrmannians reached their goal first and within an hour's time had fairly cut their way through the entire christian line and rolled it up for twenty miles with the most terrific slaughter. Darger was seriously wounded, millions of prisoners were captured by the enemy many of them general officers, battleflags numbered by the hundred were seized and the losses of the christians was shocking. The other portion of the Abbeannian army was not yet up and amid the dauntless median general Goodheart was compelled to take general Darger's place and in trying to rally the panic stricken hordes of Abyssinkilians, (The Abbeannians only retreating in order unable to resist an irresistible Zimmerrmannian tidal wave) was shot through the heart three times. General Goodheart took his place and likewise fell mortally wounded, and a large portion of the christian line along the small street called Jemido Two Turner Francis Run about five million strong was annihilated because they would not retreat. The scene of confusion and massacre was startling to behold, the shell fire tore all before it and generals after generals by scores fell in trying to rally the confused divisions of Abyssinkilians.

The Mc-Hollsteinians however had slackened their maddened insane insane fury of advance, but the Zimmerrmannians like a sea of crazy demons pouring from the bottomless pit pressed on with such irresistible fury that nothing could withstand it and indeed to the Abbeannians themselves it seemed that instead of Glandolinians attacking them, it was as if all the demons of hell and all the angels in heaven with all the heavenly leaders itself had joined together against them, and such a yelling of the clamestians could never be described. The firing of both sides condemned the very axes where into fuge of smoke, and the falling soldiers lay so thickly that they carpeted the ground for scores of miles. General August Dargor command the second part of the army becoming apprised of the danger hurried up large portions of the other section of the army, and hurled them upon the Zimoromians first, while massive parks of artillery was massed upon the N-Hollesitians who for some strange reason had been stopped in their advance but whose lines could not be seen on account of the forest of musketry they were blazing away at the christians with.

It was evident indeed that general Spoofoendool had recieved still more reinforcements, and so general August Darger sent orders immediately for Charles Darger and General Joseph Sparr to hurry up with the third section of the army. By the most desperate efforts the confused divisions of Aby sinkillians were reformed, retored in their ranks, but they could not for their very lives withstand the firing of the Mc-Hollensteinians, and as they were almost encompassed by the wild Zimmermanians they withdrew to the rear unable to stand up before such a bitter assault, of the Mc-Hollensteinians. General August Darger had concentrated all the artillery which could be brought up, and though the shelling was causing the Mc-Hollensteinians to retire slowly and silently nothing whatever stopped the wild insane assault of the Zimmermanians, and coming on in one perfect wave miles long they struck with crash and roar of fury the whole new christian line, and pushed it clear from the recovered ground, and drove it back toward its own position despite all that August Darger Darger and his generals could do to have them hold firm. This time it was showed that the Zimmermanians when driven wild with the thought of the consequence of christian success could do, could outwit the very ferocious Mc-Hollensteinians in their wild fury. The Mc-Hollensteinians had been easily and disastrously disintegrated checked by the rallying christians, and by the cannonading, but nothing so evil and hell and storm could stop for a moment the wild surge of Zimmermanians who still came on with irresistible force. On the side of the enemy the losses were great, and general August Darger had to conceal this from his infantry and army lines upon the assaults, and all his artillery leaving out not a single gun, and it appeared to many spectators a who witnessed the struggle that instead of a battling on it was a big fire for smoke of shell explosions, and musketry and cannons grew so dense that at times nothing could be seen. Everywhere between both sides there was a wild flourish of flags and standards, and the opposing sides yelled so fury furiously that it seemed as if a million Terrocian typhoons was raging in that one particular spot. At one section of the line the Zimmermanians had come into possession of the works, and August Darger grew anxious and sent messenger after messenger to hurry up the other army under the two generals while another was sent on an urgent appeal to get help from general Vivian. Defeat now for the christians meant surely before god and heaven a disastrous loss of the war and the utter extermination of all the christian armies opposed to the newly gathering glandallian armies. The situation of the christian line was indeed extremely critical.

But there was no hope. The enemy would give no time for the Christian army to oppose any advance that general Adrian would make, and half of his army to the arrival of the other army. The other section of the army was unable to arrive for two good reasons. They could not advance because of barriers that were shown in their way by the enemy under general Jannel Turner. And because this very same Glindilinan general was attacking them with the same threatening success that Speed Spoofedpool was.

August Darger tried to make a flanking movement but this was unavailing and the flankers were annihilated. Violet and her sisters were frightened over the situation and determined immediately to leave the endangered army at all costs and go to general civilian themselves. Of course they would have to make the attempt without telling any one of it for otherwise they would be detained. So scouting they saw a chance where all before them was clear, but no sooner had they gone a certain distance when at them rushed a score of lecherous headed Zimmermanians, and who looked so much like little girls with the stylish form of their hair and seemed ridiculous to be captured by such soldiers. At the horrors of the capture made the little girls utterly reckless, and it cannot be described how they escaped these fiends of all grandchildlike soldiers but they did not do it. They managed to save themself and they managed to reach the Christian line to leave it they realized was impossible that to get help was also impossible.

Under the battle was lost

It had been seen however that the little girls had been attempting to leave the Army and if it had not been for the intervention of General August Dargatzis the little girls would have been labelled as deserters, it not at first being known of their true identity, and General Dargatzis always has the tendency to be a bit overbearing, looking to maintain the dignity of appearing the little girls in male looks.

The battle went on with increasing fury, and all along the line the most furious battle of the war again was on. General Given was advancing in the meantime, and toward afternoon he reached the region but suddenly found himself opposed by half of the whole Glandallinian army. General Given himself could make no headway and after fighting most desperately for three hours with unceasing ferocity he had to withdraw his army and acknowledge himself beaten in the end.

August Darger never imagined the onony to attack so heavily before, and could not comprehend the situation at all. Most of his works were already in possession of the onony and nothing whatever could be done to retain them and twenty divisions suffered annihilation in making ferocious counter charges.

General Dargatzis did not know what to do. The two other armies which he fully depended upon did not arrive, in fact he never received one word of their whereabouts, and finally messengers came in reporting that the two armies could not advance for a because they were heavily attacked by overwhelming numbers and that they were also getting worried, and even rumors came that General Robert Vridin himself was killed and his whole army annihilated when caught in a tremendous ambush along the Jenide farmers plain. The report in many ways was completely true.

These rumors unerved general August Burger and he decided to withdraw his army from the frightful and bloody conflict before his army was also annihilated. So he had suddenly ordered a retreat, and soon the whole army was flowing back toward the north, and within the evening met a christian division was standing its ground any further. The enemy however did not press their advantage and general Burger was able to reform his army and get ready so to make another try out for the morrow. The other two armies had also withdrawn from the frightful struggle, and so general Burger's leading of it and finding out their location, made a march with the intention to try and force a junction with either one of them then. The enemy denied his purpose and a large large portion of the army under general van poolde stepped in his way. August Burger managed however to annihilate this tin glandelinian army. The conflict during the night, but the main army then stepped in his way and he had to halt his advance, after suffering the most frightful loss ever yet. Morning dawned bright and fair, but nevertheless the battle was again renewed more renewed with the most bloodcurdling fury. The Doodle's army had been destroyed during the night portion of the battle had escaped the Abdominians, and so had been given command of the right wing of the main Glandelinian army and he threw his 2 threw his whole force upon general August Burger and annihilated over 10,000,000 christians in one hour. The 2nd routed the remainder of the army at this point fifty million strong cutting the whole christian army fairly to pieces and carrying off 100,000,000. It was during the most important part of the entire battle. General August Burger in trying to rally this portion of the christian line was killed, and three hundred of his brigades were annihilated. It was the most disastrous christian defeat ever imagined, and the enemy had still the other two armies won. Charles Burger and Joseph Burger were to contend with. In the afternoon the remainder of August Burger's army came upon the scene and the battle was again renewed and this time with still greater and more frightful fury than before.

He told me that he had seen Harry when the book came to Anne's garage place. He ordered them to make a carrying cart and to get the engines there, and to try and break through at all costs and cut down all of the enemy assassins. It took fully an hour to get this big force of savvies prepared for the terrific encounter. THE leaders were under the instructions to ignore the Gladiolindas savvies and not to engage them, but they absolutely had to but to go straight ahead against the Gladiolindas Gladiolindas it took only.

Then all was ready the whole line of christian cavalry started forward to make the decided charge. There was a shout as to for it would come out, but none of the christian general was left to lead the christian cavalry in the effort to penetrate the whole christian division moved in a powerful current of men and horse forces toward the enemy infantry lines, and finally rode through it causing the most terrific slaughter. By the force of the cavalry charge the Gladiolus line at this section was demolished, in the main portion of the Zimmerman line came up to it in the back sick of time to reverse the side of battle, and up to the christian division under general Hildebrandt Zimmer and the christian troops were taken back for all the distance they had won and to their own works.

For a time now there was a slight lull. The Christian generals certainly did not know what to do on the situation. They had heard also from their overhanging reports that the plans of General Hanson given by the other Christian generals could never be carried out just now. The only hope of the Christian of the will be invaders, and so to prevent them from devastating the country. The Glandelinian authorities had: at every small whole city town and village, and every available force of the order of Glandelin's that were not needed on the battle field, the biggest number of all too, and this this seemed that the foe had country, was not much depleted as the Christian generals had believed. It was only a sign of the part of the enemy by allowing no rest. Christian armies in the early parts of the war to overwhelm them, and while this trick had been on the nightfall armies had been forming. The Glandelinians and now they were opposing the Christians with all the fury they could muster against all the Abiddinians.

These rumors also convinced General Harry apprehensive and he considered what he should retreat or really resume the battle. Yet to do so would cause an unnecessary loss of lives and so they had already fallen that it nearly came as big as the battle of Horn Zoo the night. Thus that day as for only a severe cavalry charge had been made, and had been severely repulsed.

But whether he was willing to attack the enemy or not, or whether he was willing to make another conflict did not good; for three hours later after the cavalry charge had been made the Glandelinians at once sent out the Christian armies with terrible fury, and the battle raged with redoubled violence. Violet and her sisters realized the peril of the nation indeed and decided to do something themselves no matter what the risk. They knew that they might as well for should the enemy really triumph in this battle the whole war would be lost, and probably themselves too. So the little girls disguised themselves as Glandelinian peasants and started out on horseback.

They did not know what location the enemy was, but as they progressed further, a friendly Glandelinian farmer recognized them and said:

"Oh little girls are you going a if you go any further, to get through the enemy lines are impossible. So you had better take warning and go back."

"Why is the danger so pressing?" asked Violet.

"Oh said the farmer. "The Glandelinian armies are stretching out every where to stop all messengers who would be sent by your generals for aid, and you yourselves for the sake of God himself could never get through them, and to try to do so would bring on your destruction."

"But we have to do something," said Violet. "If our armies are worsted, they will be destroyed for we are completely surrounded, and if defeated cannot escape the Glandelinians who will commit a massacre as soon as they they will a complete victory."

"I know what you can do," said the farmer. "Of course I'm putting myself in peril for I'm betraying my own country, but then the cause is so wicked that it drives me to. Twelve miles north of here there lies a Christian army under General Schloederline and if you can signal to them by wireless, you may bring them to your rescue. Of course they are not sufficiently near strong enough to win a victory, but they can at least stop you away from destruction."

"At what time can the Abiddinians be located?" asked Violet.

"At Pinesconna," answered the farmer. "Go in little girls, I have a wireless calling that you or one of you can find. I'll loan it to you."

The little girls went in, and he produced the outfit and the little girls commenced the signalling which they were familiar with. They soon received this answer:

"Have received your message and know full well the situation of the army. Don't worry. General Viviana's army had almost been annihilated but your father has been saved and has been rejoined by another force and will also arrive to renew the battle as soon as possible. Am coming as soon as possible. Will advance on forced march."

Violet and her sisters then thanked the farmer and leaving proceeded toward the Christian lines once more. They soon saw that to reach the Christian lines which they had just sent out was a real difficulty. The foe had a possession of a good portion of the battle field, and instead of Alexander's army there was now only a few scattered companies. From the noise they heard and they concluded that the battle had begun in force and fury, and were surprised to find that the action was rather for now they were in greater peril than ever, and if the enemy overtook them they would be no longer free to follow. So the little girls advanced at a rapid pace.

To the little girls heard the loud deep breathing of thousands of artillery; they felt at all more apprehensive and so raced down the nearest road they could reach. Suddenly their horses staggered and fell a small hairy beast close by and though none of the little girls were injured their horses were killed. They realized that they had to foot it all the way, and that this was nothing else to do and so they continued on but kept their watch for the appearance of the will wily foe.

"I say Henry!" cried a man riding up to a soldier in a soldier's red uniform. "Don't you hear all that racket. It appears to be near the region of Jewish Street but on Rindshooper. I've heard it already for the past two days. It appeared at times to come nearer, to recede and then to grow worse mingled at times with a terrible crash of thousands of exploding explosions. I wonder what it could be."

"It must be a great fight going on," said the one addressed. "It sounds like a battle anyway. I was wondering what was the cause."

The soldiers listened for a moment, and then became more alert. A soldier had cried out his challenge.

"What who goes there?"

"At once the two lieutenants rode over to where they had heard the challenge and halted."

"Good day and asked one of the lieutenants."

"O was the answer. I am a messenger but received no response. Heard my own father of sent more like those of children thought. But I can hear no one."

"Maybe there are fugitive children."

"All took there," said one of the privates coming up. "I just received this message from one of my friends. He asked me to take it to the general. A great battle is raging at Rindshooper and we are requested to come down and offer aid before the enemy breaks. All's killed. The two parties are reported down for, and the whole Christian line is badly broken off."

The officer took the message as soon as he had finished reading and gazed down the beautiful roadway winding through a still beautiful glen, he suddenly gave an exclamation.

"Great God I think I'm seeing things."

"What is it?" said one of the other officers.

"Look," said one of the other officers who had observed something first lieutenant had seen.

Coming down the road within their full view were eight of the most delightful fairy structures that these soldiers had ever seen. They were upon "moors" they were the soldiers could not have met at that distance, but their features and the gracefulness of their walk made them seem as the children who were they were and throw off whatever dignities they had worn and were wearing their own natural clothing.

They were coming at a fast trot, and their hair curly hair all golden seemed to dazzle the air with brightness as the sun shone upon it and the soldiers looked on in amazement.

"That's better than I have any of the Glandelinians who are now being crushed around corners upon the unexpected," said one of the officers.

The soldiers started forward, and just as the little girls saw them they uttered a glad cry and started forward toward them at a run. When near enough the first lieutenant gave the exclamation:

"It's the old story, the prettiest little children ever seen in the world. And they are the only Glandelinian little children left, the daughters of General Viviana."

Violet and her sisters were regarded kindly and warmly by all of the soldiers who had ridden up and all the privates crowded around.

"Where are they?" asked Violet.

"The new camp of General Schloederline a few miles west of the officers," said one of the officers. "I'll take you to it. He gives a question before we go any further."

"What is it?" asked Violet.

"Where in the name of the world is the battle we hear of?"

"The cause was there two hours ago," said Violet. "It's the army that has been under General Henry and I've at Rindshooper. August Burger was killed, and our friend Henry was wounded. The battle is much near Jewish Street now."

"The children struck upon us in this," said the officer. "We no doubt are only a few miles away from the reason and as soon as the great general knows of it he will advance to their aid."

"The world is in fact," said Violet. "The army are overwhelming in strength strength, and General Burger who is now in command could hold much longer. I'm afraid. And it would take a mighty large army to save them from destruction. The Christian army is surrounded."

the most inhuman slaughter. The Abbaenunians general who had arrived to the assistance of the hard pressed Abyssinkillians at this critical time declared that the Zimemmannians had made the assault with all their force this time and that probably it would be safe to counter charge, but just as preparations were being made to counter charge the enemy, on came a bigger force of Glandelinians not Zimemmannians alone this time, but also Ho-jollastinians, and Gargio Gargollians also with Owarbons and Rurds, and followed by a wave of Owarbian surges. This charge was covered by a fire of Glandelinian artillery and now indeed it became a most thunderous fray.

Maurice Costello was concentrating the whole entire first part of his army at this point and seeing the great concentration of the Glandelinians he sent orders to the commanders of the other two parts of the army to hurry up and join the first fray. The other parts of Glandelinians were finally checked with frightful slaughter, but the Ho-jollastinians and Zimemmannians did not cease the attack, and their prolonged assault gave time for other Glandelinian columns to join in and the fifth assault raged with the mightiest fury. Violet and her sisters and the other little girls witnessed the whole scene and indeed were horrified when a million cannon like roar of masonry broke out along the whole line of Zimemmannians and Ho-jollastinians, and then as they poured on like a mountain wave of yelling men and mobbed themselves with the Angolians, and Abyssinkillians hurled them back from the works and pushing the Christian line to pieces. Upon them then were thrown the Abyssinkillians and Abbaenunians, and then the concentrated but for a time it did no good, until general Grackentire on the enemy's side found his left overwhelmed and almost surrounded, and then once more he surrounded the retreat, and the whole surviving columns recoiled suddenly but this time when pursuing the Christians met the sternest and most unshakable resistance all the way, and were finally called off from the horrible slaughter. Three hundred regimental flags were torn to tatters by the sweeping storm of bullets on both sides, and every divisional and brigade commander was down. During this charge three hundred regiments had been wiped out among the Angolians, and one division of 674,999 Abyssinkillians had only three hundred men remaining, and all their colors were shot to pieces, and their color bearers killed or mortally wounded. "Maud," Maurice Costello found harder fighting and greater losses than he expected, and one deliberate counter assault against the enemy's line met with rapid and slaughter of officers and men.

"The enemy was soon coming on to make a sixth assault and this time Maurice Costello extended his lines, and hearing that the second division of his army was approaching decided not to allow the enemy to hurt his back in this assault either. The assault of the enemy this time was made with beating fury, the Zimemmannians and Ho-jollastinians attacking this time with the fury of desperation and throwing all precautions to the wind. "This one tremendous blow was given for blow, general Maurice Costello directed the divisional commanders where to place their reserve divisions and seeing to it that all the artillery was massed correctly stormed the foe's lines with a destructive withering fire. Violet and her sisters watched this tremendous assault with awe and almost terror, and warned aside Turner and her companion to keep close to them. Finally the children had to seek shelter behind trees as the random shots came their way, and once a shell burst among the treetops and rained down twigs and leaves among the children. They saw how the enemy surged forward and through the Christian line, how the Abbaenunians with horrible savage barbaric like yells closed upon them and cut them all down, how the assailants recoiled a little distance, rallied and came on again with tenfold fury, and all the time could be heard the stunning crash of thousands of big guns and the terrible blam derous roar of masonry, and the whir- whir of many machine guns. Both sides yelled madly and the scene before the little girls was like both a fire and a slaughter inferno combined. For every time that the enemy threatened to burst through the Christian lines the little girls felt nervous, and at times clouds of smoke hung so thickly over the scene that nothing could be seen. While the uproar was bewildering and made a hellish clamor, there suddenly appeared to the rear of the little girls a yelling mob of soldiers through the sheet of smoke. They were Ho-jollastinians rushing forward to take the last battling Christian line in the rear.

It was too late to warn the last of the Christians but the little girls managed to save themselves by hiding behind the other side of the trees, and watched the battle crazed soldiers as they swept forward like yelling screaming maniacs. Soon all was a confused mass beyond, but for appearance of things it was evident that the flank attack was no success, that the Christians had been on their guard, and soon the Glandelinians were surging back in broken and scattered ranks, with a surge of redeaters after them a-battering. Violet and her sisters were safe from the enemy but the battle as both sides rushed so thickly about the trees that it was a good fortune that none of them were hit. All around them on both sides fell swiftly and in the most appalling numbers. It was also evident that the sixth assault had been repulsed for the firing again started to recede, and oh how violet and her sisters hoped that the enemy would not renew the assault.

"I never saw anything like it before," said little Angelina pishoo. "This is the sixth time that the enemy went so hard into this storm of death and destruction. I hope for their own sakes that they won't do it again."

"They surely will," said violet. "As long as their commanders won't give up they will have to come and charge our lines. Good God Jesus! murder look here they start from the woods again."

"It was true. The enemy had not receded enough. The Zimemmannians were approaching in fresh divisions and added by a still stronger force of sturdy Ho-jollastinians. They swept on with the same fury and the battle was on again with raging fury. At one portion of the Christian line the Ho-jollastinians this time fairly cut out outstriking the Zimemmannians like a won race broke through the Christian line like a torrent breaks through a levee of a irritated dam and fairly carried all before it. The Christians were pouring in a panic stricken mass toward the hiding places of the children and they were met with a roar of yells like a storming torn tornado and on after these poured the fierce Ho-jollastinians yelling back at the Christian soldiers. How it came to be that the children were not noticed by the foe it could never be understood but the enemy did not observe them, and the little girls seeing themselves not noticed hastily climbed the nearest trees. The other two little girls were not able to climb trees to the dismay of violet and her sisters and now ten Glandelinians coming back saw the two little girls and made for them with fixed bayonets. From the tree tops came the crash of eight pistol stultaneously, while the two little girls below also fired and the ten men pitched headlong in the dust and lay still. The Angolians who had been driven back had been rallied by the approach of Sollosodrinian divisions and now the enemy was receding but more Glandelinians saw the two children, and leveled their muskets to shoot them down. Violet and her sisters were too quick for them however and caught all of them down before they could fire. Then on the left of the foe was overwhelmed and intermingled with the surging Abbaenunians violet and her sisters hastily climbed down from the tree, and asked the little girls the reason they did not climb up the tree.

"We never learned to climb trees," Jean Jennie in answer; "And you really frightened us when we saw you do it for we did not know you were two children."

"Had we known this we would not have left you down to here," said Jodie. "We did not know you had not followed us until we reached the top and saw those ten Glandelinians charging upon you. We were frightened and called but we stopped them. But who fired the other two shots?"

"We did," said Angelina pishoo. "We were not going to let them do any harm to us without showing them our real fight."

As the little girls were thus conversing among each other assault number eight was on, and Violet and her sisters decided to seek a better place this time and so started off toward the rear. The noise of the battle was stunning to the children, for everywhere could be heard the crash of the conflict. The battle could be heard along the lines, and a now distant prolonged roar told fully well that general Vivian's whole new army was in fierce action, and that Sollosodrinians were now also coming. The ongoing the enemy as they had never engaged the enemy before. As to the other section of Maurice Costello's army had come up and joined into the battle and the firing had been growing fiercer and fiercer. The enemy was now being driven back, and a long general Kurva then the enemy assault had been still more fierce but nevertheless now the enemy had failed to make any progress whatever.

Violet and her sisters hastily rode their way to the rear but were continually annoyed by the noise of the conflict. They were wondering what had become of Sterling and of his two companions since the time general Kurva had been worried at Brattle Tree Station. William and Francis they knew were safe for they had remained with the better army and had been taken to Angolians. As the little girls were thus progressing onward, listening to the wild clamor of the battle, an officer came riding up and halting them and said:

"The sixth assault of the enemy has been repulsed, but Maurice Costello requested me to find you little girls and advise you to stay where you are before. You are going into real danger instead of escaping it."

"Why how is that?" asked Jeanie Vivian.

"The foe army are in possession of the woods beyond this part."

"Good God and we were running right into them," gasped all of the little girls together. "It's a lucky thing you came upon us lieutenant. We must return came sisters Marjy Jennie and little Nichee."

So back with him the children went, to watch the assaults of the enemy.

The ninth assault was indeed a beautiful one.

The enemy came on in great waves direct toward the whole christian lines and made the wildest assault upon maurice costelloes lines ever mastered yet. With the terrific thundering of many cannons, and the wild stammering and bewildering crash of millions of firearms, and the boom bang of exploding shells could be heard the wildest wilder and frantic commands of the generals generals who issued orders here and there, while the onrushing assault drove forward like a gigantic storm. Violet and her sisters watched this gigantic attack with interest, but the other two little girls thought they had seen enough of the battle and kept themselves hidden behind the nearest trees. A shell exploded right against the tree in front of violet, and this whole tree gave way with a thunderous crash, falling against the tree behind which Jennie was standing and splitting it off right at the trunk and the whole tree came down with a shocking crash showering all of the children with a blizzard of branches and leaves. Jennie was buried under the branches of the fallen tree, but she was unharmed though her clothes were a bit scratched and badly torn and her forehead was bruised.

Jennie was able to free herself however, and the little girls at once retreated further to the rear, taking defense behind these trees. All the while the roar of the conflict was growing wilder and wilder, and now the enemy came surging among the christians once more, and poured over the works at all points driving the first line of Abyssinians and Abbie Annans back and crushing the divisions of Angelinians to pieces.

Victoriously the enemy came pouring on, and the little girls found them selves handicapped. "Ornate y near then was a steep ravine, and into this they all plunged just as the panic stricken fugitives came surging up followed by the wild glandelinian assailants. A shell exploded in the middle of the ravine, but the children were unharmed. A force of christians rallied and took defense in the ravine, shooting down and slaughtering their assailants in fearful numbers right before the eyes of the children who were in hiding in a small cave. The glandelinians finally drove the christians out of the ravine and pressed on after the retreating troops.

The main part of Maurice Costelloes line had however held its ground, and thus the general was able to bring up his reserve artillery and these guns were opened upon the flank of the pursuing glandelinians causing them the greatest confusion. This gave the retreating forces more time to rally, and as they reformed Schloederins threw forward a large portion of his division to their rescue and the assailants were again beaten back and with such heavy losses that few of them reached the works at all in possession of the main body of the Glandelinian attackers. The firing here was something terrible but Schloederins concentrated half of his forces upon the assailants, and raised all of his artillery, and mowing the glandelinians down by the hundred thousand drove them pell mell to their own works.

But this did not ban the fierce Zimmermannians in the least. They were soon gathering for the next desperate assault, and general Schloederins and Maurice Costelloes prepared his own lines to meet the next desperate assault. Prisoners had been taken in untold numbers by the christian troops, but every time the enemy had closed with them they had been retaken. While the enemy were moving forward again to make the tenth assault Violet and her sisters during the lull had ascended a small hill more closer to the fierce battle zone, and could see more clearly the raging battle all around them. They saw that the woods beyond was nothing but a sea of glandelinian soldiers as to call it and realizing that half of the glandelinian army was concentrating also at this point the little girls went back to their own post, and signalled general Costelloes of the enemy's concentration of the foe. The whole of Maurice Costelloes army was concentrating against the advancing assailants by this time however, and now the whole of Schloederins army was up and preparing to repel the foe.

The assault was desperate, obstinate, and sanguinary, and also irresistible for large portions of Maurice Costelloes lines could not stand before it, but Schloederins massed all his troops, and also did the generals of the other divisions mass their troops, and while the battle was going on hotly general Costelloes received word that a large force of the enemy were massing upon Schloederins rear. Schloederins was immediately warned, and so the battle in this location progressed back and forth with the utmost fury for three hours without the slightest pause, and so bloody was the struggle that the generals of both sides became appalled.

But again this great assault of the enemy had been repulsed, and just as the foe gave way a shell laid general Schloederins low.

Another christian general by the name of Huges Sanderlins was also severely wounded, and many other christian officers had fallen.

13-227

The battle raged all day long, with the utmost fury along general Vivians lines and the portion of general Spoofendocle army which assailed him. The charges made by the enemy had been most desperate and incessant, and against general Vivians entire line the enemy had thrown the heaviest masses, but without success. It was probable that after all the battle was going to turn out as a christian victory. General Kerry's lines were also holding firmer than it had ever been expected, and general Van Delle of the Glandelinian side was killed. It had been general Spoofendocle's expectation that if he hurled all of his Zimmermannians and He-Jollistinians against those series of christian victories he would be enabled to complete his sweeping successes of the day before, but now despite all the facts of Glandelinian that he throw against the christian lines he found himself met with stronger resistance than ever, and all his expectations unavailing. In the meantime while the battle was progressing along general Maurice Costelloes lines, general Maurice Costelloes captured a spy who had an important letter which had been found on him.

As the spy was being held for investigation general Maurice Costelloes opened the envelope and read the contents. It ran as follows:

GENERAL MAURICE COSTELLOES
COMMANDING AT LEAST OF NEWLY FORMED CHRISTIAN TROOPS

It is my request to hold the foe that attacks your line at all costs. For it is the purpose of general Spoofendocle to force the main part of the Glandelinian army so as to sweep you back, and prevent you from relieving the pressure upon my own lines. For God's sake don't let me down at all costs, and yet try to avert annihilation if possible also. Three quarters of the Glandelinian army is massed upon you and general Kerry, and if you are swept back, so will be general Kerry and then the main strength of the Glandelinian army will be concentrated upon me. If you hold we can and will win the greatest and most important battle of the entire invasion.

GENERAL ANGELO
VIVIAN. *****

The note was dated '9 A.M.

"This spy had this in his possession all that time." Though general Maurice Costelloes to himself. "And yet without receiving this note my lines have nevertheless stood firm against ten desperate assaults and are repelling successfully another great onset. I have so many men that I cannot get them into action here and so I'll send them around to relieve the others who may be hard pressed."

He gave orders for the spy to be taken to the rear and closely watched and then notified general Vivian by wireless, when he just received his note and that he had withstood with great success ten desperate attacks and that though the enemy were making to the eleventh the foe seemed unable to even pierce his lines at any point, and that altogether he had so many reserve divisions at hand that to get rid of them he had sent them to reinforce general Kerry or Schloederins divisions. General Vanderdon had assumed command of a Schloederins army and was directing operations.

The battle was raging on fiercely, but soon rumors came everywhere to general Maurice Costelloes that general Vivian was pressing the advance advantage at every point and that he would soon be able to crush the foe and make a prisoner of general Kerry.

This was indeed good news for all of the christian generals, and they spread the news among their men, and this caused them to fight with still more greater spirit. Maurice Costelloes had finally repulsed the eleventh assault of the enemy and he gave this information to general Kerry and urged him to hold firm, and that he would see him all the aid needed.

General Kerry was delighted over the success that the Abbie Annans forces under Costelloes were making, and this encouraged him to still increase the fury of the resistance of his own divisions, and indeed the foe suffered untold off losses. Indeed it was again one of the bloodiest battles of the invasion and almost equaled that of Logan Zoe Rae Run now.

The battle was progressing wilder and wilder hour by hour. For every failure and every assault that was repulsed, the enemy only became more powerful and drove in harder at the christians, but still unwilling, and the christian soldiers were heard to shout again and again amid their fierce yelling at the cries;

"Yes We'll rally around the flag boys
We'll rally again and again
Raging the mighty battle for Freedom;
We stormed from the plain,
Raging the mighty battle for Freedom.

Then the whole line at times as the Vivian Girls sang was heard to shout the chorus;

The Calverine forever Hurrah boys hurrah,
Down with the traitor, on with the charge,
While we rally around the flag boys,
Rally again and again,
Raging the mighty battle for Freedom.

Another verse later during the action was also heard by Violet and her sisters and it thrilled the little girls through and through at that. It went as follows;

"We are springing to the call of our brothers gone before,
Raging the mighty battle for Freedom,
And we fill the vacant ranks with a thrillion freemen more,
Raging the mighty battle for Freedom.

The battle was still progressing still more furiously and many of the Glandelinian generals had fallen. Generals Obstinate was killed, carnal Policy Slough Despondency, Legality was also killed, Morality was wounded, and Civility, Passion, and Henry Dives were disabled. The Glandelinian generals Formalist, Hypocrisy, Difficultly, Distrust, Timorous, Midden Apollyon Pope, Pagan, Decist, Wantan, Adam, Discontent, Pride, Arrogancy, Self-conceit, Worldly-glory, Shame, Talkative, Saywell, Prating, Now, Feels Beelzebub-Vainity, Lord Hate Good, Envy, Superstition, Pickthank, Lord Oldmann Lord Carmalidelight, Lord Luxurious, Lord Desire, Lord Vain Glory, Lord Lechery, Sir Having Greedy, Blindmann, Francis No good, George Malice, Love-Lust, Live Loose, Live Lise Heady, High-Mind, Embodity Good, Tellingliar Liar, He's-A-Cruelty, Hateligh, Implacable, By-Ends, Turnabout, Lord Time Server, Lord Fairspeech, Smooth mann, Facing-both-ways, Hanson Anything, Two Tongues Laddy Painting, and gave all, having suffered the tremendous slaughter of three quarters of all their divisions.....

General Vivian had indeed been pressing his army forward, but the reason was because the enemy who was opposed to him was much slimmer as really Spoofendools had thrown three quarters of his whole army upon Kelly and Maurice Costello. Night time finally ended the battle cruelly as a decided Glandelinian victory, for they had been failed to be driven back and under cover of the darkness the beleaguered christian armies were compelled to retreat, and to keep on retreating to avoid any further engagement with so formidable a foe.

Since lately the Glandelinians have been winning endless and most tremendous successes. And why? It was evident that Glandelinia was far from being subdued, that they were massing stronger armies than ever believed to be mastered, and so fierce had been the resistance that it was no reason that the christian armies could cause very little devastation.

All the points and places recaptured by the enemy, and those not captured by the enemy were heavily guarded by armies not needed in engagements, and it now seemed impossible for even the most massive Abbeannians armies to dare, yes even dare pour over the boundary line to make a repeated invasion. Hanson ordered general Maurice Costello to take personal command of general Dargers army and to withdraw from the enemy territory and as quickly as possible and the same order was given to Williamsburger Zimmermann.

As so far no such orders had been given to general Vivian, but nevertheless general Vivian decided to abandon the invasion, and to have all the christian armies stand their ground along the boundary line, and suppress all attempted invasion that might be resumed by the enemy.

THE INVASION FOR THE TIME BEING IS ABANDONED.

While the three christian armies were retreating northward, general Cannon gave various orders to every army concentrated at the border, and the Angelinian, Calvinian, Abyssinian, and Abbeannian governments sent much needed supplies, and even sent more artillary and ammunition to the border than was really needed, and soon along the whole border there was gathered nearly 5,678,999 pieces of artillary of all kinds.

It took three weeks for the retreating armies under general Vivian and Maurice Costello to reach the border of Angelinia, and Zimmermann was still unheard from and all feared that he was in peril. But a week later he arrived, but there was no appearance of the enemy, and for a time all was quiet as if the entire war had really ended. All of the christian armies had soon left the Glandelinian country, and the invasion had finally been abandoned. These events surprised the world indeed, and no doubt the millions of children of every nation must have felt broken hearted, when they felt sure that the next coming christmas would be the same, a sorrowful giftless one.

But general Hanson was not discouraged. It had been over a month now since he had been wounded, and as general Evans had been less severely wounded than Hanson, Evans was requested to leave for the boundary and take command of the entire series of armies, and see what could be done on the matter. It was evidently believed that his absence made it impossible for the christian armies to fight such foes, and that Evans being a good leader, could accomplish much. Evans felt that he was unable to do so yet, and would have refused, but then separation from his little girls friends for so long already felt to him like the separation of God from a lost soul, and so he decided to do his best, and believed that his doing so would speed up his recovery. It was already near the end of January, and it was drawing high to February. On the twentieth of January Evans left his hospital.

And bidding goodbye to his pretty nurses, and the doctors, left for the train. He reached the boundary line after two days fast riding, and as soon as possible assumed command of a personal army, and issued orders for all the other generals commanding the Abbeannian armies to follow out all orders that he should give. Yet he longed for the time that Hanson would recover so he could resume command for to command so many big armies was too much work for Evans alone, and yet he found no evidence of the presence of the Vivian Girls, and did not know where to locate them. He made inquiries but no one knew which army they were in.

Violet and her sisters were oversaddened over the outcome of the last great battle, and did not know what to make of it when the news came to them that the invasion was entirely broken, and that their uncle general! Hanson Vivian had ordered that the invasion had to be abandoned..... They were almost discouraged, and feared that the enemy would surely make a new invasion now and that the entire war was lost for good and all..... They longed for the return of general Evans, and prayed that he would soon come and take command of all the christian armies.

Finally three weeks after the christian defeat at Bandoobogier Violet and her sisters learned from their own little girl friend Jennie Turner and Angeline Niches that general Evans had taken command of all the christian armies, and that he was making inquiries about their whereabouts but could not get any satisfaction.

"We must go to him then," said Violet. "Whose may has he taken command of?"

"No one knows as yet," answered Jennie Turner. "But we are great informers and could easily find out for you in no time....."

"Then do please," cried Jennie Vivian pleadingly.....

"We will do anything for good little friends of ours like you." Said Jennie Turner. "But to find out this information we will have to leave you for a few days. And if we find the great general ourselves we will bring him to you."

Evans was looking over a map in his headquarters at Illina section. It was an important map and gave good proofs of the situation of all the christian lines along the border of Angolinia, and Glandolinia. As he was thus studying this map and looking over every detail, an officer came in and saluting said;

"Your excellency, there are two little girls outside who would like to see you on important matters."

"Who are they asked Evans." "The Vivian girls."

"No." Answered the officer. "They are little strangers to me and under no conditions will give their names to no one but you. By say they must see you and won't leave until they do."

"Well why tell me before bringing them." Said Evans in a surly manner.

"If little children wish wishes to see me let them in. Do you think they will cut me up on first sight?"

Evans that day on some account was in an ugly mood, and the officer knowing it said nothing more. He went out to where the two little girls were standing and said;

"I would like to see you little girls. He told me to bring you in."

"We wish to go in alone." Said the little girl with pink dress and golden hair. "We are not horses and don't want to be led. Do you suspect us as some treacherous spies of Glandolinia?"

The man cowed by her manners did not say a word and allowed them to enter the building. They mounted the steps but under no cause or despite the protests of the children would the little girls be permitted to pass by the guards at the door until the officer said;

"Allow them to proceed. Evans your general wants to see them."

So the two little girls were allowed to enter. They were shown by one of the privates to where Evans was sitting looking over the map. They were asked to sit down, and Evans forgetting about them for the moment went on studying the map. It was the first time that the two children had ever seen this great christian general and they felt almost shy and timid, and for a while kept as quiet as if they were not there at all. For an hour there was silence. Evans still continuing the working over his map and then he chanced to look up and noticed the two little girls sitting down in the lounge.

"Oh I have forgotten all about you two." He said in a pleasant manner. "Are you the two little girls who wished to see me on important business?"

"Yes." Answered Jennie Turner shortly.

"Well, well." Said Evans pleasantly. "I'm glad to see you. Where have you come from? Were you not with my little charges the Vivian girls once at Glorinda?"

"Yes we were." Said Angeline pishes. "And we know where they are now too. That is why we came to see you. They heard of your taking command of the great big christian armies, and begged us to find out how they could get to you. I thought it would be best to find you and have you go to them."

Evans was astonished at this information and said;

"You little girls did wonders. Where are they?"

"They are in the army under the command of the general known as Maurice Costello." Answered Jennie.

"It's glad you have told me this." Answered Evans. "More orderly tell the chief to bring up something to eat. Hurry." He added to the orderly who just then stepped in. "Then turning to the little girls he said;

"What is your name if you please to tell us?"

"My name is Jennie Turner, and this is my little friend Angeline Riches."

"You must be the very battles that have been fought." Said Evans. "Have you named after those cities?"

"We must have been." "Was the chief answer."

"But how did you find your way to my lines?" Asked Evans. "Maurice Costello's army is far from here, and there is danger lurking over where."

"We learned where you was and got here on a fast train." Answered Angeline Riches. "We did not see any of the wicked Glandolinians on the way, nothing but christian soldiers everywhere we looked. We don't see how so many Abbleandians can be so easily beaten."

"I don't either." Said Evans. "What is keeping that orderly?" He wondered to himself. "He's been gone ten minutes already. Does he have to make the chief before he gives him any order?"

But at this moment the orderly appeared.

"What detained you?" Asked Evans sternly. "You have been gone for ten minutes."

"The chief was not in at the moment and I had to prepare it myself."

Evans looked the orderly.

"Oh that's different." Said Evans. "Here little girls is some dinner for you for I believe you are mighty hungry."

"Oh thank you general!" Cried the two children. "We had even missed our breakfast in our hurry to reach you."

As the children proceeded with the eating Evans rolled up the map and placed it under his arm in his drawer and was about to close it when he accidentally swirled apart the table cloth, and saw a man hiding under the table. Suddenly he drew his pistols to the surprise and fear of the little girls and cried;

"Come out from under that table you sneaking cur or I'll shoot you down as I would a dog."

"Seeing himself caught the man moved. He was a fierce looking second hand scoundrel. Evans relieved him of his pistols two of which were found on him and Angeline pishes summoned some of the soldiers who came in a run."

"You were here on some important business of your own." Said Evans.

"You no doubt heard the conversation between me and those two little girls here. And I believe you are one of those sneaking agents looking for the whereabouts of Violet and her sisters. Tell me what your intention was."

"I'll have to admit that you are right." Said the spy. "I was sent here to prevent these little girls from giving you any information as to where they are but have failed. I'll surrender myself to you as a prisoner, as to go back now when suffering a failure would bring upon me a worse fate than you have in store for me. You shoot spies. They torture me when I'm not successful."

"I'm not going to have you shot when not successful." Said Evans.

"But you will serve a long term in prison. Then take him away out of my sight."

The soldiers marched the spy away and the children recovering their apprehension resumed their eating.

"You little girls seem to have been scared when I brought that spy forth so suddenly." Said Evans. "Am I right?"

"We were startled but not frightened." Said Angeline. "We did not know what had happened when you took out your guns. I thought you saw a wild animal under the table."

"I did." Said Evans. "A wild animal in here?"

As soon as the two children had finished eating, Evans determined to take the girls to his room, and when he had arranged to Maurice Costello to send them the Vivian girls to him, giving directions as to where they were to be sent and on. It was two days however before Maurice Costello got this order, and then riding up to where the little girls were still lying on the grassy sward sleeping he dismounted and woke them up.

"Good afternoon general." Said Violet. "What is the trouble now?"

"There is no trouble as yet." Answered the general. "I've received orders to send you little girls to Evans. He has given me full directions as to where you are to go."

"Oh goody." Cried Jennie. "We have been praying for this so long."

"How long will it be before we can go?" Asked Jennie.

"You must start right away." Said the general. "And alone too for scouts have reported that the christian armies are so numerous and so close together that there is no need of a canopy in sight."

Receiving full directions Violet and her sisters mounted their horses and started off toward the point indicated. They must reach the railway station but when they got there they found that the ticket agent was gone, and inquiring learned that no trains ran any more as the trucks had been destroyed to prevent the enemy from using the lines. Violet and her sisters did not know how they were going to reach general Evans, but one of the men knowing their well said;

"You can have colonel Jensen to make the trip. He'll let you have it."

In a few minutes the little girls were in the machine and the chauffeur started off right away toward the distant country. Violet and her sisters enjoyed the beautiful scenery as they passed, and also watched every roadway to make sure that no enemy was within their region of refuge.

Violet and her sisters wondered if they would be long in reaching general Evans, but they did not ask the soldier any questions on this subject. They knew however that little Jennie Turner and her companion had found general Evans and had given him word as to their whereabouts. This they were thankful for, and hoped that it would not take very long, as they were almost impatient to reach him. Finally they asked the soldier who was driving the machine how long it would take to reach the destination.

"That I cannot tell you," said the soldier. "We have a long ride before us and we are lucky if the gasoline holds out for all the way. We have over fifty miles to go yet."

Violet and her sisters sighed.

"It's too bad they wrecked the tracks so soon," said Jennie.

"Yes but it had to be done," declared the soldier. "You see the enemy has used the tracks for their own communications without our knowing it, and that was the only way to prevent them. Our troops are ripping all the lines that run southward, or eastward. It's got to be done. We don't like to do it as we are ruining our own property, and not the enemy's, but then when it is necessary to do so we cannot help but do it...."

"I know it is true," said Catherine. "But how do you know that the enemy would not use some other means. They are clever as you all know."

"We'll prevent anything on their part if possible," answered the soldier. "They have driven out of their own country all of our enemies, but we are not going to let them invade us again and cause much more damage like before. We will show them that even if we can be driven out of glandolinia they will meet just as much resistance as they gave us. And we'll prove it when the opportunity comes."

"I believe Evans will do his best to recover all the lost ground," he exclaimed Hettie Vivian. "He is a good general, and we were awfully whipped because he was absent."

"Yes and he was whipped three or four times when in full command of the armies," said the soldier bitterly. "And how comes that he was thrashed?"

"We can explain easily for us found out," said Daisy. "Three of his generals blundered repeatedly during those battles, and lost their commands. Evans does not stand for no blunders, and only our pleading to him prevented him from doing what Hanson our uncle does to those who blunder. And that is condemn them to death as high treason."

They had now reached the junction of the planvieda gun and here the machine was stopped by some guards and after being questioned were allowed to continue on their way. This was a strange part of the country to the little girls, and they indeed did admire the lovely scenery. It did not look like any there at all for all kinds of beautiful tropical flowers were in bloom and all the trees were fully unburied. The ground was especially beautiful and every house they passed had a cozy appearance. The weather was delightful and exceptionally fair, and the sunbeams darting through the thick foliage made a sublime appearance indeed. They were nearing the region of the largest portion of the Sunbeam Creek where it empties into the Erminia. But they were many hundreds of miles south of where the great battle of Sunbeam creek had been fought. Violet and her sisters watched all the beautiful scenery in silence, and the more they progressed toward the more beautiful it became and finally they reached the stream, and sped across the bridge. Here the scenery was a paradise.

As they crossed the bridge, they halted for a few minutes, to refresh themselves, and then they continued their journey. As soon as they were quite a distance, Violet and her sisters saw moving objects behind some overhanging vines and suddenly a swarm of soldiers stepped out and leveled their muskets, but as soon as they recognized who were in the car they lowered their guns and smiled.

"Beg pardon little Darlings of the Nation for our mistake," said one of the men. "But we must be on our guard you know."

The party still continued on their way until over thirty miles had been passed and night was fast approaching. Then the party realized that they had to stop and turn in for the night as to continue further was not safe without daylight. Near by was another Abbeonnanian camp and here the children and the soldier received shelter.

The Abbeonnanians here were glad to see the little girls and welcomed them warmly and gave them first a good and hearty supper. The officers of the two troops were not Abbeonnanians but Abyssinians, and did not know the little girls until informed who they were, but never theless they were treated with the utmost respect, and eight of the generals offered their own tents for the little girls to sleep in, the general proposing to sleep on the outside.....

The night was a beautiful one, and perfectly clear, and warm. For a certain time for some unusual reason Violet and her sisters found it difficult to go to sleep and so they got up for a while and sat outside the tent, looking constantly at the stars far above them, and at the moon which was shining brightly overhead. They had never seen such a splendor of the heavens before in their lives, and were awed as it seemed very unusual.....

"Ain't the stars much numerous to night," asked Jennie. "And is not the moon beautiful and bright. I believe it never looked so bright before."

"It certainly is," answered her sisters. "And the air is so clear and black. And the air is so beautiful and calm. I wonder what it can mean."

"It is hard to tell," said Violet. "I saw many a tranquil night but never like this. Maybe it is a spell of very fine weather which occurs so frequently in this part of Angolonia."

As they continually watched the scenery, they noticed the nearest bushes slowly wave aside and before them stood a tall, lean man with a gun on his shoulder. He no doubt was one of the guards, but the little girls did not like to take chances, and desisted of what he wanted.

"Oh nothing," was the answer. "I heard your voices and came to see what was up. Why are you not sleeping? It is near ten o'clock!"

"We do not know ourselves," said Catherine. "We could not get to sleep."

"Maybe it is the tranquility of the atmosphere," said the soldier. "I'm usually sleeping while on guard at some nights, but to night I fell as if I could go without sleep forever. It's unusual."

At times Violet and her sisters could hear the drum drum explosive signals among the distant christian camps, and at other times the occasional challenge of a sentry, or the cry "All is well." They liked to listen to all of these sounds, and finally they began to feel drowsy and so they went in and retired for the night.....

THE BATTLE OF BILLIARDS RUN.
THE GREAT EXPLOSION. EARTHQUAKES CAUSED BY EXPLOSIONS.
VIVIAN GIRLS IN PERIL. FIRST GLANDOLINIAN VICTORY.

At ten o'clock in the morning, Violet and her sisters came within the location of general Evans lines, near the region of Billiards Run, but some farmers came up and warned them not to proceed any further than the town of Goodnow for a battle was raging along Evans lines, and that the region was believed unapproachable. This was surprising news for the soldier, but then he had to head warning, and so directed his course toward that town. He and the children had been positive that something was going on, for all that morning since the early break of day they had heard continually the most strange noises, and believed that a battle had been raging somewhere. As soon as they reached the village or town, they could hear the roar of the distant battle more clearly, and also the fiercer yelling of the combatants.

When the little girls were at large in the streets of the town, they found the people all excited, and when mingling among them soon heard the cause. It was rumored that general Ambrose Fuller had led his whole army out of Johnston's camp, and was now fighting against general Evans' army, and that three armies were at present in the field, besides all the christian army. They had heard of all these accidents, and after clapping especially fifteen times, they had heard out of all that Ambrose Fuller had led his army out of Johnston's camp, and had escaped with his life.

No one at first could hardly believe these rumors but it was really true for no one who gave the reports lied. Johnston's army had pulled up his main defense army to force his way to make another great invasion for the cause of glandolinia, and had found general Evans' army opposed to him at Billiards Run. The result of the meeting was a tremendous battle, and for three hours early in the morning Manley had delivered three bitter and violent assaults against the christian line. Then came up the army under Ambrose Edwin Fuller, stronger than ever known before. Each time he threw five million men against the christian line until his losses had been terrific. Within two hours he had made six desperate assaults losing entirely 30,000,000 men. He had expected aid from other portions of Hanley's line, but Hanley had been heavily assaulted by other parts of Evans' main army, and soon for Ambrose Fuller himself all was over. He had been repelled with great assault, and the Angelinians followed up their successes with great counter charges and destroyed Ambrose Fuller's army completely after repelling over fifteen assaults from his Gladiolians.

Hanley had been dismayed over this loss, and Ambrose Fuller who escaped was so broken hearted, that he felt discouraged, and would no longer join in the battle.

Violet and her sisters were shocked indeed over the news, and at first they did not believe it, until the bulletin told it all which had been learned from the main Christian line still inactive. All day long the noise of the distant battle could be heard, and still no one could tell how long it would continue. It was later on reported that the firing of the battle caused series of earth tremors that wrought pain and ruin in the villages and towns thirty miles away from the scene itself. Even many cities, districts and towns were totally devastated by great shell explosions of both sides. This battle seemed another bloody Jennie Turner raging for the losses seemed equally as great. The inhabitants of the town of Goodnow however gave no thought to any immediate danger for they did not believe that the battle could produce shocks as to reduce their own village into ruins. But toward evening scarcely six or eight hours distant had caused great havoc, and even in the town when a peculiar uproar of the battle reached them a severe rocking of the earth was felt but no one paid any special attention to it. But Violet and her sisters were suspicious. They remembered what the disastrous battles of Sunbeam creek, Jennie Turner, Big-Girlkool, and Glorinia had done, and warned many of the people of the village not to go in their own houses until the roaring of the conflict ceased.

Violet and her sisters over the tremendous din of the distant battle were restless and agitated, and they walked about through their room into the garden, and listened to the appalling noise of the distant battle. It sounded like millions of volcanoes far in the distance in activity. A strange foreboding oppressed the little girls intensely, for they felt that the very house was about to collapse about their heads. It was now eight o'clock in the evening. Night now the battle seemed suddenly in violence, and the little girls finally awoke down the town as it did the others. Frenzied and disturbed the little girls went out into the garden, the coming stars were found sparkling so mild, and the distant hills and mountains rested as solid as though their foundations were destined to last forever. But far to the south continued the noise of fierce cannonading, and the crashing thuds of great series of explosions. They return into the building. Then they try to divert their little minds by reading their prayer books, but the letters seemed to move about on the paper like ants, the chairs beneath them seemed to shake continuously, the ceiling overhead to creak. A second time this severe indefinable sensation drove the little girls out of doors, and though in the distance the battle seemed to have slightly increased, as more cannons than before seemed to be in action, the sky above appeared to be as calm and as quiet as ever, all nature itself seemed to be peaceful.

THE FRIGHTFUL EXPLOSION.

"How strange." The little girls mused to themselves. "Is this unaccountable fear that is within us. What we alone be seized and tormented by such unjustifiable apprehension?"

At they took the nerve to go inside the house again, Violet looked at the clock. Eight o'clock had passed.

"Go outside. Go outside." Calls a warning voice seemingly within the air and almost resembling that of little Annie Aronburg. And a third time the same interior prompting urges the little girls to leave the building. The terrible crash of the battle still resounded throughout the coming night, mingling with the hoarse boisterous song of thousands of cannons, and the thunders of terrific explosions. Far to the west the sky was all aflame as if there was some great fire, but Violet and her sisters had no time to think of it. Scarcely had Violet and her sisters left the threshold again, when they observed something in the south like a sudden outburst of a volcano, there came a tremendous crashing as if millions of parks of artillery exploded simultaneously. Indeed roaring and with furious speed the rolling wave came on bringing swift explosion. Then suddenly to the ears of the little girls came the stunning and tremendous deafening noise of falling houses, caving walls and collapsing ceilings. Stones were hurled through the air, the end of the world seemed to come, and mingled with the din came cracking floors and crashing timbers every where, causing a dense cloud of suffocating dust to ascend to the bright starry sky. A moment only and the town of Goodnow was no more. Two terrific shocking explosions had occurred within the Christian lines following each other in quick succession had produced an earth shock which leveled a score of other towns around, and the city of Jennie Wren town only twelve miles further away went down into a mass of ruins, filling the air with dense clouds of dust. The inhabitants were hurled almost a yard high by the shock of the concussion, and indeed it seemed as if the earth had opened into spasmodic convulsions to bury the alive with the doomed city.

"Merry Merry." Was the desperate earthrending cry that rang through the stunning noise and blinding clouds of dust. The plea was no longer for that world in a moment hundreds of thousands appeared before the tribunal of the Judge who unprepared or prepared as they were will pass sentence upon them for eternity. That hours of suspense and terror preceded the tragedy. The wailing cry of the millions of wounded, the unheeded cry for help from those partly covered with debris, the death rattle of the dying the pitious moaning and whining of crushed and mangled children all increased the horrors of this dreadful night. Folted by repeated shocks of earthquakes produced by more great explosions the awful ruins pinned down their victims still more tightly as fresh masses of walls and earth caved in.

As long as the battle would be continuing there would be no escape, no means of rescue for the wounded from this confusion and desolation. The streets were blockaded by piles of debris with no possibility of passage. After this experience it was clear to Violet and her sisters who it was that had given them no peace. Without the faithful warning of their guardian angels and of little Annie Aronburg, they thought to themselves they would now lie dead or buried alive beneath the debris of the house they had taken refuge in for the night. Thanks to the interior promptings, they had apprehended the approaching dangers, and were able to secure their proper protection and safety in the beautiful garden, at a safe distance from buildings. In fervent prayer they gave thanks to their guardian angels and the little Aronburg Girl for this miraculous rescue.

In the meantime before the explosions had occurred, Hanley had massed all of his army forward against the whole of the Christian army under general Evans, and thus after the occurrence of the explosions the Christian army could be seen retiring northward as fast as soldiers could run. Evans could not stop the wild rout, and it was feared exceedingly that the fierce Gladiolians would soon overrun the Christian country once more.

But it did not seem that anyway the battle could be as yet won by the enemy. It was only half of general Evans' army which had been worsted and this he quickly got ready, and during the late portion of the night he had rallied and gathered a large section of the beaten armies, and was prepared to meet the enemy once more. The enemy were in possession of the devastated regions but it did not benefit them anything whatever.

Violet and her sisters and the millions of homeless survivors had been compelled to retreat before the tide of confusion, and were succored by many other villages and towns further north. Tired, weary, and apprehensive Violet and her sisters were given shelter in a frame house, and they laid awake for quite a while listening to the noise of many explosions, and the rumbling of many big guns. They felt apprehensive over the entire situation for evidently it appeared that the enemy would surely make an invasion into the Angelinian country again. Even if the foe did invade Angelinia, there could still be hope of holding out successfully, but the main danger was Gladiolians. Should the Gladiolians march over such as Calvernia the three, Abbeville, Angelinia, and Calvernia might as well be their arms and surrender. Thus they thought while lying awake. Finally they fell asleep. Enemies however were prowling around this region in disguise, enemies as thick as swarms of flies over a decayed animal, and several of these in the darkness of the night set the frame house on fire. The fire when discovered was in full blaze when the fire bells clanged through the dark noise calling the people to hasten to the rescue.

Houses at other points had also been set afire by the prowlers, and the sleeping occupants of the many ill-fated houses knew nothing of their peril until aroused by the outsiders, and only by rapid flight down stairs did the elders save their lives and their own children.

The fire had caused a general panic, and while the confusion was at its height the fire-department of other towns arrived, and started to work on the fierce infernos of what had once been houses. No child in the buildings had been forgotten, but when the crowds had surged toward the place where Violet and her sisters had been sleeping it was also found that this building was also aflame, and that the children were not out, and had been sleeping in the attic. What was to be done? To re-enter this building was impossible, suicide, already the stairways, the floor and walls, every one were ablaze, and soon the entire house would collapse. The fire departments were already arriving in increased numbers, and two of them started a desperate fight to save the houses, and two being attracted by the crowd to the special one where Violet and her sisters slept, started the work more strongly on this building, but the fire had spread too far, and nothing could be done to check its wild progress, and all the lower section was a roaring furnace. And there high above the burning structure, slept those eight innocent saintly little girls - the beautiful Vivian Girls, who had survived so much for our Poor Lord, and who had risked so many perils for his sake, and who were the Darlings of the Nations. No one was able to call them, no one could give them aid. Ladders were placed against the walls but the flames leaped so far from the lower windows that no one could climb them, and this attempt had to be abandoned. The floor of the room where Violet and her sisters were sleeping, was already burning fiercely, already many timbers have burned through, and the place was smoke filled. Soon a portion of the floor fell in with a heavy and deafening crash. But fortunately the loud crackling of the flames, the stifling smoke, and the noise of falling timber, and the shouts of people outside, and shouted orders from all firemen, and confusion of sound, besides the noise of engines, and firewhistles awoke the little girls, and at once they jumped from their beds and rushed to the door.

In a moment they had jerked it open, but to their dismay saw singing sheets of flame fairly blew in their faces, followed by black clouds of dense smoke. With difficulty they slammed the door against the devouring flames and ran to the nearest windows about three of them.

"Oh God how far are we from the ground!" gasped Jennie in horror. "We are eighty feet!" cried Violet. "At least it seems so and no ladder can reach us for the men I would free the flames of fire below. And there is no rope at hand with which we could save ourselves at the other side. We will have to jump."

"Overhead already great tongues of flame were breaking through the roof beneath them leaping through the windows, came long a tongues of fire, which were also rapidly consuming the walls. And already the house was starting to sway and tilt as if about to collapse."

"Oh God help us, we simply must jump down!" cried Joice. "I will jump first dear sisters, and if it don't hurt me you must jump after me."

"Taking the sign of the cross she cried:

"Only guardian angel, help me and she leaped to the ground fully thirty feet below - wonderful indeed indeed. She did not suffer the least harm, and as she rose quickly and called to her sister with a joyfulness that was indescribable. "X Come on little sisters it did not hurt me." She leaped among the throng. Daitating her sisters pious example Jennie made the sign of the cross and begged, "H Holy Guardian Angel, help me."

Another jump from the window. To the inexpressible joy of the weeping friends, and anxious bystanders, the little one too rises without having sustained the slightest injury. Instantly her sisters followed, and just in time for the house collapsed with a thunderous roar sending clouds of sparks high into the air. Instantly all are on their knees thanking God. You true is the word of Holy Writ:

"He hath given His angels charge over thee to keep thee in all thy ways. In their hands they shall bear thee up."

In fact the enemy had won that last day a sweeping and crushing victory on Evans' foremost army. A brilliant victory indeed on odds best serves. But their progress inward was noticed to be peculiarly extended. The main line of Evans' army had been pierced badly but not bended back, and should Johnston Jackson Manley advise Evans to resume the battle without pressing his own advantage which he had gained, Manley's army would pay little hell for it. His whole Glandelinian army was caught in an angle of Christian armies, not under Evans alone, but generals Jimmie Vivian, General Vivian James Cannon, Williamshurzer Zimmermann, and now others of worthy note. Manley was in danger for his victory had carried him right into a trap that was more dangerous than a snare of the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

General Evans did not know this fact at all. He believed indeed that he was already beaten, that the enemy would now surely decide the situation. "I'm beaten," and all the rest in their own favor in the darkest time that it takes to think of. He was not discouraged or dispirited, and vowed that no Glandelinian general no matter who he was could ever make him surrender. "It's like surrendering to the devil and his angels." He said to his staff that night after the armies had been withdrawn to the main line. "To surrender to the worse enemies of God under that Manley, is cowardice, and for one I'd rather commit suicide than do so. I'm beaten, I'll have to admit it but just the same I do not lose heart. I remember the stories of the many battles during the Civil war in the United States, in Eighteen sixty one when many times the cause of the Nationals was just as much at stake as our own are now, and how did the whole quarrel turn out. Why the Confederates were finally reduced to the last stages of desperation, and general Robert Edmund Lee had to surrender to save his armies from destruction, and the Southern States from further devastation. We cannot be like the Confederates who were beaten through their own fault, and neither will we allow ourselves to be beaten. We can win, and there is something wrong somewhere that causes the victory that the enemy continually wins."

Violet and her sisters were with him and heard this statement he made. They had earlier in the evening reached his lines, and succeeded in scouting on the enemy after the earthquake scenes, three days before. Though worsted in the battle Evans did not allow his army to retreat, and determined to await his opportunity, and strike back as swiftly as a thunderbolt. Violet and her sisters who had been out scouting, had discovered the condition of the enemy's lines. They had observed that the enemy were really victorious in the battle, had accomplished more than even Manley had ever expected, but Manley's whole army unknown to him was trapped, and so when they had returned to Evans' headquarters, it had been just in time to catch him in his speech to the general officers, and for a while they gave him all the information which they had to his surprise and joy.

"You little girls are certainly wonderful," said Evans. "You have to the world all you discover all this."

"Easily." Answered Catherine. "We went out to scout on the enemy early this evening, and discovered it through means of our maneuvers, and learned of it through a certain Glandelinian we heard talking to a companion. We shot them down, and wounded them, so that they could not escape and bring the information of his danger to Manley, and made haste to tell you about it. And we hope that we have succeeded."

"Well it would do little good for Manley if he did discover his danger," declared Evans. "Of course we cannot capture his army, but he will not dare assault us again, and we will not fear the results. And we can withdraw our armies to better cover."

"I think it will be foolish to do so," said general Baldwin.

If you withdraw, you'll move the trap out of Manley's way and he will take advantage of it and strike you again, and probably more successfully, and more disastrously. I can see, and probably the little girls can see it too that if you defeat Manley this time, after all the success the Glandelinians already have made, it will be a blow from which they will never recover, and we probably can march on their captured capital then without much further resistance."

"It seems possible that you are right," said Evans after a moment's silence. "I believe it will be the best thing, to strike him, and strike him hard. And I'll have general Williamshurzer Zimmermann who is only twelve miles away from me catch Manley at the same time. This will give me a chance to revenge my many defeats, which I have already experienced."

Later on Evans went out scouting, himself, and for favor and company brought Violet and her sisters, and even the other two little girls with him. As they had progressed for a short distance, they were suddenly attracted by the sound of voices, and going closer heard one of the men said:

"Yes I was shot sergeant by one of the Vivian girls and so was my companion too. But don't blame them sergeant. It's our disguise that fooled them. They heard us talking about the trap into which Manley fell into and believing us Glandelinians they at once charged upon us, and shot us down. But only two of the little girls fired the shot. Jennie and Daisy."

"But why did you not explain who you were?" asked the sergeant.

"We had no time." Was the answer. "We were being ordered to all this time still you and your cavalry came along. Please hurry to the lines and don't any more on the matter, for I don't wish to have it spread around that Violet and her sisters shot down their two best friends John Evans and Rudolph Bassett's dale."

Telling Violet and her sisters to stay in the background general Evans rode lastingly to the spot. The sergeant had ordered the men who were with him to place the wounded christian generals on a horse each, and was about to direct Violet's horse when Evans came thundering down upon them. At first each man suddenly drew his gun and prepared to fire, but when they saw that it was they were glad.

"Your excellency these two men in disguise have been shot down by two of the Vivian girls." Said the sergeant.

"Yes I know it." Said Evans. "And even my brother for I heard the conversation. A : they severely wounded."

"Seriously, and dangerously." Answered the sergeant. "But I believe if we can get them to the lines quick enough, we can bring them through. Your brother was shot more seriously though, and has a wound in the right lung, and left arm."

"It's startling, and they have heard your conversation too." Said general Jack Evans. "They are only a little ways from here I having come alone." But as it was a mistake I suppose they did not mean it. I must call them."

He rode forward to where the little girls were, and advised them to come. They did, and as the disguise of the two men were stripped off, it was soon evident that they were really the two generals, and Violet and her sisters felt frightened, and thought that they could never forgive themselves.

"We surely thought you were Glandelinians." said Violet. "You were talking so suspiciously that we thought you were Glandelinians who knew the secret of our armies, and we show no mercy to spies, and so two of us let you have it. But I hope our shots were not fatal."

The whole party led the two wounded generals within the lines, and as soon as the hospital camp was reached, Evans turned the wounded generals over to the most expert army surgeon.

"They will pull through." He said. "But they must be kept from noise and excitement. If a battle happens to rage, see to it that they are transferred to one of the northern towns or cities."

Violet and her sisters were full of apologies, but general Evans drew them away from the wounded generals and said:

"What is the use of feeling so terribly over it? You little girls made a mistake. Surely it would have been me to do the same thing if I saw them first, and thought them as suspects. The doctor says they will recover and surely they'll forgive you."

Violet and her sisters however did not know what to make of their mistake, and felt that indeed Jennie Turner and Angeline niches were surprised that Violet and her sisters could have made such a mistake, but who could trust the chance when any one would have suddenly rode right into two gray coats. Anyone who dared wear the graycoat whether enemy or not, took his chances, and they knew it. So Violet and her sisters could not be blamed. Jennie Turner and the other little girls, told Violet and her sisters, how they had reached Evans lines, and also told them how the battle of Billiards Run had raged. Violet and her sisters lying down and looking at the bright and beautiful stars, were interested in the story of the two little girls, and then Violet said:

"I suppose you two friends of mine have had a lot of our own experiences."

"We read of it all in the papers." Said Jennie Turner. "You have suffered a great deal in the four hands, and we are surprised to see you living with us to day. We don't understand it and yet we see it."

"You and your companion have proved yourselves to be brave and courageous too." Said Jennie. "When in danger that the two of you killed two graycoats, while we shot down the rest."

"We did not know that we did be brave." Said the child. "We thought we could have screamed when we saw them lunging toward us."

"But you were brave nevertheless." Said Jennie. "We have felt the same way ourselves when cornered by the foe. But we suppressed ourselves, and did not utter a sound, but fired at our foes."

Jennie Turner and her friend admired the presence of Violet and her dearest sisters, and wondered that such fair and beautiful little girls could really have such bravery. Nevertheless they did not even so much as hint at their special guardian. They were called in by Evans to a private call of the little girls to go to bed as they would probably have to arise early in the morning.

"Go to bed!" Asked Violet.

"Yes." Answered Evans pleasantly. "Good little girls always go right to bed when they are asked to."

"But we can't." Answered Jennie. "You know well enough Evans Dear that there are no beds in the cots. We sleep on the floor last night, and so did you and the other generals." And the little girls started laughing.

B 233

"You little children are greatly mistaken." Declared Evans. "Do you think my soldiers make raids for mere nothing. This morning our sole soldiers made repeated raids on the enemy, and captured articles of furniture of every description besides over 567,000 beds, and everything belonging to them, added with provisions, and many wagons. So to night none of us generals at least will sleep on the floor, and I congratulate you to say that neither will any of the soldiers, for their good work these past three days. So this is where I surprise you."

Going inside the little girls saw that it was really true. In their own well selected rooms these the three beds that was well fit to have for a number of kings. After their prayers the little girls tumbled in in no time and were soon fast asleep. Jennie Turner alone could hardly get any sleep, but finally she grew drowsy and was soon as sound asleep as any of the other children were. Soon the children were suddenly awakened by the sound of fierce thunder or something what appeared like thunder, but thinking it a thunderstorm they gradually went to sleep again, just as the noise ceased and all was quiet. Evans had been shot in a large section of Glandelinian country who had been discovered scouting on his lines. Evans during the night had been concentrating his main forces toward Lizzen Pirsian, and learning of the approach of Abraham Manley's armies, had extended his other forces to the left, to prevent the new Glandelinian army from making a junction with Manley's or Billiards Run. This was generally the cause of the fierce campaigning, but fortunately it did not cause any serious action.

But late in the next morning the very Glandelinian army showed its teeth when machine guns were turned with dreadful destructive success on the mobs of Abbeannian assault, who made a storming assault upon the whole line with unceasing fury, and great ferocity. The battle had raged for over three hours before Violet and her sisters had been awakened by the frightful din, and later they heard of the frightful repulse of the christian assailants who stormed the enemy positions so fiercely. Wireless dispatch reached Evans which said that the Glandelinians had not been able to repulse the bloody assault or disperse the wild mob of Abbeannians and Abyssinkilians until the most vicious of war weapons--flame throwers--a new device was used by the Glandelinians. While the forces which had been driven back were being rallied all the army was agog with wild rumors and unconfirmed reports that scores of millions of Abbeannians and Abyssinkians were killed and wounded and many more millions taken prisoners, and that scores of christian generals were also killed and wounded. A furious and most sanguinary battle was now raging along the main and extreme christian right held by general Cal Clannon which seemed to be the climax of a furious demonstration of a surge of Glandelinian waves estimated at over 26, 26,799,000 strong, and who in the face of a murderous withering fire of christian musketry and cannons poured successfully over a large section of the christian works, quickly but gradually pressed back what portion of the whole Abbeannian line. The Abbeannian machine guns about sixty a thousand in number at this moment opened a terrific and withering fusillade digging vicious holes in the gray surges, and splintering them into pieces, and even splintering the trees, amid the terrific storm of shouts which rose from the throngs of Mc-Hollentinian assailants, and as massed fresh divisions of Abyssinkilians and Abbeannians were thrown in overwhelming numbers upon them, and shot and cut them down in whole sale masses, an indescribable panic and confusion broke out, and many Glandelinian officers who were caught in the panicly turnabout of the Mc-Hollentinian waves finding for the shelter of the woods, fell mortally wounded in that screaming, thundering, and fearful storm of slaughter and conflict. Men and officers piled on top of one another, and as the machine guns kept up unmercifully, the Abbeannians as if driven by fury pressed on after the retreating foe. Evans who had not ordered any attack on the enemy lines in the first place did not know what to make of it, or how in the world the battle had started. Nevertheless he did not believe it wise to allow the enemy to rally at this section at all, and so toward noon massed all of the wing against the Glandelinian army in the location of the first main notion and soon crushed the assailants, and sent them flying back to their own lines at a headlong rate. It was a christian victory so far as it went, but it was evident that the foe in no time would resume the action which was known as the battle of St. Santa Claus Marie. Violet and her sisters and the other two little girls had not witnessed any of this tremendous action, but they had heard the frightful din, and had hoped and longed that the foe would not meet with any success.

Evans during the lull was suspicious of the enemy's actions toward the left a section of the Easter Starring Run junction and threw three quarters of general Jackwick Baldwin's divisions at once at that point, and opened on the enemy's center a tremendous cannonade of many thousands of guns.

He was indeed suspicious when Evans saw three glandelinian divisions and all. Zimmerman thus meaning upon his own center from a different and new quarter, for from the point where Johnston Jackson Manley had his army as situated, and he came to the conclusion, that it was not Johnston Jackson Manley's army that was harassing him but some other glandelinian army of itself. So fearing some thing treacherous he sent a note advising Williamson and Evans to move toward at once, and strike Johnston Manley down, to prevent him from throwing his army upon him, and then raised his second half of the Abbieanman army to meet the new assault that was coming, a-tearing like a roaring, screeching cyclone out of the Hells blowhole.

Cannons of every make tore the glandelinian waves into flying pieces, the din was hentshocking, and terrific, glandelinian waves start staggered and gave back, and with yells of derision the Abbieanmans swept forward at a fierce counter charge, but the glandelinians had rallied, and struck back with all their might, and reduced the column of christian assailants to fragments, and sent them also flying back in the wildest rout to their lines. Evans again massed a immense division before the glandelinians would recover from the effects of the close engagement, and the battle assumed such a murderous and insane fury that of all of the christian generals became suspicious that Manley was massing some new armies from some different location, and warned Evans to be on the lookout. Likewise, when the glandelinian assault poured on, and was torn to pieces, and hurled back in panic. Again the glandelinian surge massed itself in unbroken storm waves of human beings upon the Abbieanman lines, and after a wholesale wholesale massacre driven back with the loss of three quarters of their numbers and with twenty generals slain. But along the christian center the christian army had broken the whole christian line to pieces, and had captured general Evans headquarters, and everyone in it. Fortunately he and the child were absent, but nevertheless surely not finally the battle was going to be a glandelinian victory, for Evans was now overwhelmed by the assault and by a murderous and annihilating fire of 34,000 glandelinian cannon.

At other points of the line he over the assault of the foe did not meet with evident success, and the glandelinian leaders had withdrawn out of their attacking column, thus leaving the assailing glandelinian center fearfully exposed to extreme danger.

Evans had discovered this blunder of the glandelinian generals, and made the strongest concentration of the whole battle upon the glandelinian armies attacking his center, and finally toward night fall the glandelinians withdrew but nevertheless though the fierce conflict was over, it was only a drawn battle as the main glandelinian army still retained its positions and it was in vain just now to make any further efforts to dislodge them.

The battle had been extremely fierce and sanguinary to behold for any length of time, and was the bloodiest battle along the border that had as yet ever been fought.

Manley later in the evening tried to make a diversion and though it resulted in some activity, no more general fighting occurred, and soon all was as quiet as if no battle had been fought. Evans then made efforts to bring to conclusion the cause of the battle. So that night the generals were all assembled and questions were asked about the whole situation.

"I ordered the first great charge that the Abbieanmans made," said general James G. "And I had to. The enemy I discovered were massing three quarters of their full battle batteries of guns on our own line, and so I gave the order, to make the assault. The attack I made was indeed terrific and lasted fully three hours. At the first part of it, my divisions was able to push them back through the glandelinian front, and capture a good number of their best generals of the day, but the main glandelinian general with the last hour throw upon me all his force and crushed all my assaulting line to pieces. What the enemy's intentions was I was not sure, but I sent parts of artillery upon it, and was successful, but I feared an Abbieanman that I feared the enemy might be able to do so, and so I ordered the attack, and I was successful. I have captured them last night, and have saved our armies from a severe dissolution."

"It's possible that it had to happen," said general Evans. "I did not wish to have an engagement with the enemy yet until I could concentrate my main army on Jackson Phynum but as long as the battle could not be avoided then I had to tell any one responsible. What do you think general Cannon was the intention of the enemy in making all their artillery on your side?"

"I cannot say," was the answer. "But I would not take any chances and so let them have it first with my best batteries, and then throw my whole army to the assault. I tell you general they never fired a gun in the whole battle, for when temporarily victorious the men spiked and disabled all the guns so the enemy could not use them."

"You have accomplished something great for the army and prevented a real disaster," said general Evans. "Since the battle of Florida, I thought the war would be over in its fierceness but it seems to me it's getting still more fierce and without any pause. So many glandelinians fell in these recent battles which they won, or lost, that I believed the glandelinian nation was trying to face annihilation, and still comes more glandelinian armies. I cannot understand it at all, but nevertheless it does seem to me that our armies will never cross the border again to make a invasion. We have not casualties of disasters, have been worsted three times in making an invasion of glandelinia, and have raised Cain and hell literally in our efforts to drive the glandelinian armies out of our own countries. The more we gather the christian armies to the defense of our country, the stronger the foe become, and I thought sure they were being depleted more and more and that it would be an easy victory for Angelina now that Abbieanman put in her own armies, but the Abbieanmans seem unable to do the work that the Angelinians were. I cannot understand the reason at all."

"It does seem peculiar," said general Baldwin. "I know of my great talk with you at Florida and we may have to have another. It's strange indeed that the Abbieanmans seem to have so many reverses, not to say losing every good battle fought, fought during the invasion and driven out of glandelinia quicker than they paired in. How does it come is the question, when in the great war of Eighteen fourteen One the Abbieanmans cleared Galverinia from armies of glandelinians scores of times bigger than their own in a few months time, and destroyed forty armies of Ho-Hollatinians in as many battles on the very very Angelina soil during the year of Eighteen Forty Four when the war was in full sway and at its most sanguinary fury. How was it that the glandelinian armies during that war were surrounded by the score, and how was it that the Abbieanmans in Eighteen Eighty Eight were almost completely the glandelinian capital and that other armies that were in the city were destroyed and had to withdraw in terror? I do not making forest fires caused by their own fault. How does it come that they finally reduced the city to surrender, and vanquished the whole country, and now mean now that we reported and most serious disasters and defeats that any army have suffered in all the wars that have the world? Well I can explain. And easily too. Glandelinia has been changed since then. They were so small, so weak, so that great war because they have not how to fight, and were not themselves and able only to vanquish smaller nations themselves. They could at that time raise immense armies but their style of fighting was not even as good as those of Glandelinia. But now they have the style of fighting the Abbieanmans have, they learned it from that time. The world changed in a very short time. Glandelinia was changed, it changed, and we ought to have listened to advice. It will be soon as it will not, but let me tell you general Evans I'll swear to it that as soon as it's over the whole world I if not attended to will be plunged into pestilence and fearful ruin, which were never heard of. This dark war is a warning of hell to itself, and all in off we cannot break Manley like within another week. We'll get it and get it good. Glandelinia has shown herself before the whole world at the end of this war to be the most powerful nation in the world. They suffered nothing in this war, we suffered all, and what can we do to escape from in Galverinia where thousands of cities of ground has been desolated, worse than the end of the world itself could do. We'll not finish of course not yet, but the other side we will. The war has caused terrible sorrow already but it is only a trifle what will come."

And Glandelinia will support those nations or I'll destroy her all together," said Evans with sarcasm. "No matter how hard on the situation is from this war I'll be prepared to meet it, and so will Hanson, and you others will have to too. We'll raise crops in Galverinia, and I'm going to make all of the damnable prisoners who are confined in Galverinia rebuild the frame which they have ruined, or take the places of the children who had been so cruelly murdered during this war. I've sworn to have revenge for the suffering the living girls have went through, and for the assassination of my parents relations and sisters, and I will have revenge too or go down into the uttermost depths of hell as a liar. I'll not give way from this border not even if all of Heaven was to join the glandelinians and pick pitch against us and try to lose. I'll wait the two Manleys or die one or the other. I proclaimed God himself that I myself would be the main leader to keep the city of Glandelinia, and I'll get there too. I have to take the same old old as I did before. There is no more of anything, and in the end of this war I'll have a very strong army. I'll make them pay for God asking me to stop the terrible fire among the lines. I feel a defeat as I feel to be called a coward, and the more defeat I feel the more determined I'll be to win, and shall. I'll cross that border and defy all hell to stop me."

General Baldwin however did not feel so confident of success. The foe's armies were reported to have easily overwhelmed the christian armies during the invasion, and that now it did seem that both sides really equalled each other in obstinacy. However he did not believe it possible that christianity would and could be worsted by an enemy of God. He saw that there must be some way to crushing the two Manleys, and of ending the war. So he concentrated along the border and repelling another attack upon the border, and it did seem as if the war had been reported from all points of the border, and it did seem as if the war was growing more terrible in fury every day and that both sides seemed to face annihilation. While all of the generals were silent for several minutes Evan pondered on the situation. It was real probable that if the Glandelinians won the war Violet and her sisters would soon look like so many of the other murdered children did, and this must be prevented at all hazards. Strike he must, and at once. There should be no waiting untill to-morrow.

"Damn it." He suddenly cried to their amazement. "I'm going to resume the battle at once and crush Manley at no matter what the cost. Go to your respective commands every one of you, and start them forward to strike Manley a blow. I have three hundred thousand Cannon and will blast the way for you. I'll order Zimmermann to strike Manley immediately too. I'll push through all right or know the reason why."

"Alright your excellency we'll do so." Said Baldwin. "And may God help us to win so we can move our armies and concentrate upon Lizzien Pirrian. If we cannot push forward here, we'll never force the way into Lizzien at Lizzien Pirrian. Manley will then laugh us to scorn."

The generals were dismissed, and preparations were made for the assault, while Evans within three hours had a full play of three hundred thousand cannon in action which made a din so terrific as to shake Zimmermann out of his bed, just before he got the order to move like a wedge against Johnston Jacken Manley.

It was Evans purpose to move fiercely with his whole army against Huebaum Manley crush him, sweep past, and throw his whole army upon the rear of Johnston Jacken Manley. If this movement could be successful all would be well. If not then Evans would conclude that he could never do the work desired of him, and if he saw he could not accomplish anything he would hand in his resignation.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

CONTINUATION OF BATTLE OF ST SANTA CLAUS MARIE.

IT'S CONCLUSION. GREAT BATTLE OF THREE DAYS

DURATION AT LIZZIE PIRRIAN. AND THE HIGHEST FURY OF

THE MAD CONFLICT HUEBAUM MANLEY'S ARMIES ARE DISRUPTED.

HIS FATHER'S ARMIES CUT UP AND THROWN INTO CONFUSION AND ROUT. HUEBAUM MANLEY BEARING THE ANNIHILATION OF HIS ARMY, IS COMPELLED TO FLEE, BUT IS SHOT TO DEATH BY FIERCE ABYSSINKILIANS IN A RUSH. GLADELINIA IS REALLY DEVASTATED."

Early the next morning Evans had his whole army thrown upon the glandelinian forces under Huebaum Manley. At first Evans had little hope that he could accomplish anything a success, as no such opportunity presented itself, but during the frightful melee, Evans had discovered that Manleys had extended his left grand wing too far toward the east, and that if any big force was thrown upon it unexpectedly it would cause a disaster.

Evans decided to take advantage of this blunder immediately, and bringing up general Charles Glangings divisions of Concentinians, he hurled it upon the left wing of the glandelinian army, while he sent all the Concentinians and Abyssinkilians cavarly to strike the wing a blow in the rear. The assaults of these two immense forces was made almost simultaneously, and though for a time it seemed possible that the Abbieannians would not be able to pierce the line, the Concentinians cavarly, got far around the main rear, of the glandelinian force, and threw themselves for with the yell of a terrific cyclone. Ten repeated desperate charges were successfully and frightfully repulsed by the glandelinians along their front, but the main body of Abbieannian cavarly after having checked their own rush for an hours time to gain time to reform came tearing through the rear of the glandelinian division, scattering all before it like chaff before a windstorm, and the glandelinians were at once thrown into confusion. Back was rolled the entire left wing of Huebaum Manleys army, and dreadfully cut up, with their fallen lying in monstrous windrows, the survivors retreated in panic.

Huebaum Manley saw the disaster, and warned his father what was going on and tried his level best to retrieve the disaster, but his main reserve force was cut off by the Calverinians under general Childs, and he could do nothing whatever to surpress the onslaught of the Abbieannians along his center. The whole thing was accomplished in one whole morning, and soon the whole of Huebaum Manleys army was retiring southward.

In attacking general Johnston Jacken Manley, Whilliamsburger Zimmermann met serious and stubborn resistance. Johnston Manley had discovered the evident intention of general Evans through means of his spies, and had brought his whole army into the trenches during the night, and repelled every assault made by the Abbieannians with great success.

Evans fortunately had worsted Huebaum Manley sooner than he had expected, and the warning that Huebaum Manley had sent to his father, never reached him, as the messenger fell into the hands of the Abyssinkilians, was shot and the document taken from him.

Toward late afternoon Evans was well in the rear of the army under the second Manley, and toward four-o'clock Evans pushed forward, and finally after most sanguinary fighting, cut his way through the whole Glandelinian army, drove it back for ten miles, and toward evening made a close junction with Zimmermann. Manley at eight o'clock tried every effort, to dislodge Evans, and Zimmermann. Twenty eight successive assaults starting at eight o'clock and ending at twelve midnight was made by the foe with terrific fury but without success, and finally Manley gave it up and retired southward.

"This is surprising indeed..." said Violet to general Evans the next day after the battle had progressed later on in the night with still more success for the enemy, after the fl. foe had been forced to withdraw toward evening before. "Why is it that we can't win anymore... believe we are ourselves too far reduced to have a even chance with Glandelinia."

"Maybe, or at least it seemed so so," answered Evans. "But you little girls must remember that Abbeannia has been through many great wars. She smashed the Normonians in her great battle with them in the bloody and cruel christian war of 1771, and then she smashed the Abyssinkilians who had beaten the Mormonians too, and who were supposed to have the most efficient armies in all the world, and who were then known as the mightiest nation in the world next to Abbeannia. You see the Abbeannian nation has been doing a lot of fighting for many hundreds of years, in series upon series of bloodier wars than ever waged in U.S. or any other country in all Europe. Every man in the Abbeannian army is a veteran, and knows just what war really is. A man like that is worth more than those who have to get used to the idea of campaigns, and who has never been under fire. And I knew and do know that if she seems unable to do anything, I can use her power because of Glandelinia's stronger resistance Abbeannia maybe will not have to fight Glandelinia alone. The Angelinians were a most beaten in the war, Abbeannia admits defeat already through her bulletins, declaring that she cannot drive the glandelinians to submission, but then there is one ally and state of Abbeannia that can under all conditions, if she throws all her armies out."

Violet and her sisters stared at general Evans not knowing what he really meant.

"It's Consentina, and Domb Dombolia," he continued. "And maybe Abyssinkille will help us in all our for their forces. And I think she will in many moments notice. If Glandelinia has to fight Abbeannia and Dombolia or the other side she won't be able here on to spare the armies she has left to her to fight us Abbeannians and Consentinians, and Angelinians here. And Three hundred and sixty five million Abbeannians, Abyssinkilians, and Angelinians won't be beaten by that many Glandelinians I can tell you once I get them all going right. The main thing we must depend upon is the recovery of general Hanson Vivian."

Evans had just finished talking when he heard a heavy pounding on the lower door or door of the lower room which was at the bottom of the stairs, directly in line with his own, his room being on the first floor. For a moment he was curious enough to open his door to listen and saw the woman of the house open the door.

"In the name of the law of Abbeannia," he heard a voice say. "We have come to take one Richard Sanders calling himself an American, a citizen of the United States, who is accused of being a dirty Glandelinian sneak and spy, posing as an American, and is to be immediately sent to Abbeannia. He is hiding in here somewhere. Stand aside aside."

The spy was hiding under a table in Evans room. He was aghast in a moment for to be captured by the fierce Abbeannians was like being seized by starved wolves. Then by a sheer instinct of self-preservation, he got out from under the table, flung the door shut, bolted and locked it, and examined his guns. The door proved itself to be stout and would hold against an assault for any length of time. He rushed to the window. It was an easy drop to the garden below, but of what use to drop, for what chance was there for him to make the leap when he saw that the building was surrounded. He thought it better to yield himself up. Though he was not a coward, he knew that the Abbeannians would shoot him without trial as they never try the spies like the Angelinians or Abyssinkilians. Just then heavy footsteps came up the stairs, and deciding not to take any chances the spy leaped out of the window, shot down several of the soldiers who made for him, but was immediately seized and overpowered. Enemies of God could never escape justice. Evans saw the man leap from the window and was outside in a moment.

After the spy was led away Evans went back and resumed his conversation with Violet and her sisters.

"Yes," he continued Abyssinkille will also help us if Glandelinia tries to force her way on to make another invasion. We know that already. Then Protestina must help Abbeannia, and Blaulina must help Abyssinkille, and Abbeannia must help them both. And then the great war will have to and will be carried forward to great success, and Glandelinia will suffer the defeat which she threatened us with, when she tried to wrest Galverinia out of our possession that millions of our comrades had died to win the Galverinian fatherland. We have given way many times during the bloody war, have seemed about to lose the war entirely, just as we gave way at Big girl knoel when the glandelinians were enslaving millions of children near Theantonburg, no there might be peace for a space in that region."

But this time Glandelinia has gone too far when she tries to take away the independence the child slays in the rebellion bought from the child slave masters with even their blood. Angelina and Abbeannia can not give way, and must not again. And Abbeannia will not let Angelina be wiped out by Glandelinia."

"We are in the right, and we are going to win," said Joise. "There is no other way. As too," said Evans. "And little girls there is one thing. Glandelinia has treated Galverinia badly and that she should not have annexed lands which there were so many Abbeannians..."

"And that murder of the little Aronburg girl was an awful thing," said Jennie.

"It was indeed a frightful deed," declared Evans passionately. "Every true christian of any nation fighting the glandelinians in this war will tell you the same thing. But it is a wicked lie for Glandelinia to say that Manley or many of the other glandelinian generals who were accused, to say they had anything to do with it. It was that fierce and dreaded Phellinia Tamerline who planned and had it done. The Abbeannians did all we could after it happened to run the rascally assassins down. Our own governments learned also that on account of the Crowley massacre that trouble was then brewing between Glandelinia and Angelina, and the Abbeannian minister in Pardora Galverinia begged, general Vivian at that time to send you little girls to Abbeannia immediately, or at least to take special precaution to see that you were safe. The Glandelinians hated little Annie Aronburg because they knew she was the little rebel who planned the whole child slave rebellion and who with you her sisters Gertrude Angeline carried it through to such success just before she was murdered."

"No that is only an excuse," said Gertrude Angeline. "The Glandelinian child slave masters were really terribly afraid of us little rebels whom we once got started, afraid of us, our patriotism to god and all his creatures in heaven. Glandelinia hearing of our rebellion planned to crush us rebels before we became too strong, and that is the reason they assassinated my sister. And now Glandelinia is really trembling because of her memory of how resolutely in 1841 Abbeannia crushed her easily in the ten years war, and thus the reason of her insane resistance. I know Evans that the time is coming when we'll really turn the tables once again and for good. She came to me in a vision not long ago, and told me that Glandelinia will never win. She gave the notice to me that the war will rage just exactly four years and by that time Glandelinia will be begging for our mercy. And despite the looks of the situation now too."

"Yes and until we become power powerful by beating Normonia and Abyssinkille which attacked us as the result of a dirty glandelinian trick it mattered less than known now. But ever since the child slavery took foothold in Galverinia we have known that wicked Glandelinia was only looking for an excuse to attack us. And so from the start Angelina had tried to be ready. It was our only chance to save ourselves, by throwing our armies immediately into the conflict as after the massacre of children by Glandelinians at Crowley and Jennie Wren town."

"But you say Abbeannia can't lick Glandelinia alone. I thought Abbeannia could never be licked by any nation."

"She can do it," said Evans. "But then Abyssinkille is a part of Abbeannia a state just as Dombolia and Tripogonolia are."

"They all will come to our aid won't they?"

"In a way yes," but just now they don't think it will be wise to send any more troops to fight with our armies against the glandelinians. They may attack Glandelinia south and east along her border and coast where she least expect an assault, and so keep many of her large armies busy elsewhere and give us a chance to march on to Glandelinia theft on their capital without much more opposition. But that is all. Just now we can't not touch Glandelinia anywhere. She might send troops through western Angelina and Angelina in that location would bar her from sending troops and ships of provisions by sea to Millford for they would have to pass through the region of the Boyging Islands, and that now is simply impossible as those armies and the region around is swept by Abbeannian battleships, torpedo boat destroyers, submarines by the thousands, and scores of regiments of the Abbeannian government in making ready. She can strike quickly. Protestina will be slow on account of the distance she is from us. It will be three months before her armies could land on our western shores, and two more months before she could make herself felt. even if she declares war against Glandelinia at once. Or two not months more Glandelinia can only devote her attention almost entirely to us. And during that time the odds in her favor will be so great, that anything might happen in that short a space of time, if we had not prepared for her. As it is there is nothing of glandelinian plans and preparations that we did not know." Evans later on went out scouting bringing several officers, and the little girls with him, for though defeated in the battle Hanley had not abandoned his position, and had later in the same evening after his defeat come back at Evans tenfold and crushed him back for several miles, making the battle totally another Glandelinian victory. As Evans and the little girls got out to a certain distance things commenced to happen. Glandelinians suddenly appeared, and caused a disturbance, and three of them unhorsing the christian troopers nearest Evans, and three of them unhorsing Evans, and burst down a small tree in their haste to clash with Evans who eluded them and fired with great effect. Then there was a sea severe spattering of rifle fire from the rear of the railroad cut they had just left, and colonel Mische Evans bodyguard officer, staggered from his feet and collapsed just as he was about to remount his horse. A bullet had reached him, and killed him outright. Suddenly to the south there was a dull booming roar. Evans, and the rest who had escaped their assailants start stared at one another and at the same moment there came a wild burst of cheering from the soldiers on the Glandelinian side of the railroad.

"What is that?" Asked Violet, apprehensive. As she spoke the sound was repeated with greater intensity.

"Cannon," said Evans. "This sounds suspicious."

"Yes cannon," repeated another officer his face lighted up. The first guns probably of a new battle. Who knows how many shots or echoes those shots will have. They said that in the United States a shot was fired once that was heard all around the world. I believe that this is just such a shot general Evans.

"Where is the firing. It's growing heavier and sounds as if hundreds of cannon are breaking out into fierce action."

"It must be from the glandelinian batteries near Lissen Pirian. They are bombarding that town I suppose." And then there was a most deafening roar, a sound far greater than a million volcanoes blowing to pieces in one particular spot, greater than the firing of even the heaviest guns of modern warfare would make, and toward the east down the great Krimidie, there was a great flash of fire, and the great railway bridge across this immense river was seen to sag in many places. The beams were collapsing the piers melting away, while the whole central span of the bridge collapsed in utter ruin leaving a gap where the river now flowed partly unbridged unbridged.

As Evans and the party was still watching the place where the bridge had caved in suddenly a bullet whistled over violet's head following the crack of a rifle, then a volley ran out furiously from some hidden point of the landscape and a hail of bullets swept over them and pattered against the trees near by.

"We are discovered by the glandelinian cavalry, and boy scouts," said Evans. "We'll have to get back to the lines or we'll be shot down. They mean business."

As they started off the glandelinian rifles spoke once more from again an entirely different point of the landscape, and two of the Abbeismian horse men dropped as more than three score of bullets pattered against the trees.

Soon there came a loud detonational roar near by, followed in a moment by a dull explosion, that seemed to be within a few feet of them and three soldiers, and four horses went down in a tangled heap, one man being dismounted but not injured. The ground rocked violently as it seemed and a shower of dirt and gravel descended deluging them all.

"Good! they are anxious enough to get us," cried one of the other officers who escaped unharmed. "That was a close call for all of us who survived. But I'll bet it was just a lucky shot. We are too small a target and we are moving pretty fast. I don't believe those glandelinian gunners will really hit us."

"Too close to be comfortable," agreed Evans. Three of my troopers are killed by that high explosive and its wonder none of us or all of us got shell shock. "It feels funny for you little girls don't it," he said turning to little Jennie Turner and Angelina niches. "Being under fire. You never was before were you?"

"Yes we were but we don't care if we never see again," he joined Jennie Turner. "I'm frightened, and I don't care who knows it. I don't mind the bullets or the other shells, but high explosives. When."

"So an I admitted. Angelina niches a little tremulously. "And I hoped I wouldn't be. I wanted to be like your little charges the vivian girls who are only laughing at this disturbance, but a coward can't be like them."

Before Jennie Turner who did not think it was cowardly to be afraid, could answer her little friend and companion, another shell clumped into the ground beyond them, and again showered them with an avalanche of earth, and debris and even clay and mud, while again the concussion seemed to set the ground under their horses feet to rocking. But in some way even this danger was a source of safety for the upheaval of smoke like a volcanic eruption had spoiled the aim of the riflemen at the same time, and each time, and though the fugitives did not dare to look they felt they must be very near the southerly sentry picket lines of the Abbeismian army by this time.

And then general Evans laughed aloud.

"You need not be afraid little Jennie," he said to Jennie Turner. "You need not be afraid that you are a coward I mean. I am a great general but at the outbreak of this war I was afraid at first every time I was under fire, and had strong temptations to desert the ranks, and so are most soldiers no matter who they be. Ask violet and her sisters how they felt when first getting their own dose of what we are getting now. Now that you and your little companion are under fire yourselves. At first violet and her sisters had been terrified. But the bravest men need not be ashamed to admit that they were afraid when the first bullets sang in their ears, or they heard the wild sing-song 'Devil yell of the No-Holliestinians, and other Glandelinians or when they heard the storm of shells burst near them.' Twice more in a few moments shells dropped near them. But either luck was with Evans and his small party or the battery was target practice was poor for neither the latter shells did any more damage."

"Look out every boy body. Scatter," cried Violet herself. "They are going to try forty shells at once just to get even now that we've got away from their hiding riflemen."

Urging their horses forward in every direction they scattered wildly at once, and sure enough forty shells struck close to where the small party had been just before half burying them in the ground before they exploded and sent dirt and gravel flying all around like a snowplow thrown tons of snow from the mountain pathways. The fire of the hidden bombardiers carried across the meadow from the opposite side, but the bullets had little force left after carrying so far.

As they continued to progress onward a shell burst high in the air above them like a peculiar clap of thunder, and in a moment there followed a curious tearing sound, and then a pitapat on the ground about them. Violet and her sisters guessed it was shrapnell, though of course they never had been under shrapnell fire before. But none of the children or other Evans were hit as far as it was known.

They reached the christian lines a moment more.

"All right dear little Jennie Turner and your little companion Angelina niches," cried Evans. "I did not have any idea of bringing you into anything as hot as this. You might have better stayed within the christian lines."

"I don't care. We are all right now," said Jennie Turner. "She laughed nervously. "I'm not sorry a bit." She declared fixing her hair which had come unfastened in the disturbance. "It's the most exciting thing that has ever happened to me. Now that's it is all over I—yes I believe I have enjoyed it."

"So have I. I mean it Evans," said Angelina niches. "I'm not saying that just to make myself brave." Continued the child. "Or make myself think I'm brave, because I was awfully frightened all the time. But now that it is all over it's something to look back at. Isn't it? It's not every one who is under fire after all."

Then they heard Evans calling.

Violet and her sisters. "He cried. "Where is your sister Jennie, Vivian?"

Violet and her sisters immediately recalled something that they had only half grasped as they rode hastily toward the christian lines while under fire with the pattering of bursting shrapnell, with its load of all slugs and bullets, nails and pieces of iron, all about them. They had seen something like a little girl fall from her horse which had also staggered and fall to rise no more. Before Evans Evans could realize what they were doing Violet and her sisters had turned and plunged back in the direction from which they had just come.

"Violet and your sisters where in the name of N Heaven heaven are you going?" cried Evans as the thunder of cannon fire grew with red doubled fury. "Where are you going? What are you going to do?"

"We are going after our sister," shouted the little girls.

"Wait that's madness. I'll go with you."

"But if they heard violet and her sisters made no answer. They did hear they paid no attention and scarcely understood the words. All that violet and her sisters knew was that they had unintentionally run away from their own adored sister who had been wounded because they had she had braved death to save their lives. They had seen her fall it was no doubt a death and they had not stopped to see if they could help. Violet and her sisters felt a surge of shame. They felt as if they could never respect themselves again unless they tried to make atonement now for having run on it was fantastic, quixotic, absurd perhaps, but it was their way as any one who had known them at home in their younger days would have realized at once.

"We saw her fall we know where she is," Violet and her sisters told them selves again and again as they ran on stumbling over roots, tripping repeatedly in their hasty progress. "It's up to us to find her at no matter what the cost or peril, and make up to her for our desertion." That was their thought. Jennie had fallen out in the open and Violet and her sisters came up to her at last. Violet and her sisters were horrified at first and believed that poor Jennie was dead, but then in making a closer examination they saw that she still lived but was severely wounded. Like all the boy-scouts of even United States Violet and her sisters knew something of first aid and a very hasty glance showed the little girls just what had happened. Jennie lay stretched out and the blood was gushing out from her leg above the knee. One of the great arteries had been cut by a shell fragment. In a few minutes minutes she would bleed to death if help did not come to her.

"Oh I hope we are in time," cried Violet almost weeping in a heartbroken way.

And then she and Joice alone wasted no more of the precious seconds. Taking out the red cross packet containing the absolute essential of first aid treatment they started to work. Catherine had went alone to the bank of the Emaine and found two small flat stones.

This she pressed into the open wounds where the shell fragment had passed in and out, and then Violet drew a tight bandage around it. All this time be it remembered they were under heavy fire. Bullets pattered about them more constantly than it was camp cozier comfortable. And once a stick Catherine was using in an effort to provide a still better tourniquet was shot right out of her hand. But the little girls never faltered and nevertheless it was fortunate that the shooting was wild.

The blood soon ceased to flow, and finding that the little girl had recovered, they proceeded to help her when the soldiers came rushing down and quite by bore her toward the lines, and for the nearest surgeon.

Later in the evening it was told to the little girls that the Jennie would be up and around in a week the doctor having said that who ever applied the tourniquet had saved her life.

Later that night the Abbeasians succeeded in blowing up a big big Glandelinian arsenal. For suddenly the ground shook like an earthquake, and there was a dreadful roar, a huge flash lighting up the sky, and all around in that direction hadian seemed to break loose like a war in Mars. There was a succession of reports thousands at one time continuously for many hours like repeated volleys of explosions during a continuous volcanic eruption and the whole region was set on fire and smoke - scene which attracted the whole christian army who saw it. It Abbeasians planned not only to inflict a severe blow on the victorious Glandelinians by the destruction of war material, but to spread terror as well, they succeeded admirably. For there was not one explosion but series of explosions all night long, and big fires spread from the arsenals too. Shells went off everywhere in bewildering reports, exploding in all directions sending an awful lot of bullets around promiscuously. In the meantime there was frequent fighting along the whole border. It was regular border war now. On the Emaine there were minor battles and thousands of skirmishes. Abbeasian fortifications were frequently fired of Glandelinian battle ships, and vessels who attempted to steam up the rivers running across the borders. In the Emaine near the wrecked bridge an Abbeasian who destroyed six Glandelinian monitors. And all along the entire line along the border between the many varied Glandelinian and christian armies there was constant skirmishes.

When news came from Carpathia first as a wild rumor, then as a complete Glandelinian victory. Of Abbeasian troops in panic stricken flight and losing scores of millions. It seemed too sad and shocking to be true. But every hour not only confirmed the reports but added to them. The Abbeasians had not alone been beaten they had been utterly routed, and the routed army was general divisions, who had combatted against Ambrose Fuller and Stainelawa now forces of Mc-Hollentian in either or of the first faintest battles of the war. And the Abbeasians were reported to be in full retreat in their own territory. Then more Glandelinian victories in skirmishes and small battles came thick and fast. Even while batches of Abbeasian prisoners were taken Glandelinian troops in great strength followed across the border, and there was a daring, magnificent raid also across the border in which all the Abbeasian monitors were driven out of the Emaine and other rivers and army by the terrific fire of the splendidly handled guns of the Glandelinians. For two or three splendid days the Abbeasians under Paul Mc-Hollentian before the exigencies of the campaign forced them to give up their prize and let the Glandelinians now heavily reinforced re-enter the city.

The Glandelinians also sent reinforcements into other captured villages and towns and the Abbeasian armies at these points had to retire. For now the Glandelinians poured across the northern and western borders in overwhelming force and the Abbeasian soldiers mattering and fighting wisely step by step as they went fell back before them.

A battle also had come on at Servias Run. For three days the cannon in an unlimited numbers had been thundering incessantly and shaking the earth in great throes. Rifle fire tore gray lines to pieces for every charge they made, broke up whole divisions into fragments, and crushed and mangled every army that clonched with the christian line under Jmads yvian. But that day the Abbeasian army learned that they had charged their own armies against the Glandelinians only to run them into a trap. That at first before their charges the Glandelinian armies had only retreated not because it was beaten, not because it was afraid, but that it might fight when the time came for battle on its own chosen ground.

From the east came the new Glandelinian army that had done so much work to recapture Bristle goe Station striking fiercely at the Abbeasian flank and crushing it and capturing many prisoners. And again an Abbeasian defeat became a monstrous rout. Once more the Abbeasians were pursued their generals crying as they rushed on after the fleeing christian troops.

"The time has come my children. The time has come for us to drive the christian invaders from our soil. We have had to retreat, and it has been hard. But now - now we can strike. This is the dawn of Glandelinian greatest day in victory or defeat."

This battle was one of those crushing decisive struggles that seldom occur. With a second defeat along the border the last hope of a renewed invasion of Glandelinia, and even a successful stand to repel the Glandelinians from making another invasion themselves seemed to be shattered, and when the sun went down there was no longer any doubt of the issue. The Abbeasians had fought for three days well and bravely, but the fiercer fiercer Glandelinians had fought with the courage of despair and the cool precision of trained soldiers used to victory as well. The stars that night looked down upon the abject flight of a whole Abbeasian army of a nation which had never known defeat, split in many parts, scattering its army arms, its equipment everything that would retard the search for safety from the furious pursuit of the wild Zimmermanians, Mc-Hollentian and other Glandelinian hordes.

Two divisions of the Abbeasians were caught at the Angeline Run where Glandelinian cannon had smashed to pieces bridges of boats cunningly contrived for safe retreat. And while they were making their last fierce resistance a brigade of Glandelinians marched around their flank and the Abbeasians who had been cut off were annihilated because they refused to surrender to the enemies of God.

All this time Violet and her sisters had kept on wondering whose hand it was that had drove the cruel sabre or knife or sent it tearing its cruel way through the heart and body of pretty little Anna Aronburg, on the eve of what was to have been the most joyous success of her life during the child slave rebellion. What Glandelinian could have cursed a bad hate and anger so bitter that it could only be satisfied with the murder of the brave little girl who was about to become one of the best child leaders ever known.

And indeed what was the reason for this wicked overpowering hate of the Angelinian child, a hate that reached its wicked climax while that year the Christmas bells were ringing out their message of peace and good will? Was it the intention of luring the Angelinians into war, greed, fear, or exposure or some entirely different motive that impelled the mysterious assassin, to steal into her home, and relentlessly slay her down?

Violet and her sisters also had a foreboding that in some way if such a thing was really true as believed, that the Aronburg situation hung heavier over them, than it did over the Angelinian nation.

Evans feared the very same thing about it, and did his best to discover where the real part of the mystery came from. He was also rendered desperate about the situation of all of the christian armies, and wondered what could be done to change the states of affairs. It seemed now positively that the glandelinians were winning the battles more brilliantly than ever before, and that not even the brave and hardy Abbeannians could crush them or bring them into submo submission. Evans felt terribly ashamed of his defeated which he had suffered so repeatedly, and decided that if he has to lose another battle it will be a good sign that the war for the cause of the christian side would be entirely lost, and he himself would then resign his command before the enemy overran the whole Angelinian, and Galverinian country.

Evans in his quietude and while the little girls were sitting around him just as quiet, the great christian general had the map of the whole world out before him and was studying it, and brain trying to make an idea out of the situation.

Then taking an old time history of recent great wars, he looked through them all, taking down all the victories that were won by the Abbeannians and in the stories he read here saw that as the statement goes the foe really were no different then in fighting than they were at all before or now, that some mistake was made in saying that glandelinia in is improved her fighting a talent, that glandelinia was still better in fighting in those days.

It was evident to him when he examined the whole situation that the christian nations no matter what the reason could really be whipped by more than ten glandelinian nations, because invasion of glandelinia could go only as far as Galverinia and no more. To try to invade Abbeannia or even Abyssinkile would be like a man walking the third rail, but then it would be probable just the same that if it would cause greater disasters than before, and insure glandelinia safe from invasion herself as well as the other countries. If glandelinia could not be put into submission, then it would have been folly for so many soldiers to have laid down their lives in the vain attempts to end the horrors of child slavery. To accomplish the good that was needed glandelinia must be crushed, and Angelinia and Galverinia spared from a second invasion at all costs. Evans that day had received word that he must push forward in the name of God at all hazards and this just now had seemed impossible and Evans had sent an answer stating that it would cost a horrible battle to make any attempts to force his way past the Zimmanian forces concentrated along the Lissan Firian and that it would end only God knows how. Evans even sent word also that without sufficient reinforcements for the war border he would sooner resign his command than have to admit that he suffered the mortification of another serious defeat.

Many of the christian officers however had the suspicion that all these retreats of the Abbeannian armies was really a snare. Surely without doubt the Abbeannians were never licked in any battle of any wars before, and indeed it seemed impossible that they could even been licked now. And discoveries had been made that something suspicious was in the wind. It was looked into and discovered that all these retreats were only plots. Planned for some reason not given, and planned by King Gannon himself. Glandelinia knew not the tricks that Abbeannia could play when, at war with so powerful and wicked a nation. And indeed it was only a sham those retreats. It was the purpose of King Gannon to draw all the mightiest of the armies of Glandelinia northward to the boundary, to leave their southern country exposed and now while this had been done bigger armies of Abbeannia had reached by sea their southern ports had captured every one without a battle and was marching through this portion of the nation, and headed toward the north and before the alarm was spread, the Glandelinian King saw indeed what the christian retreat from Bristle toe Station had really been. The Abbeannian armies as the ir generals finally confessed to Evans had been retreating because they had been told not to stand firm at all, but to lure the bigger glandelinian armies on and expose the southern part of the Glandelinian country to the invaders who would come in from the south. And simultaneously the plans of Abyssinkile had been worked out with the most tremendous success. Their armies were in possession of all the western and eastern seaports, and were moving eastward and westward, to close the glandelinian in. The glandelinian nation was between a converging fire, in a trap which it was utterly impossible to escape from. The severe defeats were only shams, and God only knows what losses the enemy of Our Lord payed even for the costs of their supposed victories. Victories indeed they were but what victories?

This showed the clever head that King Gannon had and how no wicked glandelinian general could really outdo him. He had in some way proved himself to Evans to be one of the best generals agoing, and when the opportunity came and when Gannon was summoned to Evans Evans said: "I'm a greater general than many supposed. General Gannon, and have done many plans that could outwit any enemy of god have proved myself to be a the uppermost general of all Christ inty up to now. You general Gannon have done a deed which surprised the whole world who have learned of your success in placing the foe between four fires, and to your credit the war will end just as little Annie Fronburg told Gertrude Angelina her living sister. It is my wish that you may serve with a higher honor, so as you proved your ability in outwitting the enemy of god as you have done I'll use you as my Lieutenant. It's also the request of general Gannon who declare he will be back within two more weeks that I should do so and I will. Shake old man you have proved to me and my little charges the vivian girls to be the best friend we ever had. You have crushed the enemy before the war is over yet, and next to general Vivian you are the highest of all the generals. Shake and May God keep you in your good work, and hope to see you repay Glandelinia well for your and life of so long ago."

There were tears in the good Abbeannian eyes as he shook hands with general Evans, and also there were tears in Evans eyes, as the soldiers cheered until they were wild and hoarse, shooting muskets into the air and tossing their hats about. Two days later Gannon confirmed Evans decree and King Gannon of Abbeannia was placed as the highest general. General Vivian protested saying that King Gannon ought to be made the main chief of them all and generals Vivians advise would have been carried out but Gannon did not desire to high an honor as that and after a hot debatement he was made as Evans first Lieutenant.

Gannon on his initiation made a speech which ended,

"We will boys carry the war to a final finish and show that no enemy of God will triumph long. We have lost battles but on purpose, and now we will strive to regain all we lost, and force the foes of god to a speedy submission. And we will also put down child slavery at the utmost too, and not only put it down, but make sure that it will never reappear again. And another thing boys, and comrades comrades, that Childhood is endowed with certain inherent and inalienable rights among which are freedom from slavery and many other horrors which they have experienced, during the recent child slave years before this great war, that they have the right to play, to be happy, and to dream, the right to normal sleep of the nights season, the right to an education, that we may have an equality of opportunity for developing all that are in us of mind and heart. We have easily and within the same short space of time that my uncle did, cleared Galverinia and Angelinia together of the wild and savage glandelinian hordes, and will show them now that they are utterly mistaken if we will allow ourselves to be beaten now. Tomorrow Evans wished to force his way past the foe at Lizza. Lizza P. Irrian and we will show the two Manleys they we can do it and sha/l."

There was a wild storm of cheers to his words, and an inspiarted inspiration also. Early in the next morning, the enemy had suddenly made a fierce attack on the barracks of the christian camp, and though they took the christian troops there by surprise and drove them out, they only got for the oples burning houses, and tents and the loss of 41,000 in killed and wounded. The Abbeannians this time in this conflict had really been wreted without doing it on purpose, but they had no orders to play off retreating as yet and so were stung to the quick by the knowledge that they had been forced to abandon this part of the camp without short notice. To them it felt like the bite of an adder. After a full of perhaps half an hour the Abbeannians came back upon the apparat apparently victorious Glandelinians who were then trying to put out the blazing barracks, and drove all before them in the widest confusion capturing many prisoners and shooting the panic stricken glandelinians down like flies. They even joined the gladiators silently and went so far that two main general commands had to be sent after them to bring them back. It was the wildest charge that the gladiators had ever known. The Abbeismians were on the attack before they had expected that the Abbeismians were easily beaten and had been surprised to see them come back like a wild pack of crazed demons. A second desperate assault was made for the possession of the burning barracks but the Abbeismians would not yield a single inch of ground. In spite of the fact that the enemy really charged with irresistible force, and allowed the crazed assailants to close with them, in which they cut and shot them down and did not yield until so badly thinned out that annihilation of the Abbeismian troops seemed probable. Knowing what was up general Hannon sent a large force of Abbeismians to the assistance and the gladiators' Gladiators Glandelians were soon driven back with terrible loss and with the loss of their main leader general Spoofendoodle who had led the assault. In this assault the losses of both sides amounted up to 356,666 in killed and 1,365,799 in wounded.

The gladiators were surprised over this turn in events, but thinking that the Abbeismians were only reinforced they decided to try it again and a good deal of booty could be obtained in this portion of the camp. A wilder assault than before was then promptly made, and also almost successfully this time, but the Abbeismians came back with the force of an avalanche that tears all to pieces in its path, and the gladiators were compelled to throw away their weapons in their efforts to reach a place of safety. Again they rallied and reinforced made the attack once more but of no avail. They could not force the christian line at all and finally did they give it up when the officers yielded to their own wishes. So fiercely had the Abbeismians counter charged them for every assault that the gladiators believed that the soldiers in red uniforms must have lost their reason as they were like crazed beings. No cannon had been used in this action and it could readily be called the battle of Logan Barracks and general Logan had main command of this part of the camp.

Evans was surprised when he learned of the fray in the camp in the army under general Callahan twenty eight miles east of him, and decided to watch that Manley made no attempt on his own camp. He also had many barracks in some of the camps of his army and these had been especially guarded as an attack would be probably of fatal consequences if it was made while the troops were off their guard. General Evans placed Cannon's headquarters in the house next to his own and finally transferred him to his own building, and then still closer than ever. Manley soon heard of the trick of Cannon's and decided that he must do something or he would lose all without a doubt. He must never allow Evans or Cannon to pass him at Lissen Pirrian and so he decided to bar the way at all points. So three days was spent in extending his lines, while Hannon Manley maneuvered, and ordered his father to see to it that nothing goes wrong. All the movements that was being made worried King Cannon who observed it as well as many of his scouts, and when Evans got word of it he grew suspicious. He went out scouting again but without the children as he did not wish them to be under serious fire again and seeing the reason of the movements of the foe seemed it probable that Johnston Jackson Manley was barring his way, so they thought that should he attack his son he would not be able to pass. He immediately telegraphed to Whillansburger Zimmerman:

"Enemy under Johnston Jackson Manley----making maneuvers and demonstrations that look extremely dangerous to me.))Strike immediately and throw all your force into the conflict. I'll follow as soon as possible as I'm bound to get past the gladiators' armies. Hannon shall be requested to force his own way through too."

EVANS."

"Zimmerl Zimmerman receiving the order made preparations to do so. Evans soon had all of his scouts out, and ordered them to report every thing they observed and so frequent were the reports that it could have filled a book. And all of the reports were exciting. Zimmerman was engaged with Manley but in a desultory manner as Evans had later in the morning advised him not to start a general battle until it looked safe. But it really was the first action of the battle of Lissen Pirrian.

P. 3399

However the army under general van Evans was not in action that day, and when the noise of desultory conflict could be heard elsewhere, and it was learned whose army was in the action it was thought a marvel that nothing happened along the christian line under general Violet and her sisters had not observed the noise of the far distant conflict, and neither had any of the other christian generals, but Evans and the other other two little girls had and also the boy-scout friends of Violet and her sisters.....

They feared that a terrific struggle was coming on the morrow, and so the boys warned Violet and her sisters to be careful as there was no telling but that it looked as though a desperate assault before Evans could take the opportunity to assault Manley or his father. The night was bright and starry, and so Violet and her sisters went into one of the barracks in the eastern section of the camp to visit the many soldiers concentrated there, one playing a talking machine, others playing cards, or other games, and singing songs.

At the entrance of the little girls the soldiers became silent and stood at attention until the sergeant cried: "At Rest." Then they showed their commendation for the little girls when they respected as they did their highest officers, and started for their quarters a regular regular and played all sorts of games and even had boxing matches.

Jennie Turner and the other little girl had been in the barracks building all this time and when Violet and her sisters entered, they felt more at ease. Suddenly while all the soldiers were thus relaxing with their sports and fun a sergeant shouted "ATTENTION!"

All was quiet at once and in came general Luckwig and Jacob Baldwin the oldest friends Violet and her sisters had. After giving the word "AT REST" the generals spoke to Jennie Vivian and for a moment Violet motioned to the soldiers to be quiet.

"It's all right to have your fun boys" said the great general who had first come in. "But I have come in to warn you to be on a better look out since these little girls have come in with you. The enemy has recently surprised a portion of our own lines and are now in possession of our barracks in Camp Rockford. The Abbeismians have failed to retake the camp and Evans is massing his main grand division to storm the enemy's lines and retake the camp at all costs. So you boys better be on the watch for there is danger everywhere and the enemy may take you by surprise and if they do the little girls will meet their destruction."

The soldiers were surprised at this warning, and so on from then they hardly uttered a word so quiet and finally when it grew pitch dark they appointed a number of men among their own selves to go on guard outside and wait that the enemy did not come upon them suddenly. Far off toward the west they could see an awe inspiring and bright glowing glow which covered the whole horizon and also in that direction there was a peculiar sound unlike the noise of battle, but nevertheless it was no doubt that it was a counter attack that Evans was directing to recover that portion of the camp where some of the barrack buildings were burning having been set on fire by the christians when they had to abandon them. Violet and her sisters and all the soldiers had been attracted by the glow of the distant fire, but the awesome sight did not distract the soldier soldiers and they listened strictly for any sound which would warn of a surprise attack. But here all was as quiet as if nothing was going to happen as quiet as the time of peace, excepting where in some other barracks across the company streets where some soldiers were either playing a game or a mouth organ.

Some groups of soldiers were even playing foot ball and other games out side, and officers passed silently back and forth.

Every now and then there could be heard firing at unexpected quarters but nothing happened to startle them around here. Violet and her sisters felt conscious of an unseen danger, and so kept themselves on the alert and asked whispered questions of their two girl friends when ever the strange noise in the distance grew stronger, and the glow of fires still more brighter. It had however been some time on the part of the enemy in attacking the barracks camp in Evans' main line, but nevertheless, Evans took all the reports he got and decided feared it was no attempt on barracks but a forerunning of a general onslaught on his own lines, and so during that time while the fierce attempt had been made to regain that part of the camp he was sure that the nearest portions of his strongest batteries were in good condition and ready to meet any attack that the foe would dare even dare to make upon his lines.

As Violet and her sisters watched the distant glow of fire with apprehension and awe there suddenly came the sound of many cannons far to the east which swelled to a dull but terrifying volcano of flame and din, and added to it were volumes of queer sounds.

While the children were wondering what was up a stream of infantry rushed down the company street, bugles began to sound, and drums to roll in an exciting manner. The soldiers started to rush out of the barracks in short order forming into ranks in a moment's notice and then dashing off toward where the other's had gone. Those who were in the barracks where Violet and her sisters were had received no call as yet and neither the others of this part of the camp and so they believed that nothing was unusual as yet in the wild though indeed the thunder of so many cannons in the distance did sound mighty suspicious. A bright moon was shining and the stars were not a single cloud in the sky.

As all was still quiet in their part of the camp Violet and her sisters feeling tired decided to go to a bed believing that there would not be anything unusual here and so with their two little girl friends they made their way back toward general Evans headquarters. It was a ten minutes walk but they got there without an very exciting experience though they had watched every dark part of the camp carefully and suspiciously not that they were afraid of the dark, but that they would not be taken off their guard by any Glandelinian prowler who may be hiding in the dark waiting to spring upon them without warning.

However there was one Glandelinian who had stolen his way into the camp and just as they had reached the location of Evans headquarters a strong dark form had made a sudden spring, knocked the little girls all sprawling and grabbed Jennie Turner by the throat with the intention of choking her to death. Her opponent had both his hands on her throat and was attempting to kill her in the most brutal fashion, but the child did not try to pull at his wrists or hit him as Violet and her sisters expected, who at that time were not close enough to render aid in time having been thrown some distance from the impact of the assassin's charge. They at first thought that the rascal was strangling the child so hard that she was paralyzed beyond the power to struggle but not so. She simply reached up with her hands before he could strangle her even, and forcibly took hold of his two little fingers, which were always easy to get at if you know how, and bended them so quickly backwards that she broke them, and with a loud yell he let go cursing and blaspheming.

Taking advantage of what she had done Jennie Turner picked up the gun which had dropped out of Violet's holster during the collision Jennie Turner struggled to her feet and before the blaspheming wretch could charge her again shot him dead.

The sound of the shot immediately caused a commotion and a swarm of Abbieannians immediately surrounded the little girls.

"I killed him," said Jennie horrified at last at what she had done at the flash lights of the soldiers displayed the dead man to be wearing a red or scarlet uniform. "But he attacked me and tried to choke me."

"Look ye ah," said the leader. "Well you did good to shoot the varment. You w need not be afraid of punishment for he is not an Abbieannian. He is a sneaking agent in disguise looking for a chance to assassinate you and the Vivian Girls and ye put him out. But if he choked you or tried to how did you get out of his dangerous hold?"

She told him of the means of escaping many assailants which she had learned when at school.

"It's only a little girl," she said proudly. "But I could prove that few little boys could outdo me in boxing. I can do the hit, guard, duck, clinch, and fight, and footwork without hesitation, and can do all kinds of back breaking orjia-jitsu holds and releases."

"I don't doubt it because we saw how you made the rascal let go," said Violet.

"And is it if we had only thought of it if we ourselves would never had to suffer from no many chockings as we did," said Gertrude Angeline. "We'll know what to do ourselves now the next time an enemy tries to grab us by our necks."

The dead Glandelinian was carried away and thrown contemptuously into a deep trench and hastily covered up with earth and gravel.

"Child assassins like that don't deserve a decent burial," said one of the men. "His body ought to be ornamented as his soul is now."

Violet and her sisters and the other two little girls reached Evans headquarters without any further mishap and Evans being about they asked when he would return.

"He will be back in a few hours," said the sergeant in charge of his room. "He is gone to lead in person the counter attack to regain the barracks of the camp which had been captured by the enemy."

Violet and her sisters waited patiently for the return of general Evans and wondered indeed what was the reason of all the noise caused by distant batteries of batteries. They had intended to go to bed early that night, but then if a general battle was going to begin there could be little sleep for them that night and so Violet and her sisters did not know what to do.

They waited for about fifteen minutes for Evans and then as he did not appear they decided to do something to occupy the time and then if the roar of distant cannons ceased they would go to bed as they wished. They had started to play cards and true when the noise of cannons grew in stronger fury and there seemed tremendous excitement out side among the soldiers, who were all talking excitedly and making remarks that something was going on that looked tremendously suspicious.

"I think we won't sleep to night," said St. John. "Those cannons would not be in action for nothing, especially when they roar like that and so many are booming and booming." I believe that it is something more than an attack merely on the barracks."

"Shall we go and see?" asked Angeline.

"For my part there will be no going there just now," said Gertrude Angeline. "If we get in the path of an assault now without our knowing where its progress is in we are going the fiercest we'll be losers. We'll stay right here if we know what is good for us."

"But I have desire for some excitement," said John. "We have not been doing anything lately since the big battle of Gloriana and those Glandelinian troops must think we are getting scared of them."

"But we cannot go without the consent of Evans," said Jennie. "But we could find excitement in looking for him if you like."

"That's a go," said Gertrude Angeline. "Let's go."

Putting on their bonnets they at once went outside, Jennie Turner and the other little girl following them.

They at once mounted their horses, and set off to where they had been indicated of the location where Evans was to be found. They had not gone far when a party of Abbieannian officers came riding up and who were perfectly strangers to them.

These Abbieannians had never heard about Violet and her sisters or had they ever seen them before if they did hear of them, and so when they saw the ten little girls riding horses as well or better than they could themselves they were flabbergasted and halting the leader shouted to the children who had come ahead:

"Here little girls come back here. We want to see who you are. Come at once."

Of course Violet and her sisters immediately wheeled their horses and retraced their steps.

"Say," demanded the leader. "Do us a favor will you little girls? Tell us for heavens sake or come at that you here children can ride horses so good. Did you ever work in a circus or something?"

Violet and her sisters were amazed at the question but Jennie took the pleasure of answering:

"We are the Vivian Girls, daughters of general Vivian and these two little girls are our companions and friends. We are on our way to look for general Evans."

The Abbieannian soldiers could not very well make out their features in the dark and the officer said:

"You are peculiar little girls, and we do not know what to make of it. As for general Evans you will not be able to reach him just now for he has gone off to investigate what is causing the tremendous commotion. You had better come along with us and stay for the night."

At first Violet and her sisters felt like refusing but finally Jennie said:

"We are under instructions to do so no where when reaching ourselves then to general Evans headquarters. We are sorry to be separated like an old couple but we don't want to let Evans worry over our absence. If we are not there when he returns he will think we are captured by the foe."

The leader of the party had a strong flash light and this he turned on to show the children to see who they really were. An exclamation came from the men as their real features were revealed and the officer fairly gasped.

"I believe they are children of the celebrated Vivian," he said. "I have never observed them before. Good God and here we are face to face. Off with your hats boys. We are before our own superiors then if they are children."

The soldiers obeyed and then the officer said:

"If it's your case of finding Evans I believe you had better turn back. He is not in the location where the attack had been made on the barracks but had went to see what is causing the commotion. It's dangerous to proceed for it is not like that there is a battle or something like it going on and you may go into real which you would not like to risk."

"If the danger is so pressing then I believe we might as well go back." Sighed Violet. "We don't wish to bring our two little companions into any real peril. We are already and don't want any more." "Sure."

So bidding the soldiers good night the little girls returned and the way they had entered general Evans headquarters. As soon as they had reached general Evans headquarters the sound of cannons had slackened considerably and it was apparently growing more quiet though now the moon bright before was going behind a thin curtain of clouds appearing from the southeast.

"I believe we might as well retire for the night." Said Paige. "I feel so sleepy that I can hardly hold my eyes open." And she finished with a yawn.

As Violet and her sisters were already in bed general Evans came back followed by his staff generals.

"We've had quite a bit of trouble down there." He was about to say by the little girls who were not asleep yet. "The enemy had been at it a good while. Under general Jacob Baldwin and general John Bennett brother suspicion and so they had opened their batteries upon the enemy and started quite an illery duel. There is still some excitement going on but I do not think there is an occasion for the enemy making any general attack as yet. But just the same keep your lines well prepared and do not let them be surprised by the enemy."

Then the officers dispersed themselves, and with heavy tread Evans went into the big hall of the building just in time to see a man dart behind a winding of the corridor.

"Halt!" Cried Evans. "Halt or I'll fire!"

Evans being suspicious of the man after his disappearing figure, did not go to the spot just in time to see an object throw itself out of the nearest window. Evans darted for the window and fired three shots but could not get the fugitive in the dark.

Violet and her sisters had heard him give the command to halt, and heard him run down the hall, and then the three shots, but they stayed in his bed as they did not feel like getting up again, though little Angeline Riches hid her head under the covers. Evans at once aroused the men and they sound the alarm started a search for the fugitive but no trace of him could be found. Be one of the soldiers found a paper on the ground which the fugitive had dropped and, this was handed to Evans. Evans glanced over the paper.

"He was a spy." Violet and her sisters heard him cry out. "This paper proves it. It's the good providence of God that we got hold of this document even if he did get away."

Evans came tramping back toward the hall, and went into his room. Just as he entered there was a pistol shot and a bullet whistled dangerously close to Evans. At the same time he saw a man dart out of the window with a package of papers in his hands. Evans fired quickly and with good aim and though he did not get the fugitive he wounded him for blood-arts was seen on the window sill. It had been the same man and Evans was surprised indeed that he had made his way into his own room after he had been chased down the hall and made to clear his way out of the window at the end of the corridor. In his haste the man had dropped the package into the room and Evans examining it found that nothing was missing. In the meanwhile there was a hue and cry outside, and Violet and her sisters feeling suspicious that the spy may try to gain entrance into their room.

Looked over their little girls and kept their eyes open though they pretended to sleep. Their suspicions were correct for they heard the window open slowly and opening their eyes cautiously they saw a head edge its way in, then came a heavy body, and then before them stood a tall Glandelinian soldier in full uniform. He had dared to enter the Christian lines without a disguise. He saw the children apparently asleep, and smiled grimly to himself.

"Of course I won't harm them." He said to himself. "It ain't worth it." But I have a plan to get them out of the way more easily. I have written papers about the watch if found on them will cause their expelling from the army by the Abbeinnian government. With them out of the way Glandelin will never need to fear defeat."

Going on tiptoe he approached Violet's bed and she saw him slowly lift the pillow and place a envelope under it. Her eyes appeared closed to him but indeed they were not and she saw every proceeding as if she had then wide open. Then he stole softly away, and proceeded to go throw the drawers of the dress dresser in the room. He found nothing of importance except some of Jennies waists and hands and an old bonnet, and a pair of slippers belonging probably to the man who first slept in the building. From the date marked on a book he judged it must have been there since Johana was swallowed by a whale.

Then Violet purposely let out a moan. Quickly the man had his wits about him and wheeled around his face toward her bed and in his hand was a drawn dagger.

"Aw I guess she is dreaming." He muttered. "If she wakes up why I'll shoot without hesitation. I'm no child murderer. I'll swear till I die, but just the same I'm not going to allow myself to be caught if I can help it. If she sees me she'll probably scream or shoot me herself. I know how those Vivian children fear me from what I have heard and read about them."

He waited for a minute and then as all was quiet again, he closed the drawer slowly and started toward a wardrobe which was on the opposite side the room being big and having six beds in it.

There happened to be a slight undulation in the floor here on which he tripped and fell awar sprawling to the floor with a thud. Of course he felt sure that all of the little girls were aroused and was about to shoot the light out and make a bolt for the window when he saw that none of the little girls moved.

"They must be heavy sleepers." He gasped. "Josh I thought I woke all of them." "One to cope with is plenty but all of them are like a million tigers and I would not have a chance at all."

Recovering from his scare he culprit went and unlocked the wardrobe as the key had been left in it, and then looked through the interior but found nothing that would suit him.

"Nothing here to disguise myself with." He growled. "How in the world am I going to make my escape. Maybe if I seize one of those little girls and bear away with her it will probably insure my escape. I guess guess guess I will spare goes for the one who moaned."

He made for Violet's bed but just as he reached it he was confronted by eight revolvers, and by the fierce warning defiant look of eight little girls.

"I'm going to fire six shots and get Evans." Said Joice.

She did so and the man winced. He was outwitted by the little girls who he now realized had been awake all the time, and who had evidently seen all that went on in inside their room. Violet took out the envelope which he had placed under her pillow and as a candle was handy she lit it and held the paper or envelope over it and burned it up before the spys face. Evans at this moment came in with ten soldiers and the spy was seized hand cuffed and led away. Violet and her sisters explained how they had caught him and Evans laughed.

THE BATTLE OF LIZZEN PIRRIAN BEGINS IN EARNEST.....

The morning broke bright and early. Evans could see by the demonstration of Johnston Jackson Manleys army that he meant something that looked mighty suspicious and so decided to wait no longer but to strike general puebaum Manley a terrible blow and end it for all. He was bound to resume the invasion again and follow up the ruse that King Gannon had so successfully made. He also depended upon ruses that the Abbeinnian King would make during the approaching progress of the battle now impending and so he advised Gannon to look sharp and shot that he was worth being made his first Lieutenant. Gannon did show it as soon as possible and caused the frightful disaster to Glandelin that happened here, and which had broken all hopes for the older Manley for making another invasion into any of the Christian countries. At about daybreak was on Evans massed up all his artillery and brought up all of his troops and concentrated his right wing toward the little border town of Anna Francis Marie.

Manley suspected this movement and had also in the meanwhile made preparations to meet any assault that the Christians would make upon his lands, a line and also had warned his father to look out for any blows that would be struck by Zimmerman.

Violent and her sisters had been warned about the coming of a battle and so had decided to stay out of the way for there was danger of the enemy making the wildest assault that ever had been made on account of the desperate condition of their situation..... Evans Evans did not know whether it was best to allow the enemy to attack him or to attack the enemy. He had no spies on the enemy's position the day before and observed that it was well formed and strong. Thereafter, he asked general Darger for the subject of the attack but it would be difficult to make an attack to be made upon his own lines than to allow his colon columns to be frightfully decimated by the enemy's batteries, and the fire of their infantry. Evans then decided to follow the general's order, and massed his batteries with the intention of forcing the enemy to a battle.

It took quite a while before the cannons could be put read on account of a blunder in orders from other superior orders who understood the commands of Evans and when they were ready so were the enemy, which Evans did not like at all. He surveyed the distance between his and the enemy's batteries, and saw that to open an artillery duel would do him more harm than the enemy at that range and so decided to change the range by which costs another delay. It was not until noon before any of the batteries could be brought even into action, and so Evans was forced to abandon the idea of fighting a battle that day.

Evans had been disappointed over this occurrence and blamed the blunder for it all. He decided at least to show the enemy he meant business and so at half past two did open up with over 22,000 of his heaviest cannon when the enemy took advantage of the blunder of his and destroyed him not long afterward. Evans had believed that Evans would not dare anything after it all happened. The storm of shot and shell landing among their lines surprised and demoralized the glandelinians but within half an hour over 30,000 of their own guns were thundering away to beat the hand and a general artillery duel was on.

If it had not been for a blunder on the side of an ally also nothing serious would have occurred. But there was also a misunderstanding of orders and general Darger of the glandelinian Mc-Hollistinians believing that the command was a sign for an assault launched his whole army forward against a portion of the christian line under the christian general Henry Joseph Darger, when Violent and her sisters had been with before the position was abandoned on purpose. The assault was completed, took cost the christian troops for Evans delay in the artillery action had been so long that when the artillery did break into action they had believed that the enemy would not make any assault at all. At the first approach of the glandelinians the pickets had opened a rolling musketry fire, but the Mc-Hollistinians had advanced without the slightest noise until almost upon the christian line under Darger, and for the christian infantry there was not the slightest time to fire a single shot, for the enemy came rushing up with fixed bayonets and closed with the surprised Abyssinians and Abbeemians.

The attack of the enemy was fierce and desperate, but the Abbeemians and Abyssinians resisted as manfully as they could and drove back the frightful assault twice and killed the whole of the enemy lines with a scathing cannon fire that tore whole divisions to fragments. The glandelinians had not expected such fierce resistance at all, and gave up the assault when it was not intended as by their officers, and not believing that anything would happen they retired quickly and sullenly to their own works.

Darger had lost his favorite horse during this terrific struggle which had been a prize to him and he felt so sore over it that he decided to take revenge for the attack upon his lines.

He had all of his artillery massed upon that portion of the enemy lines and began a frightful cannonade of fifty thousand cannon, and then threw forward under cover of this fierce and deadly fire thirty divisions of Gondocontinians and Abyssinians, supported by ten long lines of infantry. The charge tore its way through the glandelinian forces under the other Henry Darger, but so fierce had been the resistance that it could have easily been repulsed if it had not been for the ten lines of cavalry which poured on after the retreating glandelinian and scattered them to prevent them from rallying. This made a serious breach in Manley's lines and alarmed general Hiebaun Manley, and the strongest forces to regain what he had lost. Two bloody charges made by monstrous waves of glandelinians was repulsed with the most shocking slaughter ever seen but the third was an overwhelming concentration made by the glandelinian general Darger which gradually but surely forced back the Abbeemians to their own works with great loss for themselves. Manley not knowing what was going on at any other point of his line threw ten successive giant columns upon the christian line under Darger, and so intense became the roar of cannons and musketry that Evans was surprised for though he did not hear any conflict at that point before on account of the thundering of so many guns he was directing he heard it now and plainly and as it grew worse and worse every single instant he was a surprised and telegraphed toward that location to find out what was on and learned that Hiebaun Manley was making a fierce assault against his right command by general Darger, and that the leader of the assault was a general, general general by the very same name. Evans was puzzled over this news, but did not delay in noting. He immediately ordered his two main reserve columns which were held at Spencer to go to the aid of general Darger, and then galloping up to his headquarters to see that all was safe, for here the noise was much more nearer he sent orders for all his cavalry not engaged to see to it that the rear of the christian line is well protected, and to resist any attempt of the enemy on the flank of either wing.

The cavalry under John Evans was nearly 16,789,000 strong and was deployed in many divisions to protect each wing at the same time being in a long extensive line, and using light artillery, and grenades also. Evans wondered what the reason was that caused general Darger to be assaulted, while no other part of his lines was assaulted. As he was issuing orders here and there, and giving advises, reports that activities came from other quarters, and then ten minutes later a heavy column of Gondocontinians and Gargolian Gurdies was seen moving forward under the reserve support of a monstrous tidal wave of Mc-Hollistinians, Amerionians and Zibnermannians.

Where the assault was going to be delivered it was not correctly known as yet but the officers on the nearest hill watched with the greatest interest, and then as they saw the tidal wave swastave and move toward the main center of Evans' line proper they at once gave the alarm, by telegraph, and signal stations.

Evans had observed this monstrous column also and issued orders for the children to be immediately removed from his headquarters. While this was being done the assault came, and like the sudden outbreak of some terrific storm, and the cannons suddenly burst forth in a wild hurricane of salvos followed by series upon series of ear-splitting broadsides of musketry which gradually but steadily became incessant.

What was strange about the assault was that the enemy came on silently neither firing nor yelling or uttering a sound. Evans knowing that the result of the assault would be if nothing was done to stop it for the attack was wilder and more furious than he had expected, decided to mass all his available forces upon this point only, and within two hours hours more after the most desperate fighting, the concentration of so many christian troops began to tell, and the glandelinians were finally forced to withdraw, having sustained the most heavy loss. Night fall closed the scene of action and though it was not as yet a general battle it had showed what would issue if the struggle once began in earnest.

Violent and her sisters had stayed at a respectable distance during this desultory fray, and had remarked that the battle had not been a general struggle, and had believed in this and that it had been too late in the day for either side to fight a full struggle.

No generals had been killed or wounded during the fray and this was a comfort for both generals Manley and Evans. Whilderns-burger Zibnermann had been inactive for he had received no orders to attack, and general Johnston Jackson Manley did not think it wise to assault him.

The night was quiet and peaceful and once again it looked as if there was nothing like a war and that all the camps and soldiers was only a certain army of hibern parties. Violent and her sisters retired early in the night before seven o'clock far earlier than the usual bed time for children, as they felt tired having been doing much of their scouting work, and warning officers and generals whenever the enemy had threatened a menacing movement. At a other two little girls Josephine and Angelina picked had desired to stay up later and so did not go into their room just now but stayed up and went among the soldiers watching them at work and at their playing in the camp. The two were picking back and forth in order to see the men of the looked suspicious for she could read features describe the most clever disguise known and there was no one would or could catch her. But all of the sentries appeared and christian soldiers and so she did not fear of any surprise attack upon her at the night before.

She then went to see general Evans and told him that she was watching them and that she had seen the men of the looked suspicious for she could read features describe the most clever disguise known and there was no one would or could catch her. But all of the sentries appeared and christian soldiers and so she did not fear of any surprise attack upon her at the night before.

he lull in the assault however was only a feint. Hanley knew that he could accomplish nothing with the christians too well on their guard and so he had decided to play a game of his own and lull the battle for a time. He believed it evident that if he did not make an attack after being repulsed the christian generals would believe the fighting to be over for the night. So gathering about 23,456,789 men he drove this whole column in a wild headlong assault direct upon the christian center, depending upon the strong and bright moonlight to lighten the way for the soldiers.

The christian generals had not been so sheepish however and had some how or other expected just the very thing and was ready for them. As soon as the enemy came surging within range, the whole line of christian intrenchments became lighted with musketry as if by an inferno and all of the big cannons and machine guns let go simultaneously and tore the assaulting line to fragments before it had the chance of coming within close quarters of the christian lines. Evans was startled by the sudden medley which had also awakened Violet and her sisters though they had fallen into a deep sleep before it happened.

Though repulsed so frightfully the main line had not as yet come up and while the confused glandelinians were retiring in panic the main column opened a way for them, and then in one long solid surge came upon the whole portion of the christian line with a great roaring fury. The uproar of firing became terrific, and Violet and her sisters fearing that something would happen and knowing that now sleep was out of the question, was about to get up and dress when Evans who had just come in told them to stay where they were as he was sure that the assault could and would be repulsed. The enemy made wild attack indeed, yelling like a frenzied storm of charging demons but the Abbeismian fire cut them down by the hundred score, and as they withdrew in confusion the christian line threw itself forward, and decimating the whole glandelinian surge drove the survivors back pell mell in the most frightful panic ever imagined. This again quieted down the noise and the conflict was really over for that night. Hanley saw that the christians could not be caught napping, and to prove it an assault upon his own lines had simultaneously been made at another quarter, and by Darger who had decided to take his own adversary by surprise, and he had full possession of the Glandelinian works, and four hours of the hardest and most sanguinary charges made by the enemy could not dislodge him. The Glandelinian troops under Darger had made six successive charges in quick succession but in vain, every charge was cut down and routed, and soon quiet reigned all along the line for the rest of the night. Jane's Tur or and the other little girl had also retired before this attack by the foe had been made, and strange to say while Violet and her sisters had been awakened by it, the other two little girls had slept through it all.

On the morrow while Evans was still asleep Huebaum Hanley hurried forward many columns and by eight o'clock in the morning the assault was hurled against the whole three wings of Evans army, and Evans aroused by the terrible din which was universal hurried out of his bed and into his uniform and then directed all the officers what to do. The attack had not been unexpected however, but this time it was not like the other two days only a desultory action with long pauses. It was general and most frightful. One charge followed another, and Hanley threw forward the heaviest masses he could muster upon the christian lines under cover of a terrific fire of all his cannons and the battle raged with the most tremendous fury.

General Joe Costello had brought up all his heaviest artillery and fairly pounded the christian lines with a terrific storm of shells and high explosives, added by a hurricane of shrapnell and gang-gang shells of every calibre. Every movement made by the Abbeismians to turn back the furious onslaught was frustrated, but nevertheless at last yet the christian line could not be forced. All of the christian cannon were also in action and Evans seeing how desperate the assault of the enemy was threw a supporting column of 10,000,000 Abyssinkilians upon his central portion of the line and withdrew the Vivian girls and the other two little girls to a safer location. At ten o'clock the battle was in full swing, and both sides within that short space of time had exchanged a thousand terrific and most terrible volleys many miles long. On cannons blew up by the score on both sides, explosions of munition works tore the earth into the air like volcanic eruptions and the whole region was overshadowed in the thickest clouds of smoke. It resembled another great Adge Evans raging.

But at no point as yet was the foe making any progress and this gave Evans so confidence that his lines could not be forced. As yet Cannons army had been untouched, but Evans sent him warning of what was going on and told him to watch the actions of the enemy closely and not allow them to take him by surprise. Then he notified Zimmermann of the great attack then going on and asked him how he was faring with the Glandelinian army under general Johnston on Jackson Hanley.

He wrote to Evans;

"All quiet along my lines. For not doing anything whatever. I believe I'm making a mistake by laying inactive as I cannot for all the world get the Glandelinians under John ston Jackson Hanley to attack. I got a note late last night from general Johnson advising me to attack and crush Hanley before he throw a his army into your way to the aid of his son. And I'm going to do it."

Williamshurger
Zimmermann.

Evans notified him that he had better do it as soon as possible and strike as hard as possible, and it would now be dangerous for a long delay, and also declared that probably it was what Hanley wanted. Delay."

In the meantime after the first repulse of the wicked glandelinian assaults a bigger force of glandelinians, consisting of the Zimmer avidians, Omarians, Omarian Girdes, Kurds, Condensians, No-Hollistianians, and Margolinians made the bloodiest and most furious and longest charge of any battle ever seen before, and resembled indeed one of the worst charges that the glandelinians had ever made during the battle of Glandin. These Glandelinians consisted of about one hundred and twenty three immense divisions on the right of the line of charge, and over one hundred seventy nine more on the left. There seemed altogether about three hundred two twelve that had engaged upon the christian lines, their columns pouring across the plains of Glandinman Zee Pae Run, and between the junct o junct ions of Penreita and Francis Atlanta Run.

This immense column of Glandelinians were commanded by about eight hundred eighty four generals of high rank, while the total officers of all rank was about three thousand six hundred and thirty nine. During this charge the firing of both sides was so extremely terrific and fierce that nearly all of these eight hundred generals were killed and wounded, besides all the others too, but what ever the losses of the Glandelinian divisions was it could not be estimated. But nevertheless Hanley had reaped upon Evans one half of his 107,000,456 men upon the whole of general Evans army in the wildest or one of the wildest charges ever seen in the war, and the Glandelinian losses had been so extremely heavy and sanguinary that the surviving Glandelinian generals made the statement that they did not know their exact number, though it was probable that it was their intention to withhold the real number of slain and wounded that fell in that frightful battle massacre. The plains of Glandinman stretched toward the great stream called the Anna Marie to the junction of the Francis Atlanta Run and here at this portion of the field a charge nearly as violent as the battle of Francis Atlanta itself was waged and lasted fully six hours in duration.

Like six human tornadoes the six main Glandelinian generals commanding this mighty tidal wave of Glandelinians made one of the most desperate assaults upon the christian lines that general Evans had ever seen or could have ever imagined, and though the violence of the desperate assault at first threw a portion of the christian line into the greatest confusion, Evans hurried upon the foe his reserves just as they poured over the trenches, and Kinderkins Makin, a vigorous turning movement caused a serious disaster which brought the annihilation of the left section of this mighty tearing tidal wave of Glandelinian foes.

The fury of the battle now was terrible in the extreme, and while he barred the enemy's progress in that one location, Evans seeing how the pressure of the assault was upon Dargers army still in possession of the Glandelinian works along his front, reinforced him steadily, and held the foe at bay and a terrific medley of musketry and artillery which tore the enemy's lines fairly to splinters and shivers. Huebaum Hanley along this location delivered fifteen desperate assaults on Dargers army with the intention of recovering the lost works and position positions, but general Francis Schmidt who also fought at Francis Atlanta put up his own parks of artillery and held the assaults in check while Huebaumida Calmanida made a furious counter charge upon the extreme right of this Glandelinian surge cutting it to pieces and routing the survivors with the loss of hundreds of thousands.

This counter attack soon terminated the situation of the battle along general Henry Dargers lines and Dargers massed his own troops and renewed the assault of his own troops soon throwing the whole of the other Dargers Glandelinian armies into greater confusion than at other points, the attack of the Conventinians and Abyssinkilians supported by heavy masses of Abbiannians being as steady as the seas assault upon a breakwater, which finally grained and torn to pieces by the heavy surges gives way in many confused fragments. The battle was now extremely severe all along the line a screaming horror before heaven and earth but now a good portion of the assaulting ways of Glandelinians had been cut up and thrown into confusion all of the Zimmermannians and Mc-Hollistians in this mighty surge who managed by sheer force of fury to carry their onslaught home not expect a annihilation and while hundreds of their officers fell dead or wounded the other Glandelinians driven into a pandemonium of confusion and wild panic fled precipitately, and threw away their arms in their desperate efforts to escape the fury of the Abbiannians. Along the main christian center the assault was still more desperate, and still more wild and ferocious and almost told on the christian line, but Francis Hanson's divisions led in the meantime been brought up after being on the march for thirty hours, and these were thrown into the bloody fray and after two hours mortal fighting drove the foe back to a distance of a mile and a half and kept them there to a fighting position, and then as Evans brought up his main force of Conventinians he led a charge in person and like a flood that tears up a town the whole of the christian line poured forward, in the face of a barrage of cannon fire, but the charge was carried to a final success, and the whole portion of this Glandelinian army being completely surrounded fought to the last because though it offered to surrender the Abyssinkilians were too enraged to have mercy and buthe butchered them all. Federal Melfords Glandelinian army was well posted and resisted the christian assailants manfully, but the christian assault tore his line all to pieces, and though their shattered columns were compelled by him and his officers to rally again and again they could not hold against the christian counter attack, and Federal falling dangerously wounded, his troops broke into a panic that could not be stopped and the survivors stampeded back toward their own lines the christians after them a-terroring like a forest of stampeded cattle. General Hiebman's Hanley's main right of the assaulting line consisting all of Zimmermannians really made gallant success capturing a large portion of Evans central position, by driving the charge to a reckless headlong force, the foe fighting the christian at close quarters like millions of wild demons, and fiends, but their lines had been badly cut up, hundreds of thousands of the Glandelinians had been captured and the losses of their officers amounted to the three score within a few hours. The firing along this portion of the battle field was extremely fierce and excess exceedingly severe, and the Glandelinians overwhelmed by the Abyssinkilians and Conventinians tried to hold ground, and would have too insipid the odds, but while they had low whole forests of christian soldiers who strove to re take the position by the curtain storm of shell fire and spread a desolating fire for the length of ten miles before which the christians could not dare charge against, a large force of Tripontigonians and Pombobians, with divisions of Hornomians and Protestentians, came down upon the flank of the apparently successfully fighting Glandelinians and holding until threatened with annihilation, they finally finally gave way, and the whole christian line finally crashed down upon them at all points and not only changed the retreat into a total rout, but captured so many prisoners that few of the Glandelinians got back to their own lines.

Along the left of the christian line the assault of the enemy had been still more deliberate as stated before in which Dargers had also carried all before him. But the struggle was still fiercer along Evans right wing commanded by general Cannon Profile himself. The Glandelinian cannon every available battery covered the Glandelinian onslaught at this section of the line and though the A G Angelinians had twice that number of guns as the enemy had they did not answer the as enemys fire of heavier artillery but reserved the ammunition of all of the batteries to mow down the charge of the enemy. The christian line at this point was overwhelming in numbers ten to one of the Glandelinian assailants and it was horrible to see how the christian cannon committed such terrible and unhuman slaughter among the Glandelinian columns. Ten divisions were immediately riven into fragments and recoiled in panic, the blasting artillery fire tore the main line of assailants through and through, and as the surviving column got nearer a machine gun fire of the greatest intensity wiped them all out. The Glandelinian assault along this point was like a moving hellstorm of tidal waves of demons but it never reached the christian lines. General Francis Schmidt left grand division all Angelinians made a sweeping counter charge which crushed the assaulting line at that point portion like an egg shell, and though the few survivors tried like a pack of maddened screaming fiends near mate to stand their ground and rally against the tremendous odds, their flank was finally turned by the Abyssinkilian columns under general Hendor Sta Stanek, and crushed to fragments. They were threatened with annihilation and as Bavarian Abyssinkilians also rushed them they were finally thrown into confusion and panic like the rest and the Glandelinians abandoned their attempt.

A good portion of the main assaulting wave had already been smashed up millions having fallen on both sides simultaneously in one great counter charge which had been met and repelled but now the christians were in possession of the enemys works also and a vast morgue. Johnston Jackson Hanley had heard of the insuing struggle and had longed to come up to the support of his son, but he could do nothing as Zimmermann had been watching him closely and was maneuvering to force him also in an engagement. Hiebman Hanley left was exposed to a blasting artillery and musketry fire on all sides which threatened them with annihilation and when a gleam of a great victory was in his grasp Hanley had to withdraw this wing which had been three times rolled up in great panic and with the loss of a legion of slain alone. The rest of the line had pressed on all sides by Francis Schmidt and Hendroes Abyssinkilians also had to give way just as Hiebman Hanley was bringing up his heavy reserves. The assault he had attempted had lasted six hours, and instead of bringing up success had ended in disaster, and placed him in still greater danger of losing a part of his positions. He did all in his power in that damming inferno to stay the headlong christian advance, even sent against the christian all of his best cavalry which met destruction to his horror, and also sent in all of his strongest divisions but in the nothing hellstorm of carnage all of his generals were down, not a flag was left all being shot to pieces, a hundred thousand color bearers had fallen and his army standing against a great onslaught had to finally withdraw still further southward.

Terrible indeed was the frightful uproar of the battle and the country had vibrated so terribly from the concussion that on that day along thirteen towns near by had fallen into total ruins. Despite the success the christian troops was making Hanley was bound to stay their progress if possible.

It was already near night fall but the Glandelinians came forward to renew the efforts to stop the christian charge. The christian fire pounded every one of their lines to pieces and with the most stupendous losses the Glandelinians were hurled back, but the many shattered columns removed the counter attack division after division storming the christian line only to be swept back every time with frightful slaughter. Customis and Francis Schmidt cut up the Glandelinian center once more and drove all before him but at other portions of the line the many Glandelinian columns fought to the very last making a regular fiery battle storm, and they fell in such great numbers that Schmidt was soon viewing something like a world wide morgue. Again and again the main monstrous columns of Francis Schmidt's Abbiannians and Abyssinkilians repelled the onslaughts of the foe and counter charged them, vanquishing the foe with the greatest slaughter.

The Millions of the Angelinian horsemen rode against the assailants as fast as their horses could gallop and cut and rode the Glandelinians down in monstrous numbers, annihilating the whole assault at this quarter. Only had only one-quarter of his army left to him now and he was really frightened. His army was fairly annihilated and he frantically withdrew his small handful of survivors trying to recover the retreat of those who had gone to the rear and no fierce had been the battle that indeed the heavens had seemed to burst into flames.

The Glandelinians encompassed tried to make a stand but the christians pressed on like a furious tidal wave pouring a storm of death and destruction upon their already wretched columns tearing their lines to pieces and the christian cavalry dashing up like an avalanche divided a portion of the remnant of Glandelinian forces from the rest and annihilated them all.

But still for a time the main body of surviving Glandelinians remained firm headless of the battering storm of christian cannon which cut them down like the harvester does the wheat, but the christians only closed and fell upon the Glandelinians with greater slaughter.

Seeing that the christian troops were advancing really to victory Hiebman Hanley made a fiercer effort to repel them and though he fairly cut down four fourteen onslaughts he was compelled to withdraw his forces, and with a yell of triumph the Abbiannians carried all before them and finally scattered his survivors.

In the early day the armies under Zimmermann had also started a tremendous action as advised by general Hanson still at Pandora Angelinda but three desperate assaults had met bloody and crushing failures. At first the battle with Zimmermann and Johnston Jackson Manley was not very severe and the three charges had only been made in military ways and caused desultory actions. But later in the morning while Zimmermann was in possession of a portion of the enemy's own field which he had gained in a fourth charge of tremendous fury and with the loss of many men, he did not could not believe that the battle could become so inconceivably furious as it did. At first it retained a moderate fury after the result of that fourth and tremendous charge. Crowleys glandelinians retiring in confusion and refusing to offer any further resistance. Again the battle had seemed to slacken, and some charges had been returned by the glandelinians who swept across the Pullaway run but the charges amounted to nothing at all being only severe demonstrations.

Then came the frightful charge of the Mc-Hollisterian forces under general Bristle too with the foremost portion of the christian line who had been taken by surprise being badly and shamefully beaten, and in which the enemy recovered their lost ground and held it against a fierce and repugnant counter charge in which the firing raged and roared like a million cannons. Another slackening of the battle followed then a complete pause until ten o'clock. Then across the Angeline Run, toward the old time battle field of Apple Orchid came another surge of glandelinians and those who had recovered their lost ground made a junction with them and made a heavy assault upon Zimmermann's lines. The battle became general and increased now with damming fury. More columns of assailants arrived and the attack was redoubled, and so terrific was the attack that Zimmermann massed all his available divisions upon the assailants, and the battle increased still more furiously.

The charge of the foe was finally repulsed, but followed immediately still more violent assaults made by the divisions under Mc-Hollister John, Gedorine Jensen, Thomas Phelanburg and many other glandelinian generals, in fact now the battle became so horrible, that within the whole remainder of the morning many millions had fallen. The battle now progressed with extremely bloody ferocity and the battlefield seemed bathed in oceans of blood.

General Calman St Clair led one of the first bloodiest charges of the battle along Zimmermann's lines which lasted three full hours without a moment's intermission, and so was Calverines desperate assault wild and tearing to the utmost, the three violent charges led by Costello Mareccollie the nine massacre like onslaughts against the Eva Granla works, and then followed the mightiest onslaughts Zimmermann ever saw in his life led by Girl Knool, Evans Glodge, Zoe Due Rae B Beck Johnston, Stancelin Callen, Junno Julio Callies, Porra Johnson, Helio Marischance, Mc-Whirther Stancelin, which resulted in destruction for every glandelinian division without their ever piercing the christian line at any point, and then the stupendous Glandelinian onslaughts led by Decepes army, four other desperate assaults led by Mc-Hollister Remington, drenching the ground in torrents of blood, charges of still greater damnation led by Camendonsonia Flanders, Franklin Vivian, Jennings Turner, whose lines were fairly torn to pieces, and worse of all a great and most tremendous onslaught led by Leo Costello himself where the losses of both sides became so severe that they could never be accurately estimated.

After all these violent repulses the battle again lulled slightly. What was the meaning? An hours lull only. Then what followed. The whole afternoon was bathed in blood and wholesale devastation caused by the wildest of battles raged in Southern Angelinda.

After being in titan thrice with Manley all afternoon Zimmermann successfully repelled a series of glandelinian onslaughts that not even the power of all the oceans briny waters as its surging lashed tide could have done upon a rocky shore when tearing it to pieces in the wildest hurricane for storms of nature, and the assaults of the enemy had been so terrific that it seemed as if another Francis Atlanta was about to break out. Three hundred glandelinian onslaughts were made during that whole afternoon but every one were repulsed with the most frightful and inconceivable slaughtering slaughter.

The next day Zimmermann himself renewed the battle along the Pullaway Run and managed to push Manley's army clear out of its position. Manley then made a torrent of onslaughts but all these assaulting columns was pre-emptively wiped out by the christian fire of cannons and rocketry and all attempts to retake the lost ground was impossible. Stanck Smithings lines coming to the rescue of Manley's disabled left was disintegrated, Hanson's Franklin's the main command was riddled by a thousand bullets, Mc-Whirther Ruthinghouse Sanders was mortally wounded, and a hundred other generals were among the slain.

Zimmermann fortunately had his central lines overcrowded with heavy real reinforcements, and he finally within four hours time massed 20,000,000 men against the glandelinian assailants and crushed the foremost part of Manley's main army after being in the fiercest conflict ever seen in that part of the theatre of war for all that bloody morning. For the rest of the day the columns of Glandelinians 79,999,999 strong and gradually massed itself against Zimmermann's lines in the wildest and most driving and insane assaults ever, but each time this immense column was torn to pieces for every charge until 50,000,000 only survived. They had crushed themselves against general Zimmermann's lines with the result of over 2,000,000 down. This ended the second day of the battles generals fury along Zimmermann's lines. Evans himself had been unengaged, but he had been marching around unopposed to make the intended flanking movement upon Johnston Jackson Manley's flank.

The next day the battle was again resumed by Manley himself, he sending forward mighty waves of Glandelinians under the three Mc-Whirthers again, with others under generals Aronburg, Collyer Stanck, and others who charged into a roaring sea of death and destruction, and who were only repulsed with the most frightful losses. Chamberlaine was killed on the christian side but this did not daunt the christians, for they again took possession of Manley's positions after making two frontal charges, and then Manley tried with might and main to recapture it he met heavy repulses.

General Cannon also captured a large portion of the enemy's lines, and held it finally crushing back the sheer charge of the foe which raged for four hours with fiendish fury. It was Williamburger Zimmermann's coolness that enabled general James Cannon to hold his ground against the greatest odds until he was able to send to his support many fresh divisions of Abbsaunians. They were charged on made by the enemy even after this. Evans in the meantime had advanced his army unchecked by any barriers for over twenty four hours, Johnston Manley's having fled continuously and westward rejoining Manley and murdering his officers that Evans was coming to take them on the flank. But Evans had been too quick for them, and just as soon as Manley recovered the news the waves of christians came in an irresistible ocean tide of human beings upon his rear, the whole glandelinian army was thrown into confusion and panic, and Johnston Jackson Manley was compelled to withdraw. The Abbsaunians pressed him on two sides until his army was so badly cut up that it could not stand and finally the whole glandelinian army retreated in a total rout. Again the Abbsaunian armies had triumphed and the other glandelinian armies hearing of the disastrous disaster at the border either deserted their ranks or fled from the christian armies without resisting them or fighting a battle.

THE ASSASSINATION OF HERRMAN MANLEY
BY THE ABBSAUNIANS WHO LIVED IN A HURRY, AS HE FLED
AT THE DESTRUCTION OF HIS OWN ARMIES.

On the first day of the battle or when it became general nearly of all of Herman Manley's army had been so terribly reduced by its losses that it was almost wiped out and the few survivors had been so scattered. Manley in drawing them through the inferno had become lost in the darkness, and was separated from any of the Glandelinians. The pursuing Abbsaunians had got wind of his misfortune and decided to repay another of the child hatching with his life and so they followed him in endless numbers hounding him down like a dog. He had taken shelter on the following day in a ravine but here a large number of Abbsaunians had concealed themselves, themselves. They had tried to take Manley prisoner however without shooting him down in cold blood after surprising him in ambush, but he put up a fierce resistance. He managed to subvert many of his assailants until despairing of taking him alive the Abbsaunians ruthlessly shot him dead, and left him lay in the ravine to rot. It was another great tragedy to Glandelinians and who could explain the grief of general Johnston Jackson Manley when three days later after the defeat at Hizen Phiran his sons dead body was brought to him by the Glandelinian soldiers who had found him.

Manley was wild with grieved grief and cried even like a little baby. He also saw that the hopes of an invasion of Angulinda was gone and that now he alone must repel the christian invaders once more. All of his best worthy officers had either been slain in battle or had deserted his cause, and he was left to fight his battles alone. The king was appealed to let the king make the statement that somebody of high rank must be left to watch the city of Glandolinia and insure it's safety, and so he could not come out and hold repel the christian armies.

THE CHRISTIAN INVASION OF G. LAND.

In Indeed- Johnston Jackson Manley had been hit hard by the hand of Almighty god. He had expected success from the war very start, and now he had lost his two sons the worse blow of all. All of the best generals whom he had depended on to win the war had left him, having resigned their respective commands, and all demands to draft the same was refused as generals were no success. It was seen that they simply could not be forced.

To invade the enemy's country seemed easy as eating pie now with the main thing was the work of devastation to be done. This seemed impossible before the eyes of Almighty God himself. The enemy knowing of the defeat at the battle of Wizzon Pirkan feared that if the christians would remove the invasion which had been purposely a abandoned, to act as bait they would also renew their work of devastation, and to guard against this the foe leaders said it possible that every northern city, and every farm was well guarded by the greatest armies that could be mustered, while every means possible was used to oppose the christian armies, advanced through their country from the south, east and west.

At every town that the foe had recaptured hundreds of the mightiest cannons was placed besides mighty armies, and as soon as the invasion began Evans who started first found his army seriously handicapped and checked at Bristle Toe Station which he had reached first.

The whole region here was guarded by over 6,789,999 cannons of heavy calibre, mostly all guns taken from christian armies during battles, or those used from nations whom the Glandolinians had conquered during other wars, as well as their own. To dare make an advance against such a deadly barrier was impossible, but Evans had seen to it that all the million cannon which had been placed at the border had been taken across with the vanguard armies, and he sent orders for ten of the nearest christian armies not opposed by the foe to come and join him at once at Bristle Toe Station.

King Cannon had played his game against the foe and by his orders other generals had done the same, causing the enemy seemingly to win great victories but this was no joke. It was really serious, it was the real maneuver of the foe who had outwitted all the christian generals as they had never been outwitted before during the whole war.

Cannon had separated from Evans to make a better better movement himself but learning that Evans was in dire peril he immediately returned to give him aid, and within a weeks time eleven christian armies had joined Evans. Evans saw to it that all of his artillery was concentrated upon the region, and two days later one of the fiercest and most clamorous artillery duels of the whole entire war began. First Evans personal army of over four hundred big guns opened fire, then cannon batteries opened next, then gradually but quickly the batteries of cannons belonging to the other christian armies also opened fire, and terrific indeed was the roar of over a million christian cannons. So many shells fell among the enemy lines that it seemed that the whole Glandolinian army gathered in the vicinity of Bristle Toe Station would be ground to earth, but when the artillery of the christian began firing, the Glandolinian infantry had withdrawn to shelter, and the Glandolinian artillery also withdrew several paces back. For nearly half an hour the christian artillery continued the sporadic fire without receiving any response, but finally whole lines of Glandolinian artillery responded with a shocking roar and then the whole entire ranks of Glandolinian batteries opened fire, and the christian infantry had to take to shelter.

Evans continued the most tremendous cannonade for an hour but without effect, and his own batteries were being disabled rapidly because his guns were still too far. But Evans finally had a plan. He knew what King Cannon could do, and ordered him to go forward with his whole army advance through snowflakes "as which" was found unoccupied and get around the enemy rear. When the cannon enough assault the batteries in the rear and carry them by storm. It took cannon two hours to make this march, but it was successful, and all the while the batteries were blundering in the wildest confusion he made preparations to make the assault. He saw that he had to tear up the Glandolinian infantry forces first, and learning that it was general Mc-Allister's army that faced Evans he decided to use caution for he knew that general Mc-Allister's army, fought feebly when attacked in front, but when attacked, and stormed in the rear, or cornered, demons had nothing in their line of fighting.

At ten o'clock in the morning general Cannon threw forward two immense lines of men nearly ten miles long and each ten million strong. They were to charge silently, and with fixed bayonets. On they came those two monstrous lines, and into the Glandolinian infantry they crashed with a mighty shock and drove them within a mile of their own blundering batteries with frightful loss. The main line of infantry had recovered from the surprise however, and returned to the charge with redoubled fury, the firing of both sides made a terrific clash, but nevertheless the Glandolinian charge for the moment could not be stopped the first line of 10,000,000 men was fairly crushed to fragments, their general John Scandillon killed and all of their flags shot to pieces in that bloody madman.

The Glandolinians with terrific fiendish yells struck back also at the second line, and also drove it back the whole Glandolinian army advancing with a fury of millions of stampeding cattle, and so terrific was the pressure of the Glandolinian onslaught that the Abbotswains had to give way and retreated with the loss of 15,000,000 dead and wounded in that one bloody crushing failure. The general of the second immense line was also killed and twenty color banners were captured, and 10,000 others shot down. King Cannon was horrified at this horrible disaster and calamity, and knowing what the result would be issued his machine guns and whole covering the retreat of the surviving columns, he brought up the rear remainder of his army and repelled the attack which the enemy immediately made upon his lines.

The enemy almost drove their attack home at the first start, but the christian fire was too severe and the foe was finally repulsed.

Cannon had repulsed the charge of the enemy, but now knowing that the foe was on their guard he realized the impossibility of taking the enemy's guns and wrote to Evans;

"My flank on guard. Make an assault, and not only was fearfully repulsed but also was compelled to repulse and stand before three bloody onslaughts made by the enemy. Glandolinian army under general Mc-Allister Evans. Be careful what you try so that no disaster will happen to you. I, lost 13,765,076 in killed and wounded in that four hours fray. KING CANNON.

Evans was startled and surprised at this news, but nevertheless did not lose his courage. His staff generals were for attacking the enemy's long chain of blundering batteries in front while fresh forces would go at them in the rear, but Evans knew what Cannon had met with, and to make an attack on the front of the batteries would cost too heavy a loss even if successful. He decided to all the action for a while and await word from Hanson whom he had notified of the sudden situation.

That evening Hanson wrote to Evans that the enemy at Bristle Toe station must be forced at all costs, that if Bristle Toe Station if captured, the enemy can no longer defend their cities with success, and he can not only advance in an successful invasion but devastate the enemy's country also. Evans then decided to try his luck that very night. He mustered his army and sent a whole wave of Abyssinians forty miles long to storm the batteries in the darkness. They were to advance with the utmost caution as to arouse the foe too soon would mean annihilation for them all. They started off silently and soon came within sight of the enemy's batteries after ten minutes slow and quiet march. Not a sound had been made, not a man had spoken, or rather did they allow a single foot step to be heard, and so when they rushed upon the batteries the surprise was complete. The six million guns were captured without their being able to fire a single volley but the infantry came to the rescue in double time, and a terrific struggle raged hand to hand.

for the christian soldiers who reached it. No such a lake - some violet and her sisters added in a warbling distinct and loud of a call above and by the side and over the shore of the lake. The forest was a wall of fire. The other 10000 soldiers of the forest, the forest was a wall of fire. The forest was a wall of fire. The forest was a wall of fire.

The fire was fiercely enveloping the lake along its southern and eastern shores and its shallow waters were already thickly and brightly colored. The forest was a wall of fire. The forest was a wall of fire. The forest was a wall of fire. The forest was a wall of fire.

On the shore where Violet and her sisters paused was a huge column of Abyssinians chattering and clucking foolishly, as if scolding, scolding all things in general for having disturbed them at dinner. Then compelled by the fiercely approaching fire they too took to the water. Along the shore the fire was already leaping a wall of flame.

A little further up the shore a column of Concentinians hugged close to the water line hesitating to get their precious uniforms until death itself snapped at their heels; and as if to bring fresh news a second column column dragged itself wearily out on the shore, as limp as a wet rag after their swim from the opposite shore where the fire was already leaping in a mountain of flame. And as this swim swim of Abyssinians swam in hoping to find safety an old bear twice as big as a horse crashed panting from the undergrowth plunged into the water among the soldiers and swam out. Smaller columns of christian soldiers were creeping, crawling and slinking along the shore, and now Violet and her sisters with the other two little girls waded out slowly into the water. They came continued onward until they were submerged up to their shoulders.

Then they stopped. The fire was a great deal closer now advancing like an express train. Over the projecting barriers of timber drove the clouds of smoke and ash. Swiftly the whole lake became obliterated, and out of that awful chaos of blackness, smoke and heat, there rose strange and most thrilling cries, the bleating of a moose calf that was doomed to die, and the bellowing terror filled response of its mother, the agonized howling of a wolf, the terrified barking of a fox, and over all else the horrible screaming of many soldiers who escaped not from that awful sea of flame. Through the thickening smoke and increasing heat the lake became surrounded by a solid wall of fire. Blasts of flame shot up the pitch of trees and leaped for a hundred and fifty feet into the blistered air.

The roar of the very conflagration itself was most deafening. It drowned all sound that brute agony and death may have made. And its heat was terrific, more terrific than it could be. The fire was a wall of flame. The fire was a wall of flame. The fire was a wall of flame. The fire was a wall of flame.

Swift as the fire storm had come it passed, and the walls of timber that had been so green a few moments before were smouldering and shivered, shriveled and dead, and sound swept on with the flame until it became once more a low and rumbling murmur. The christian army had been fairly scattered in all directions by fleeing before this forest fire and it was evident that nothing could be done to reform it even ten days later when the smouldering grounds had after retaining intense heat cooled down. All the rest of the day and the night that followed no living thing had moved forward with the same eng enthusiasm as before.

While the christian commanders had made fierce efforts to rally and gather their scattered and broken commands, a deluge of explosions occurred along the Starring Run and when day broke and the sun shone through a murky heaven there was left no sign of what the forest had been except for the charred and smouldering timbers, the dead bodies, the strewn of the christian soldiers who had perished in the fearful forest fires. For many days after the passing of the great fire the army had been scattered and left back in its advance while the other christian army had been scattered and left back in its advance while the other christian army had been scattered and left back in its advance.

Finally when news of the army was got together again it was found that Violet and her sisters had escaped through it all, never lost, and took the opportunity of a moment of adventure, but none of the men heard of the whereabouts of General Evans yet.

Whether had in some during the fierce panic of the forest fire now no one knew and Violet and her sisters feared that being perished and felt as if they would be least broken. Both soon returned with a few stragglers and in vain reports to General Hanson who was most of the morning of the forest fire. The forest fire was a wall of flame. The forest fire was a wall of flame. The forest fire was a wall of flame. The forest fire was a wall of flame.

Evans claimed that there was some reason that caused the blunder for the fire was not to be made unless a steady north wind was blowing and he had received reports that General Vivian had deliberately made the fire when the wind had been blowing steadily from the south and west for the last past weeks. Evans wrote to General Vivian asking the reason of the fire being made at such an unfavorable time, and stating that the fire had burned its way toward the christian lines instead of toward the camp before it. Evans also stated the loss he had suffered, how low his army had been scattered to the four winds by the panic caused by the approaching fire and the disaster of losing all the army and the camp.

The christian army was scattered and left back in the fire.

"Your excellency general Jack Ambrose Evans;
"I'm indeed surprised and flabbergasted at your statement. My troops made no fires of any kind as we received as yet no orders from you to do so. The rumors you made were false. And I'm still too far north to have made a fire that would have advanced upon you from the south. It is probable that the enemy was the one who did it as it happened right in front of your armies who were pursuing Mc-Allister's army at the time. You do not know I suppose I suppose that Mc-Allister would stop any christian army in their advance even if he had to burn his own home to do so. It is a best to make an investigation and find the real cause. It's readily proven that my army did not cause it as we are still at the boundary line being strongly opposed to make an advance as yet."

General Jimmie Vivian.

The forest really did set it as Evans soon found out through the means of clever spies. General Mc-Allister had been saddened and angered at being so hard hit by Evans and so to stop his wild and irresistible advance into Glandelinia had devastated their own property by setting a fire that had in a months time spread over a stretch of forest nearly five thousand six hundred miles in length and hundreds of miles in width. It had been foolish of general Mc-Allister to have done so, and being blamed with ruthless destruction of Glandelinian property, and also charged with arson, Mc-Allister suffered the loss of his command, and also was court-martialed for the fire.

It was some time before Evans could resume the advance and he had to halt until general Hanson with a fresh army could come and join him. Vivian and his army, did not begin until the forest fire on one condition but they abhorred the loss of lives it caused, and the delay in the success for the christian armies. Evans was furious over it when he learned it was the vile trick of general Mc-Allister and when he learned that the army was without a leader decided to surprise and capture it if possible before any general could arrive to take command. His army was already half encircling the lawless Glandelinian army and all that would need be done was to "hasten and close in the ring. Prompt measures was taken to do this work, and it went on very well, but so strong was the Glandelinian army that was thus surprised that to capture it without a desperate battle was impossible.

When the Glandelinian soldiers saw it was surrounded it became demoralized however, and their wiser leaders decided to surrender rather than have unnecessary bloodshed. They demanded of Evans on what conditions would the surrender be.

"Here will be no conditions whatever," said Evans rejoinder. "You have simply got to surrender, and when prisoners we will do with you as we see fit. For all area lot of devil assassins and ought to receive no mercy at all as it is."

"We will not surrender then," said the answer. "We know that our armies are surrounded and at stake but as long as your acceptance of an unconditional surrender is at hand why we'll fight to the last. We'll never surrender unless there are terms."

In the meantime the general who had been sent by the Glandelinian government had arrived in time to fall into an ambush and get captured. It was general John Quincy Bushings. He was a furious old man and did not submit himself quietly, declaring that the Abbeismians and Abyssinians were an army of devil livered skulls of hell, and heaped all kinds of immita upon God and dared to lay sacrilegious hands upon a priest while a prisoner and knock him down right before the eyes of Evans and Violet. The general threw it smack into the face of general Evans. Violet and her sisters had witnessed the whole performance and almost wept when they saw this deed and Evans also was surprised but did not show any excitement.

"He just went and picked the cross up and laid it on the table and then turning to the prisoner said as coolly as he could:

"Your actions are beautiful to behold sir. I've never seen or believed to see a prisoner like you before. Cursing and Blaspheming God like you did and doing other actions as well as striking down the priest may have been your habit at your life I suppose. Your being made a prisoner was only fortune of war and you surprised us all with your actions. I suppose you don't know the penalty of striking a prisoner be a priest especially before the eyes of these little girls do you?"

The man was silent and aullen.

"Well said Evans grimly now. The penalty is death. There is no man no matter who he be or where he came from, even from hell who will dare strike a priest before my eyes, especially when he is my cousin. Your deliberate action of flinging the Holy Crucifix into my face was another action that I enjoyed as much as God did, and your deed of this kind I find it very bad for you. We first arrested you merely as a prisoner of war, but now your a prisoner because you are a bloody scoundrel, a criminal who deserves to be burned at the stake. But for your rank we'll make it a better penalty for you. Tomorrow you'll hang on the cross and see how you like to be in our lords place for a long day in unbelieved agony you dirty livered scoundrel. Get him out of my sight boys or I'll run him through where he stands. His face reminds me of a creature of hell."

The man was led roughly away and placed before the court marshal to have his sentence carried out. Evans in the latter time had pressed his army closer upon the one he had surrounded, and soon to avoid the danger of annihilation in case the christians would attack, the whole army laid down its arms and surrendered. Evans had thus captured an army 75,000,000 strong without another battle with it, and also the same number of rifles and twice that number of pistols, besides a lot of ammunition, thousands of battle flags, fresh artillery, and all of the enemy's provision and ammunition trains.

This had been a great and telling blow on the enemy. It was the first real surrender of a whole Glandelinian army in their own native country, and now King Hanley felt sure that all hopes of preventing the christians from laying siege to the city of Glandelinia was out of the question, and he refused to lead his army any further against the christians and made preparations to retreat to the city and reinforced the other Glandelinian armies there. Evans realized that to capture the city of Glandelinia was a hard thing to do unless these new things were to be done.

1. To get there before any of the new and big forces of the foe arrive there to the defense of the city.

2. To prevent the Glandelinian armies if possible from retreating toward that city, and to see that all the christian armies were sufficient in preventing the foe armies from doing so.

3. To crush Hanley before he can reach the city or at least to force him to fight another engagement and to crush him then and head him off and capture him and his whole army."

When christian armies were already moving with the purpose to stop them from advancing to reach the capital and all the efforts to crush him was being made. Other Glandelinian armies had been cut off from that direction by christian armies even without a battle, storms of devastation was on, as all farms and villages was laid in waste and a great destruction was also going on for many hundreds of miles.

The invasion was now resumed with redoubled fury.

Now Violet and her sisters hoped that this time the war would be brought to a speedy finish and with a good smart christian victory. It was also a long time now since they had seen either their mother or aunt, or any other relation and also their two brothers they had never seen since the terrible war had first started. All through these years Violet and her sisters had shown themselves to be really what they intended to be. It is probable that even saints could not have done better in their note of mercy toward even the very Glandelinian wounded.

But they hardly had recovered any good point from the wicked war the Glandelinian soldiers who only had provided the little girls with their clothes and it seemed impossible for the little girls to get friends even from the Glandelinians, and it was only then, for though they were soldiers fighting on the opposite side, they had expected great things at least. But all that was over now, and later on Evans in a rage had ordered Violet and her sisters under pain of even punishment to go near any of the scoundrels.

"All the reward you deserve anyway is revilings and other wicked things," he said. "So why don't you have with them when it is of no use, let the red cross have no attend to them. It's not your work anyway. So among our own wounded where you will receive no better words and praises."

The advance had been continued for three days in succession and as news came from the other christian armies that they were progressing fast and soon ever, Evans finally gave the order that the work of general rain should begin as soon as they got within another fifty miles into the enemy country. The advance of general Evans army was vigorous despite the fact that the enemy offered slight resistance every day, but now he could not be stopped, and as Hanley was fleeing toward the capital with his armies and refused to stand before the advancing christian armies any longer, all the other Glandelinian armies facing the advancing christian armies took more to their own self and offered general Evans and the others resistance only when compelled to and so the advance of the christian armies was continued without their being any general battle as yet.

Evans was surprised at the sudden retreat of general Johnston. Jackson Hanley's armies and feared that it was only a trick on his part, and warned the other christian armies or their generals at least to be careful, and not allow themselves to be caught off their guard.

This time there was no stopping in the fierce christian advance and it was a series upon series of tidal waves of Abbeismians more greater than during the first of the main invasion and it was as irresistible as the stampede of millions of cattle before the advance of a big fire on the plains. Town after town was taken without a battle, and set on fire, farms were devastated and the tired hands taken prisoners, and other things of sterner resources was accomplished. General Vivian was also coming on with bigger armies than he had ever gathered before, and so was Hanson who was hurrying his army on a forced march in order to join general Evans as quick as possible.

It was the swiftest advance of christian armies that had ever occurred in any enemy country before. During the war of Eighteen Forty One the advance of the Abbeismians had been as swift as the lightning here and there but now their advance was still swifter and as irresistible as the force of a tidal wave.

Every kind of the greatest value or no value was seized by the furious invaders and stretches of woods was cut or hewn down or set on fire, bridges by the score were blasted into the air, and dams were again burst this time by the great falling the worse floods looms that was ever known in any history and which caused millions of people to be homeless and many thousands of them to drown or perish.

It was a fearful invasion more destructive than the Hunns made in Europe a worse scourge that Tartars had made, and even more resistless and violent. All the bridges fording rivers and streams were cut down or blown up, and damage of every kind was inflicted. Railroad trains were wrecked so fast that the Glandelinian government had to have them ceased running, millions of coal cars loaded with the expensive coal was sent to the lumber and deposited with no other strong guard, cattle and box cars were made blazing bonfires, trucks were twisted up everywhere on every line and especially on the He-Hollenton one. Pardon the last damage was done and the greatest amount of property seized. Ten trains laden with munitions was taken possession of, sixty thousand tons loaded with iron ore, coal and all kinds of oil fell into the hands of the Abbeismians, and all the trucks of cars found empty were turned to the ground, and their trucks sent away to be used for other purposes.

It was a great scene indeed this invasion and Violet and her sisters had observed with awe many a big fire made by the christian invaders. Ten munition arsenals were blown up, causing a loss of fifty millions of dollars to the Glandelinians and every school house was set on fire and burned to the ground in the country. Orphan asylums were not even spared this time they also going up in flames and the children rendered homeless, were taken possession of by the Abbieannians who transferred them from army to army until they were brought to the border and across as child prisoners to take the place of those slain during their invasion of Calverlinia and Angelinda by the Glandelinians.

The city of Titanic Fair was bombarded anew and the returned population forced to seek shelter in their cellars so quick it came, and other great cities also crumbled into a mass of ruins as the Christian invaders turned their cannons ruthlessly upon them. The Glandelinians tried to give serious resistance once more at Fountain Of Pirene De La Greece which had been shelled with greater fury this time, but one wild charge of a surge of Conscientian bay cavalry charged their mind and the foe was compelled to cease their retreat. retreat.

After all this for about two weeks Evans army now far in advance of all the others and Hansons second behind had halted for a brief rest at Lannionionia to allow time for Hansons armies to arrive and join him. Before the army lay a row of child slave mills, and making an investigation Evans observed that the children were treated like dogs in a pound and that to prevent a rescue of children, a great force of Glandelinians had concentrated there in great numbers. Evans learned that the strength of the foe army amounted up to over eighty million against his three hundred million Abbieannians. Evans advanced his army in many separate directions and unknown to the foe had within three full days surrounded the whole Glandelinian army.

The Glandelinian general winner who was in command soon observed that his army was surrounded but did not intend to allow himself to be fooled. He ordered one quarter of the army to surround the factories to prevent the child slaves from being rescued and with another portion of his army suddenly and unexpectedly made a most tremendous assault upon the whole of Evans western part of the encircling army.

A good portion of the Christian army had been taken by surprise and was driven into confusion and routed before Evans was awakened to the disaster and it seemed probable that the small army of Glandelinians would despite the odds against them force their way through.

Evans however knew what was coming, and he dashed forth from upon his point and while these were striving with might and main to repel the wild assaults and drive them back, Evans dispatched another portion of his army and made a furious assault upon the Glandelinians defending the sixty eight child mills. Most of the army took shelter in the mill buildings and inflicted shocking havoc upon the Christians and repulsed two fierce assaults with terrific destruction, but the machine gun picked the Glandelinian victims by the score of thousands and soon as a wild series of rushes and charges the Angelindians burst through the entrances of the buildings first forcing their way furiously and desperately through all the doors, and fighting their way through the lower windows, while the soldiers above poured continuous galling fire upon them.

This was as near as the Christians got and once more they were repulsed with terrific slaughter and driven back a great distance. It was feared that the foe would massacre the children anyway and so three hundred and sixty five cannons were massed upon these buildings and opened with galling and murderous carnage. A storm of wreckage flew upon into the air in every direction and finally the troops rushed forward again and stormed the factories with greater and redoubled vehemence.

This time their charge drove home, all of the Glandelinians not slain were captured and made prisoners, and the buildings were smashed for their possession. Despite the damage done to the buildings by the cannon fire, no child was harmed thanks to their guard in angels though the buildings looked as if they had been razed by a strong tornado of long duration.

The children were taken possession of and brought back to the lines with the prisoners and soon all the wreckage buildings burst into a sea of flames.

The Glandelinian assault along the western circle of the Christian line was the bloodiest of any battle before but it was finally repulsed, and being that his army was in a position of utter ruin and his army andy depleted, and surrounded by an army that could never be lost, the Glandelinian commander surrendered the remainder of the army.

He made claims however that he did not surrender without a desperate fight, and indeed he had put up a desperate fight before his downfall. His losses was terrific but twice heavier was the Christian losses. General Hanson later on who had heard of the furious action called it the battle of Sixty Mills but it was forced known as the battle of Lannionionia.

The battle had raged a full day, and the Glandelinian army had been surrounded just before night fall. Violet and her sisters had been too far away to have witnessed this terrific battle but they had heard its great noise, and when they learned that over 60,000 children were being brought within the lines all rescued slaves their hearts gave a leap of joy, and they started on their way immediately to see some of these children.

They arrived at the location where the battle had raged the next morning, after sleeping on their journey in an auto driven by a soldier, and soon came within view of the children who had been lined up by the officers to have their names taken down, and the names of their parents or relatives if they had any. Three quarters of the children had lost their fathers in the war but all had their mothers and other relations still living, and all of these children had fortunately known their addresses. They were happy over their sudden deliverance, and many from mere joy informed the officers where many more mills were still running and worked by child mills.

The number of children really rescued was only five thousand and not so many as Violet and her sisters had heard.

Nevertheless the number of the children was great enough, and as they were being prepared for deportation to Angelinda under strong guard and protection Violet and her sisters bestowed gifts upon the delivered children, and when the Christian advance started again and the children were placed on the train to be north guarded by an army of soldiers, Violet and her sisters bade them farewell and almost cried with joy at knowing that more of the poor innocent children had been set free at last.

During the remembrance of the march Evans crushed ten small armies opposed to him: one at Mayo, Jason, Pileon, Glee, Edith, Lincoln, Webster, Tarrabee, Thedabara Turner, and Chaplin Run, all small but very severe battles in which the Christians won sweeping victories. These battles raged within the space of a week.

Other child slave mills were seized before the Glandelinians in possession knew of the approach of the Christians, and another great haul of child slaves were made this time over 10,000 of them were liberated. Liberation which increased the joy of Violet and her sisters who saw them also. Serious resistance was offered in the meantime to general Hanson who had not reached Evans in a battle at a ridge called 'The Pointing Finger' but the foe was repulsed with the loss of two million killed and wounded. Hanson was also repulsed by another Glandelinian army at Funeral Range and had been told not to be at all in his advance and these severe attacks of the enemy only cost them heavy losses.

Hanson carried an easy position at the battle of Parrisscale in which the foe drove a great assault as any assaults as 'Mauls' had at Sunbeam creek but paid the price with a bloody failure, and terrific crushing losses and two thirds of this Glandelinian army was captured.

The invasion continued on without a check and it was now possible that 'Mauls' was about to become more wise and dare make another stand but they believed it was foolish though it was reported from the town of Mary gold. A fierce and sanguinary battle occurred at Anna Marie where both the Christians and Violet's army under General Y. Van, and the Glandelinians under Ambrose Miller the latter having taken command of a new army, but Ambrose Miller was beaten at every hand and fought for twenty miles without a single minute's pause in the wild retreat. Action also occurred at Gary, and Opa, and another at Gary with Christian successes that was only slight. Evans however did not further resistance for the time being during his advance and it seemed probable that the enemy did not care to resist him any further since nothing could be done to even stop the wild advance of general Hanson and even general Y. Van who was now as far south as Hanson and also endeavoring to make a junction with his great brother.

During the advance there was millions of wild charges on horseback against fleeing Glandelinian cavalry, over-throwing of the riders, shooting of horses and people every day and every night of the day and no much secret service work, and plotting as to keep the wild plot but they were the scenes during the invasion that no motion pictures could correctly show them. Evans once with a body of cavalry tried frantically to encircle a Glandelinian general who had made a surprise attack upon his flank but of no avail. The Glandelinians overcame after a wild storm of musketry and Evans had to abandon the pursuit after losing two hundred and fifty three men in killed and over 1,700 wounded and dying so that of the fugitives 6,722 killed and 10,739 in wounded and dying.

Thus the big part of forces ever known before and had none something like a running battle.

Evans remembered what he had heard this poor mother say with weeping and arid grief."

"Bidd Good bye to that dear old mother for she will meet him oh so far away. There is an old song that I long remembered "Who will follow Jesus" But if possible I'll save the lad if I have to amputate the glands in an arm for it."

Again and again under the tremendous clatter of the frightful mediam, the christi cry of the Abbeissians could be heard; "On to Angelina Fadr Down with the Glandolinian assins. On to the Glory of God and his princes."

"We'll cause war to bring its widest desolation o'er the Glandelinian land and sea."

The assault of the foe was indeed desperate but the Christian soldiers pressed onward and onward amid the same fierce battle cry. Shells were exploding everywhere and the cry of other battle discords came on with "Down with child slavery, onward we'll go, on To Angeline Fair, There is no word that's like thine Sweet Savior" Oh come and follow me."

"I'm satisfied that war is nigh, for I'll bring them to say good-bye. Oh, oh, oh, on to Glandelinia. Oh onward we'll go our way. We are satisfied with Jesus now and down with child slavery. Oh on to Angelina. Oh on to Angelina."

to the left of the christian line could be heard crying amid the din and confusion of the wild battle. Their sorrow no doubt was known to the Apache Indians who were engaged here. This point far beyond within easy eye sight was another one of the bloodiest.

Several children had been saved recently and they cried to the soldiers:

"Oh! I am dying, and I am alone in the world. Take me to your camp, and the rest of my brothers and sisters will follow you."

friends, as they saw the Glandelinians bearing the children from the mills and away they grew more desperate, and an officer sent a cavalry around to the rear to stop their efforts at a l'la costs. All this the cannons thundered along the christian lines in a wild storm of salvoes.

A. the cawing was charging these Glendelindians and or

"Oh down with child slavery, oh down with child slavery, on to Mandelinda they heard the cries of children who had in the blood' storm of strife and confusion gotten away crying as if their hearts could break.

On this battle of confusion and bloodshed they did hear most the crying of children and all the horrors of cannons firing, shells exploding, men dropping, by the hundreds of thousands everywhere, and the crash of musketry, and amid the battles confusion many of the children still in possession of the enemy was heard to scream.

"We must save all of the children and shall." Cried the officers here and there among the fiercely fighting cowardly forces, amid the carnage wide. We must save the children from the foe."

"Oh down with child slavery. Oh on -- Glendellina. Oh down with child slavery. On on to Glendellina to hell with Glendellina. She wanted war and we'll give her hell."

Glandelinia. Glandelinia. On to glandelinia. Oh down with child slavery a'' Again arose the battle cry. As the battle raged in full away counter charges were made by the Concentinians this time who carried all before them amid frightful slaughter, and who vix victorious in the desperate noise tore away thousands of the children, and as more children screamed out

"Down, down, down with child slavery." Cried the fierce Concentinians as they sabered and cut their way through the immi immense throngs of rallying Abandinians on their way back to the christ

Evans seeing that the enemy was attacking his lines with the fury of desperation, and worried over the delay of his advance by the impudence of the foe barring his way decided to make a strong concentration and

Evans then kept the foe at bay with a fire of cannons that was the heaviest that he had ever put in, and then directed the well planned counter assault. First the counter assailing christian lines struck against the Immediately the center assaulting Christian lines struck against the slowly recoiling Glendelinian foes, capturing the child slave mills and the remainder of the children, and then struck the main indentured servants of the foe. The carnage was indeed dreadful. Like after like of Christian soldiers was completely wiped out but nevertheless the main portion could not be checked, and finally the rest of the Glendelinian position was first carried, then the center, and the right, and the enemy sent flying southward in a total rout.

It was another sweeping victory to Evans credit, and he pursued the enemy so furiously until worn out with fatigue the remnants of the army sought its retreat and Ah Amio had surrendered unconditionally to end the horrors of the slaughter. It was amusing. Despite his funny name he had proven himself to be a worthy man, no child butcher, and was friendly towards his freedom but the army was retained as prisoners and sent northward.

Evans during the pursuit had obtained a note which ran as follows;:

"Despite the situation of the Annie Aronburg Murder, there has occurred an extremely bloody battle at Aronburgs Run, and now the foe has been driven clear out of Galverinia and Angolindaboth, and on great invasion has been started by the Angelinians since the Abbeonians have started in with their full aid and thrown their mightiest efforts against Glandelinia.

The war is going on a four years duration it being already December. The invasion of the christians is going on a second time now in full way though the resistance of the foe is being a terrific. From the start of this great war until now thousands of battles big and small have been fought. The christian armies are pouring into Glandelinia like an irresistible flood.

Also here is a list of generals who are special enemies of the little Vivian girls, known as Violet and her sisters;:::

-1- Raymond Richardson Federal-----Dead.

-2- Shoeman.

-3- Cannonia.

-4- Rhoban Manley-----Dead.

-5- John Manley-----Dead.

-6- Johnston Jacken Manley.

-7- Phellina Tamerline.

-8- Richard Francis Tamerline.

Richard Tamerline finally relented in his enmity toward the pretty Vivian Girls, and on one occasion saved them from the clutches of general Raymond Richardson Federal....."

Wondering who wrote this missive Evans pocketed it and went to command the pursuit.

It was two days now since the last great battle had raged and was won, and Evans was now advancing without meeting any opposition except at times from small bodies of glandelinian soldiers. Violet and her sisters were kept busy now a while since the victors were busy, and so gallantly, and the valiant Evans did not seem to be the only hero in their eyes.

Despite the efforts of Hanson to make a junction with general Evans his brother general yivian got ahead of him and reached general Evans army that night. In a brief talk with Evans he had a question or two asked. Violet and her sisters were still eager to have the opportunity to see their beloved father once more, and they stayed with him a whole night, and on the morning breakfast with him and Evans and told him of their experience in the forest fire when it raged a good portion of Evans army.

Finally after breakfast Evans asked general yivian how far general Hanson was.

"He has kept an even twenty miles between himself and you despite his efforts to gain on you to make a junction." Said general yivian. "He had you and have been going, and on the road. He tried his best to gain with you but for those three weeks was kept at a distance of twenty miles. You must have your army well trained that they can advance so fast. His army got badly whited and had to stop on several occasions."

"Well I'll say that I certainly have been pressing on." remarked Evans kind of coolly. "You see I'm racing with the christian armies who are making this invasion. I want to see who gets to the city of Angolindaboth first. This darn war must be ended sometime. And I hope for god's sake that we will not be needed to fight another battle until we get there. It's not imprudent to stop a while I guess I'll wait long enough for general Hanson to catch up. Did you know he was following us with the intentions of making a junction. I'll notify him to hurry on, and tell him that I'll wait."

"While Hanson was waiting in his advance for a brief rest, he concentrated his army under direction of Hanson all along the stretch of country from the three ten rivers, to the Prudon, with the purpose of preventing any forces of the enemy from coming up from an unexpected direction and taking either his army, or general Hanson, or general yivian by surprise. As he was thus occupied, and while Violet and her sisters were even playfully giving each orders too, just for fun, and to humor and cause the soldiers and other animals Evans got this report from the glandelinian bulletin, which he had seized from a neighboring town which he had set in flames;::: "

"What is going on now during christian invasion;::: "

-1- December 15. General yivian's army of her gracious Glandelinia caught in terrific christian tidal wave at the battle of Angeline Mittens. Surrounded and forced to surrender to christian army under general Germaine Vivian the brother of those dastardly Vivian Girls.

-2- December 17. Terrible tornado of christian and Abbeoninian troops pouring through the state of Angolinda Agathia (Glandelinia). Battle at catho. 1,000,000 killed and injured on our side. See no possibility of checking the tidal wave of Abbeoninians.

-3- December 18th. The towns and cities in the states of sacramento and Glandelinia destroyed by christian invaders. The year through as if they were a series of terrific cyclonic storms. Battle raging at Overland Run. 2,345,678, killed and 10,000,000 wounded and captured by christian foes. No end of slaughter.

-4- December 18th. Glandelinian army under planders engaged by forest fires set by pursue by christian soldiers. Rescued by generals Folio and yivian who came up with reinforcements. Battle impending.

-5- General forest fires north of the state of Angolinda Agathia. San Groat destruction going on. Loss of lives and property damage to towns and villages uncertain. Twenty railroad bridges going.

-6- December 19. Burning of towns and villages in State of Aurdeonville. Considerable loss in lives. Christian troops like invading tigers. Farms and all country side is being laid in waste.

-7- December 12th. State of nonnina Germania invaded by Abbeoninian armies. Towns and cities blown to pieces, or torn to shreds by terrific storms of cannon as if torn to shreds by Serbian Tearing typhoon. Great loss in lives. No battles reported.

-8- December 10th. Frightful battle reported north along the banks of the Prudon near Calvernia (Glandelinia). Towns and villages badly damaged by cannon, and soldiers killed by a storm of shell fire. Twenty five thousand men of the Abbeonians reported, and thirty thousand of christian soldiers caught and sent to the state of Angolinda Agathia. Big floods. Glandelinia almost totally wiped out.

-9- December 9. to 11th. Raging forest fires of wide extent. Raging through out eastern forest regions of Glandelinia. Millions of people fleeing from general destruction. In 10, and three 11, sides.

other like it was observed in anywhere anywhere else, and so they decided to risk it or die.

they knew that the flag had been hoisted too early and so no one would know of the attempt. They stole cautiously toward the building, and then while the rest of the little girls stayed in hiding to watch out for any one rise, Violet, Annie, and Annie joined herself, think of it, stole cautiously their way up to the roof of the veranda, and like monkeys found their way quickly to the roof.

Seeing that the way was clear, they got away through the smoke from our kitchen and across my field in the safe zone, still not a foot from the divide that line, but the smoke from the fire was clearing. Today was at once a new day and it was too late for anyone, and so we fairly still had the idea however it was. It was not until the morning to arrive at the house, and so before we had arrived, the question of a safe arrival had ordered me to consider the possibility of a matter that the public.

The best thing was to hide until the heat of the pursuit and the search was cooled down and so they did. They hid in a scrub area in the side of a high hill, and saw that the pursuers were an ever changing everywhere "out on finding them no matter how.

"His. "This is certainly a great thing indeed." They heard some one say. "At first Hanley blamed us for it saying that the flag was not gone but that we had forgotten to hoist it up. But it is gone and he soon realized it. But I do not think it was any of those Vietnam Gals do you. Surely they did and could not have the nerve to do this very thing."

"Yes it was those Vivian girls." "Who heard the parents say any?" "Anne found a boy named Willie." "What was he doing there?" "He was talking to one of the children, but she was not one of the Vivian girls." "Where were you at about round Jennie Turner. We know that little brat well. All her life as a fighting one to Angelina and Abbotson's as all her doings here and were kept secret but I tell you that she is as well known by all of us as Joe Brown. In being a dangerous spy the Vivian girls are not in it on her. We must find her for it was she alone who seized that flag."

"Violet and her sisters were surprised at hearing this statement about their new companion Jennie Turner who was an older, well-mannered, middle-aged woman. "We're all little friends," he whispered. "Any of the Gladiators, even the 'Angels' could give him back teeth and a million dollars to boot for my destruction." And a spy's parents have been slain by the foe during the early part of the war and this is how - really - they by helping the 'Angels' turn things and Abbeism into something that is 'nationally' is Abbeism."

negotiations and communications should have been conducted by the

"But the question is to find the children." "Scried another man. "Oth were lieutenants." "They may have reached the Christian lines by this time. All of those children, even Jennie Turner and her companion Angeline Riches ride horses like circus performers. So I believe and know that our search is in vain."

They said something to Jennie Hunter and the child suddenly surprised him and his companion by appearing as quickly as the mentioned tiger and leveling both her small pistols at them.

Second, themselves confronted by the little desperado the Lieutenants dashed away panic stricken but she fired twice bringing them both down almost simultaneously.

and were well away in an open meadow when a surge of the gray-green coats snarled about the two fallen lieutenants. They were both pulled past further service for the Old Gladiolus again.

'After them, there they go across that meadow' 'Shouted the captain in charge of the searching party. 'Fire.'

"You deserve to be shot for pursuing children with the intent to murder them." Issued the Abrasinkilian, leader. "We are different than the Angolians and Abdemians, and we decreed that we'd destroy those whom we caught eluding children no matter who they were. And you and your party were eluding the Vivian Girls and one of their little companions. The penalty is death."

"It makes no difference what they look," said the captain. "You were caught clucking the children and that is enough. We'll spare you only on one condition. And that is if the little girls wish it."

"All right then we'll make him only a prisoner," said the Abyssinian general. "And if he had any reason about him he would be grateful that it was at your command that I spared him and not mine. Boys lead him off to the usual house, and say nothing to the others about it."

"How in the world did you little girls manage it?"

"We sawaged it easily," answered Evans. "The whole camp around Manley's headquarters was sleeping, and we were unobserved by the guards. So we got the flag without being seen. We were way out of the camp before Manley discovered the loss. It was his own personal flag, and he sent out pursuers."

"Is own personal flag," asked Evans. "And you little girls secured it with out getting even observed. Why that is utterly astounding. I knew all you a little girls could do but this beats anything. Taking it from the flagstaff on the roof of Manley's headquarters. Come with me to your uncle and Father. They must know of it." Violet and her sisters wished to have it secret but Evans did not desire to and as the little girls would not go he immediately sent for the two great generals. They were surprised at Evans sardonious look, and of the blushing children before him.

"What have they done?" asked Hanson.

"What have they done?" answered Evans seriously. "A lot's your excellency. I see at then out this morning to get the onkeys a main national flag, and what should they do but climb up to the roof of general Johnston Jackson Manley's headquarters, and take down Manley's personal flag and bring it here despite the close search made for them. Three prisoners taken yesterday who were among her their pursuers confessed to do this morning. I could prove it by these prisoners."

The three prisoners were brought and questioned.

"See it is true said one of the men looking at the children. "Were little girls is my hand. I'm a true Glandelinian and so are my companion but we have to admit you are the bravest persons that have ever lived. We wished and do wish for your sake that we were whipped. We are so flabbergasted. They deliberately took the flag sir and no lying. It was Manley's personal property he having had the flag made for his own personal use. I would not wish to face his rage for a million dollars. He blamed us for it at first before we were compelled to go out and hunt for it."

The two great Vivian Generals looked at each other in ast onisluent and then general Robert Vivian spoke first;

"It is certainly astonishing general Evans. Have you the flag to produce?" Evans summoned his orderly gave him an order to fetch the flag and he did so. It was a beautiful flag in spite of the onkeys designs and the two generals marvelled.

"My brave little daughters the greatest reward I can present you is to give you this flag for your own use," said general Vivian. "The news of your wonderful and daring exploit will astonish the world when it hears of it." as surprised, and honored to know that I have eight little daughters who have proved themselves to daring, and full of courage. And you little Jonnie Turner deserves the same honor that I bestow upon the Vivian girls. You may remain with them all times and shall have Evans as your brother."

Then general Hanson spoke up.

"And I am also glad to know that I have such brave and daring little nieces," he said. "One day if God wills it I hope to see you little girls have the great joy of witnessing the down fall of the city of Glandelinia, the capture of Johnston Jackson Manley, and the wicked Glandelinian king. And if greater honors can be bestowed upon you I will see to it myself. If you were men instead of mere little girls I would make every one of you the greatest supretendent generals there are. As for little Jonnie Turner I am heartily glad to see that she is made one of you and shall hope to see it all through for your own happiness. I shall tell your good boy friends of your daring exploit and then you will know how they will feel." General Hanson then embraced and kissed to them all, and taking Jonnie Turner in his arms placed three golden crosses and four golden medals on her breast while general Vivian and Evans did the same to Violet and her sisters.

Manley was furious when he learned that Violet and her sisters and a little girl by the name of Jonnie Turner did take the flag and he swore and blasphemed God terribly, and used the vilest words against him. Seeing near him a shrine of the Blessed Virgin he took it in a rage and ran his sword through the Holy Image, and then threw stone and all against a stone wall and of a building smashing it, and then stamping the crumbled remains with his foot and defying God to ever dare punish him for it. Oh indeed what a wicked Man he really was. This deed just performed was really the cause of his down fall that soon came so speedily and so disgracefully.

It was even peculiar that he was not struck dead just where he was. It was a terrible sacrilege he had committed and since then he was no more a happy man. Violet and her sisters heard of the terrible sacrilege, and went to find the shattered Image. They could not however as it was too near the onkeys lines, but they knew where others could be obtained within the christian lines and the little girls weeping, wreathed her figure in the lowliest flowers for atonement, and yet begged her to forgive the poor fool and bring him at last to repentance.

"But ain't it possible?" A voice seem to say within themselves, "That when a man goes so far as to commit such a horrible sacrilege in a rage, that he is beyond repentance?" evnt,less they did not lose heart and besought her if she wilt to forgive him and restore his lost senses before he went any further in his sins.

Manley was his humilia humiliated and grief stricken over the loss of his most valuable flag, and even tried to get some news to have returned, seeming secret agents within the christian lines to get it but they never returned. He was on the verge of even onery though he was of sending a message begging Evans to please return it, but he changed his mind and decided to fight for it no matter how, to make a most desperate attack upon the whole of Evans lines.

SHAMBUKIAN GENTRAYS. JOHNSON ON JACKSON. HARRY VICTORY THAT

HE HAS OF HIS ARTILLERY, FIRES TO THE CAPTOL. THE WICKED
.....

.....THE WICKED.....

So unknown to general Evans preparations for a desperate assault was being made..... While the Abbeismian soldiers were breakfasting they at first were surprised by seeing all kinds of animals running into their lines panic stricken, deer, cows, horses, rats, rabbits, and chickens, and even wolves. At first they knew not what to make of it, and began to take nothing of it when they were startled by the storm of fiercest yells over a rolling the air before followed by the rush of millions of feet, while at their left the thundering of cannons and musketry aroused them still more and above their hedious tumult that so suddenly arose they heard the voice of some general as he cried out:

"Oh I'm shot and done for now. Then came a heavy and terrible volleys which made the woods echo and see reaction and Evans seeing the rear of half of his army driven into confusion did not know what to make of it. At first the intention of the glandelinian assailants could not be realized as the smoke from sudden firing elsewhere hid the assailants, but he did his best to restore order and ordered forward a large portion of the army that was not engaged to come and help to repress the assault.

At another part of the christian rear the first notice the troops of the Concoctinian troops received did not come from any of the pickets, but from the deer, rabbits, foxes, and stags, and even fowls fleeing from their coverts at the approach of the glandelinians suddenly came running and flying over and into the christian lines. In another minute the frightened pickets had come tumbling back and right behind them came the long and monstrous wave of charging yelling Mc-Hollsteinian confederates who with one fir fierce rush came to clean over the entire christian line at this action and at a blow the whole force of Concoctinians became a horde of panic stricken fugitives. Everywhere there arose a fierce pandemonium of ferocious yells it seemed to the panic stricken christian forces as if the whole of Harry's army was advancing upon them the air became filled with smoke from wild firing right and left, hundreds of men fell and pitched headlong on the ground, and there came crash after crash of hundreds of thousands of glandelinian muskets, and then the glandelinians closed with the panic stricken Concoctinians. Driven to despair men on both sides in a confused mass fought hand to hand with the most desperate fury clutching in fearful death struggles. It seemed as if the fierce glandelinians wished to cut the christian line to pieces.

Indeed for a while it seemed as if the whole Abbeismian army would be swept off from their entire position so fierce was the attack of the glandelinians on the christian rear and while Evans and his subordinates exerted every effort to restore order cannons of all calibers were massed upon the assailants which tore their surging lines to bits. It was indeed imperative to gain as much time as possible so that the detached portion of the Leanne army under Evans personally could form across the line of the Mc-Hollsteinian advance, and also time must be gained for Hanson to know of what was ensuing. General Hanson's division of Concoctinian cavalry but four hundred thousand sabres strong was accordingly sent full against the front of the 10,000,000 victorious Mc-Hollsteinians. General Hanson himself fell pierced by bayonets, but the charge was repulsed at once with mortal loss to the enemy, but a few priceless moments had been gained, and saved and general Hanson's monument had been given time to post twenty two thousand guns loaded with double canister where they would bear upon the wild heaving attacking enemy. The Mc-Hollsteinians advanced in a most dense mass yelling and cheering like maniacs but the discharge of the guns fairly blew them back across the works they had just gained. Again they charged most furiously, and again were driven back, and when the battle once more began the Abbeismian reinforcements arrived, and the most of the confused portion of the christian line was rapidly being rallied.

TRIUMPHANT VICTORY OF THE BATT LE.

The glandelinians however reinforced made another tremendous charge over an extent of thirty miles, so long, though short after sheet of flame burst from every portion of the christian ramparts tearing the first line of assailants to pieces, mowing down whole columns and disintegrating three quarters of the right wing of the assaulting party. Appalling and terrific indeed was the murderous fire along the whole Abbeismian line during this fierce and terrible attack of the foe. The glandelinian columns overwhelmed seemed doomed to destruction indeed. It was the greatest charge ever seen for real since the invasion started, the greatest charge since the Calvinian and Angolinian disaster at Florinia, bringing in its wake a terrible toll of suffering and loss. In half an hour the great fighting force of 20,000,000 Mc-Hollsteinians extending nearly thirty miles seemed helpless in the path of the annihilating christian fire, the entire line of christian works, and woods behind them seemed aflame, and it was as if the whole glandelinian wave would be wiped out. The christian forces to make matters worse counter charged as fiercely as they knew how, hundreds of mines and gas grenades were used per minute in the man insane fight to check the christian assailants but this was most ineffective and fifty thousand dead was observed within a small space. Untold horrors and tales came to Harry of this terrible calamity to his best division of men, scores of his general officers having gone and driven insane from the most excessive roar of the battle, and the excitement. It seemed almost impossible for the glandelinians to stand ground or pass the bayonets of the Abbeismians. The Abbeismians pressed them clean to the works they had captured and though the dynamitors works fearfully toppling over trees by the hundred scores they could not check the christians, who drove them clean to their own lines.

HANSON IN ACTION. A BLOODY INSTANT OF THE BATTLE RE-UNIONED WITH FRANKFURT DESTRUCTION OF LIFE.

General Hanson who was concentrating fully upon the town of Harrygold heard from his messengers of the conflict going on along Evans lines, how the enemy had surprised his rear, and realizing what was on by this sign of sudden activity, was bound to seize an advantage before it was too late and go into the conflict himself and crush Harry before he could force Evans out of his position. He was well informed of the state of affairs along Evans lines. General Hanson made a great and long charge upon the left grand division of Hansons army, and rushed pell-mell over the first line of christian works, but general Hanson threw a fresh force upon the flank of the assailants, and they were driven back with the most heavy loss.

Again general Hanson's division, and being reinforced by general Harry's threw forward ten divisions with the most tremendous fury. The battle at once became general. Hansons batteries opened a most fearful fire upon the assailants attacking the infantry, but despite the tremendous artillery fire, each division charged upon the christian line, in succession, the assaults coming on again and again but however to be only repulsed with the loss of two quarters of their divisions.

Terrific indeed was the slaughter to behold, the air was clouded with smoke as if there was a forest fire. Though repulsed so often the glandelinians were not discouraged and with fierce yells the glandelinians who had again been heavily reinforced gathered their whole strength for another fierce and desperate effort and came rushing forward again with the most tremendous fury. For two hours these assailants faced a murderous withering fire all along the line, the survivors were disarmed, enveloped form and bleeding, and as they observed that their own comrades lay piled up in heaps where they had fallen they drew back through the woods fighting with still more pugnacious fury as the Christians counter charged them, but they could not hold, and so the battle was partially won at this quarter.

Thanks solely to the attack made on the Christian line under general Hanson considerable forces of Mc-Hollatinians and Abbeonians moved out in series waves and made a tremendous assault upon general Vivians lines and here also the carnage was awful. It seemed as if the whole Glandolinian army under general Thomas Tamerline was surging up against the whole of general Vivians lines with the intentions of crushing it, with an overwhelming force, and so fierce was this Glandolinian attack that general Vivian was compelled to send to Hanson himself and beg for support for the name of heaven. The Glandolinians were rushing in the heaviest masses against the obstinate Christian lines being a grand display of a well organized attack which indeed had been thoroughly concentrated and operated cleverly.

Hanson had received an order from another general to the same effect and he at first did not know what to do. To send a quarter of his own army to the support of general Vivians would take at least three full hours. And for general Vivian to retire from his own advanced position in front of the Glandolinians who were making the desperate assault would have also taken three hours. The Glandolinians under Tamerline seemed terribly determined to break through general Vivians lines, despite the fact that a heavy fire of shells and canister was tearing their columns to pieces. Some columns of the Glandolinians wavered and began to give way there being confusion and chaos for several minutes, then they rallied and rejoined the attack with still greater fury.

The Glandolinians made a well executed move that enabled them to break through a portion of general Vivians left wing, and press it back with great loss, and though general Bethels Abbeonians army made a furious counter charge it was repulsed with utmost destruction.

Meanwhile the rest of general Vivians cannon were being placed and soon the fire of eighty thousand cannons tore up the Glandolinian waves in the most shocking manner, mowing down their columns like grass. As the cannons called them so horribly the first portion of the assaults broke into such confusion but they were quickly reformed again, and with dogged determination renewed the assault, until the Christian batteries tore their main line to fragments, and then the surviving Glandolinians fell back with hundreds of thousands of their men torn to pieces.

Hanson had successfully repulsed the charge the enemy made along his own lines and so he himself sprung everything to the charge, all of his first line of troops springing forward with exultant yells and all along the line they pushed forward in the face of a murderous fire of Glandolinian cannon and musketry, and drove the foe back close to their own position.

The assaults under general Thomas Tamerline was also swept back with the loss of half of his number of 10,000,000. On either side the wooded position of the army across a series of open fields, where even the rocks and other wooded trees gave no shelter from the fierce searching fire poured in by the pursuing Abbeonians who threatened their enemies with annihilation. General Thomas Tamerline was killed and all of his regiments reduced to raw recruits. General Gordon Tamerline was also killed and if the Glandolinians were called into battle from their assistance that could be sent and general Tamerline Van Buron, brother-in-law of the forces against the Christian assaults. Other brigades of Glandolinians also came up and poured a pugnacious withering fire upon the obstinate assailants but the Abbeonians wave pressed on, their leaders leading back to Hanson to send other divisions under general John Evans which soon came and who who started the army with tremendous force. The arrival of the new Christian forces to the attack was followed immediately by a crushing disaster. While deploying twenty of his divisions under a withering storm of grape and canister from the Abbeonians cannons which had been brought up following, the Christian tidal wave the great Glandolinian commander Gordon Tamerline, and Tamerline Van Buron was shot and fell mortally wounded, and general Thomas Tamerline who succeeded Tamerline Van Buron was also mortally wounded, and the three great armies crushed to fragments, and forced entirely from the position with the loss of twenty six other generals who were killed or wounded, and with the loss of all their cannons, and battle flags. The main line of charge extending nearly twenty six miles still present without a check from any quarter and in this position attack had ruined the whole of the enemy's position at this location.

enjoyed in the Christian mantle really worked a good portion of Evans army, for the Christians had literally crushed his rear and captured his headquarters, and broken up a good portion of the line so seriously that rally seemed beyond hope. So as far as he could take of the rear attack he believed that he had already won the battle. Evans who was being carried back in two pieces, disordered, and up and down to repair, wrecked worse than a disabled horse, while his own men full of spirit, were riding the hair ring with their cheers, and devil yells. It was just at that point while Hanley and his officers were looking for a favorable position at which to place his still unengaged artillery that he discovered Hanson's crushing blow upon his own center, the rolling up of his whole central line, and the capture of his works by Hanson and Evans who had not fallen back at all as he supposed. And also at that moment his own chief general and brother Assistant Hanley fell severely and dangerously wounded and was borne off the field. By the time Hanley was ready to no renew the frightful contest the whole aspects of the bloody battle had changed. A good portion of Hanson's army had hurried up to the relief of general Vivian's desperately assaulted lines, and though their own forces were much inferior to that of Hanley's assailants then, general Vivian's army having not as yet come up they had the way of advantage with artillery, and the assaulting line of Mc-Hollatinians and Abbeonians was fairly wiped out, and the whole Vivian line coming forward like a screaming hurricane with a million thunderbolts to boot. Down went the pure and red coats by the score of columns as the Glandolinian artillery from the main batteries opened upon them, but despite the terrific slaughter the Christian advance could not be checked. On came the Christian line under general Vivian's leading like a stampede of millions of wild bulls and cows and the main line of the foe at this portion became filled with wild confusion, and without resisting a blow broke and fled in a stampede as swift or as swift as the Abbeonians advance. Their flight reached the main line in the rear, but this line stood its ground doggedly, until overlapped by the Abbeonians tidal wave and then the panic also spread to this force and now the eagerness of the utter rout of this force, and the wounding of so many of their greatest leaders, and the deaths of four or five others had been shown by evident evidence too conclusive to be questioned.

Hanley had believed that he had already won the battle, that he had crushed the demons fight fighter Jack Evans, but had found himself meeting one of the worst disasters that had ever happened to his armies throughout the whole war.

General Hanley on going upon the field found that general Vivian and his own waves of Abbeonians had dispersed his most massive armies. He passed the remnants of the armies under the fallen Tamerlines in the rear where the generals had already been carried but he saw nothing of the other divisions at all, but found piles upon piles and masses of slain graycoats which he took for the annihilation of the Glandolinians who had assaulted general Vivian's supposed weak lines. General Hunter Harrison had been killed and the main line under general Lapping had been cut up by a severe musketry and artillery fire, and thrown into confusion.

Hanley's own quarter of the army had been dispersed indeed with the loss of half of the number and no question about that. For the dead and wounded Glandolinians were strewn or piled up everywhere.

General Evans had observed the success of his own army, those under Hanson and Vivian and deciding to keep the advantage threw King Cannons into forces upon Hanley's still unengaged left with horrible and merciless fury. General Evans had taken Hanson's former main position to hold it against surprise while Hanson's main line had gone to occupy the captured works, and this was done with such admirable precision that Hanley was not aware of the Christian success, having the impression that the newcomers were merely or merely reinforcements brought up to support a force that had been either driven back, or had taken possession of a portion of an unoccupied works.

Next came the Abbeonians under general Henry Dargor, the Concentrians under Mc-Hollister Hubbard followed, and then the main line under Evans.

Hanley saw indeed that here was to be the main issue of the battle, and he sent his own army to meet them. The force from his right, for this the Abbeonians and Angelians, under generals Evans, Vivian and Hanson observing his lines so closely, it made the error of so pressing and serious that he left barely 4,790,000 men on the left with which to confront this seeming host of Christians. At eleven o'clock it was certain that victory for the Christians was secure.

King Cannon had made three tremendous assaults upon the left wing of the Glandolinian army, and had gained a position even beyond that which Hanson and general Vivian had driven the Mc-Hollatinians two hours before, and destroyed two brigades of the enemy in the bargain, and captured an immense toll of prisoners taken and officers. The whole glandelinian army had suffered fearfully from the hotter fire all along; the advance division of the christian line and the survivors were fleeing to the rear and general Black Brooks having lost a quarter of his 2,000,000 men killed and wounded, and having exhausted their ammunition by too long firing had to be withdrawn and Brooks was wounded several times and out of the war entire ly as he was crippled for life. See Cannon Muley held his ground for two hours but was soon sorely pressed by King Cannons also, and the whole left wing of the army was on the point of giving way. Ricknell on Cannons right had restored the balance, giving Cannon and Hubbard John a force of 31,000,000 men and now Cannon advanced with irresistible force, and Hubbard and Ricknell flung his main forces on the left of the glandelinian left wing.

This combined attack on both the flank and frontal portions of Manley's left wing was made with the most destructive fury, and the whole left wing was closed in and annihilated, before the new force of glandelinians under general Adele De Garbe Ricknellian could come up to give aid. This force however resisted the christian onslaught with the fury of an army of demons, but it was nevertheless more than they could stand for the christian assault was made with such great vehemence as that after very bloody fighting, and suffering frightful losses, the glandelinians were forced from the position and across the open fields and meadows in front of Emerald Run and though the Glandelinians finally rallied behind a post and rail fence and reformed, and though they poured in so hot a fire as to mow down the persons by the thousands for every discharge, they could not check the christian advance, who came on with fierce yells in the face of this most murderous fire, pushing on vigorously, and so furiously that they drove the foe from the fence with the loss of general Francis Hubbard, driving the massive Glandelinians clear back for a mile. Here ensued the fiercest struggle on the main left wing. The battle was fought almost wholly of musketry, and never in any battle outside of Francis At Atlanta, or Florida did musketry run so loud or incessantly, and the foe suffered in frightful and sanguinary losses. Hubbard was disabled from a fall of his horse, but the Glandelinians almost threatened with annihilation, and exhausting its ammunition started to withdraw, but found its retreat cut off. As steady as if on drill a brigade of glandelinians moved up to the rescued rescue of the left wing which was threatened with annihilation and now many desperate attempts were made to throw back the christian assailants but all was fruitless. They were overpowered by numbers the re reinforcing force of glandelinians was also driven back with great loss and was placed clear to their own position leaving widows of their own dead wounded and dying as they retreated to their own intrenchments.

All that while in the meantime there was an uninterrupted cannonade of batteries of artillery along the central portion of the battle lines the enemy in trying to rally the confused masses used all their available pieces of artillery, and never before since the invasion had such a bombardment been witnessed on any battle field in that world.

Three million cannon were in action on both sides. The murderous drum drum fire of the Abbeimudian batteries told fearfully on the batteries of the Glandelinians, annihilating even the front line of Infantry and killing every one of the remaining Tamerlines, Tamerline, Phellin Tamerline, Tamerline, Pl Phellin Tamerline, Tamerline and Phellin Tamerline who strove vainly to crush the christian batteries with a mad dened fire of their own artillery. Thousands of artillery on the side of the enemy was disabled within a half an hour, but fresh guns took their places, and though it was later reported that the actual shock the whole country no towns or cities felt any disastrous effects except many gold which crumpled into dust. The artillery duel continued all the rest of the day without intermission.

General Manley had toward noon recovered half of the remainder of his main army and toward two o'clock he sent these forward to make the final charge which would decide the big battle. These fairly divisions began to move forward under cover of an artillery fire in splendid array. Heavy Bangers forces formed the main right of the whole attacking force of Abbeimudians. All of the Glandelinian forces were being opened upon these divisions at such a distance that they were being great and frightful gas and tearing and of women in the main line but

STORMED THE FORT. A portion of the attacking tidal wave of Abbeimudians crashed the left of the glandelinian right wing to pieces, and though another portion of this wing had been strengthened by Jennings divisions and ranged in his wire lines five deep and well protected by high intrenchments and rail and stone fence they were nevertheless cut to pieces by the assaults and driven back. Other portions of the glandelinian columns were rallied by massive artillery in front, and obliquely from twenty batteries concentrated on the flanks of the hills and the glandelinian soldiers displayed in white and windows. The main glandelinian infantry lines which still held its ground reserved their fire until the Abbeimudians were within two hundred feet of them, and then poured volley after volley with such precision as to almost annihilate the first column of advancing Abbeimudians. Then short range cannons added to the fire, and thousands of deadly machine guns. General Hickey's Abbeimudian wave was the first to meet this sheet of flame and the whole wave melted away like a big snowbank. In five minutes the remnants of the other portion of the ragged line was streaming as if in wild disorder over the glandelinian works, closing with the glandelinians. The sight of this part of the battle was indeed more appalling than any one could ever imagine. The Abbeimudians made such a determined assault indeed that they broke through good portions of the glandelinian right and charged among the batteries cutting down all the gunners, capturing the guns, and ransacking them upon the glandelinians and annihilated all attempts of the foe to retake the lost position. The officers on each side fought pistol to pistol, and the men with clubbed muskets and bayonets. General Joseph McCabe ordered his forces to follow the retreating glandelinians, and when he was leading them in a rearing driving charge he fell mortally wounded and three quarters of his men fell in the face of a screaming withering fire. All that mortal man could do in the face of the greatest odds was done to hold their heavily heavily attacked position by the Glandelinians. General Ricknell Benign of the Glandelinians fell dead, in that scorching inferno of cannons and musketry, General Burgling dead and seven other generals were taken off the bloody field to die. But all the efforts of the foe to hold this part of the position was fruitless. They were cut up and annihilated by bold and determined charges and a murderous fire of cannons and musketry from the captured positions, and an adding machine gun fire of 10,000 machine guns was pouring an annihilating fire into their main rear, so there was nothing for them to do save retreat or to throw themselves on the ground with their hands uplifted as a sign of surrender. Soon all this portion of the wicked Glandelinian army under Manley was flying wildly from the fate that had overtaken their fellows, but nevertheless they were killed mercilessly both by the captured batteries of artillery, the Ave and Abbeimudian batteries, and by the concentrated and Abyssinian batteries, and by their own (by mistake) for the Glandelinians in the main position saw the situation and so fired from all their own batteries. Presently a bigger column of Glandelinians formed and moved forward to rally the panic stricken fugitives and started forward furiously to make a counter assault, but it was checked and scattered by a hot artillery fire, and did not get within gunshot shot distance of the victorious christian line.

General Vivian's troops had struck the first real blow of the battle and to them it was all or nothing to strike the last. They followed the retreating Glandelinians and cut off many hundreds of thousands of leaders and took their prisoners or shot them down. Manley's division of 45,000,000, severely had been fiercely engaged for three hours and held in check by general Samuel Thorne. The severely engagement extended over a stretch of country for over 10 miles and was a screaming bloody horror. The check was the most terrific of all cavalry fights, every man being put into the death and the losses were horrible. But the glandelinian cavalry was finally vanquished with the loss of one tenth of their number, and a portion of the victorious christian cavalry under a murderous fire scaled a fence and charged up to the musketry and mangle of a glandelinian battery of a thousand big cannons from which it had been driven, with the loss of its commander. Again the assault was renewed, and again repulsed with still greater loss. A third time a charge upon the batteries was made and this time was successful. The guns were carried and the glandelinians driven off in total rout.

Now a good portion of Manley's army was broken. His losses were terrible, and he was even demoralized in the extreme. If he could not rally his center, and bring up the reserves upon the line to check the victorious christian advance all then would be lost.

For a time the frightful battle continued. An infantry attack along the line of the Alghunian center had failed. Violet and her platoon had been shot down during the early morning part of the conflict. That the enemy had in their possession the machine guns, the loss of which would be a major blow to them as prisoners. Violet and her platoon were bound to see that these machine guns were a success. They were rescued and so had told General Evans of this was surprised, and flabbergasted, and decided to do something as soon as the machine guns were in their hands.

Evans did not wait for the machine guns to be in their hands. He decided to launch his attack at once. He ordered his infantry to advance, when General Evans himself was leading his platoon right wing to pieces. Then General Evans prepared for the desperate attempt. To rescue the machine guns, the army at that quarter would have to be surrounded and cut off from escape. For even if the foe were beaten by the assault and not surrounded, they would do their retreat into a safe zone with their prisoners, and Evans did not like the idea of sending the machine guns to the enemy. He had now forced during the early day to move around the flank of this position of the enemy, directing their aim to do and destroy, and by seven o'clock a large force of Alghunian troops were well posted upon the front and other portions of this desperate position. The Alghunian army.

As soon as he received word that the forces were concentrated upon the enemy, he immediately ordered the army to make an assault upon this position. Evans all day had his main batteries in position upon the Alghunian position to pieces in the widest artillery duel of the war. He had then before all of his own positions, sending them to the front and behind of the artillery, firing in fierce grandeur that may ever be heard before. This Evans knew would keep the enemy at bay. The force he was going to have assaulted and so he decided to keep up the artillery. The machine guns and other the Alghunian in possession of the machine guns pointed out by Violet and her platoon.

EVANS MADE THE MOST TERRIBLE AND OBSTINATE DISTRIBUTION EVER MADE IN THE WORLD'S HISTORY.

In the rain and deafening grandeur of the Alghunian artillery was Anderson in the front, the machine guns, Evans was specially firing the machine guns columns on the edge of the woods. The machine guns were firing in the center, forming a front of about sixteen miles and a half in extent. It soon emerged from the woods and moved steadily and finally forward to make the assault. The advance of this wave of Alghunian and General Evans was indeed a most splendid sight and called forth admiration from the front of the army. They were left behind as onlookers. General Evans appointed General Harvey to take command of the Alghunian forces. The Alghunian forces were indeed a most splendid sight and called forth admiration from the front of the army. Evans decided to bring the matter before general Hanson Vivian, who to know had and was successfully repelling every assault the enemy had made against him, and was then very nearly in possession of the main line of work. He decided at first by telephone to push but this had to be observed by the enemy who would undoubtedly be repelled, and so he decided to try it by the orderly telephone, so he sent this message to Hanson:

"Your Excellency general Hanson Angelo Vivian;

I have been able to force a portion of the main line, and also repel a series of great assaults made upon my lines. But before my own personal counter, there is tonight before me a tantalizing position of the enemy, guarded by cavalry under Dargers, and 70,000 men of every race bent over twenty three thousand machine guns. I threw a heavy assault of over four million men against this position supported by a second column over 74,000,000 strong, and when they got to within three hundred yards of the enemy works the foe made a counter charge that carried all before it, and I had to withdraw myself out to increase the assault against my main line. Then I threw forward a bigger column under cover of the first of all my artillery and this assault was also driven back with heavy loss. I then observed now that it is impossible to carry the position in front or even in the rear by attack. What shall I do as that position must be carried, or we cannot win the battle."

GENERAL JACK
AMBROSE EVANS.....

General Hanson who was still fiercely engaged the enemy attacking his lines with utmost determination in order to recover the lost positions, was surprised to receive this note from general Evans and looked it over carefully to do what should be done. Then he looked at the map of that part of the country, and saw that in the location of the main line a small line of low hills which were on the side of Evans were but a little to the rear. This note of this he answered as follows:

"Your Excellency general Evans.

There are a line of small hills back of your army to your left. Withdraw all your men not in action, place them on this hill, and for fifty thousand quickly on machine guns. Then there I'll sure you can surround the enemy out of the position. If you fail in this we cannot win."

GENERAL HANSON ANGELO
VIVIAN.....

Evans on receiving the note, went to examine the hills and found them in good position to throw a shower of shells upon that deadly salient. It took a matter of two full hours to place all the batteries there, about twice as many as the enemy had a series upon series of batteries of 220,000 big long range guns. This was well supported by three thousand lines of infantry in case another portion of the enemy lines would make an attempt to attack these machine guns by a desperate assault.

At eight o'clock the whole line of hills to the surprise of the enemy gave forth a tremendous noise as if they had and only broken forth into violent and constant and a hurricane of shells fell among them until they were completely destroyed. The great and long thousand cannon of the enemy which were pointed, but were then the Abolitionists and the upper limit, for the abolitionists had been long, and the enemy were not, and the first abolitionists of shells tore everything to pieces. It was a realer ball of death and destruction.

General Dargers decided that as long as there were long range guns they would not be able to reach anything very close or at a distance of a mile from them, and so he threw forward a great portion of his line to surround these batteries which were in the line and back and marching and gradually the position to earth. This was what Evans really wanted. The assault was fierce indeed the enemy started every hill with night and main making a tremendous income of these hills, a regular hill of ammunition, but while this was going on Evans sent forward twenty five million men and a strong support of cavalry to storm the position still under the heavy fire, and another twenty million to storm the rear of the foe who was assaulting these hills.

This double movement succeeded splendidly for the Glandelinians attacking the hills were caught between two fires, and cut up and thrown into confusion, while on the other side, the artillery and position of the wrecked and salient was carried, Dargers cavalry in a fierce engagement was annihilated, and the remaining infantry lines seriously handicapped, and closed in by overwhelming forces had to ground their arms and surrender.

To save himself from the disgrace of surrender Dargers had turned a machine gun full upon general Evans with the intention of riddling him with bullets, but the rush of Angolians between him and the storm of cannon, and Evans riding around another way got in the rear of the Glandelinian general and crying "Dad like a dog you are." Shot him fifteen times in the back."

The Glandelinian losses was fearful in this engagement and they were really glad to throw down their arms and surrender. The Glandelinians who had assaulted the hills were also seriously handicapped, but they succeeded in getting away in though three quarters of their number were either captured or shot down. They were pursued and driven into a total rout. Evans had taken Hanson's advance, and had succeeded splendidly in capturing the main position desired. He then wrote to Hanson at Nine O'clock

"Your Excellency general Hanson Angelo Vivian;

I have followed out your plan and succeeded marvelously. I concentrated all of my batteries upon these hills, which took two hours, and stormed the enemy's position with shot and shell. Dargers sent a large force to attack the hills, thus weakening the forces at the works, and I took advantage of it and stormed the position on all sides, and captured the remainder of this part of the Glandelinian works, besides the cannon, and the position, and cutting down the assault on these hills.

Thank for your kind advice, the battle will soon be won. I'm now reforming my armies to throw against the remainder of the main line a long my point still standing its ground and then I'll come around and turn upon the flank of your assailants. Then we'll win a complete victory.

GENERAL JACK
AMBROSE EVANS."

This report filled Hanson with joy. The assault of the enemy line; his own lines was still going on furiously but had made no impression on the Christian lines a bit. He notified Evans of his own successes, and of the good success general Vivian his brother was making at other portions of the line, and also stated that Gannon had annihilated ten churches against the position he had captured.

Though darkness was gathering now the battle still went on with terrific fury. Evans was bringing up his whole line against the remainder of the enemy's position and by ten o'clock was already in possession, and moving his army around to strike the flank of Hanson's assailants. He struck the fatal blow at ten thirty, threw the Glandelinians into terrific confusion and drove them clear back to their last line of positions and free them in a most hopeless rout ever seen in war time.

Hanson was then able to press on and he clashed with the main center of Hanley's army, cut it all to pieces, and captured the remainder of all the Glandelinian intrenchments. In fact Evans and Hanson made better and quicker success than general Vivian had.

General Vivians success however was about just as splended as the other two armies though he of course had not entirely completed as quick as they had done. General Evans, and Hanson had crushed the enemy along their own front within twelve hours time, while general Vivian was still being assailed by the enemy under Manley in person, who had not known as yet the main disaster that had happened to other portions of his main great Glandelinian army.

He was bound to crush general Vivian, and had delivered already four great assaults upon his entrenched lines in a desperate and most superhuman effort to recover the works which general Vivians army had captured during the bloody fray.....

Realizing his own situation, how he was holding the foe at bay in their attacks, and learning that the battle was going on with better success elsewhere general Vivian then threw all precautions to the winds and struck the Glandelinian forces along his own lines a series of heavy and mortal blows.

During the fearful conflict and while it was still raging, Violet and her sisters who had been with general Vivians command at that time, found a envelope from a prisoner who had accidentally dropped it as he was being led to the rear of the christian lines. Violet who picked it up volunteered to read it to her sisters. She opened the envelope, took out the sheet of a paper and then unfolding it read slowly and carefully but not loud as they did not wish for any one to hear what she was reading except her own sisters:----

"Your Excellency general Johnston Jackson Manley;

"I have seen and observe that general Jack Ambrose is concentrating all the strength of the Madge Evans hills back of his lines on his extreme left wing. If he succeeds in doing so he will be enabled to cannonade the Glandelinians under Francis Darger out of their strong position and the battle will then be lost. Please hurry up more artillery and infantry to their support before it is too late. Evans our enemy has failed already in two assaults, his army having been routed after the first, but now what he is doing in manning and something must be done before it is too late.

General Flip."

Your assistant;

"God we must take this note to general Hanson right away." Said her sisters. "I suppose the prisoner had it with the intentions of sending it to Manley as soon as he got the opportunity. Its a blessing that we found it and that he had dropped it."

They at once hastened to his lines and reaching him showed him the letter.

"Its lucky for us." Said Hanson. "This will now enable Evans to go on with his work without being discovered, and Manley would be able to send any heavy reinforcements to the salient. Notify general Vivian right away."

He added turning to his orderly.

General Vivian got the fine notice of the find, and was surprised, and then Evans received report of it just as he had then turned the flank of the enemy who had assaulted Hansons lines to recapture their lost position.

Violet and her sisters by message were congratulated for their find by the two generals, and Hanson praised them highly. All the time of the fierce conflict Violet and her sisters had kept their distance from the battle knowing what the results would be if they got too near. They had not forgotten the results of their mistake during the frightful battle of Brigano.

General Vivian could not progress any further along his own portion of the line as the darkness of the coming night set in and this had to close the conflict with the situation along his own lines just the same.

Violet and her sisters had not learned as yet of the outcome of the battle along general Vivians lines, or along Evans but they knew that Hanson had put the Glandelinians along his own front where they belonged.

It had indeed been a thunderous fray, and little Jennie Turner herself had almost believed that another battle like Glordina was going on. It of course was not near so fierce, but nevertheless it was one of the fiercest conflicts of the invasion, and the little girls had observed enough of it to know that war is certainly a horriblothing.

However they soon learned from general Hanson that success had occurred all along the line, though from the situation along general Vivians lines there was danger of the battle being renewed on the morrow.

"I don't think it will be renewed." Answered Jennie. "Surely the foe are not foolish to renew such a fierce conflict when already they are played out with all their hard fighting and desperate losses. If they do they are indeed foolish."

But general Hanson was not wrong. Johnston Jackson Manley was still ignorant that the main portion of his army had been routed from the field by both Hanson and Evans and he was preparing to renew the battle the very next day. Hanson suspecting this decided to keep every officer well informed and if Manley had any force sufficient enough to cause trouble he would turn on Manleys flank.

Violet and her sisters that evening felt rather tired out from lack of sleep the early night, and so since all was quiet now they decided to retire early and get a good sleep. They first said their prayers and then into the cots they hopped. They had no sooner gotten asleep, when five christian generals came galloping up.

"Evans is advancing upon us." One of them said. "His has cleared the way for us, and if Manley attacks us now he will meet destruction."

"Oh goodness is that so?" Demanded Hanson. "I did not know Evans made such a sweeping success."

"But he did your excellency." It would soon as to say a greater sweeping success, than a saints success over mortal sin. He has scattered the Glandelinian armies which had attacked him and so now is now moving his army forward to join a junction with you. He advised me to tell you not to allow Manley to make any further assaults, but to wait until he arrived, and then the three of us that is you, your brother, and Evans himself will strike on Manleys remaining army and also crush it."

"A good idea." Replied general Hanson. "Then we can win a sweeping victory and carry all before us once more. How far away is he?"

"He is about two miles of us." Answered the general. "And he is advancing as fast as his men can case."

"I'll tell you what." Said general Hanson. "I'll notify general Vivian of this, and have him stop Manleys army right away. In the meanwhile I'll signal to Evans my intention, and move my army around to Manleys rear. Then Evans can when he arrived close Manley in and we'll have him right there where we want him."

"If we do this we'll capture him sure enough, and he won't be able to bring up any fresh forces to defend the Glandelinian capital." Said another of the generals. "How are your little noices. Sleeping I suppose."

"Yes they are asleep but I'm afraid the noise of the conflict will awaken them." Answered Hanson. "But then we got to let them advance presents itself. I'll notify general Vivian right away."

Hanson at once telegraphed to general Vivian;

"Do not wait for enemy to renew battle to morrow. Attack him now. I'm going to move my army around his rear and crush it in, while Evans will attempt to close him in and capture his whole army."

General Hanson Vivian."

General Vivian was indeed surprised to receive this notice but nevertheless he was acting all the time to renew the battle right away for he had feared that delay would have given Manley time to receive reinforcements, and then it probably would have made another change in the bloody battle. He had been nately prepared for the action while Hanson signalled to Evans what his intention was. Evans receiving the news, thought it a good idea, and hurried his advance. But unfortunately through spies, general Johnston Manley had received the news of the intentions of the christian generals, and seeing to it that all ways of his retreat was secure, he also prepared to make a fierce and stubborn stand, and to answer so that general Hanson could not make any attack upon his flank. Hanson had discovered this however and warned general Vivian to be careful that Manley was on the alert, and so decided to await the arrival of Evans, while he threw a portion of his army far in the rear to guard against reinforcements coming to his aid.

Manley said. If there ever was a human fox Manley was one himself. He knew full the intentions of the three main christian generals to capture him if possible, and he decided to guard against all surprises, and to strike general Vivian before the other christian armies could come to his aid.

He had learned that general Vivian had sadly depleted his forces, in the engagement of the day before, and so decided to take advantage of it, and make a desperate assault during the darkness of the night with his whole army at that. He got ready all his batteries, and seeing that his lines were also well prepared, sent them forward to make the attack on general Vivian's main line.

The big forces of the remaining Glandelinian army at once moved forward, under cover of the darkness, and as quietly and as stealthily as cats. None of the christian pickets heard them coming, but when the foe were near enough, their dark objects could be easily seen, and the contries started their well known signals while falling back quietly without firing a shot. On and on came the Glandelinians wondering where all those cries of birds, and crickets came from. It was the signal of the guards but the enemy did not know it.

As they at reached the front post of the christian line, they started forward at a rush. They swarmed over the first line of works without meeting any opposition, or without finding a soul there. Indeed the Glandelinians were surprised at this for they expected to fall upon a sleeping camp full of soldiers, and they found a long line of deserted works of no account.

Nevertheless on they pressed confidently, and captured a second line of works with the same results. Now the Glandelinians became suspicious for they believed that the christians under general Vivian were on their guard, and that this apparent abandoning of two lines of no account works, was a trick, and the main Glandelinian generals signalled to their men to be mighty careful for they feared they had run into a trap. They now started to retreat without striking a blow, but as they started to fall back, a furnace of musketry and artillery was suddenly opened upon them from the rear, a fire so terrifying that it shattered their whole line, and within four hours the whole Glandelinian column was streaming back to their own position in the wildest confusion.

The enemy had intended to surprise the christians, and had then selves been surprised, and outflanked by the wily christian troops. But nevertheless to surround Manley or cut off his retreat was impossible, and general Vivian realized this. The din of the firing for those four hours had been horrible, but nevertheless Violet and her sisters slept through it all never having heard a bit of it to the surprise of the christian generals who had expected that they would have been awakened at the first crash of musketry.

By this time the foremost portion of general Vivian's army had arrived, and Evans who had arrived ahead of the army, went directly to see Hanson who was reforming his own lines, which had received a fierce but desultory attack, the same the general Vivian's lines had been invaded but not attacked.

Evans was surprised indeed to know and learn that Manley had found out the intention of Hanson, and saw now that to capture Manley was out of the question. Fearing another attack of the enemy, and probably one of redoubled fury, Evans desired to have the little girls moved to a better portion of the lines, and this was readily done. As the little girls were thus being moved, a surge of the enemy unexpectedly came crashing upon Evans newly arrived forces, like a thunderbolt. At first all was confusion and panic but Evans immediately dashed to the scene, and by help of the now glowing moonlight, saw that a long Glandelinian wave was also moving cautiously toward Hanson's right. Hanson was aroused by the sound of heavy firing along general Evans' lines, and so again left his headquarters, to see that every thing was alright, when all of a sudden hell seemed to break loose along his own lines as the christian musketry and cannons let go simultaneously.

This assault though it never touched general Vivian's lines this time, was still more desperate, and though the foremost portion of the wave of Glandelinians was wiped out the remainder of the surge continued the attack with utmost stubbornness, and fought with the energy of despair and the fury of desperation. Three times they almost pierced the christian line under Hanson and three times they were driven from the works, and brought to stand still further on. This struggle was an unequal one, a struggle of great mightiness for the Glandelinians despite the repulses again rushed to the attack with tremendous fury. Cannons thundered and crashed in a deafening confusion of sound, and the noise of explosions, and the roar of musketry was so constant and incessant that it unwarred most of the officers, who feared that the assault would drive all before it. Hanson now believed it evident that either the scattered Glandelinians had rallied or that Manley had received heavy reinforcements. General Vivian was also awakened by the terrific din along general Hanson's lines, and believing that his own lines would soon be attacked got everything ready and laid the bait as he did before. Hanson to stop the frantic night assault of the enemy was compelled to concentrate as much forces upon the assailants as possible and for three hours along his lines the flash of musketry was blinding, and the cannons and explosions made a scene as if lightning was flashing with an incessant display. Of course who could say that a million thunderstorms in one could have made the din that the firing during this assault did.

Evans was also heavily assaulted, but after an hours desperate effort he had managed to rally the christians who had been surprised and driven into confusion, and bringing up the other portions of his forces who were still advancing he threw them heavily against the right of the Glandelinian assailants. A bloody sanguinary struggle was now going on, but still the reinforcements were arriving; untill within four hours more the whole of Evans' first division had formed in line of battle and was meeting the enemy with fierce and pugacious resistance.

General Ledger of the enemy brought up in the meantime a force of over 15,000,000 Ameracianians but these were caught in a trap when they moved to assault general Hanson's rear, and in the frightful inferno which made the flashes of musketry and cannons as bright as day, general Ledger was killed, twenty six of his highest generals went down mangled and bleeding, his army was crushed to fragments, and then routed with the loss of half of their regimental colors, and 7,000,000 prisoners of this 15,000,000 only 9,876,000 came back to tell the result of their attempted attack on Hanson's flank.

Still all this while nothing occurred along general Vivian's lines. All was quiet as as no battle was raging, but nevertheless his whole army extensive as it was could hear plainly the roar of battle not only along general Hanson's lines, but Evans as well. He decided to investigate and see whether general Manley had received any reinforcements or not. He went out with a score of general officers, and soon returned perfectly satisfied and wrote to general Hanson;

"YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL HANSON VIVIAN:

The enemy under general Manley has been reinforced by the Glandelinian army under general Black Brooks. I am going to advance around the way of Sanbury's pike, and take Manley on the rear. Otherwise he'll surely crush both you and Evans in another two hours, as he is hurling overwhelming numbers upon you with unceasing fury. Stand as hard as you can for I'll take an hour to make the run around that location. I'll hit and hit hard.

Your loving Brother,
GENERAL Robert Angolia
Vivian."

Hanson was surprised at this but then he decided that it would take more than Manley or general Black Brooks to force him or crush his lines, or Evans altogether. Unknown to Hanson or general Vivian however, Evans had thrown against the foe who was attacking him a sweeping counter charge that had torn the whole Glandelinian surge at this quarter as a tornado tears a house. The slaughter had been terrific, but the charge ploughed its way entirely through the Glandelinian wave, and poured in another counter charge through its rear, and so badly was the Glandelinian army at this quarter broken and cut up that the survivors were thrown into complete panic and confusion. But in the melle general Luckwick Baldwin who had also led a portion of this counter charge, had literally cut off a portion of the Glandelinian wave from the rest, and to avoid a annihilation it had to ground their arms and surrender to general Baldwin, who for the first time in the war had ever received a surrender of a Glandelinian army. No however however would have received quarter, but Evans had protested with him, and so he took them all prisoners, and marched them, a disgraced and beaten army to the rear, for transportation to Abbeemina.

A blow this time had been struck by Baldwin, which gives Evans army a credit for three great surrenders that occurred during the battle. Hanson and all the other generals were surprised at the furious conduct of general Evans' army. Glandelinia had some enemy, when Evans was their foe indeed.

How much of the enemy was assaulting, general Mansons did not know, but he could exactly tell just now, but now nevertheless the assault was the fiercest and growing worse every minute. The Mansons right however was in a good and favorable position, unknown to the Glandelinian assailants, and so for the assault the Glandelinian divisions was suffering unspeakable losses. A large Glandelinian tidal wave under general Stinson was moving against general Mansons center with madlin fury, but this division was broken up like the wave of the sea against a solid wall of rock, the main Glandelinian Glandelinian general was killed, and three others Stan, Sassen, and Samuel Paltze severely wounded. The division gave way in confusion, and now Mansons believed it a favorable moment to push forward his own forces to make a counter charge.

He first made a reconnoitering of the assaulting Glandelinians, and soon observed that to make a counter charge just now was dangerous. The Mansons center was the solid and Evans range to make one then he was also so heavily assaulted by apparently overwhelming numbers. Stories Glandelinians was making a rolling assault upon the left of Mansons lines, and generals Gordon, Snyder, Secretary, and Sniderman were throwing heavy forces upon other portions of his lines.

Mansons of course did not have the whole of his army in action as yet, and conscious that the general giving his brother was moving around to attack the enemy's rear in the meantime, decided to risk a counter charge and force the foe back if possible.

He ordered general Jacob Baldwin to throw forward his main columns and also ordered general Felling to throw his cavalry upon the rear of the assailants. The cavalry attack was made first, and moving with irresistible force they managed to force their way through the Glandelinian surge at that particular point, and fought and cut their way back to the front of the christian lines. This was the most desperate charge that a christian cavalry force had ever made before. And these cavalry men were neither, Abissinians, Abyssinians or Concentinians. They were cavalry belonging to general Mansons Calvinians.

The Glandelinians were thrown into great panic by this scathing charge, and then as Baldwin poured on through other portions of the Glandelinian assailants cutting their way through also clear to the rear the Glandelinian assailants became panic stricken, and broke and fled in a stampede.

The long and desperate assault was repulsed at last even before general Vivian had accomplished his attack on the flank of the foe. But Mansons knew that if one assault proceeds another. Evans was very successful in repelling the assault of the enemy along his own lines as predicted before, having a counter charge with irresistible force, and so he ordered Mansons by telegraph to do the same, just when Mansons had already done it. Mansons answered;

"I have also counter charged as you proposed, having heard of the great effect the charge would have. We have accomplished wonders, but there is sure chance that Mansons will rescue it again. It is probably only a temporary repulse, and we cannot expect a lull unless the general Vivian reaches the enemy's rear. I never saw a battle so furious during the invasion before. It is simply terrible and extremely bloody to boot...."

General Mansons Vivian...."

The battle was soon again resumed along Mansons main left wing with redoubled fury where general Stewart Brown threw forward about thirty-six divisions against that portion of the christian front the assault being the most desperate of the whole battle entirely. Simultaneously the Glandelinian Glandelinians under general Emma Wicknell attempted a most vigorous turning movement against the combined christian forces under general Evans and General Henry Tanager with a result of a serious disaster to the Glandelinians themselves, for Mansons christian army had arrived to the assistance of Evans, and perceiving the approaching of the line of Glandelinian flankers made a violent counter charge, and threw back the Glandelinian flankers with the loss of two quarters of their number and with the wounding of all their general commanders.

Forteen desperate counter attacks was hurled upon the enemy by Evans himself at another point of the line, nighty night onslaughts, which tore the enemy's lines horribly, though repulsed as they were for the attackers were like the waves of the sea, which though repulsed by the shore only rise a new to resume the assault. Indeed Evans continued to throw his heaviest forces forward like the storm waves of the sea, while the rest of the christian line itself was being assaulted by the enemy and now the encounter with Evans army was the most ferocious ever known in Glandelinia and was fiercer than any other portion of the battle field. The battle was terrible in the main fury, exceedingly severe on all along the line, and the whole Glandelinian assaulting line had been so dreadfully cut up and thrown into such wild panic and confusion that they recoiled like frightened sheep before the pursuit of a pack of raving wolves. A hundred foe columns were horribly torn, scattered and flying, and like at Francis Atlanta also, Evans portion alone hundreds of Glandelinian generals had been dreadfully cut up or mangled, killed or wounded, others said the dreadful storm were trying to rally their confused and shattered divisions, but got no time for Mansons forces now came up in their main army, and after pouring upon the demoralized enemy a scathing fire charged with a roar of demoniac yells themselves, the face and nerve of the Abissinian yell, and this violent attack of the Abissinians continued steadily for over four hours, the main line of assailants was a gain torn to pieces by the Abissinians cutting their way through their lines, and though the shattered christian waves rallied again and again to the charge in that sea of battle, they could not stand before the Abissinian pressure, they were only cut to pieces once again, their other main commander general Believe Believe was shot to death, and so many others fell that the survivors broke ranks and fled in a wild rout back to their own lines.

Evans had in no time accomplished a wonderful success, and learning that Mansons was still assaulted, without being able to repulse his assailants, Evans at the break of day raised his guns upon the assailants from a hidden position, and then he blew the columns of Glandelinian assailants to atoms with a terrific shell fire that carried all before it, and the whole Glandelinian command under general Blockhead with the loss of all their general officers within four minutes in that hurricane of shell fire was torn down, dissipated, the remainder of the columns cut to pieces and routed in terrifying fury, hundreds of thousands of the Glandelinians falling in the hands of Evans on who charged them on their flank, and indeed the sea was surprised Mansons.

A few minutes later only, and then with superhuman effort general Evans opening fire with all his cannons, threw half of his own force upon the enemy's position, before Mansons himself could do anything to make any movements and though the firing along the enemy's lines was very severe and killed low whole waves of christian troops, the survivors nevertheless cut down the opposing line, and once more routed them from the previous line of christian works they had captured the night before, the nonaccount of works belonging to general Vivians lines, and the shell fire of general Evans main batteries was so terrific that the storm of explosions made a noise heard for six hundred and fifty miles away.

Mansons having been relieved of the assault along his lines by Evans fierce cannonading, and strong overwhelming counter charge, now prepared to make an attack himself and try and capture the remainder of Mansons position. He drove forward the christian forces with all the force that could be mustered into the attack covering the onslaught with all the available guns that could be brought to bear. The Glandelinians however saw the big waves of christian assailants coming, with their unusual rush and jump and concentrated all their smallest batteries upon the point while they made ready to respond to the cannonading of Mansons batteries. Incapable damage was committed however by the Glandelinians not being properly on their guard, for the christian gunners got the range better than the foe cannonade did, tearing up all of the position of the enemy, with a riving shell fire. The attack of the surging christian line was unspeakably fierce and beyond standing, and as they tore their way through the Glandelinian divisions with fierce yells, they shattered them to scattered fragments, by inflicting such excruciating losses that they fled in panic in all directions. Whole armies was brought up and hurled against the christian assailants, but the Glandelinian armies, though checking for a time the christian attack was frightfully mangled by the fire along the line of christian cannon on Mansons positions, the blasting artillery fire being of such intensity, that it ploughed the whole line of the enemy through and through. General Germaine Felling, and Jacob Baldwin crushed the main left grand division of Johnston Jackson Mansons army, banded and buckled back the main first line so far that though it stood its ground, and fought desperately while the christian line was cutting it to pieces, they were nevertheless made the fire of the captured machine guns which were turned upon them, and which committing such a close slaughter at close quarters threw the Glandelinians into confusion, and in the desperate dash Baldwin was already in possession of this part of the Glandelinian position and the foe were running as if all the devils in hell were after them.

All the glandelinian artillery was also in possession of the Abbieannians, and general Adgelinda Evans army being crushed up by a fierce artillery storm, was also compelled to retreat in the wildest confusion, though general Jack Thos Glandelinian divisions still stood its ground most stubbornly to cover their retreat. But so soon their own right and left was turned and destroyed, the main line was exposed to Hanson's blasting artillery fire, and a fierce musketry fire from the attacking infantry, who now included them, and the forces then withdrew also in panic, and while all parts of Hanson's main left wing was rolled up in confusion Hanson had to surrender to general Jacob Baldwin, and during the surrender this is what he said to Baldwin:

"I have to surrender my sword to you, but I'll tell you christian dogs, that you'll never capture the city of Glandelinia. We'll win this war on you in the end or perish one or the other. And if it was not for my men here I would not surrender to a christian pig cur like you. But y to save them from annihilation I'll do so."

Baldwin answered

"You have been forced to surrender to me sir, but just the same I'll not accept a sword from a man like you. You can keep your sword. You are not made a prisoner of war, but taken as a low down sneaking criminal who encourage your men to butcher children, just because we and other christian divisions are fighting to free them. Bah I spit on you."

In the meantime the rest of Evans army was pressing on its its own glorious victory, and though general a Bernard Sharpplay, and Bicknell Barney did all in his power to stay the fearful christian onslaught led by Evans and the other christian commanders, he so they four, a found it in vain, and in the each seething holocaust of a slaughter their generals fell mortally wounded or dead by the score, and after making thirteen desperate counter assaults against Evans in which the glandelinian divisions were cut to pieces every time they were compelled to give way, and those Glandelinian forces also retreated in the greatest confusion. Indeed it was the greatest battle seen in the invasion yet, and the bloodiest known during the fourth year of the war too, for losses on both sides were terribly and well known to be noticeably greater.

All of the glandelinian country felt the concussion of the fighting as far as the distance of 100 miles, the firing of Hanson's and Evans batteries with that of the enemy's response, with their force was becoming so very awful, and terrible, and the uproar of the firing of rifles was still fiercer, while the number of big explosions, and bursts of shells could not be counted. Men fell thicker than rain.

After this great success of the christian army, Evans was still attacking, and being counterattacked with great violence, general Evans was still working, day after day, for the distance still greater than he showed, as he had not reached the enemy's rear yet, and finally he seemed to have enough, or was not discouraged, as he had a large and last reserve force near in which he could hurl upon the christian troops when they reached the advance a robust line.

The christian lines however were still solid and strong, and only along Evans lines behind of which there stood a stretched a shaded woods all was quiet. Evans army clustering around their tower and the battered flags and standards was awaiting for the word; "FORWARD."

Before Evans lay the shattered Glandelinian force opposed to him. As soon as all was prepared and ready Evans gave the order "Forward" and the whole Abbieannian line swept forward to give the foe "Hell" once more. Evans to cover this onslaught placed his main batteries on the flanks and again threw upon the Glandelinians a hail of shells and high explosive explosives. The shell fire seemed to go to the Glandelinian tents to pieces, but the Glandelinians nevertheless too shelter too the left of the white forests behind them and from every advantage of protection poured upon the christian a severe fire of musketry and artillery which made the christians suffer the most stuporous loss, and then with wild rage the foe counter charged, and hurled back the shattered christian columns, and again the christian lines were forced forward. The christian army was now in a desperate position, and the Glandelinian fire and the christian riddled, and reduced to remnants the Abbieannian line swept forward valiantly and to the last to that fiery battle storm gave way and melted back to their own position.

But again and again Evans hurled the monstrous Abbieannian columns to the charge, and that time the christian army was vanquished with terrible and a disgraceful slaughter the christian army was completely routed.

Evans then hurled against the Glandelinians a force of millions of the fiercest forces, who rode against the Glandelinians, and fought the Glandelinian cannon and musketry sound and horse as thick as snow falls, and in such fearful monstrous numbers that the lay in high numbers the survivors rode completely through the Glandelinian forces, and back several times, the Glandelinians being forced to give way before this irresistible charge, and the very heavens seemed to burst into flame and clouds the bloody battle was so fierce, the violence of flame and din being enough to deafen a world of people at once, the cavalry pressing on like a seething storm of death and destruction the fiercest seeming to blaze like a hell of fire and smoke together, the very atmosphere like at Francis Atlanta seeming to turn into smoke and flame, and all the whole battle field was hidden in clouds of smoke, every opposing line seeming to become a soft seething conflagration as if forests were burning, the explosions seeming to tear up the living garments of the earth, which seemed to wither and fly off into space in the fiery blast of Glandelinian, and Abbieannian cannon, and a exploding storm of shells of every calibre, and so terrific was the din that a 100,000,000,000,000 cannon seemed to be exploding in a continuous crashing roar as if to tear the millions of worlds to pieces in an hour like.

Hanson received a later 1,999,999 men who were defended by the din, and 8,766,555 Glandelinians who had been driven insane from the crash and up roar the name of the christian soldiers seemed to have been affected by it. However by the force and cutting fury of the charge of the big strong division of the Abbieannian cannon, the Glandelinians finally and all before began to give way, and again and again like shattered and broken waves of the sea they were hurled back, and the Abbieannians reinforced by other bodies of annihilating parties who were then so far up, turned the christian army gallantly, and the cavalry simultaneously divided a large portion of the Glandelinian divisions from the rest, and after all was said and done, a large portion of this surrendered force had been shot down and slaughtered as the din still raged, the Glandelinian general a cannon, Patrick Madden offered to surrender all his seventeen million four hundred thousand Glandelinians were taken prisoners by the cavalry, and transported through the fighting lines, and handed off for the christian rear.

Still undoubtedly the rain both of the Glandelinian forces, Hanson's suffering terribly and horribly from the battering storm of Abbieannian cannon, and from the battering and battering storm of assaults along their front still remained firm, and with their own cannon added by thousands of broadsides from musketry guns cut down the multitudes of Abbieannians like swarms of grass. But general Vivianha and swearing-to-raise-earns was compelled to make a furious counter charge. He did so and so sudden was the attack that it did drive the Abbieannians in confusion, but general Evans threw upon the assaulting Glandelinian charges an annihilating fire of artillery, the Abbieannian infantry closed and fell upon their assailants with still greater slaughter, capturing legions of them and driving the survivors back in confusion.

General Abner Schroeder was shot in the eye, and left and dropped mortally wounded, many of his officers were already killed or wounded, and Stanley Jackson Francis seeing that Evans right grand division was advancing with great success ordered a general advance of his whole own center, which was in full swing toward noon, and which fairly scythed and killed the whole Glandelinian center opposed to him. Getting directions from Evans Stanley Jackson Francis moved around and flanked the Glandelinians in a most crushing, and deadly way, and the christian army was completely routed.

General Livingston in the meantime had been made by general Hanson's Abbieannian forces, and though they were all cut down, General Livingston also turned the enemy's flank and cannon itself that is to say, cannon who had been assailed himself all morning by other portions of the Glandelinian army and who had been compelled to withdraw and leave the field in the hands of the enemy for three hours was seen able by the arrival of a part of Evans army under general Sanders to make a counter charge which soon caused him to recover all the lost ground and smash the enemy completely and routed the christian army.

General Livingston in the meantime halted his forces to make the flank attack, but he saw a chance of doing so. Everywhere outside of his army or north of it there was so thickly nothing, but a stretch of forest the Glandelinian soldiers. The battle had been totally won by the christian forces who, to a fight, and the whole of Hanson's army was retiring, scattered in as disgraceful a defeat as ever lay down before during the invasion.

Welland with the victory Evans so turned his advances, and now was unopposed for three days, when to shield valley three new Abbeinnian armies were thrown at his way. The new army under general's Nicholas, garrison, and were less. But they however did show any intentions of making any attacks, and so Evans determined to rest his badly worn army for several days before proceeding to force his way through the Glandolinian armies. While he was thus encamping, Evans received this startling report from general Gonabio Vivian who was leading armies in the far west against the foe armies under general Ambrose Muller;

"The Seismograph at the weather bureau of the Glandolinian University at the town of Dornel recorded the most pronounced earthquake shocks which continued steadily for four days without a moment's pause. It was the most peculiar earthquake shocks ever known and lay away to the southeast during those four days we could hear an incessant noise as if the world of volcanoes were in action. The disturbance added with all kinds of queer noises, and distant rumbling of sound began at four thirty this past morning four days ago and was still in progress at nine o'clock the evening of the fourth day according to our university observers.

The continuous shocks had a profound prophetic effect on the seismograph than any other earthquake ever known, it was said to me. The observers said the continuous shocks probably occurred at about 11,000 miles south from the city of Glandolinia.

Gonabio Vivian."

Evans was surprised at this report and wondered what could have caused it. As he was viewing his armies the next day concentrating his artillery, to prepare for any assaults that may come, he received another note from general Everett True at Golnco;

"Your excellency;

"Accordingly to Prof. G.A Johnston, in charge of signal stations at Pont-dolar-eye the recent earthquake of your big battle at Harrold was indistinctly recorded on the instrument, which is said to be one of the most sensitive in the whole of invaded Glandolinia. But early this morning the needle began to tremble distinctly at four thirty o'clock, and all the rest of the night was still vibrating although the disturbance had apparently abated. From the data we have on hand it is impossible to locate or determine the main location of the earthquake, but from any queer noises we have also heard we believed it was the concussion of some far distant battle. The instrument showed the most pronounced vibrations for over five days in many years, such more distinct than those which were recorded since the earthquake shocks caused by battles during the entire invasion. The entire point of the quake was registered at 10,40 o'clock in the evening of the fourth day.

Another report from Everett True also ran as follows;

A very severe earthquake lasting more than four days and centered between 11,300 miles from Glandolinia was recorded early to day on the Glandolinian university seismograph. Shocks began at four 40 A.M. reached a maximum about nine thirty in the evening of the fourth day, and ceased at eleven thirty o'clock. I believe there is that now the disturbance has been gradually subsided. The record sheet on the seismograph will not be removed until to-morrow morning, when the accurate time of the starting and end of the terror will be determined."

On the next day what must have been the most disastrous earthquakes in history of Glandolinia was recorded at the seismograph at the captured university within Evans' lines itself. It was impossible for him to determine the location of the main force of the earthquake, but the ground shook for all that day with great feeling under his very feet and the instrument recorded the first tremors at 5,45 A.M. They grew steadily stronger and more pronounced. At eight o'clock Evans took charge of the seismograph. The waves of shocks were then coming with startling strength. They reached their first height at eight ten, and then began abating. At noon the instrument still registered registered the quakes though with slackening force.

"So far as I have been unable to locate the quake, the indications are that it is an earthquake of uncommon proportions--a considerably more severe than the one caused by the battle of Glandolinia." Said Evans. "It must have been some battle near by for I heard a great volume of sound in the distance all that time.

Indeed all day the next and all that night terrific continuous earthquake shocks more severe than the recent Volcanic disturbance of Mt. Calverline during her violent eruptive eruption was registered on every government seismograph captured by the Christian armies. The main location or the directions of the heavy disturbances and heavy tremors that caused the delicate needle of the instruments to vacillate wildly was not yet definitely learned. The shocks so continuous was the most pronounced registered by the local quake detectors on a score of years. All of the Abbeinnian generals commanding the armies, invading Glandolinia were anxiously awaiting a cable, or telegraphed report of the location and results of the great upheaval which had continued so long without abatement. The disturbance was believed to be from 3,456 miles from Evans' army according to an estimate of general Hanson Vivian himself. But none of these Christian generals were able to discover from what direction the earth blast origin originated and the varied sounds had seemed to be in every known direction. The tremors commenced at three o'clock that latter morning, continued growing more severe with the progress of time until ten o'clock in the morning when they were most pronounced. From that time they abated until hardly distinguishable during the late afternoon.

"From the data we have on hand it is impossible to find out the location of the earthquakes going on for these past seven days." Exclaimed Hanson to reports and questioners. "The instruments showed the most pronounced vibrations in many years, much more distinct than those recorded from the recent Glandolinia disturbance. The Glandolinia shocks was distinctly recorded on our own instruments in Angoline, which is one of the most sensitive in the world. From present indications we fear a much greater disaster than that one, has occurred. Owing to the unusual severity of the shocks great anxiety is entertained by all of the northern Christian armies invading this country less some point in southern Glandolinia may have been stricken with a catastrophe more worse than that one which occurred at Glandolinia which wrecked so many cities and towns, and caused so many lives to be lost."

Evans however was soon surprised by this news of the Glandolinian bulletin which he read in the town of sandlin the following day which he had raided;

"Big battle at Lesterdegester. Abbeinnians worsted, it being one of the severest battles during the invasion of the Christian armies.

Hanson succeeded in crushing the whole Christian line assaulting his army annihilating the right wing with his cannons. This battle is considered as the most bloody of the war in Glandolinia especially for the size of the armies engaged and the firing on both sides made such a din as to shake the country for over 23,000 miles. The firing seemed to rive the world from the din. Ten times monstrous waves of Abbeinnians made great assaults, turning the whole battle field which extended for forty miles into a volcano of flame and crashing din. After our forces had repulsed the charges of the Christians our own forces made a storming assault of four hours duration during which the firing roared like a hundred trillion cannon the assault of our side being so tremendous that the whole Christian line was forced from the works, and our army almost annihilated and cut flanked and the few survivors gave way only to be also cut down.

On the second day the Abbeinnian forces renewed the battle having received the timely arrival of reinforcements and the battle raged at a new position for the rest of the bloody second day the new force of Christians holding their ground to the very last.

Along the Christian line our own forces assaulted the Christian line with such tremendous and wild storming fury that their combined divisions had to be concentrated to their fullest strength in an effort to stop 3454. addressed variously; onslaughts of our forces. Hundreds of thousands of ammunition of every calibre was concentrated upon our main line, columns, and though such a havoc occurred which was never seen before our forces could not be stirred. Other whole portions of our soldiers were torn to pieces, by the torrent of shells, the others still came on, and this second second force of christians only recoiled when threatened with annihilation.

This contest was of the most fierce character, it indeed in being a battle that into the most terrible character, and indeed one to which the courage and endurance of our glandelinian soldiers. Our general Housman sent forward all of his mightiest forces to renew the battle on the third day these christian forces being concentrated on the heights, who were opposing Housman's assault which seemed to be volences in eruption, though many thousands of christians were supported by a sheet of infantry fire failing to check the wild Glandelinian onslaught, though their destructive fire did tear again and again whole divisions to pieces.

It was said however to say that it was a most fatal charge upon those heights, for it was gradually repulsed, and three or four times again our grand and noble armies attacked those ridges with all their courage and utmost fury, and desperate courage, and with the stubbornness of an army of lions, but in that onslaught of demerit the wicked christian fire again swept all before it, in avalanches of screaming, roaring destruction, and our shattered Glandelinian armies had to recede once more. All of their biggest waves of assault had been cut to pieces and routed in disorder, by our christian enemies who were now strongly entrenched, and again reinforced. Several times our grand and noble forces, did manage to reach the top of the ridges and close with the christian dogs, in a fierce hand to hand combat but they suffered exorbitant losses, and were compelled to retreat. Our generals then saw that it was utterly impossible to win those heights in the face of such a fearful fire of christian artillery and artillery and they also feared a disaster, should the christian forces counter charge, our fighting lines, and so he strengthened the lines more strongly and prepared to resume the battle on the fourth day.....

Indeed this battle was really as the tallents predicted. It also almost ended the hopes for invasion of the southern part of Glandelinian and lasted fully eight days instead of seven as the foe predicted. Through some mistake on the part of general Mc-Farrans divisions on the fourth day of the fight full contest during the height of the bloody battle which was known as a most serious blunder, general Jinks Vivian had sent half of his main forces to intrench in the woods he, below the ridges previously assaulted the other day, where unexpectedly he met strong Glandelinian forces under general Thomas Federal Johnston, and Phillip Phaulseer.

The Glandelinian force under these two commanders was about 56,234,557 strong all the fiercest kind of Glandelinians really known the indomitable Zibrommians. Their features and dress seemed Arabian and Gargolian combined, but their girlish way of fixing their long hair, and their furious look and blinding as set of their eyes, and the fierce sinister aspects of their teeth proved themselves to be the Zibrommians.

The battle was at once resumed with redoubled fury, the Zibrommians making a fierce attack, attack than expected, and though temporarily repulsed under a redoubled attack of exceedingly great violence, engaging all of the christian forces in possession of the woods at once, and general Philip Phillipus, withdrew a great force of real Glandelinians threw forward the whole division upon the left grand divide of the christian line with all the violence that could be rendered into a wild attack.

But for a time both the Mc-Hollensteinian, and Zibrommian forces with those of the Glandelinians met the sternest and the greatest resistance, and was also compelled to stand before serious series of wild and raving counter charges, of christians forces stretched for forty miles in length, and the whole battle field was torn to a ball of destruction.

The Glandelinian losses were so heavy that they never all there to be seen, general Thomas Federal Johnston, in the highest hour of the fourth day's battle suffered the complete annihilation of one of his best divisions the force of the Glandelinian army, and when parts of the survivors of this division were in the wild confusion he fell mortally wounded in battle to rally them, he drew out a sheet of fire of christian artillery and musketry and to across the distance, and finally with the last of his strength he fell mortally wounded and bleeding and that dreadful scene of battle's carnage. General George Francis the son of Mc-Hollenstein, and Mc-Hollenstein's standard bearer, just in the heavy reinforcements, the arrival of Thomas Federal Johnston, and saved from total death at once, and was hurried to the rear, but the violent counter attacks of the christian troops for a time could not even be checked, until Thomas Mc-Hollenstein and Stanch Housman threw forward their divisions, and finally won their second victory.

demolishing warfare, then when the soldiers were badly wounded..... As to the first day of the battle on the other parts of the fields the fury was too horrible to relate in detail, save and say writers seem to do so, though it can be stated that it seemed to be one of the greatest victories of the war but even in the entire Glandelinian war itself, besides of the christian invasion. Housman Boldon was killed, his Abbotinian forces were routed back to the heights in the most awful panic and disorder, with the loss of one quarter of their number, the woods was again possessed by the foe, and general Vivian Costello who continued to make a desperate and furious stand at other parts of the forests of the woods, was also beaten severely in detail, his whole army of 10,000,000 being cut to pieces, and routed for the distance of twenty miles. Had not it not been for general Christian Plantains stand on the lower sections of the ridges to the whole christian line would have been entirely swept from the high heights, and probably routed or captured, and the southern centre of war would have turned out in favor of the Glandelinian forces, and probably the christian invasion would have been swept back once again, and probably for good.

Total losses on the fourth day of the battle could not be predicted, though thirty christian soldiers were wounded, twenty mortally wounded, and forty five were killed, making a total ninety three in killed and wounded. The fury of the four days portion of the battle was exceedingly destructive, causing greater havoc than any desolation of battles in Glandelinian and Arabian combined, outside of Glandelinia. On the fourth day the Glandelinian had won a sweeping victory on the christian forces who held the bloody woods, carrying all before them, and changing the tide of the battle into a final and total rout. The predicted losses early in the first three days of the battle was over 11,000,000 in the killed and wounded but the total losses of the whole four days battle was not even mentioned though hundreds of generals of all rank were killed and wounded.

The fifth day of the battle was indeed the wildest conflict of the entire invasion. It was about as wide and as long as the battle of Glandelinia, and about as wild and bloody covering twenty five miles in width and nearly a hundred miles in length. It was a struggle on that day twice or three times as fierce as the battle of Phlo Lintonburg or Mc-Hollenstein. Run combined together in one day's fighting, and also estimated losses were never stated. It was not depicted how this day of the great struggle turned out, but though the christian general Housman's flanders suffered in the last stages of the battle a most crushing defeat, through the surrender of several of the main christian divisions which had been surrounded, it was stated however that the main army of the christians held their advantage, and crushed back the assault of the enemy.

The inconceivable violence of the battle can never be described, but the fifth day of the battle had the greatest explosions ever seen in a battle before, and it not forest fires that also burned down three cities afterwards and many towns and villages. Immediately after the fifth day of the Glandelinian struggle it seemed it had been a total defeat that the christian Glandelinian had won a total victory, but as they failed to force the christian line, they could not have won on the fifth day of the battle.

Results of all the many frightful battles up to this in the entire war itself have had hardly equalled its violence except Glandelinia alone, or Phaulseer's Atlanta, and there on both sides a struggle in the whole struggle to one hundred and forty generals single had fallen. The cannonading blunders of the five days of fierce battles had each terrible and overwhelmingly violent explosions as the severe earthquakes felt all along of the northern Glandelinia, and also the Glandelinian shot down many towns and cities both, nearly as great as Glandelinia itself.

The Glandelinian and Abbotinian made use of the most greatest charges and in the time of the whole invasion, and their whole lines were cut to pieces, and rolled upon the greatest confusion of the christian forces and a great many christian soldiers and other christian soldiers were killed, and all themselves in the confusion, it was a most terrible tragedy. One of the most tragic tragedies of the war and this battle was the death of the christian general Jinks Vivian, who was shot down in the christian army. It was a great rejoicing for the Glandelinians when one christian general had been mortally wounded four severely, fifty were mortally wounded, nine hundred wounded, and fifty christian soldiers killed. The fifth day of the battle had instead full christian forces fought in a five weeks in the morning and lasting until twelve o'clock at night, though that portion of the day battle was less violent than the first day's fighting. The terrific storm of shells on General Evans was told about two days for an answer to the note behind which he hid the commander of the Glendalinden army, and then as he received no answer he sent another demand. He waited no answer but the envelope with the note in it was returned unopened. Evans was a furious man over this conduct of the new Glendalinden general, and he told along his generals whether he should attack the enemy's lines or not. They decided to wait for another note demanding the surrender, and if no answer came, or a refusal was the result, to annihilate the Glendalinden army and give no quarter, to those who were willing to surrender. Evans then did so, and this time he received an answer...

"What the devil! Impudent, general! I'll show Evans,"

"I have received your note demanding my surrender. By mistake I have in your notes. I do not know what the word surrender means. All of your Christian governments that they can go to perdition, and I will fight you and your forces as long as I can. I defy you to bring all the heavenly host, and your army against me at one time. I will write to you again as I will make it hotshot for you if you do so again...."

Commander of Glendalinden army.
None of your business who is in it."

Evans was tantalized at this defiance, but Violet and her sisters knew more about the situation of the Glendalinden army, and when he was about to give the order for his forces to attack the enemy Violet said:

"Evans dear, you do not understand. The enemy would not refuse even when their army is half surrounded if there was not a trick in it. You and your army have the enemy half surrounded but really Evans goes in the army and has been surrounded. You have given him an army of uneducated barbarians, and he has decided to kill me before he was killed. I did not have time to be killed. I told my sisters discovered the trick of the enemy early this morning...."

"I don't believe this," said Evans. "I believe you and your sisters are only feeling to avoid the horrors of another tremendous battle, or do not wish to see the unfortunate Glendalinden army annihilated."

"If you don't believe so," said Violet reproachfully, "then make the army half surrounded again and you'll find out. The tents are original and only in these, their manner being made only out of skins, furs, and barrels, and the other things of round shape. All the soldiers within view are dummies." Evans grew it. "You have no army surrounded."

"I believe I would admit a secret to say that you are lying to me," said Evans. "I will make an investigation of this and if it is all true I'll make the truth to general Evans and his army, and your sisters to come and tell me to show the enemy's supposed army."

"There is about four hundred thousand well made dummies," said the officer addressing Evans who had made a dash into the camp. "How many do you think you found your excellency?"

"I can report twice that number, besides wooden guns and cannons made out of stone pipes, large and small, barrels, and many other things, supposed to be stone wheels. This is one of the cleverest tricks any army have played on an army before. To worry the general of the foe could refuse to surrender and with out fear of annihilation. I have surrounded an army of dummies. I wonder what my two friends, generals Hanson and Wilson will think of it when I tell them."

Evans after returning back to the camp reported to him to general Hanson and his brother. They two led forces forward to make an investigation, and when they got to the camp, and looking the little while after. Indeed the three great Christian generals had been surprised at the clever trick of the enemy. It was a serious joke indeed, to find that three clever dummies had deceived them. They themselves should be so badly deceived by a wicked Glendalinden army.

"The devil is clever in human shapes, and makes all kinds of traps, a play on the mind and the life," said general Wilson. "But if the devil can do better or as good as this, then we could almost bow down to him. It is the funniest, and the cleverest way that we three generals have ever seen a trick before. The world did not see it at all the dummies!"

The camp was set on fire by the Glendalinden who were outside. This work of destruction, but all the dummies were taken within the Christian lines, to use as a kind of bait for the enemy, who opportunistically presented, it half-burned the whole Christian army learned how it was broken, by the fact it was serious but they could not do anything, to strike back for the Christian loss it suffered, for the wicked Glendalinden army laughing at the Christian loss and gotten away, and were well and safely on their retreat at this time. Evans started his own army first to pursue it, and then Hanson and Wilson took another course, with the intention of trying to surround the Glendalinden army or fail altogether.

At the retreat of the Glendalinden was so swift that the Abhimanyus could not catch up with them, and soon fatigued with several weeks of forced marching, and all kinds of hardships, the Christian army had to halt. The dummies, and set up for the time being. Then the Christian army under general Evans halted, the enemy also halted, and then a threatening movement, that made general Evans suspicious. The enemy prepared to have a large force of his army upon the Glendalinden soldiers started forward, the Christian demonstration, but when the Abhimanyus started forward, the Glendalinden retreated in haste, and the Abhimanyus hesitating to go on for fear of falling into a trap fall back themselves, under the orders of their commanders, who reported the affair to general Evans.

General Evans decided to go out on a reconnoitering tour and see what he could learn about the enemy's Glendalinden army. He started out with a large party of officers who were all Concentrationists and rode on to a certain place in the middle at which stood a small house. Next next to the small house on the left appeared to be a large and stable mansion, and as the house looked suspicious to him Evans decided to examine it. He crept up close to the building, and looked in one of the windows. He was startled and surprised at what he saw. In the room was a large and round table, the room itself being of great size. The table was covered with maps, books, and papers, and the room was filled with all kinds of pictures hanging on the walls were the same kind of child pictures that the Virgin Girls had in their possession. On the table was a small book. Two pages of which in the book also showed pictures of children. But more strange still around the table was seated at least three scores of the highest Glendalinden generals that Evans had ever faced in his life. But they were not to be killed but he was nevertheless suspicious, and, leaving the window, entered the house, after giving a signal for his staff to surround the house, and then entering the palace like building, he made from room to room as cautiously as a cat with pistol drawn, until he reached the door of the room where the sixty officers of the foe were seated at a round table. As the Glendalinden generals were talking in loud voices Evans stood at the door and listened. They were evidently talking quite loudly as there was no doubt that the Glendalinden generals did not think of being intruded upon. In their apparently safe refuge to far from the Christian lines.

"It must have been a funny occurrence to that door of a Christian general Jack Evans. One of the generals said. "I thought he had my army surrounded, when in fact he had the army of dummies to surround. He must have been and when he found it out."

"And why not let the main leader of our army know the intentions of these three main Christian generals?" said another of the Glendalinden foes. "Evans especially intends to push on by way of the Anderson railroad, and here if our leader knew it he could throw a very strong force and oppose the Christians with success."

"It is best to wait," said another of the intentions of the superior one Hanson Wilson does. "This is the main adversary to face in this war, and if we could crush him, (never mind the others) we would be able to put an end to their invasion for good and all. And I have a plan of their own line of advance, which will show that our movements could stop them if once going good. There are three branches of railroads around this part of the country, and three big streams crossing each intersection. Well there are six other Glendalinden armies advancing besides our own, which if we were then in the could take a possession of these railroads, and also concentrate along the both banks of these streams at the same time, and while the Christians advance. This could form a barrier which no big Christian army could pass, and if we accomplish this the war will be won on our side for all. We can cause this great movement by warning our main chief general before it is too late."

Evans was surprised at this information, and listened carefully to everything they were saying.

"I wonder who in hell owns all these pictures of children," said another of the Glendalinden. "I would care about it. I would care about children

"I never mind those damn old pictures and not down to himman. I'm the main spokesman. There in another thing we could do to get the best of the three christian dogs as well. Their purpose of advance is to cut capital and they have a long march ahead of their own way. I fully get and further out, and we could concentrate our an for them all those bills, and in in advance for the advancing christian could we could make those bills regular volcano furnace for them which they could never never pass, and then their invasion if not stopped or thrown back would be shooting."

"Aw you are talking through your hat. I knowed naddy pleniel Indian officer of the party. "they have not put us on our knees. If the hind we would have yielded up our arm long ago. They have us only between three fists that's all. We can not get our nation out of the danger if we only work the see a some right. We have enough arides to stand against a siege of their capital for many years. No ovysions enough stored away in that city to keep us for many years, and plenty of iron and ammunition. And what more wickedness will this triumph. A count 1000. We have the best command-

"Well you may be right," cried the spokesman, "But then there is something different in the matter. It is true we acknowledge we that we are enemies of God, that we do not love him as much as a son, but we are not fools enough to say that we can love his or his people in the long run."

"But who is the main one we ought to get?" asked a fifth man. "There are three most dangerous of the christian general. They are General Divlan, his brother General Robert An. Angelo Divlan, and another called not Andreus, vanis."

that the three sailors suffered at sea lands in the four blood and first full battles at Harle (Glorious), "I was at the battle of Killour (Glorious)." "It is possible that this happened during the war, but I am not sure." "It is possible that this happened during the war, but I am not sure."

"One of us can give an answer." As the chorus, "The question is how can we capture a dream without a woman. It is like a man on a..."

They were surprised to hear the door suddenly swing open with a slam and hear a loud shout:

the following information was obtained from the above:

The Clevelandian papers have turned up all in consternation, and have made a dash for the nearest railroad, and have shouted:
"It's no use, it's no use!" I have the house perfectly surrounded. If you try to escape you will be killed like the dogs just killed us." I heard all the remarks you made about me and saw you were deceived by knowing my real nature and if you are still unwilling to march you will be killing yourselves up to the without over it, indeed." I repeat again, that you are all beloved prisoners."

to shoot a shot at Evans, but Evans fired simultaneously and sent one flying into one of the picture frames holding a number of child

The generals obeyed without a protest, doing likewise with their swords. You are to hand those swords to me," said Evans sternly. "Do not call that a surrender."

The officers charged "barrage" and "barrage" into line, forward march."

"I am not allowed to do that," said the man.

The "Jungle" came started entirely between the two files of christian general none of them at first seeing a single word at all. They were dumfounded and disheartened to think that some of them should have been surprised and captured by a single man. They were soon within plain sight of the christian lines, and Davis ordered them to go on further.

Flavelle said he was not crushed or beaten as "King Cannon had thought I had" who was victorious and only retreating on purpose to lure the christian allies into a well laid trap. An christian murderers in the south had been caught, accomplished in a few weeks while Cannon had been advancing, and twenty six other christian avian had been forced to surrender to the army.

When the British and the Russian armies had been forced to surrender at the end of 1918, "I was very close to the war. I saw no chance of a truce, fear that the whole war would not continue sooner or later and so he sent to his desire to the Yugoslavian government for resignation stating that he saw no chance of winning the war that Claudelina was only during the whole war, in order to have, and that over thirty thousand armies had already surrendered to the enemy to avoid another war."

On General Hanson's receipt of Evans' letter of resignation, and went to see him in particular.

"I do not think it is wise to make such a move," said Lannon. "You are accomplishing it if only given time. The committee is resigning in the face of the majority, and what will I think and say when they are on their knees of it." "I think that I will let it all blow to it," answered Yana. "I have already resigned, and am only waiting for an answer from the government. The war is lost, and I for one will not bother to surrender to the enemy. Not on your life."

"But," I asked, "If the four 'Showered Nation,' I did not know an Englishman, and I could not know the Chinese, I was surprised and as a result I did not really understand the man. He made the mistake, and I did. I was sorry he did too, for now we cannot depend on his actions. He is going to be a man, I think, and we are in jeopardy. I am not going to take the possibility of the Chinese line that will have to be the one that will be a loss for me. Following on their advantage, I hope to remove the conflict but will have to. Otherwise they will reach a point of no return that we are not going to follow. If we do not do this, then they will be in a position too strong for them, and will not take any further. I am worried of course that they will prevent a disaster of the will have an if we do not do this first..."

"It is just the same to me," answered General Hanson. "But if you do start off you will see how quickly I'll send a party after you to bring you back. Do you little girls want to make perfect fools of yourselves?"

"Well all right then, we won't go then," said Jennie. "But you are the foolish one uncle, and some day you will find it out that what I say is true. There is a war going on along the entire north line somewhere, and for your sake so you could succeed in your advance we wished to find out. When you refuse our request, you do so at your peril. We are not really anxious to go on the mission, in fact don't care to and if we had been ordered to go beforehand we would have really refused. If you send any other man I know he will never succeed because we are the only ones who know the way to that particular part."

Hanson was surprised at this answer and said:
 "Where is the weak part of the enemy's lines?"
 "We are wishing to know ourselves ourselves, and you won't let us," answered Violet.

"But you are going to greater peril than you think if I let you go on that mission," observed Hanson. "You know indeed the penalty that all spies meet if caught by the Glandelinian soldiers..."

"We defy them just the same," said Jennie. "We are bound to escape detection on. And we can do so too!"

"All right as long as you little girls are so determined I believe I'll have to let you go and do it," answered Hanson. "And also I'll have to storm heaven with prayers for your safety as the danger you are facing is very great. The Glandelinians would shoot you down like dogs."

"We'll watch out for ourselves," answered Hattie. "We have never been slain yet and we don't intend to do so now. And when we discover the weak portion of the enemy's lines we'll bring the information to you right away."

"All right," answered General Hanson. "And may God Bless you on your mission and keep you little girls safe..."

"....."DRAT THOSE DAMN SPY!" growled a Glandelinian officer coming up to a group of soldiers. "Did you men not see them?"

"None saw this way your honor," answered a soldier saluting, while the rest came at attention. "How many men were there?"

"Men you guess they were little girls. And the strangest thing about those little girls is that they are not like other children though they look it. They shot down one of my officers, and escaped from a squad of my troopers who chased them though they were on foot. I saw them come this way and thought you boys had observed them."

"They never saw this way your honor," said the soldier. "But it is strange that children, Christian children, who know what we do to them if we have them once in our possession, should take the nerve to spy on us."

"Well they did and there were eight of them too," said the lieutenant. "Though they are those cursed Angel-born children, they were the prettiest girl children you ever laid eyes upon. They were even too pretty to gaze upon and a day though they were I would not wish to see them again, but they have seized our general's plans, plans and have easily gotten away."

"I'll detail my men to go and search the neighboring woods," said another officer coming up. "They surely could not have gotten far away as yet. But how came it that children dared such a thing. I never heard of this fact before. Are you sure Lieutenant Conlon that they were little girls?"

"More than sure," thundered the officer. "I'm not blind. I walked from my company's street when they left the building. I ordered them in the name of God to halt but they did not answer, and when I and several of my under officers pursued, they did what surprised me more and that was to suddenly open fire, and bring three of my officers to the ground and shoot down my horse. This horse I'm riding is another. I saw them go this way and thought the men had observed them."

"Well, well they have ambushed you then," said the second officer. "They if they are children were indeed strange ones. Some boys will call that distant woods for them. They must not be far yet."

So at once led his cavalry squadron for the woods, and entered it just in time to see flashing glimpses of little children scurrying away in the distance.

"Where they go now," he shouted. "After they boys. When they come down too if you can't catch up with them. They have our general's plans and just be can hit."

Some of the soldiers had observed the first fugitives, and so none of them knew which way to go.

"Its funny you did not see them," growled the officer. "They have just escaped that little band of in the distance. We sent down upon them before they got away. Forward!"

The squadron of cavalry at once dashed forward, and soon were tearing toward the bridge at a thunderous gallop. They reached the structure in no time and the foremost portion at once started across. There was a crash of rending timbers, and within another moment all of the horsemen who had landed on the bridge were in the deep water of the creek, amid curses and loud cries. Knowing that they would be pursued Violet and her sisters had wrecked the bridge.

It was some time before those in the water could reach the opposite land having been literally forced their way across quicksands, though some of them had to leave their horses behind who could not get out of the bog.

For the remainder of the Glandelinian column it seemed impossible to get across in time to catch up with the fugitives. But as the fugitives were still within the territory of the enemy's possessions the officer decided to allow the others beyond and not have them catch the little girls.

There was a small house near by with a telephone booth and to this the officer hurried. He went in turned the call handle smartly took the receiver out of the box and began:

"There is no need to describe the performance which ensued. All telephone users are familiar with it. All the Cohen codes have nothing on this. It consisted entirely of the word hello for well five hundred times if possible, repeated crescendo and furioso until exhaustion overcame him."

"Probably the telephone is out of order sir," said his Second Lieutenant. "I never had a range top telephone that wasn't when fugitives are getting away with important plans." Replied the infuriated captain inspection the telephone. Still he might give this one a well sporting chance as how it may have only been tampered with. "Probably by those spies."

Again he took the receiver from the hook with wonderful assurance and bellowed:

"Hello there for the name of Neptune. I want to speak to Captain Heller."

"Honk! yank, yank! Honk! boak!" answered a ghostly voice.

"Captain Heller, hurry up for the name of Glandelina and her flag, and the King."

Presently the bell rang, in response in stead of getting a voice, and the Glandelinian captain got down to steady business.

"That you Captain Heller be inquired cheerfully. Look here. There are child spies who have escaped our lines, and I want you to look out for them. What is that you say?"

"Yes sir," replied the telephone-----or something to that effect. "Gzostochom, Krazzshovio, PLOK."

"Oh curse the thing," growled the captain, hastily removing the receiver which was emitting sounds suggestive of the buckling of bullet into the fire and laid it on its rest.

This delay gave Violet and her sisters a chance in the long run and they had by this time gained a considerable distance from their pursuers, and were well within sight of the Christian lines.

Violet and her sisters had succeeded in escaping the foe easily than they had expected themselves, and reaching their own lines within another hour, they were let in by the guards, and learning that it was a portion of Hanson's army they had entered they immediately set out for his headquarters. Of course little girls they were were indeed. Many times they had been in strange places or strange parts of the Christian armies, and have never been lost yet. They were in a strange part of general Hanson's lines now but they had no difficulty whatever in reaching points that were familiar to them, and then on they went for general Hanson's head quarters. In reaching the camp of general Hanson's fifteen who should they meet but general Walter Starring, and the boys friends.

It had been a long time since the little girls had seen their friends and they were hailed with joy.

"We did not expect to meet you here," said General Starring. "We went to general Hanson's headquarters to see you and heard that you had went out on a spying tour. Though he did not like to let you little girls have you come yet or are you just starting out?"

"We have come back," answered Violet. "We not only found out what we wanted to know but have gained important plans, and a letter belonging to the chief Glandelinian general too..."

"Well my nephews you little girls are slaves," said general Starring himself. "But what was the main reason you went out to stay in the camp of glory?" "We heard of a mentioned the name like it was considerably wounded by a blunder of one of the glandelinian generals, a mention his sword never be wounded," answered Catherine herself. "We wished to find out the location where this would be, and when we entered the enemy's lines, we thought of also seizing their plans. We did so and got away though we were surprised by a party of officers three or four of which we shot down. They only shined us as far as the little bridge, which we managed to wreck, by setting off an explosive under it before the foe came in sight. We knew also that when they failed to cross the bridge they would telephone to the nearest glandelinian station across the stream, for help, and so we tampered with the telephone also. By doing this we got away without much pursuit. We wish to see general Hanson vividly right away."

"You had better ride our horses, and we'll walk," said Frederick Lowden.

"We do not want to see you walk all the way when we are on horseback."

"Oh it's alright," said Jennie. "We would sooner walk. It would do us no good."

The boys insisted but the little girls also insisted on walking, for with the boys dismounted, and placed the little girls on their horses in short order.

"You'll ride and that's all there is to it," said general Starling. "We will do the walking."

General Starring waved over the good manners of the boys, and then dismounted himself offering his horse to the good boys, but they declined to take it and allowed two of the little girls to ride instead.

"You boys are certainly good gentlemen," said Violet laughing. "Remember the kids one of you gave me at Cadornia, and know now that it was a sincere one."

Darkey blushed at this but he said nothing, while his comrades around him winked at him and smiled. They had proceeded a certain distance, when up came a cavally force all Abyssinians.

"Say little girls," cried the Abyssinians leader. "Did you hear the news?"

"What news?" asked Angeline.

"Your brother Gernanivian is dead. Evans told it to the camp this morning. He was killed at Foster De Poster."

At first the little girls were shocked at this news, and almost burst into tears, but then they believed there was no use in feeling so over the death of a wicked man who if he was their brother, when there was a sure certainty he did wickedly and so they said:

"It is bad news for us, but it is sadder for him than us. If he died still in his wickedness, then it will help us more to cry over it."

The Abyssinians officer was surprised at the news himself and now at the calm conduct of the little girls, he was still surprised.

"But you are misapprehending it," said the Abyssinians. "It was false rumors. A general who had his features was killed during the battle of Foster De Poster and they thought it was him. But it was not. He was really mortally wounded, though and brought to our lines before he died. He really died."

A better man for he was repentant, and begged Evans to forgive him, and ask you little girls to forgive him too. He allowed himself to be sanctified by a priest, and received the Last Sacraments. So you would have reason to feel the loss."

We do," said the poor little girls. "But we feel better, and do not hardly need to weep when we are sure he is not lost forever, forever."

Violet and her sisters had reached general Hanson's headquarters, and for getting for the moment their mission told him of their misfortune of losing their brother Gernanivian who had reported of his death just before he died.

"The death bed is sometimes the only thing that will change a man's character," said Hanson. "It's sorry to hear that he died and will forgive him even as wicked as he was. I know I did before this, and so did general Evans. To have all forgive him, and here that some of the others were fairly foolish. Johnathan Jackson 'Hank' will also turn over a new leaf. I believe a downfall will be the only way to accomplish this. But how about the mission you wish to go on. You are still here a prisoner. Did not go after all. I hope you got saved and took my advice by staying asleep and safely within the Christian Union."

"I find out he did not get saved," said Violet dryly. "How he even for she had been saying. He has done just what we expected we would and ore. He also seized that which was also an important letter."

"Well first of all where is their mentioned notion of the line?" asked general Hanson.

"In the center of the main glandelinian right wing."

Said Violet. "It took us two days to do the work."

"You were gone so long that I believed surely you had went back to Evans and did not go on the mission," said Hanson. "I would have felt better too if you had not done so. But as long as you have returned safely I'm at ease. And I know you have went but where are your two friends Jennie, Arthur and Angeline Riches. Did they not go with you too?"

"We did not want them too as we wished them to stay with general Vivian our papa and cheer him while he lies wounded in bed," said Jennie.

"We informed Evans first before we left, and he tried to persuade us not to do so but we told him you permitted us, and so he also let us go. There is a bad break in the enemy's right wing, which cannot be repaired, and the enemy are doing all in their power to throw up earlier upon a series of false works so we will not discover the break. And the line has been terribly weakened because they are compelled to draw from it so many forces to watch every movement you make toward their center. If papa could only get well enough he could assault that wing with all his army, and you could occupying the attention of the center to keep them from reinforcing it. Of course unless it would make a terrible battle, but then if the foe are worsted now there is no hope for them to shield their capital from a siege no longer. Hankley is also stationed at Ottomunda Hamma, waiting for developments along the front of this glandelinian army. This we heard from the officers we spied upon. If they cannot hold out against you then he will have to retreat toward the city with his small fragments of what he has left of his army."

"You have discovered things of great importance," said general Hanson. "We have looked over the packages handed to him by Jennie. Consider what this letter contains."

He opened it and this is what he read:

The heavy battle fog of morning
Still hid the shelled and torn plains from sight;
When with wild and storming yells, came a wave of scarlet;
Marked faintly in the white;
We fired hundreds of scores of cannon;
And as their horrible cannonading thunders rolled
The smoke mist before the strong breeze lifted;
In many a heavy fold;
The mist before us covered all and again lifted;
And amid yells of derision, and in their bravery fine Came rushing to their ruin, the fearless Abbaanuan Christian line."

"It's a poem that the enemy must have printed," said Hanson. "They certainly did not give us much insight into here, but told what we are." He showed it to the little girls and then proceeded in looking over the map. It showed all the positions of the enemy.

"He said Hanson. "The little girls did the best work yet in capturing; that this plan." It shows just where the positions are, and how the enemy are fixed. Three of their wings are stretched across the intersection of the three little Rivers, and the remainder along the three stretches of rail road. If none of the two best fighting generals were wounded we could now have the chance of striking a blow that would stagger the enemy. We probably can do it yet but we'll have to wait until at least general Vivian recovers from his wounds. As for general Evans I cannot say. I guess we would need not wait for his recovery for he is going to resign anyway. But for God's sake I wish he would not."

"If you strike sooner and win a more decisive victory I do not think he will resign then," said Violet.

"It'll strike if the opportunity presents itself," said General Hanson. But as to this letter, I wish to see if it is yours or Violet's."

General Hanson opened the envelope and in his hand the man glanced over the contents.

"It's a letter to General Johnston Jackson Hanley," said Hanson. "And you little girls did well to have captured this, and now I thought that I allowed you to go after this."

"What does it say?" asked the little girls in a chorus. General Hanson read it to them carefully.

"Your Excellency General Johnston Jackson Hanley"

"I have checked the Christian dogs in two desperate battles already. Your plan in our riding over my means has succeeded unreluctantly, and also splendidly. Our forces made some assaults during the conflicts also, but were repulsed. But we have great confidence that we have checked the advance of the Christian armies, under the three main Abbeonimian generals for final, and that now you will gain time to reform your small army, and also receive reinforcements. If you could come and take personal command your presence would do a lot better. We have a big gap within our central portion of the line which if the Christians assault will result badly for the the, as it is only a trap to catch their divisions in. The sooner you come to us with your small army the better we'll like it for without you we do not expect to hold our entrenched positions any too long for Hanson has no doubt sent messages to the coast communicating armies, which will arrive and increase his forces so friendly that sooner or later we will have to give up. Evans and Vivian the two main commanders are wounded. Their dismemberment cripples the Abbeonimian armies slightly, and this increases our hope that no direct assaults will be made upon our lines."

Yours truly,

General Ottoburn
Hanson...

Hanson was indeed suspicious of this document, and after reading it, on it, said to Violet:

"It'll have to prevent Hanley from moving to reinforce this army of Gladiolus, and from taking personal command. If he comes we'll be worried sure."

On General Vivian was wounded, Evans was wounded, and so many other main Christian generals were still disabled, and at first General Hanson, did not know what to do. He knew from the many reports where the enemy's main general had withdrawn his small well equipped forces, and so he decided to make a barrier for Hanley, and so repay for his own severe situation. Two new Christian armies had arrived, under generals James and Andrew Bolen the few nights before, and these he immediately sent toward the extreme southern rear of the enemy to accomplish the work of making a new barrier. It would of course take many days to accomplish this advance, but never theless they would have to advance northward first, to escape being caught by the enemy barrier, but soon nevertheless after two weeks marching, Hanson received the message that while on their march ten other armies had joined the, and that they were forming the barrier to prevent the advance of General Johnston Jackson Hanley. Then satisfied with this Hanson resolved to make another try on the enemy in front of the, and force a portion of the barrier. General Vivian had recovered sufficiently enough to resume command, and Evans was no longer in command.

General Evans however did not believe it wise to assault so strongly an entrenched force of the enemy, and declared that they ought to wait for the arrival of more troops, until their army became as overwhelming. It was strong that the enemy could not resist their attack, but General Hanson was afraid of the consequent consequences of delay, and did not like to wait. Evans did not like to think of the delay either, but then he felt sure it was dangerous not to make the assault just now, for he felt sure it would and the same as before during the other two battles. The Gladiolus army was equal to them but some stronger positions, one artillery, and better fighters than the Christians had.

General Hanson decided to hold a council and see what should be done on the whole matter. So the next evening all of the generals were assembled together in General Hanson's headquarters, and the debate went on all night. The council was an exciting one, a trial of a desperate combat, and was the hottest conversation of general officers that ever occurred, but still none agreed with Hanson. They all believed it too dangerous to make an attack on the foe without receiving reinforcements, and the position of the line which was predicted to be weak, and so Hanson was a down despondent of ever forging ahead again.

His armies led on by Evans before had gained ahead of all of the other Christian armies operating against the foe in the west, east, and north, had been nearer to the capital than they, but now they had been checked by the foe for about three long weeks, and the other Christian armies, were also being checked, though all along the whole there thoughts of war no severe action had occurred.

Hanson knowing himself to be the supreme commander decided to make a try at first. Evans had not received no answer from the Abbeonimian government but the next day it came by telegram:

"Your Excellency General Jack Ambrose Evans;

"We have received your resignation dated on the month, and will say that without you who can force the war to a finish. We cannot accept the resignation, as you will have to appeal to General Hanson our own master, and we know already that he has advised against your resignation. We have here refused resignations of officers, as the situation of the war is too hard pressing. But after receiving your high rank, as you did for all your brave action and wish to resign now."

Be patient, and pray more for your victories. We are sending more armies and supplies to your aid in Gladiolus and the rest, and sooner or later we will be besieging the enemy's capital. Don't back out now, because things look so black. They looked still blacker when the foe was invading Gladiolus, and then Gladiolus seemed about to be wiped out. But you have already crushed the enemy's invasion, beginning at Marie's Cove when four times you crushed the great foe armies, and you can do so again. We beg you for the sake of the nation's good, for the sake of God who died for the Christian world, for helpless children, who slaved and died under the Gladiolus tyranny to retain your command, and we are sure that later on you will be glad that you remained. But nevertheless though we plead you to remain, you must anyway because Hanson is your supreme commander, and we know already that he has refused your resignation. If he said yes, why then we could say nothing, and would have to let you go."

Yours truly,

Secretary.

Secretary Evans had before receiving the answer forgotten that he had resigned and had been glad too that the resignation had been refused, because Hanson had decreed that never would the Vivian girls be allowed to leave the army to go back until the war is over. Danger was greater for them that way, than with the army as too many secret services they would literally trail them down and slay them in cold blood. He had several days before notified Hanson that if his resignation would be accepted he would bear it up as he now had no intentions of resigning. He had vowed to crush the enemy no matter what costs, and so he had decided that to resign just because of being outwitted by the foe would be the biggest mistake he made.

Evans on the next day after receiving the message from the government, was setting with a party of soldiers, and saw the enemy in movements that even scared him and fearing something out of the way entirely, ordered a rapid investigation, and finally several of his scouts came back with the report that the enemy was moving large bodies around his rear with the intention of beating him in. He had not expected this movement, and so sent signals all around, and rode toward the rear of his lines as quickly as possible. Seeing that all reports was true, he sent all of his cavalry force to repel the enemy, and then as the cavalry was charged: these would be flankers, and every movement of the enemy watched. Of course as the morning passed it was evident that the enemy intended no general assault, but just the same it was a movement that one could do to another who hated him, though starting no fight, and it startled him.

only to find the soldiers harassed by the second half of evening army which had just been advancing. The whole Glandolfin army this time had really been surrounded, and the retreating soldiers were once more driven back and forth, and every man closed and fought in the utmost confusion.

The slaughter went on in a series of minutes; fighting until night fall, and then realizing that his army was threatened with annihilation general Otto von Hunsdoh approached general Evans with a white flag.

Within half an hour the firing, the pod, and the whole Glandolfin army of what survived of it, had crowded their arms, and were formed in lines preparatory to the swift surrender. Evans was asked and Evans with his surrounding army approached the down cast general Otto von Hunsdoh.

As the Glandolfin general offered his sword to Evans he said not a word, neither did he lift his hand or his arm, and Evans receiving the sword, spoke nothing.

"It is the fortune of war, and better for the men too that the war have come. For have surrendered and so for the war is over. Your children in towns will air and for with you are charged with being no prisoners. You shall have your freedom, but the army shall be marched into Angeldale to be interned until all fighting is over."

Again after three weeks check by a vastly superior Glandolfin army, and after being so discovered as to realize Evans had at last still retaining command captured another big Glandolfin army, and one of their best known and old time generals. It was the most surprising event in the war. Five great surrenders to Evans alone during the whole course of the invasion. Hanson who did not as yet know the outcome of the battle though all firing had ceased, wondered what was up it was not until the next day when his forces had returned, when he finally saw again into cooperation with the forces under Evans and general Vylton when he learned that Evans had again captured a Glandolfin army.

Hanson and general Vylton, and Evans flanked and surrounded and waited the foe in such confusion, that the foe had no fact that Hanson and general Vylton's army could not overtake them. It was like a regular race. But Evans with the remainder of his army had come up with the remainder of the army at the most critical time, and surrounded all of the Glandolfin after five more hours of desperate fighting, with the foe.

Hanson was indeed surprised at the results of the battle and found out that the number of prisoners taken was over 24,500,000. The number of fallen was believed to be in the whole three battalions was 20,000,000 and to the total strength of the Glandolfin army had been 54,500,000. It took three days to reform the army well enough to continue the advance, but soon the advance was on again, and now all hopes for a successful stand for Hunsdoh was really lost.

It cannot be described how the troops felt over the entire crushing victory they had gained, and neither could the joy of Violet and her sisters be described. Slowly but surely the Glandolfin were being suppressed, and sooner or later it would be all over, and Glandolfin brought at last to her knees.

In many other wars dogs had been used to rescue the dead, but in this one no dogs had been used. The Angeldalians had intended to put all the dogs to use during the early part of the war, but when it was seen how strong and successful the battalions had become it was decided not to, for if so many generals even fell in the war it was probable that no dog could survive and so would meet annihilation. And it seemed too cruel to send these loving friends of man into such fields of hell and damnation.

Violet and her sisters however would have given anything to have had a dog friend with them, but then it could not be done. Some then gloriously on our serpents had done a great deal to help the Christian troops, and it was reported that once a great Blomgitz woman serpent saved a lot of wounded during the battle of Francisanna, when the men were sitting in of such a fire of shot and shell as if they were trying to destroy the world. It is said that there were about ten thousand small Blomgitz woman serpents employed at the battle front of Hildred Greenburg, before the time of the war most Glandolfin and devastating condition. They were named from Blomgitz, to all other snakes, and from power to the borderlands. Many of these had been placed on mechanical contrivances like the soldiers the soldiers.

In the trenches during the battle of Hildred Greenburg, and other great campaigns they showed all the power and knowledge of the soldiers that nature, and they were known to the men as the men's friends. They at once carried formidable weapons to fighting and aided the wounded in the hospitals beyond rescue on these scorching battlefields of annihilation, and when they found a soldier who was unconscious they brought him back to the lines safely.

A lot of them of an better shells, there were available stores of all they could spare, and except for the shot like a machine with only one thought out head was to make the wounded and in the battle field in Angeldalians began a gasless charge after the shot and the object of their search was a hand. The story and courage and bravery among individual small Blomgitz woman on the battle field was too many to state, would take many chapters to tell, but are inspiring. One called Jennie drag of a wounded man who had been left dead in 'Ho Hans land, fringing Hildred Greenburg and she and John brought him to earth with flying by the shock of the road explosion. By quick treatment by the soldiers, and physicians the little creature was saved.

There is a small Glandolfin that followed their mate, her mate through a rain of shot and shell at the first part of the battle of Jennie's position was wounded by a shell twice, but continued to "go over the top" and saved many a soldier, until brought to Angeldalians by the Angeldalians' Glandolfin Det. Catholic platoon.

There is a Blomgitz woman serpent which the little girls had in their homes before the war was full grown now, and on, only once during the war had they seen it. They were glad to "know home" however that no poor unfortunate dog had been put into his big ball stone, and so it glad too when they heard that all the small serpents that had been used in the other armies, had only received slight wounds and none had been killed. There and the firing had been in the various battles.

But none had been used in their war, as none could be obtained. Evans had led lately also to circumstances with the other armies which had stopped in their advance but he could not go on, and so felt that he was still the only one who was advancing with his army army. Nevertheless he did not lose an advantage and was that decided to put the war into his hands and use it there.

The Christian armies had advanced pretty far into the enemy's country in this time, and all the northern armies were also closing in, and it was soon evident that the foe was to be defeated by the biggest army that ever formed. As soon as the Christian armies were in full progress in their advance, Violet and her sisters noted that the three main generals were still together with them, and conversed with them on many a topic of the recent occurrences of the war. There was room to be other armies opposed to Evans, and that those that had been under general had been so badly defeated by descriptions that no one could tell how they were now and how all the war was.

Finally the other armies were also advancing again, but with Evans and their descriptions had been cut off, but later he got word from a reporter which ran as follows:

"All the Christian armies are advancing successfully. The foe are falling back, and offering no resistance whatever. Some probable that in another month the war will have ended as a Christian victory."
REPORTER!

"The news gave Evans great satisfaction to press on now without stopping, and so they were still in the advance of the Christian armies."

In the meantime on general Hunsdoh saw that all hopes for victory, and suppressing the Christian troops and general had done his level best, but had been unable to gain success in battle during both parts of the invasion, whether Hunsdoh was not, and now Evans for Glandolfin armies were attacking and were not. The Angeldalians advanced. Discovered over the end of the war, Hunsdoh had been completely and finally by the action of Glandolfin during every proceeding, both, and now Hunsdoh had only a small army with a few shells and no more shells to spare.

He did not know what to do. His office was now the pretentious condition of the Glandolfin, and Evans the other armies defeat the other part of the Glandolfin army, but general Hunsdoh had not like to do. He followed that the presence would up Hunsdoh the armies to and with greater obstinacy and so he refused to do so, and started a riot against the plantation capital. Now there, other plantations are told now, that were protesting before the christian mission had not later, but have nevertheless no mind pronounced was that they were never answered in reaching the capital, and for himself. Signs of reaching reinforcement, to into a hint stand visible of the capital was lost. At the beginning of the month of the christian mission general Johnston Jackson himself had over 345,000,000 men, and now in a season, and destruction, and destruction, to had in fact only 11,237,543 men, and out of those were threatening of coming, declaring that their time was up, and that they wished to go and defend their own homes from the christian mission.

Manoel fell wounded and declared that he himself had brought the attack on the Mingolista by not following his own advice during the battle of Glorinda. Manoel saw nothing to do but to take his retreat as soon as possible. He learned that all the Christian armies were advancing everywhere with irresistible force, and so after this learning, that he was under Ottoman pursuit after holding the Christian position, under Pannoni, Zivini, and Eviani had surrendered after a most terrific battle, started to retreat.

The retreat was taken in a disorganized way, and the soldiers were soon fleeing toward the direction of the glanduliferous mountain side. Many great swarms of the glanduliferous bees swarmed during the retreat, far as it progressed up to now but never like this one. It was toward the west of the Combe Confederation called the Wandenberg meadow, and millions of the glanduliferous bees advanced back toward the north to end the confusion.
 Glanduliferous bees were everywhere behind, the rest of the brotherhood, and still can be seen there in the glanduliferous mountain side.

The whole plantainian race reacted over the new impending situation, and a whole blow in every town and city to save the citizens for a last desperate effort to recall the christianian ruler. Yuma felt great over the news of the retreat of the "loud Indian army under general johnson jackson" army. It was a better retreat and a more complete one than that "apologetic act of jackson, or out of germany, worse than any rout his armies had ever received, and more complete.

It was now evident that the Christiana side was winning for good and all, but nevertheless Evans did not want to be overconfident. "Any armies in the south were still forming, and all the southern portion of the nation was rising in its last breath, and there was no telling whether the noise when once begun would be raised by either the Christians, or the enemy. Soon after forced marching for a good number of days, the great and beautiful region of Landelinia hovered in sight. The fortifications of the cities defense was also in view and Evans and the other two great generals led their armies, and started to prepare the siege. The cannons were brought up and also in order, and the armies started to form extensive works and positions, in the shortest time possible, around the first quarter of the advanced positions protecting the great Landelinian city. It took two weeks for the nearest necessary preparations, and then other Christian armies came up, and began forming at other portions. A desperate assault was made by the enemy upon a portion of Evans' lines, but it resulted with a severe repulse, and the enemy withdrew silently. An Evans was extending his own lines, he rushed forward the batteries, and started shelling the advanced positions of the enemy.

The recall of one battery made some blunder however, and for a time Evans was quite out of favor but nevertheless he knew just what to do, and soon he had the other batteries up, and a great outnumbering was on in general. By after day other great armies were arriving, and joined in with the other christian armies, and soon the whole city was under a siege. General Johnston when Taney had started his work of obstructing the Channel Inter-conditions an soon as he reached the capital, and now nearly the weakness of the armies defending the city and the great number of formidable fortifications, greater than those of Vicksburg he felt sure that the siege would soon fail to the christians.

Lyons still did not have enough men to press in any closer, and so he waited anxiously for the arrival of more units. While Lyons was bringing

Up upon arising to tie tighten the a police trailer decided to make an attempt to release the victim before the only circulation window opened to the aid of the three circulation materials and so he made a desperate and not bloody assault upon these lines alone. It was one of the first bloodiest battles of the beginning of the scene, the circulation corner under these was continued to fragments after five hours fiercest and some dangerous fighting and seemed to breathe in the balance, but unless assault was finally defense defeated after terrible slaughter and so injured in strength that the assaulting column was broken. Amongst a line had also been assaulted by the foe and the first part of the battle had been a awful disaster, to the christian army, for the sixth army corps embracing probably one fourth of general vladimir bontchir's forces that early morning, was defeated and routed in the terrific engagement, the commander officer killed, and the demoralized christian forces driven through general "o-widrieth's lines, where fortunately they were rescued and rallied by kindermann and Mc-Vollenter. The enemy then resumed the assault with a fury that was indescribable.

but the christian forces counter charged, rolling up the enemy's infantry lines and destroying one fourth their number. 1000 m.f. 20

Two unusual battles had already been fought at the beginning of the siege, and were Christian successes.

Evening was closing in many of the nearest nearest notions of the enemy working, and soon the entire city as far as possible was enclosed by the he stagers, and then shells began to come from all of the quickly erected christ ian positions, the inhabitants of the city having been given a week's not notice to leave if they valued their stuff, but they had foolishly remained and so were in danger of paying the consequences.

What "Violot and her sisters saw during the solemn, terrible battle around the Capitol" under attempts to commit suicide but is stopped by his officers. The fall.....

General "Arsh" Schleider's role, and what came of it.

In the meantime the Abbieannian -concentratedly cavalry, and other horsemen were progressing forward, a portion of "Hil/Immar/er Zimmermanns" advancing as day being bent on to make a terrible raid on the Glandelian property. The Christian cavalry forces were advancing at a trot from the woodlands, a file of the men looking with keen eyes right and left, striking every step of the way all crack, boyish, bronzed, none of them slain outright or heavily wounded. Fifty yards behind them marched a number of other cavalry divisions the same distance apart. The whole column of advanced cavalry soldiers consisted of about twenty million cavalry stretched in a line of approaching destruction for fifty three miles, in companies, squads, columns and brigades.

It was General "Arsh" Schleider's men, and in the rear stumbled a large number of "Parrot" men called Bull pups.

During the next woodlands ran a series of crossroads. Down one way followed a part of the cavalry forces with rushing on here and there and down the others lumbering lumber the other separated forces. While cries ring from each vantage back to the guard. Two horsemen moved from the advance and took the place of the last two of the vanguard while the army in front takes the places of the last two, while the others in front takes and keeps the original formation until the column passed these crossroads. Far in front and on both flanks are scouting parties miles away. This was the way the Abbieannian cavalry marched, in advance of the main Zimmermannian army moving to join them who was further south to the Glandelian capital.

"Glandelians ahead. Not many it seemed to be sure, no more numerous than two or three to one, so back fell the vanguard and forward charged the advance guard of cavalry like a thunderbolt not troubling the column behind. Wild yells, a clatter of hoofs of thousands of hoofs, the crack of many pistol shots, a wild flight, a mad merry chase, a few riderless horses scattered in front the fleeing foe and the incident is over. Ten miles more and many thousands of hostile bayonets gleamed ahead, and so back dropped the Christian advance guard, this time as a reserve, while up came galloped the main column in single file and dismount, while the flank parties help develop an skirmishers covered the whole front one in front of each set of fours and the corporals holding the horses in the rear.

The thousand bull pups barked and roared tearing the gray line and the Abbieannian yell rang as the line, the files two yards apart a long flexible line curving forward at each extremity, slipped forward at a half run. This time the Glandelians charged, and they came forward as wild as they knew how. From every point of that curving line, poured a merciless fire, but only the foremost blue line recoiled the remainder caving on hatless pulling on their reins with might and main in an effort to get their horses to go faster and though the enemy fire picks them down by the score they dash on along the Abbieannian line, while a volume of shots incessantly from the right flank and rear, and that line in thrown about like a coiling rope. The foe were winning the conflict. The main body of the fierce "Glandelians" were to the left and were pouring in a destructive fire that no one could withstand.

"Left face," was the order amid the tremendous uproar. "Double quick." And by magic the line concentrates in a solid phalanx and sweeps forward.

A fire seemingly from every direction tore up the charging Abbieannian over cavalry column but fighting out their way the troopers by charging demoralizing back and forth managed to throw themselves against the foe from every possible side. This is how General Schleider fought the worse of the Glandelian armies. Thus by mere marching and fighting he went his victorious way into the land of the wicked enemy despite opposition at every step without cables, with little artillery, without even the many bull pups sometimes, fighting enemy infantry overwhelming in numbers Glandelian cavalry, artillery with only muzzle loading rifles, pistols and shotguns, scattering hundreds of thousands of Gargolian Home Guards like wild panic stricken turkeys, destroying railroads and bridges, taking towns and villages, and laying them in waste, and destroying all the government stores of Glandelian, and encompassed usually with forces treble his own. This is what General Schleider did on his raid, while advancing far in advance of Zimmermann's army, what he had done since Zimmermann started to advance, and what he was starting out to do again.

The many forces of Abbieannian and Angelinian, and Abyssinkilian and Angelinian cavalry were always known from their ferocity in attacking, as the "Binged" lands, and Devils, "As to the destroying angels of God," "The Yellow Jacks," "The Dead Shots," "The Human Earthquakes," "The Chickadee Pests," and the "Hell Roarers."

In another weeks time it was reported to General Evans besieging the city, that General Zimmermann's army had been broken in the Glandelian mountains. He had been so compelled to withdraw it from General Russell Edwards forces with its back always to the foe. Russell had also pushed the Abbieannian lines which extended for three hundred miles north and east toward the north west section of Omondson without any fighting. Zimmermann was retreating so the surprise of all without offering the enemy a fight. But the Zimmermann cavalry had done a good work nevertheless.

Thus got this report from General Norman himself

"We left the main army under Zimmermann it with only twenty million men and got back in twenty four days with twelve times more than we set out. Traveled over one thousand miles, captured over seventeen cities, many towns and villages, destroying all government supplies and arms in them, scattering fifteen hundred divisions of Home Guards, and never lost a man in the engagements we had. Now is that your excellency for good work. We kept twenty hundred million Glandelians busy guarding government posts or chasing us, and we went back often."

In the meantime while Zimmermann was besieging the Glandelian lands at "reflex" by opening the "Prinzie" and General Lee rode on was fighting a terrific battle at "Furggetty", General Chad with Wolford chased the Abbieannian cavalry when he gathered his clan for his last daring adventure to cross the "Prinzie", and strike the enemy on its own heartstones, and thus give the Glandelians a little taste of what the Abbieannians had long known from border to border in many a terrible war. Pursued by large armies of wild Glandelian Glandelians General Schleider got across the mighty river waving a farewell farewell to his pursuing enemies on the other bank and struck out with his forces. Within three days nearly a hundred million Glandelians were after him and his twenty five million Abbieannian daredevils, cutting down hundreds of trees behind him in case he should return, flanking him, setting in his front, but on he went uncaught and spreading terror for a thousand more miles. Armed in as he was he really strangely got away for so swift was his dash that not even the mighty Glandelian host under General "Harger" could overtake him, and once when General "Harger's" army had him completely surrounded, he disappeared the next morning in a way that was mysterious and flabbergasting. In the meantime the battle of Dean was fought and the last great effort of the Glandelian Confederacy to break up the Christian invasion in the west was lost.

Indeed the high tide of the Glandelian hopes was fast receding now. The series of armies of Abbieannian, and Angelinian, after "Glandelians", which overthrew with immense slaughter the first main Glandelian aggressive campaign in the east to stop the Christian invasion or its progress, was retreating swiftly into its southern stronghold, as was the series of Glandelian armies in the west after General "Zoe" Paces abandonment of "Mammyville" and the Glandelian retirement had given Abbieannian now full sway in her invasion.

Indeed the sun sank on days and days. From a city that was aflame with great Abbeinnian victories. Early Anna had struck the biggest Glandelinian army ever mustered against the christian armies at the bloody battle of the Green Run and after three days desperate fighting sent all these Glandelinian forces helter skelter to the four winds. Simultaneously general Hanson Warthon had crushed the christians at Miriam Lewis, only to be crushed himself at the battle of San's Sanderford onia, while again simultaneously general Hanson Vivian had obliterated Popes Glandelinians at the Second battle of Hon. Catherine De La Peer Beresford. Eleven eleven million prisoners had been taken at the battle of Ferry Harpers Run, and Evansville with his Abyssinikiltan army had gone into the "Anopolis" on the flank of Glandelinia. Recruits were coming into the Abbeinnian ranks by the thousand millions. Pragerd Henryson had fifty million men and an impregnable stronghold in front of puell-conias, who had but a few men more and could not force his way out of the christian forces herding him in. The Glandelinian general Buell was doomed and knowing it he finally surrendered without fighting and any more battles.

At the same time the Glandelinians waited longingly for the remaining armies to strike a blow. The Glandelinian generals did strike it, but it was at the heart of the Glandelinian cause. They stunned the Glandelinian Con-Con Confederacy by giving way before the christian commander Buell Johnston. He brought hope back with the bloody battle of Ferryville. Again general Zee Rae faced Buell at Herodesda, and then he wrought broadcast despair by falling back without another battle, dividing his forces and retreating into Omaria. The dream of a successful battle line along the boundary line of Omaria with a hundred million more men behind it was gone, and for the Glandelinians the last and best chance to win the war seemed gone forever.

It was already December, and general Hanson Vivian the main commander simply said-----Forward....The day he crossed the great Brainsie, he said it to his brother, and the other christian generals down in Southern Glandelinia. Glandelinia. After seven frightful battles in the wilderness of Glandelinia he said it again, and again, and still again, and again, still again and it seemed as if the last brutal resort of hammering down the southern buttress and sea wall of the Glandelinian war, Old Omaria, and "Glandelinia, the keystone of the Glandelinian arch was well under way now.

"Throughout those frightful and bloody weeks general Zee Rae Vivian and his brother was with their uncle Hanson on his terrible trisex trisecting march through the Glandelinian country. In the month of November the great Glandelinian fortress St Anna fell after fearful fighting for three weeks and in that same month Glandelinia saw their great leader, John Ah Anna, had died in Omaria. In the month of December the Glandelinian Confederacy toppled at the west under the blows of general Francis Tomsa Redanilton, at another frightful battle of Nashville Run. On the east coast line of Glandelinia one hundred and thirty five thousand wretched broken down Glandelinians confronted Zee Rae Turner's fifteen million men, and in the latter part of December two hundred and fifty weeks was the beginning of the final end everywhere outside of the besieged Glandelinia capitol.

In the meantime the enemy defending the Glandelinian capitol were quiet and made no attempt to raise the siege or attack the christian allies. "Anley and all his survivors" generals know full well that the christian armies were too strongly entrenched and so made no yet no attempts to dislodge the christian lines, though he had intended to force their position from the south some day, or not if not successful to try and do so from some other direction. General Hanson Vivian was suspicious of all the notions of the wicked Glandelinian confederacy, and made every effort to learn their intentions, but without success as none of the spies returned having been captured by the enemy.

"Violet and her sisters wished to go out on the evening trip, and so he decided to let them go, but he said especially to little Gertrude Angelina: "Gertrude I wish you and your sisters to see what general Anley is doing---if you can. But don't be reckless. Glandelinia is desperate now, since she is nearly down on her back."

"Very good. Your Excellency." Said Gertrude.

"And your sisters are fused as good as, and I have seen before what you can do." Said general Hanson. "I'm sure you will succeed."

"We always try to do our best." Your Excellency. Said Violet.

"And you do it." Said general Hanson with a smile. "That is why I trust you and your sisters on this mission."

Violet and her sisters said nothing but after looking at the ground for a minute or two the great christian commander said:

"Take your way into the nearest Glandelinian camp to that you can reach, to general Johnston's camp. Anley's headquarters if possible and learn all you can. If discovered, shoot all to kill. Don't hesitate for you know how desperate the foe is."

"I will do so your excellency." Said the little girls.

"It's a dangerous undertaking." Said general Hanson. "You know the penalty if caught."

"That is nothing. Uncle since you wish it."

"I know anyway you little girls have never taken any papers that might betray you." Said general Hanson.

"Never your Excellency."

"Good. You are wise little girls."

"Thank you your excellency." There are no more instructions for us now to fill out."

"No. I know general Hanson. So this as soon as possible but do not make any unnecessary haste which might jeopardize your under taking."

"No uncle we will be careful." Said the brave little girls.

"And say nothing to any one about it, except to those whom you may see and trust only."

"I shall maintain a great silence."

"If you need money." Said Hanson. "Take a requisition on the paymaster."

"I and my sisters have all we need." Said Gertrude. "Is that all?"

"That is all my brave little girls."

Violet and her sisters then slipped and withdrew. Disclaiming themselves the brave little girls got off on horseback, not taking their own horses as which was too well known to the enemy, and by an arrear arrangement made with the Abbeinnian soldiers, the little girls were heavily fired upon as they left the Abbeinnian lines, and chased part of the way across the plains by a party of Concentration cavalry on horseback. The little girls had already cut shots through their boyscout hats and coats, and even made small wounds on themselves so that it would seem as if they had a narrow escape, and so hearing the enemy lines, a party of Glandelinians came out to meet the supposed fugitives the leader saying:

"O the Abbeinnian devils have you a victorious chase did they?"

"No a bit redheaded lieutenant."

"They certainly did." Said the supposed little boyscouts with a laugh.

"Did you boyscouts get hit?"

"Well I dunno, but it appears to me the bullets came pretty high hitting me."

"Then the little girls took off their hats and looked at them.

"They asked they are riddled with bullets." They exclaimed.

"Then bullets were pretty close." Said the lieutenant.

"Yes and there are two or three in your coats." Said the Glandelinian officer.

"Ah that will need mending sure enough." Said one of the little girls.

"I'll make those Abbeinnians pay the bill you bet or know the reason why."

"I reckon you little boys will have trouble in getting them to do it."

Said the lieutenant.

"All right I shot some holes in their coats too for I fired at them myself." Said Violet.

"Were you in the Abbeinnian camp?" Asked the Sergeant.

"I certainly was and we had a lively time in getting out of it I can tell you."

"What were you doing there?"

"Saying of course. Do you think us boys went there to join the christians?"

There was a general laugh at this.

"So you boys are not christian dogs yourselves." The sergeants questioned.

"In your next budget," he said, "a fundamental question

"Yes, you may go, general," said the general.

This general turned thus looked sharply at Gertrude Angelina, and then left by another door but stopped to look once again before leaving.

"Now you have accidentally seen the general?"

"Yes, your excellency," "I have."

"Let me see them," said the great Glendolindian general.

"Gertrude Angelina handed over the papers.

"They seem proper enough," cried the general. "I shall want some one to carry 'em despatched. Are you home?"

"Yes, your excellency, I have. A very good one too."

"Very good. Wait a few minutes, and be sent," said the general.

Gertrude was about to take a note when a little boy suddenly came dash in.

"What one in boys clothes is not a boy but a girl," he cried. "It's that Gertrude Angelina. She and those Vivian girls work together and I have, proofs!"

A number of graycoats were running in, some with pistols some with drawn swords, but Violet and her sisters outside the door opened fire bringing them all down, while Gertrude was out by the door which she had entered the moment before, closing and locking it after her sisters had shot down the rushing soldiers, and then all of the little girls flew down the passage, out upon the veranda, and so down to the garden, and springing upon their horses they made their way to the road, Gertrude Angelina saying to them:

"A little more and I would have had important despatches in my hands. Well better luck next time perhaps."

There was a great outcry from the house, but the children got into the woods without being seen, and as they reached the road saw the boy disappear and a number of graycoats riding a long.

"There they are now," cried the Glendolindian boy-scout. "I know those horses and their features. After the little devil, and remember there is a reward for those who take them or slay them outright."

Violet and her sisters went speeding up the road, the boy-scout and the Glendolindian soldiers after them, firing furiously and incessantly but failing to get any effect. At the very start it seemed that neither the graycoats or the Glendolindian boy-scout had any chance of capturing the child spies, they seemed to fly, and yet their steeds were not going at full speed, though the horse the Glendolindian boy-scout rode was better than those of the Glendolindian soldiers, having quickly shot ahead of the rest.

"If he will only come far enough," they mutter to him."

And Gertrude thought:

The brave little girls kept on for some short distance, till the Glendolindian boy-scout was far ahead of the graycoats, then the little girls began to shake their heads, as if they had reached the limit of their endurance, and now the boy began to gain on them, and urged their horses to still greater speed, and as the little girls slackened their own still more the boy-scout came presently near enough to call out:

"Stop you little girls or I'll have to fire."

Violet and her sisters looked back and saw that the soldiers were still coming on, although still well behind, and so they rode less, and less rapidly, the Glendolindian boy-scout gaining on them all the while, and as the boy came on swiftly pistol in hand, the little girls in the rear stopped, and all of a sudden shot toward him, caught his horses' bridles and wheels him, and in an instant had their own pistols at the boy-scout's head.

"Now the boy-scout you will come with us," cried Violet. "Before tried to slide out of the saddle, but in a moment two of the little girls had him by the collar and began to shake him, dragging the boy into the saddle, taking away his pistols and empty cartridge belt, and then saying:

"We'll go together you slippery and foolish boy, who dares tamper with us. You were easier to catch than many of your betters."

"Confound you you brave little girls, you were only pretending after all!"

"Yes and you didn't have known it, but now your friends are getting too near to suit you."

Then the whole party of little girls dashed forward, when presently from the other direction there appeared a score of graycoats, all well mounted, as proud as fresh, and in four coats, with hair like vivian little girls. These were the Glendolindians.

Violet and her sisters dashed furiously at the foe who were expected to open their ranks to let them pass, and there was a confusion though they sent a shower of bullets flying after the little girls who nevertheless managed to hit as the trees interfered. The little girls sent a few volleys back in return and then flew along the path quickly out of sight, the Glendolindians hastening about following after those few volleys had wounded a number of their men dangerously and severely wounding them. They were obliged to ride in single file along the path and there was no one among these Glendolindians who cared to take the lead, as they knew Violet and her sisters as a good Christian from the Bible and all the commandments of God.

As they dashed on Violet and her sisters were discovered by another Glendolindian force, a patrol who instantly gave the alarm, and began firing sharply, with the intention of shooting the little girls down. A bullet hit the boy and he fell. Muskets of the enemy were rattling with a tremendous din, and riding to the protection of trees the little girls answered with their pistols, and the infantry expecting no such resistance as this from supposed boys, were surprised, and then when the little girls took the daring nerve to make a most furious charge toward them, the foe did not know what to make of it, and their charges knew no bounds when the onrush of the little girls actually forced them back, making them break and retreat, the little girls fairly disappearing the infantry without firing a shot during the charge, and then far in advance the little girls found them selves surrounded by a number of the troopers.

In the meantime as the little girls were having their thrill the general Robert Vivian's arrival had happened he coming up with his large army, and he reached to take possession of the nearest heights overlooking the city, while he rode his headquarters in the elegant mansion of general Bealman whom he captured with 10,000,000 Glendolindians whom his army took surprise during his arrival, and before sunset the whole of general Vivian's lines were encamped extending in a line from the heights, toward Evans lines, toward Flooristdale, where he expected to immediately make a junction.

All this while the little girls had been pursued by different parties of Glendolindians who had learned that they were the Vivian girls spying on them early in the morning. In the brush with a score of Glendolindians Violet and her sisters had shot down ten of them, and urged their horses over a low wall enclosing a garden, and a spacious double house, the Glendolindians riding after them in a moment, and though a number of fierce bull dogs came dashing out of a large kennel the soldiers, or the fugitives even paid no attention to them, both parties dog dogs dodging the dog, who in trying to prevent the other Glendolindians from getting over were shot dead by the soldiers. Violet and her sisters urged their horses swiftly down a path under a arbor, through a rustic summer house, and to the walled fence in the rear, swerving things down in the house, as their horses burst their way right through the thin walls with a crash of shattered timbers and other wreckage. Another wall confronted the fugitives a high stone wall, with a door in the middle of it, and the foremost child on the horse went horse through smashing down the door by the force of the charge, and through this the other little girls dashed, and then progressed onward, nothing standing in their way, when they made their mind never to be captured or anything, and with a quick leap and scramble the horses were on top of another mound, surmounting in the direction of the Christian lines.

Never had these Glendolindians pursued any body so hard to over take, whose horses went, where they did not dare to go. Their horses were fleet of foot however, and by making a short circuit they had rapidly gained on the fugitives, racing more wildly after them with the utmost determination to capture them at all hazards.

At there was no chance of capturing the little girls who reached the Christian lines safely without any further adventure. Early the next morning general Vivian resumed the battle of Tryal his right grand division who made a most tremendous charge recaptured the first fire of the enemy infantry, then, and artillery, but quickly posted themselves behind the works they had captured, and returned it with great effect, while the remainder of the line who had also come on ahead to make an attack found an advantage over the rocks and in the trees, and opened a fearful fire upon the Glendolindians, changing from tree to tree, from rock to rock, and driving the foe before them. Now there were several Glendolindian army of Glendolindians rough looking fellows but fierce fighters, and every one of them fired as they advanced seemed to tell, the enemy suffering severely from the effects of the Christian attack, and from their firing, and though the Glendolindians charged upon them with the largest tim and again, hoping to drive them off they were repulsed with terrible slaughter and with the loss of many officers.

Prediction.

November Nineteen Twelve, to Nineteen Thirteen.

Enemy victorious at Angelina Agathin. Also victorious in east, laying waste everywhere and causing hellish devastation for scores of hundreds of miles. Terrific battles in Galverina. Whole of Galverina devastated. Apprehension of many of the christian nations.

The ninth report is as follows;

Prediction. December Nineteen Twelve.

Flerce war two years duration. Author Henry J Aronburg Darger, writer of Glandoo-Abboamian war, makes discoveries that great Glandoo-Angelintan war is more terrific than it was ever expected to be. Will have to look into matter.

Great christian reverse at Dretchen. General Vivian defeats Hanley in a bloodon ridding battle there completely breaking up the enemy invasion in the eastern part of Galverina. Kintergarden horror ended. But cannot advance and follow up the victory from need of more and bigger armies. Fault of Aronburg mysterious!

Yours truly,
The author.

The tenth report was as follows;

Prediction.

January Nineteen Thirteen.

Have looked into the matter, finding the battles of Galverine, Mc-Hollester, or Aronburgs Run, Cenderine, Beppo and Angelina Agathin to be the first of the bloodiest battle of the war. When will the battle be fought that will surpass these?!

The eleventh report was as follows;

Prediction.

February, 1913.

Same situation in the war, as previously written. Big forest fires continuing for months, consumes hundreds of miles of forests, and scores of cities. Fires caused by enemy and battles. Federal and the Manleys almost crushed to pieces at the battle of Jemie Francis Turner, or Second battle of Kittens Reicherts. 10,000,000 Glandolintans decimated in thirty minutes, during worse onset upon Glandolintan central lines. Greatest slaughter in the Angelintan dream of war. Death of Francis Hanson in Mc-Whirther for leader. Defeat of Glandolintan army under Hanley, who tried in vain to stand before the christian counter charge.

The Twelfth report is as follows;

Prediction and Threat.

March 19th. Nineteen thirteen.

First highest stage of terrific war. Despite two recent great victories, christian situation very critical. Fury of great war inconceivable. Last month of chance for success. No further as enemy is unending and mobilizing new armies to suppress a threatened invasion. No time for success on April the first. Great destruction will follow.

3-23-6

Report number Thirteen is as follows;

3490

Prediction.

May 1912.

Germana Vivian of Glandolintan armies victorious at the battle of Erminio Run or Glandolintan. Christian army almost annihilated, or reduced to one eighth its number, but are safe nevertheless, for the enemy fearing that the christian army is still very powerful refuse to press advantage. Combined losses terrible in the extreme. Hanson and General Vivian wounded. Child called Gertrude Angelina at salin.

Report number Fourteen is as follows;

Prediction

March 1 1912.

Starting heaven for the petition. Though rightly belonging to us, am saving papers, books, and magazines, for Sister Mary Rose, and asking the Religious somewhere at St. Sinto to pray daily for grant; of petition. Erecting shrine altar to pray before, in order to obtain petition, before the destruction of the christian armies arrive.

So rifles will also be made, for the granting of the petition. Making the main shrine chapel neat and clean, no matter how much work. Buying materials of all sorts for shrine. Read Bible every evening, and say all the Litanyes when shrine is finished.

Yours truly
M. DANGER.

The fifteenth report is as follows;

Prediction and Threat.

March 1 Nineteen Thirteen.

Another report of the great battle at Erminio Run. Heavy cannonading all along; the line. Millions upon millions of guns fired every minute. Frightful onslaughts of the enemy tear up whole christian line. Terrible are the losses. Only ten more days for petition must come by the end of the month to save the christians.

The sixteenth report is as follows

Prediction and Threat.

March 10th. Nineteen thirteen.

Five more days for chance of christian success. No granting of petition as yet. Fatal times coming. War assuming the most frightful fury. Glandolintans attacking the christians at the battle of Madoliffie. Great Glandolintan victory at Big Girl Knool. More forest fires raging. Petition will be redoubled. War lasting nearly two years. The whole half of Galverina is laid in waste. Great bloody scenes at Mc-Whirther Run, and Mc-Harran. Hanson reported severely wounded. Results of big battles doubted.

Seventeen report;

Seventeenth report as follows;

Prediction.

Cause of petition or demand for petition.
March 11. 1913.

When first arrived sometime in Nineteen Ten, General Thomas Phelan Tamerline a lake of plains, but treacherous enemy of God, a Glandelinian spy, a murder murderer of eleven thousand girl children, and the worse of criminals caused the loss of manuscript, either by stealing it, or destroying it, because he declared it trash, and refused to own up to what happened to it when asked.

At this time the child slave rebellion was raging. War with Glandelinia threatening. A few days later started new manuscript only to rescue it from destruction the next day. Phelan suspected. A feeling of enmity arises against him. First quarrel, then enmities. Twice destroyed pictures, alone with Annals Aronburgs. War on fiercely. Christians meeting disasters at the very outset. Two of Phelan's slanders which are fiercely resented. to bitter end. Clash in death struggle. Phelan is shot. In the meantime war progresses for two years. Terrible battles by the hundreds. Destruction of many cities and towns, and massacres of children.

Glandelinians of its successful at Aronburgs run and Angelina Agathia. Hundreds of thousands of acres of forests wiped out by seas of fire.

Christians are sorely beaten at Marcosello twice twice. Main christian commanders wounded at Braine run, Glandelinians commander reported killed. At the same time fierce battles rage at Jennie Vivian, or Sunbeam Creek, and Vivian Wickey. Christians repelled and roughly handled at Vivian Wickey. But victorious at Sunbeam Creek. All in war does not help christian nations. Aronburgs must be found, before the end of March or all will be lost.

Federal acting under Manley's orders. Making finally invasion of western Glandelinia. Angelina in general danger. Battle of sidights run raging. Concentration at Vandalla. Battles raging at Zoo Doe Hae Beck, and Evanses and St Clair.

Eighteenth report is as follows;

Prediction of situation of general annals;
March 12th. 1913.

Blain Nightingale christians armies in force. Mamudo Anna Glandeo commanding first foe armies in the east.

Hanson Vivian in command of western christians armies are operating against Ambrose Edwin Fuller. Kindornabe in general Vivian place operating in the north against Federal 1 at Van Vandalla. Glandeo in central Angelina with the christians armies under Bernard and Howell watching Tamerline's movements. Christian general Williams in the east watching phellon, and Shosanna Glandelinian armies. Battle of sidights run lost. Christians beaten in series of the most bloodiest conflicts. They still advancing. Danger more grave than ever.

NINETEENTH REPORT IS AS FOLLOWS:

Prediction and threat. March 21. 1913.

Grave situation. Made thirteen desperate attempts to locate said picture of Annals Aronburg without success. Out witted every time. Grave danger of the christians situation. Only five days more for chance though all hopes are almost already abandoned. Big six days battles at Mc-Hollester run. Frightful carnage on both sides. Hanson Vivian fully through a big battle of Mc-Hollester lanes. Results of the many failures. Another bloody battle at Costelloe run.

Twentieth report is as follows;

Prediction

March Twenty ninth. Nineteen Thirteen.

One army left in east to oppose the whole of Glandelinia. Situation still more grave. Crisis at its worse. Five christian armies disabled, three of which surrendered. War drawing to a close close. Battle of Vandalla soon to range. Four more days for chance. Then all will be lost.

Twenty First Report is as follows;

Prediction

April 12 1913.

Great christian victory at Vandalla. New christian armies forming. War along the boundary line, where the christians may surely get their downfall. Petition too late. Enemy of Annals Aronburg reported captured. Big battles raging along the boundary line with the Glandelinians victorious in every one. Great massacre of the innocent children. General Vivian repulsed at Viviana.

Twenty Second report is as follows.

Free Prediction

May sixteenth nineteen Thirteen.

The cause of general Zetwamm almost losing the battle of Gloria is as follows;
I. Glandelinians refusing to follow up his crushing advantage at Ophelia and Chade in a General Vivian's rash onslaught, on the garnation, Stanok, Mc-Whirt her, and Mc-Hollester ridges, and the refusal of Hanson advise to him of turning Manley's extreme right on the Mc-Hollester and White Rose ridges.

The result of Hanson's disastrous onslaught against the Free Hanson and Mc-Hollesterians, under Federal, phellon, and Shosanna. A loss of the Little n and Big Catherine hills, and the terrible destruction of generals Roswell Buster Johnston, and Kindornabe's armies, and also Hanson's along the Mc-Whirt her and Mc-Hollester Run.

The annihilation of Vivian's right grand division, and the disjunction of scores of divisions of christian troops during the Ophelia and phellon's engagement, and the main withdrawal of Vivian's army was a western wing by mistake.

Only the prompt arrival of the armies under generals Hanson and Robert Angelic Vivian, stopped the tidal wave of assaults made by the almost victorious foe.

Twenty Third report. is as follows;

April 26th 1913. Prediction.

Battle of Weeping Willow run threatening between generals Hanson, and Federal. Biggest assemblance of armies ever seen in northern theatre of great Glandeo Angelinian war. A situation very over the Aronburg register lanes dangerous.

No hope for christian west Africa unless bloodiest battle Angolians in full force. Battle of Chambers Orphan asylum with participation of christian divisions, besides capture of Glanville in force on its way to murder the children....

Twenty Fourth report is as follows;

Prediction.
May 6th 1913.....

Battle of Weeping Willow run, won by the christian armies. Also great victories, at Rauffman, Rouburg, Viviania, and Protestia. Battle of Courndorf lost, but the christian advance is not checked....

Twenty fifth report is as follows;

Prediction and threat.
May 15th Nineteen Thirteen.....

The only success is this
The battle must be increased but won by the Angolians at the cost of the lives of their main leaders, general Hanson, and his brother general Robert An Angolis Vivian, and general Jack Evans, or William Langhanger Zinner and to be placed in the supreme command.....
Armed, victorious army; the situation so, as the picture has not been recovered by March 1913. It already being May.

Twenty sixth report is as follows;

Prediction;
May 15th 1913.

Another report on Glorbia. Bloodiest battle of the great war; Hanley having attempted to raise the siege of Yonnu, Julo Callio, and Vivian Wyckeyl makes a stand of great assaults upon the christian lines, and for an hour or more since the christian center was crushed, victi victory for the christians seemed to tremble in the balance, but Hanley's armies were finally defeated after the most terrible slaughter, and so injured in strength that general Vivian was soon able to maneuver his main left grand division from the No-Hollost or Han, without another reorganization of the battle along that part of the christian line.

The first part of the conflict had been an appalling disaster to the christian armies. Six army corps embracing probably one fifth of general Vivian's entire force, that early afternoon was not only defeated, but routed in that engagement, the commanding officer killed, and the demoralized christian forces driven through the Mc-Harther and Mc-Pollester line, where they were rescued and rallied, by generals Kindernubus and No-Hollost. The new second part of the great conflict was fearful; Hanson's bloody but unsuccessful stand along the Wangollina St. Clair and Oholin saved the christian armies from the dangers of defeat and all disasters too great.
Fiercest conflict ever seen, the battle itself being a regular field of dead, Oholin, Chamberlane, and Wangollina St. Clair in flames; big and little Jabbosia fully captured, but not taken.
Third part of the battle had a fury that was incredible, indescribable, appalling losses both inflicted.

Christian columns a rising back and forth in the slightest breeze ever seen in the greatest of wars. Christian wings rolled up like and again, with one fourth their number killed or wounded, only to rally and crush their mighty wave of assaults, and thunder of hundreds of thousands of guns. Heaven in tumult from the din. God's son of christian times very serious. Christian center crushed and driven in. Last battle is won, christians being victorious. Hanson crushes Federal army by a furious headlong drive.
An exultation. End of nightiest battle. Joy throughout the world."

Twenty seventh report was as follows;

Prediction.
May 15th 1913.

On account of the loss of the manuscript in September 1911, it is found impossible to capture the Glanvillean capital, or Calver Indaby sea. The accounts of these wonderful feats, was in that manuscript alone, and only the return of the manuscript can cause these wonderful adventures to happen. Otherwise these wonderful feats will be willfully held back, some what say, fortification losses shall be avenged on the christians to the utmost extent.

Twenty eighth report is as follows;

Prediction
May 9th Nineteen Twelve.

On account of said articles being lost, Hanson will not be placed in chief command of christian armies. One thing that is true is that both the Vivian generals should be forced to retire from the great war, before it is too late. They themselves will never win it."

Twenty ninth report.

Prediction
June 19th 1913.

In case General Vivian fails to capture Julo Callio, the responsibility will be upon him, his own death, and the destruction of the armies. The transportation of the Vivian girls into Julo Callio as slaves until some other christian general causes the fall of Julo Callio.

Still another report was as follows;

Prediction.
August 1913.

Arms and went to crush. Great sum of savings lost or threatening to be lost. Loss irreparable. Incalculable. Neither Vivian girls or christian nations shall suffer if money is not recovered within January 1914.

No mercy will be shown. A enemy against the christian cause, and desire with all my heart to crush the armies, and win the war for the wicked Glanvilleans.

Losses of too many unjust trials. Will not leave them, under any conditions, and vengeance will be shown, if further trials continue.

thirteenth report.

Prediction.
June 12 1913.

Julio Gallo, Norma, Crowley, and the McWhirther fortifications taken by the christian bastions, though at the most fearful losses. Great battles at Anna Marie, or Francis At Lanta, and Glorinanna-Francis Atlanta a great christ ian victory. Gl Glorinanna at ill raging, decision known but still withheld. Great destruction of towns and cities, and extensive forest fires are raging. War at its highest fury. Battle of Glorinanna have many names, the chief ones being, McHollester Run, or McWhirther Run, Menoretta a or Chamberlano, Rosa, Evangeline St Clair, Topst, Bell Beppo Janbi, Aronhange Run or third battle of Kittens pische-ets. Raging long. Probably eighteen hours. Pierce in the extreme.

Thirty First report as follows/

Prediction.

In the whole two years of war, christians won one hundred twelve battles, as far as is known while the wicked Glandelinians won one hundred and two battles.

Thirty Second report is as follows;

Prediction.
August 11. 1913.

On August 17 12. Club the ugly reasons not stated here was broken up by mysterious explosion. Great loss in child pictures on account of it. Makes the situation for the christians worse. After thrown down. Gain to be paid to the christian nations. Christians to be saved now if God permits to gain the means of owning property so that I can adopt children, without suffering them the dangers of unsupport. Only a chance now left. There will be no other under any conditions so serious that progress in manuscript is delayed layed.

Thirty Third Report is as follows;

Prediction.
December 3th. 1913.

Invited into the Glandelinian army September 20th 20th 1913. in expectation of having chance to see the great war. Reduced in health if critical time, and wounded at Virginia Run severely, and desperately. Battle a devastating horror. Believe all in heaven could not describe its blood writhing bloodletting bloodcurdling fury. Failure of limbs and sight on account of shock received during the great battle, shoulder falls to support me to make further success in drilling.

Then go on the train. Rejected from military service
December 16th 1913. Receive discharge papers December 24th. 1913. Sent home.

Another and a very christian defeat is impending. Most serious break of all. Will not relent in threatening safety of christ ians. Will have operations performed on eyes, shoulder and limbs so I can rejoin into the army.

Another report at ill;

Prediction.
Late Withheld.

Frightful and human slaughter at the battle of ye williger or Marie Osborne woods. Will rage between christian armies, and the foes, under the leader ship of Wionetion, Vivian, Evans, the christ ians, and the foe Germania Vivian, and the three Hanloze. Battle if waged will be written writ t on October 24th no other time. Results is not known yet.

Still another report they read;

A GUE AND FINAL WARNING:

It is to be recorded, that the Glandeo-Abdoununur war raged for nearly three years, and already that a fearful battle occurred, and is still raging at Glorinda Zoe Rae Run.

The outcome is not yet known, though should the foe win the nations cause would be ruined, as its safety is now trembling in the balance. Since September 1913 A manuscript containing the Abyssinilian, Abbleannian, and Tripoligonian war had disappeared most mysteriously, and as long as they fail to be recovered, the christian nations now allied, against Glandelinia will have very little chance of winning the great war, and all will be lost.

The frightful situation at Glorinda, and the disastrous catastrophe at Aronhange Run gives evident proof of this. Calvarinia is desolated, its inhabitants almost annihilated, Angolinda is fully invaded and ravaged, as the frightful carnage at Francis At Lanta evidenced.

It is good to report that the McWhirtherian cities of for or fortifications which held out so long against the poor christians, finally fell, in cluding Julio Gallo, Jennie pische, Norma and Crowley, but ain't there danger of these being retaken?!!!!

The warning also concerns the Aronhange situation, the recovery of phelan tonburg, Big Girl Knool, and Cro Corbithin, and the recovery of the lost pictures of children. To avoid this tragedy, the prayers and petitions for the return of said articles must start before the glandelinians overrun all during their invasion.

March 16th 1913 passed. Little hope of christian success now. War may surely be lost. Year already 1914. Month of January and what is still worse the Plans No. Ten and eleven have not been carried out yet, and there seems an impossibility of carrying them out.

Tragedy at Brigano. Case of Aronburg Mysteries. Vivian girls almost fatally injured. Their lives will really be lost on July Fourth Nineteen fourteen if lost manuscript is not returned by that time.

Either they will be lost or their parent general Robert Vivian will pay the cost with the destruction of the christian armies under his own commands and others also. In this case, under this serious situation, there will be no more shown whatever.

The loss of child pictures, manuscripts, and rejection from army shall be revenged on the fullest limit against all the christ ian nations, and their cause will be hit as hard as they can be hit.

[illegible]

They were called the Great Glandolinian Conventions, and when during the outbreak of the present war, the glandolinians as it is reported found them unoccupied, and so used them, and so one can have an idea how hard

The sea was lashed wildly like a hell ocean by the storm of cannon fire. The island was entered the very first of them. The world had never seen before the McJollister gun which was shot with the greatest accuracy for five months. The Vivian Victory was battered in shell fire, and the author of the greatest line of scientific war was a fire. The battle in the world of a war over land fought in the world over made such a terrible choice and over produced such a far reaching shock. Thousands of children, in abundance, An Angelina, Abbeonville, Abbeonville and others in London Dondola and Tripoli in the most successful reported broken wisdom and had been there which looked about like hell, but no human were reported in it, except those named the heaviest of which were wrecked by the conflict in the shell fire.

Of course a terrible weather sent enormous battle in the war but there was no end, and never in the whole of war at war there over another such a battle so successful in all the world, however.....

It lasted fully a whole hour and three quarters, and was the most extensive battle of the northern theatre of war..... It is remarkable to note that only half of the number of the opposing sides were engaged in the first attack of the battle, which started along the Abbeonville range..... It is not worth while to state the story of the battle. The main description is of the choice. The sea was in possession of the Vivian, and the McJollister side, the Christians occupying the main Dondola range. Most of the struggle centered for the McJollister and Dondola ridges, where the cannon of both sides revolved either to the ground by the command of their commander. The battle there was a series of great artillery activity but most of the battle was fought in cavalry and infantry.

All these writings Violet and her sisters read as carefully as they could, and then deeming that most of it was written by either a Angelinian traitor, or a real glandelinian, decided to take them before general Tansen Vivian and did so. He was surprised when he read them, but he declared that it did not cause any harm to the nation, and that the letters were only mere threats, but that nevertheless he would do his best to have the race racial a run down if possible, and he proceeded to do so.

And I have a letter also here that was sent to me by a strange messenger or friend. He said showing it to them. I just received it this morning. Violet looked at it first and then read it to her sisters, and they were all surprised at it indeed. It ran as follows:

"It was reported time and again that the little Vivian girl called Catherine Vivian, was killed during the early part of the glandelinian or Abbeonville war. But her death is much disputed, some saying that the glandelinians shot her to death, when in reality a gang-gang shall did it they say..... She is one of the pretty Vivian girls, innocent as innocence can be, and as pure hearted as a saint.....

Her death if true will cause heartrending sorrow among her relations, parents, brothers, and sisters. If so her death must have been pitiful for it was reported that she died on the same day that she sang the hymn:

"Can a Boy Forget His Mother's prayers...."

Since that the general Vivian it is reported has issued a decree prohibiting death to any one, singing that hymn in the presence of the Vivian Girls.

The reason is that it would break their hearts to hear it, it bringing to their memory Catherine's pitiful death.

We have also known that Joice Vivian is one of the prettiest Vivian girls, next to Violet..... She is the eldest of the beautiful Abbeonville children. And as she is in looks she is as brave as one can be brave, having no fear of anything, not even rats, or mice. She is very religious like all of her sisters, good as an angel, and the slightest kind deed makes her happy for days.

But she has had many sorrows. Many times she had been taken prisoners by the glandelinians and even kidnapped. Sisters of children, the glandelinians treated her and her sisters with a cruelty which would take millions of dollars to show in pictures, or have acted for moving pictures.....

The glandelinians were relentless in their brutality upon her and her sisters but they could not kill her, or even them, for she and her sisters seemed to bear a charmed life. She has shown great bravery during the severe war now raging, and still raging, and her greatest horrors were during the reign of terror in Julo Callio.....

Violet Vivian, is one of the prettiest of all the Vivian Girls. Her bravery in saving the Blessed Sacrament, from a glandelinian sharp-shooter, and in recovering the shot into her heart or lung, has made her the greatest heroine of whole Angelina. Fatal as the shot was considered by the doctors who treated her she did not die, being saved by a miracle, when the Priest who she also saved gave her Holy Communion immediately after she had recovered the shot.

Since then she was horribly treated by the wicked glandelinians, who were horribly incensed at her for preventing the horrible sacrilege, which their king it was reported attempted to commit. She was treated far worse than any of her sisters except little Jennie Vivian. It was she and her sisters who came near being among the butchered children at Andreu. Among the Abbeonville general or King's saved her. The color of her hair has changed somewhat since I saw her last, her hair then having been golden brown, but now is as golden strings from heaven. She is really one of the dearest of general Vivian's daughters and with her sweet smiles spreads cheerfulness everywhere..... I have a picture of Violet when I sent to you in her best clothes where she looks her prettiest, and this picture of her has been taken two weeks before she was kidnapped or taken prisoner by the glandelinian spies, disguised as Abbeonvillians, but since that time a number of months afterwards as afterwards or years I even during the merciless glandelinian war, she and her sisters had more greater horrors especially since the extreme struggle at Cedernine or Stanck where over 45,678,998 fell on both sides in killed and wounded.

After she and her sisters had been taken prisoners again as it had been reported and held for several months, or had not been rescued or escaped until some time after the frightful battle of Pwngaline St Clair.

Jennie Vivian is one who suffered the most. Sorrowful as she is she is the strongest of her sisters, though delicate in shape. She has long golden hair deep blue eyes and is the sweetest of all the Vivian Girls. She is more fairer than Joice beautiful even in figure.

In the picture I have sent you she is in distress over the reports of the deaths of her brothers rumored to be killed during the battle of Aronburg Run, and all her friends who were really or falsely reported to be killed during the same battle. In the picture as you see she is struggling hard to keep back the tears but failed as she was literally broken hearted. Whoever cannot be affected by this picture as I must have quite a hard heart. I have also sent a picture of Violet Vivian in a cell at Andreu which had been taken by a reporter spy, praying for her deliverance from being slaughtered by the glandelinians. During those days there before the Child slave rebellion broke out there ensued a veritable reign of terror, which lasted for nearly a year. All child slaves reported unable to work, were slaughtered in a manner that would have been too shocking to put in moving cinematograph pictures. Violet and her sisters being captives also through their own sacrifice for those they loved among the child slaves had many a narrow escape from being cut to pieces by the blood thirsty glandelinians who hated them most. They suffered terribly however, through it all, and they almost died from sheer terror and sorrow.....

A friend.....

It was not long after this discovery that general Williamson's army had reached the region of the point near Brindis run called the sad La. Emma shore. General Vanley had known of his approach, and fearing that if he should arrive had ordered the glandelinian general Ansonia Lion Gatt with his mighty army to oppose Ziermann as fiercely as possible. He watched Ziermann's reported approach, and as soon as his army was seen started forward with his own to oppose Ziermann. Ziermann observed this opposition, and knowing that if his armies were held at bay he could not close the gaps still left by the besting Christian lines, and all would be lost he decided upon immediate action, and early the next morning struck a sudden and swift blow.

The left wing of the Chindian army was taken by surprise and overlapped retreated, but it retreated into an ambush and was destroyed. Turner advanced forward without delay and struck the central portions of the Chindian army sudden and repeated blows. "The two opposing armies fairly tried each other out like two prize fighters, and finally Zimmerman was so compelled to draw off and rest his arm for the night." Losses had been severe on both sides, still heavier on the enemy, and so far to encourage Zimmerman again Gatt withdrew, reporting to Huxley that it was impossible to hold. 2. Since Zimmerman immediately pursued, and extending his armies in a double curve at curved shape finally closed in on the fugitive army and in another fierce action compelled General Gatt to surrender.
This was a terrible blow to Huxley's army.

This was a terrible blow to Manley Zimmerman captured over 700,000,000 Glatelinians the biggest haul of prisoners ever made besides 365,000 cannons, and over 200,000,000 firearms, and many munition stores and overwhelming quantities of ammunition.

"Anlar" was now apprehensive, and did not know what to do. He felt confident however that his army could hold out against a siege for a reasonable length of time, but then the Abkhazians were not wishing for any war; whatever, from the fact of the storm of shells that was being poured upon his works so incessantly night and day and which was doing dreadful damage in the beautiful city already, and the inhabitants had all taken to the cellars.

Three days later after his great victory Zimmerman arrived and swelled the beds besieging christian armies, and now the siege was in full army and general viviano (ann started a fusillade of over 1,000,000 cannon upon "anleys lines, whose batteries responded with great and violent determination. Several sorties had ben made by the christians to take a breach during the next day in the enners lines, and once general vlvian took all days work to storm the enners main central lines with his whole army so that incessantly every engagement of that bloody battle of "ach res was fiercer than ever expected, but general vivian finally had to withdraw his sadly desolated forces, and await a better opport opportunity. Nevertheless he had struck a telling blow which the enner could never recover from at that point, and his batteries night and day was fairly harassing the enners lines with a sunsplitting barrage of shell fire for the distance of fourty eight miles.

General Cannon was bound to make the siege as short as possible having declared to his officers:

"I'm going to force the Gladelinians to abandon the city of Gladelinia if I have to blow the place to kingdom come and destroy the whole Gladelinian army to boot. And I'll sacrifice any number of soldiers now to crush the foe and end this damn war. I'll not slacken any drives and will keep the foe in constant action no matter how much work there is."

"That the historical nations suffered on account of the Glandelinian war....."

"The greatest disaster of the whole Andean-Argentinean war did not strike the opoandian nations who were never engaged in the great struggle, but all those who had never taken any part in the great war whatever. The nation which received over 70,000,000 refugees every three months suffered in food matters only, but others christian and non christian, suffered fearfully in industry and many other things. Salverinia and Ancolinda alone provided most provisions to these nations, and while up to the great battle of Francis Atlanta, the christian losses in money and food provisions suffered was over ninety millions of dollars, these innocent on lookers suffered losses also of a magnitude to hundreds of millions of dollars. And what was the cause of the losses???? Subardines. These hellish ships upon waters sent thousands of craft laden for provisions from Ancolinda which not knowing the names of the Salverinians, and the Andian the Christians sent their cargoes into the hellish boats of these non hosts of christianized subardines.

Scarcely of food and provisions was also Abbaquadin let to suffer, for she was also hard hit. Prices for a pint of butter increased to five to ten dollars, apples and all kinds of food or fruits had astronomical prices, not percent of profit, but because they were so scarce, and finally before the fall of "Winter" hockey it was impossible to obtain any kind of fruit whatever.

prices in everything went sky high, and this was one of the cruelties that brought Abbecheville smoothly into the war, and not her to support the Glandelinian trade for sugar and to fit out the various christian fleets to storm the barricades of Vivian Whiskey. In many instances all the factories had closed on account of the war, and millions of working people were jobless, and were rendered desperate for want and poverty. In all however the main and victims were the children of the oratorians. In Galverinia and Angelina only was the substance of Candy made. With the closing of Mc-Furthier and Vivian Whiskey, and other christian seaports, and the seizure by thieftress of the Glandelinians of the Glandelinian and Dorking islands, all such provisions stopped, and soon no when all Galverinian and Angelinian seaports on both the east and west coast were blockaded blockaded by the enemy. Town persons also suffered from candy and sugar famine, no tobacco or any other was need was obtainable, and worse of all some nations were threatened with general famine. The whole world suffered the effects of this raging war. Building material was scarce, outside of wood, and all erections of buildings had to be stopped. All sea traffic was stopped Glandelinian ships were interned and not allow to leave or enter. The other nations were the sorrows of pitiless Christian days, and practically this latter was the saddest. This part of the tragedy started with the seizure of the Mc-Furthier fortifications, the cities of Aronimur, Muffmann, and Federal, and also that of Julio Gallico, Porru, and Vivian Whiskey, and of the closing of their ports by the Glandelinians at the outbreak of the great war.

Yixian "Molay" is the largest city in the world it having over 700,000,000 inhabitants, and covers an area of one hundred miles. It has one billion six hundred million houses of all kinds, and surrounded on the north and parts by a series of lines of great fortresses called the McWhitharian Fortifications which stretch for the distance of one both opposite shores of the Atlantic and the Pacific, a north of the McWhitharian River for the distance of sixty three miles. The McWhitharian Fortifications were established in the year 1941, and was for the remainder of the year 1941 following, as noted by the Americans and Canadians the natives, and believed so strong as to form all the nations of the world, beside the other nations of the world together.

When the enemy landed, secured a titanic stronghold, which proved itself to be able to hold the very world of bay. All the fortifications combined had 385,999 heavy ten inch guns, added by three hundred thousand smaller ones, and 799,000 gun ammunition of the strong shore batteries supporting these fortifications all mounted on high salients. It is reported through the fault of over confidence and a carelessness the Galvarinos had not guarded the city and the fortifications, as well as they should, despite intricate defenses and a wealth of their national guard and several thousand Atlantic Division.

[illegible]

"It was only the cause of the high item of our carcases in Abbeville, the suffering of the other innocent nations, but probably the worse of all was the great suffering of toys and all kinds of other christ & christian property.

No one in the other nations had the talent of making toys, and no material could be obtained & either as such materials in these nations when tested for such means proved of no value. It made special sorrow and misery among the little children, who had the belief that Santa Claus was a prisoner among the "Glandelinians" as they called them, and that the "Christians" could not rescue him. The children of all nations suffered alike, Abbeaunna too. "Think how the children must have wept those three giftless Christmas days, and think how you would have felt if you had been one of those unfortunate kiddies. But then think of the unfortunate kiddies of Galverinia and Angelina who lived through an earthly hell of horror, or died the death of the damned before the fury of the Glandelinian soldiery.

The world was also surprised, startled and appalled over the news of the wars raddened hellish ferocity, and of the fiercest struggles, the most consuming fires that ever raged, and wondered what now would be the result when they learned of the series of most desperate attempts to recapture the "Mc-Thirther" fortifications, and the cities of Aronburg, Fedderat, Kauffmann, Crowley, Julo Gallo, and Norma.

It was more surprising and shocking to them especially Abbeaunna, when the newspaper reporters were too bewildered to place the many battles, for reports of battles came in faster than all baseball sports and other games could come in in a week's time. As fast as one or two battles was over at one place many others would rage somewhere else, keeping up thus a continuous complication of battles upon battles, horrors upon horrors, disasters upon disasters, and untold miseries, and terrible destruction to home and property.

They also learned of the world shaking bombardments of Mc-Thirther, the still fiercer conflicts raging throughout Galverinia and Angelina, and of the first bloody wreck of the hapless Glandelinian cause at the frightful carnage at Gen Cedernine, and Jennie's murder. All this, while the famine of all dainties that children loved was in full swing, and to add to it came the scarcity of fruits, and then altogether threatening pestilences, and general famines among the weaker nations, when Abbeaunna and others had to aid with provisions free of charge sent in ships protected by a squadron of battleships, and torpedo boat chasers.

Indeed those are dark darrowing days. Abbeaunna almost lost her temper at the series of vehement and violent attempts to take the "Mc-Thirther" fortifications and the others like Julo Gallo, Norma, and Aronburg becoming failures, with the results of inhuman bloody sacrifices and the sights of scores of thousands of Christian warships throughout the year torn in pieces, with cabins wrecked coming into her ports for repairs, and to unload the multitudes upon multitudes of wounded every day, and give reports of a conglomeration of evil tidings of the great war everywhere, and of the facts that the foe were driving forward and threatening to win the entire war.

This apprehensive that Glandelinia may wipe her sister nations out, as Galverinia was already dissipated, Abbeaunna redoubled her efforts, until Phillinashurger Zimmermann, had captured Julo Gallo, Norma and forced the foe from Loann Zoe Rae Run, and Virginia Zimmermann Run, and then with the fall of "Mc-Thirther" stormed her way into Galverinia and finally in a bloodcurdling battle crushed back the Glandelinian high tide at Aronburg Run or Gloribama.

BATTLE OF THE PARAPHASE. DUMPA. JOURNAL.

In the meantime the Christian armies were pushing on further and further upon the Glandelinian capital, and severe actions had occurred frequently everywhere, but not arrived to the fury of general battles, though they had been bloody skirmishes. Nevertheless general Anley seeing that the Christian armies were closing more and more on his armies and the great city which was now only ten miles away from the Christian lines, decided to make a desperate effort to break the Christian line at some point or other. Out of the conflicts he had waged during the commencement of the siege was only this single battle, and a skirmish, the last three general conflicts having not been of severe consequence, and resulted with hardly any real favor on both sides.

Anley decided at first to make movements that would baffle the main Christian army, and then when least expected, to hurl a tremendous assault either upon the Christian line under general Evans, Zimmermann, or general Anson, and Vivian. First he withdrew as much of his army as possible, for they were badly harassed by the Christian artillery fire of general Vivian's batteries on the ridges, and then he prepared for his movements. The Christian scouts however were always on the watch, and talked about the 100 Liberty boys of A61. But they could never beat these Abbeaunna scouts in watchfulness. They saw the movements of general Anley's army and reported each movement to the nearest Christian commanders, who conveyed the warning to the main generals.

Evans did deem it possible that his lines would be the particular ones that would be assaulted, and Zimmermann had the same apprehensive, and thus both warned each other to be on the watch, and not allow their forces to be taken by surprise. For three days the movements of the enemy continued, and then on the fourth day Evans reported heavy firing along general Anson's line, though whether it was a general battle or no or not he could not say. Evans was then moving his forces toward the region of the Paraphase Diema Lorelei River with the intention of driving upon the foe in that location, and found himself confronted by the largest part of the besieged army at this location, who presented a very hostile front indeed.

Evans' artillery had been brought up, and as he heard the noise of firing in the direction of Anson's army became suspicious and sent in orders to Zimmermann to watch every movement of the enemy along his own lines, hurried one quarter of his first grand division of Abbeaunnians upon the Glandelinian line in front of him. The attack was made with the utmost utmost determination and lasted fully three hours. So vigorous was the attack that the enemy commanders had to change front ten times on account of repulses of broken lines, and in bringing up new forces to take the places of the divisions which were threatened with annihilation from the terrible searching Christian fire. The Glandelinian general cheat money, then hurried forward a large force of Mc-Holstein and to follow up the repulse their main line had accomplished to the end results to the Christian forces, but in the frightful melee general Cheatingmoney was severely wounded, and his whole force cut to pieces, and routed clean back to their own lines, and driven from them, with the loss of two more generals, Frank payow and January who were killed.

Then there was a lull for a while, as Evans preparing for a final effort sent messengers to find out the reason of the noise of such heavy firing along general Anson's lines. Two hours of preparations, and then once again Evans drove at the Glandelinians confronting him, supporting the attack with all the artillery he had on hand.

The fire of the battle was now terrific, but the charge was beyond control of the officers, and after desperate fighting for over fifteen minutes hand to hand, Evans was in possession of the Glandelinian trenches, and had driven the forces of the foe southward to their capital.

Anson had been fiercely attacked by the Glandelinians early in the morning, and as soon as Evans had released the charge against his line, and then drove the main force of the foe back from its own works, all was still along Anson's distant lines, and the messengers came back with the report that Anson had been heavily attacked by the Glandelinians under swearing praise again and that he had cut the Glandelinian force of assault to pieces, and routed them helter skelter. Anson later reported that the Glandelinian general Swearingtonaise cut, Benidist Pantarabrooklin Bendict Fan Pantarabrook, Erinde Johnson, Pau Sanders, and Jandforde Johnston, Valian Yallen, Joseph Loma, Gu Gundy, Richeson, Ashington, Balde n, Joe Galsoothia and Adolende were all wounded during the great Glandelinian attack upon his lines, and that the remainder of the foe who had not been destroyed during the attack were fleeing in wild rout toward their main lines, and were beyond rally.

General Vivian, and Phillinashurger Zimmermann reported all quiet along their lines, but Vivian, and Constantin Aronburg had also been engaged, and reported that they had lost ground and that the foe along their front were still attacking in wild ferocity.

At this Evans decided upon immediate action. Zimmermann was nearest to these two and so Evans ordered him to hurl a part of his forces upon upon the assaulting attacking generals Henry Barker and Constantin Aronburg. This was done in fine still style and toward nightfall, the whole Christian line had advanced considerably, and were closing tighter on the besieged, and won another complete victory.

Evans was happy over the final triumph he was making, and expressed it to Vivian and her sisters who were also happy. During the night there was some desultory battles of severe ferocity, but not general engagements.

But the next morning the enemy resumed the battle with redoubled fury. Forty six waves of Glendolindians, under the able leadership of commanders, made a series of most violent attacks upon the whole of General Hamilton's line, while other Glendolindian forces, came heavily upon those under Vivian, Hanson, Evans and Barker and Concentration Kronburg.

General Vivian's batteries swept and tore thirty waves of assailants to pieces within five hours time, Evans crushed the main line of assailants along his quarter, and Zimmernann, and Barker, with Concentration Kronburg, swept all before them with a devastating fire, and promptly counter charged, and drove the enemy back with horrible slaughter, but general Hanson who was more heavily attacked was driven back for short miles, and his whole force outside the second division was in hopeless confusion.

General Hanson found it impossible to sent the last grand division to rally the charge in time, and so while he had his cavalry and other officers at work in trying to rally the troops who were panic stricken, he withdrew his second line to the Stanley hills, and awaited the approach of the apparently victorious Glendolindians. On they came, when they were suddenly swept by a most destructive fire, which tore their line to pieces, then the Christian line charged, and drove the foe back across all the ground they had won, but again the Glendolindians rallied ferociously and once more drove Hanson back to the hills. By this time the force which had been in confusion had been rallied, and they having taken up a new position to the south of the hills, suddenly poured a deadly flaming fire upon the Glendolindians who were about about to force Hanson from the hills, and again routed them from the field.

But having reinforced the Glendolindians again rallied, and swept to the attack, and though their lines were torn in large fragments would have again swept Hanson back, but Evans having known what was coming on had sent a large force of infantry and cavalry around those hills, and these toward evening came upon the scene, and the Glendolindians after the most hardest fighting yet were finally driven back to their works, with great loss, and with the deaths of many of their commanders, who had fallen amid that frightful struggle.

Hanson's army was wearied from their desperate efforts, and so general Zimmernann was asked to place his army at this critical point, as soon as opportunity came while general Hanson was to fill up the gap left by Zimmernann. This was done after all night work, and marching, and all this while serious upon series of desperate fights had gone on here and there without abate, until Hanson estimated that throughout the night there must have been about over 10,000 small arms' bullets.

Hanson had been slightly wounded during the second day of the fight, but he still retained his command, and ordered all the men necessary showed that should be made.

And coming there was a lull in the incessant fighting, and the army had a short respite. Nevertheless all the time the artillery of both sides kept up a continuous and thundering roar, and this was believed to be the prelude of the final issue of the battle. But general Hunter did not deem it wise to attempt any more assaults for a while and so the day passed with only slight infantry actions here and there, and the artillery duel which continued all day long without cessation, and desperate cavalry charges.

How many of the Glendolindians and Christians fell in this three days desperate fighting it could not be estimated, but it had been a hotly contested battle, and no doubt the struggle could equal some of those which were seen in the war during the American Civil War.

Violet and her sisters now indeed that the scene was being a very bloody one, for the enemy were bound at all costs to break the Christian line and that despite their only being four general battles the fighting during the entire siege already has been somewhat incessant day and night.

There were many great forests fires burning now too, but not near enough to be alarming, though it was enough to awe those who saw them at that distance.

The great Glendolindian capital was now in sight, and Evans decided to press his advantage, and give the enemy no respite. He knew that he could not force the besieged into surrender but by starving the city by starving them out because the enemy had no avenues of escape, and also that they were so well provisioned that they could have held out against a siege lasting over forty years, and also had plenty of arms and ammunition. He knew as well as his superior Hanson that the enemy must be given no rest, that the only way to force the siege was to keep up a brutal display of fighting, and not desist until the last fortress was paid, until the enemy either fled from the city, or the walls were captured.

So he pressed forward his battle after the action of the day before, and simultaneously kept his batteries pouring shot and explosives into the enemy's positions. Hunter delivered an assault upon his left wing that afternoon but the attack was only desultory, and finally ceased without result.

A general battle though of course the losses were very heavy indeed, and general Hanson was killed, and generals Gatt, Fox, Wolf, and Lion severely wounded in the desperate fray.

THE BATTLE OF YUKALOO....

Evans surprised all of the other Christian commanders, by being ahead of their own vigorous advance, until driven still more desperate Hunter started opposite against Evans at the town of Yukaloo. Evans had not expected any further opposition right away, and so was surprised indeed at the fury and desperation of the Glendolindians now. Evans delivered about three grand attacks in the morning, his forces rushing forward with tearing fury, and drove the foe from their last position, and then had to stand and repel that son of a gun and wild counter charges of the fiercest force. Of course the charges were repelled in quick succession but the Christian losses were terribly heavy and many Christian generals were reporting that their divisions were badly thinned through the whole of the day. Evans put the Glendolindians completely out of action, and then was able to progress in his advance once more, though the foe gave serious opposition at every step.

All this while at the orders of general Hanson, and the advice of Evans their grandest Violet and her sisters, and the other two little girls Annelise Riches and Jennie Hunter had remained out of range of the firing line, but S. Starring and the other boys were not so lucky and came off unscathed though they had faced the hottest fire of the Glendolindians while they did their signal work on the small and high hills, within sight of the fiercest battle Christian lines. Hanson and general Evans had been also fiercely engaged as they advanced but nevertheless they forced their way toward the enemy finding it impossible to start ground before the irresistible pressure of the fierce Christian advance.

Finally when there was a short lull along general Evans' line, the boys went with Violet and her sisters, and the other two little girls went out too with the intention of learning something, but found it impossible to approach the enemy lines without certain destruction for they were putting in so hot a fire everywhere a mile along the line that it seemed impossible for even the spirits to live in its way.

Evans warned the children to be careful, for he knew full well now the desperation of the Glendolindians who though not yet down were staying strong in the last stages of the conflict and about to fall. All of the various Glendolindian armies during the invasion had been so terribly depleted that only Hunter and those under general Killehill, Pemberton Federal, Pemberton Jensen, Marcus Hall and Linderman were left to oppose the Christian advance.

It was now a matter of probably a few weeks or another month or so when all would be over, and the foe beginning for their mercy. And general Hanson was very anxious to rush on and lose no time, for he was tired of the war which had lasted too long already for the faithful few it had. It was already December 21 the day before Christmas and it did seem that nevertheless though Jules Gallo, Vivian Vicker, and the others had not been at rest, but it was probable that the children of the nations would yet spend a rather giftless Christmas day and so he could be done to obtain anything yet to send to the other nations.

"I believe we are safe," he said, "but I hope we do not suffer any serious loss and have to all to do over again."

"I hope not too," answered her friend "but then your friends the great Christian generals must be careful and not have too much trouble. That is what general Barker said. And I think he is right."

"I suppose you will see your father for this Christmas after all," said Jules Gallo, "but then you can have it until you are old and some day we will be up for this too."

"It is always claimed by many that General Willibrodus was dangerous to the president of all the Christian generals, even better than you dear Byron." "And I am?" "No you believe it?"

It is no "Great Power." His rank is not higher, than mine, may be only a brigadier general, but him who did all he did? If it had not been for him the city of Virgin Falls would not have been retained yet and neither would the cities of Julio Galles and Norma. I have read history of the world, have read the history of the wars in the United States, and our their great civil war or rebellion, and of wars fought done by their great commanders. But I cannot conceive that there is any, could be any that ever was like general Abraham Williamson Zbarrman. For all he has done makes him a general that is feared by the worse enemies of God. He is a regular St Michael in human form. Abraham Zbarrman as she is called in all her attempts by storm and by foul, to retake the Mc-Wirthlin fortifications were really disgracefully beaten in all of her attempts by land or sea all along the coast. Abraham failed to force the foe from Virginia Pan, and from Logan Zos was gun, and the news of this made the world fear that Claude Zins would wipe out Galvorlin and make a direct invasion of Abraham and start something that would horrify probably her Lord himself. But Abraham with all her mighty armies and fleets could never accomplish throughout those three years desperate efforts Zbarrman accomplished within a three months fierce fighting and sieges. After Mc-Wirthlin and Julio Galles and Norma fell simultaneously before him, he also captured Crowley, forced the enemy to run like a maddened hyena from Virginia and Logan Zos was Pan and captured all of the Glanclinton navy in Galvorlin. He also recaptured the town of Phelanbury which I myself was unable to do, annihilated the force of Glanclinton that tried to attack him at Mc-Wirthlin, and held his ground in Glanclinton during the "break up of our Union" while all of our armies were driven out in a hurry. And before God Manley and all the others with their biggest armies found they could not dislodge him or Aronburg nor any other. They stuck like flies on flypaper. That is why I mention and the whole in entire world depend upon him to accomplish the ending of the Glanclinton resistance here at the Glanclinton on Capitol. If the war is won we will all point to Zbarrman and send ray to the face of the world.

"There is the man t who made the enemy fall upon his knees and beg for mercy. There is the man who opened the ports of L'Anse-au-Loup, who cleared all the Galveston rivers of the Chelak Indian fortifications within three months and who captured every strong old the enemy had in Galveston. There was he who wiped out the invasion of the foe in the southwestern part of Angolinda by crushing Taitay at Temula - Urner, and it was he who broke up the entire Chelak Indian invasion at Alorinda and finally caused the foe to ret ire as lustil as they could back to their own country a shamed and beaten nation."

Violat and her sisters were surprised at this statement, but they now believed this was true, and felt that they would give anything to see the great general. Even as if he was reading their minds and:

"If you like," I told you to him. I have a message to send to him and you can go to see him if you like."

"Oh, thank you are a dear," said Violet throwing her arms around his neck and kissing him."

"Your excellency there are a number of the prettiest children list little girls who wish to see you."

The speaker was an officer and he was addressing the great Philadelphiaer Edmundson himself.

'You don't say.' Observed the great titan of a fighter. 'Children to see me. Are they child refugees.'

"No sir. They are the vivian girls. One of them has a message to give you." Zimmermann stood agnast. The vivian girls to see him? Could it be possible? After recovering himself, he said

"Show the darlings in." I'll meet the lady over room. And see that t they are escorted under guard. I have heard that Evans allows them a guard for their protection."

"Yes sir." Answered the officer and he went out. Soon to come the little girls saw a bit shy as the great general had expected, and after giving a polite bow, Violet said:

"I've a message from General Evans to give to you."

He handed it to the great general who looked at them with great awe and love and then opened the envelope taking out the paper. He read:

"Our excellency general Zimmermann!

I wish you to push on with all your force toward the enemy position at Gerbride Hoffmann. The enemy are making themselves a nuisance there and they must be forced. If you succeed I will be able also to push on still further. Do not give the enemy any rest as delay will give them time to recover and strike you a blow that may jeopardize your army.

Your loving friend,
General Jack Evans.

"I'll do it!" cried Zimmerman forgetting himself or the presence of the little girls. "I was just intending to do it." Then remembering the little girls he said:

"You had better hurry back to General Evans lines for your own safety. There is no telling how fierce a battle they have to wage. If possible when an opportunity comes I'll come and see you little girls. This is not the first meeting we have had though I believe you dear little girls have forgotten it."

After saluting and bowing the little girls left having felt satisfied that they had seen him at last face to face. "So then he was not so fierce a looking man as they had heard of him, and they felt that he could be also one of their best friends. In the meantime General Picknell had arrived with his big christian army and also joined Zimmerman and now all was prepared to push on and force his way from the southern to Gertrude Hoffmann.....

Zimmerman had intended to strike the blow without delay but during the evening he had been forced to wait a while and so by morning while he was preparing to advance his front line to the attack, a report came to him that a very large force of Alandellians consisting of the Zboronians, Merians, Merian guards, Kurds, Domendians, "No-pollentians and Cargolans numbering about ninety two million had late that night and a part of the morning made about fifty two great assaults upon general Pichelli's lines with the result of ninety two divisions so badly mangled that they could not stand the Christian fire no longer and had given away while fifty three Alandellian brigades with all their commanders had been captured.

"It's a good thing," said General Zimmerman. "It shows that General Picknell knows how to command an army."

Then came more report of that during that terrific struggle that there had been four hundred dead and many more mortally wounded.

slightly hundred fifty six killed, and six hundred and eighty one more severely wounded, while three thousand four hundred eighty four other officers of all rank had been killed or wounded also. It was surprising to general Zibornanski but nevertheless Zibornanski did not intend to allow his lines to be annihilated if he wished. Then he fought in independently he never had allowed the enemy to start the battle by attacking unless it was a very good reason and so now he did not intend to also allow the enemy to attack him now when a good frontal drive could break the enemy resistance all the better. To make the first move at about ten thirty in the morning, and without a fight captured four hundred seventy million, seven hundred eight thousand four hundred sixty six rounds of ammunition, 70,000 pieces of artillery, 72,000 tank guns, and a line of anti-air towers and fortified lines stretching for twenty miles. Then he blew up after taking care of all the provisions and having it sent to the rear. Other parts of Zibornanski's lines were so engaged disastrously that morning but the gladiatorial losses were severe in the extreme, the battles being centered but nevertheless so exceedingly fierce and sanguinary that the losses were not known to the enemy generals, and although by the gladiatorial general's death known.

For the Floridia was a position of the foe to the right of the captured storm and ammunition but the enemy after showing a great deal of resistance fell back, and then fragments of the results of only demeritory fighting, and fearing intently that he was not taking advice as he should from his great friend Evans, (though already he did more than was ever as acted) he threw his combined forces under general Everett's true upon this glandelinian position called Zee Run Floridia and after fierce fighting threw all of the glandelinian forces here into confusion, and by a vigorous turning movement closed them in and captured not only the position but the whole glandelinian force as well.

At this time at another point Tannonia came up with the left grand division of Ziemer's army where the enemy had been making a violent counter assault to recover their lost stores, but a serious disaster had occurred, and taking advantage of it Tannonia threw his forces forward like an avalanche and drove the glandelinian forces forward in a wild stampede toward their own men the killing and wounding two of their main commanding generals. General Picknell having seen from report a the movements of Ziemer's army started forward himself to help in the great undertaking, and captured a large portion of the enemy's works along his own front and annihilating fourteen desperate counter attacks, ordered Shoenma's Francis Bank to move around to the left center and storm the enemy's position there which he did, and he soon had the enemy flying here also.

The battle was still in a demeritory fashion but now more severe than before but the engagement as yet between the foe and picknell was the most ferocious on yet. After he had cut up the glandelinian forces opposed to him and threw them into confusion that was beyond control Ziemer's army moved forward his own central wing, and stormed another portion of the enemy's works. Here the slaughter on both sides was terrific, generals falling dead and wounded on both sides by scores, but in due time the desperate glandelinian forces were badly shattered, and forced to recoil in a pandemonium of confusion.

In the meantime general Anderson had brought up his own forces, and while he opened a continuous barrage fire of cannon, he sent his forces forward to storm the enemy's position still held along the Anna Maria Francis Bank. Here the struggle was desperate, desperate and bloody, and most stubborn, for as fast as the glandelinian columns were cut down and shattered they rallied to the counter attack, and also about drove general Anderson's army from its own position, but their main general Fidderson was killed, the whole glandelinian command with the loss of all their general officers, was cut to pieces and routed also beyond rally, and nearly 23,000,000 glandelinians fell into the hands of the christians as prisoners.

An exceedingly severe fire was poured upon the Abbeismians under Ziemer's army as they tried to take the main glandelinian position at Gertrude's position, a fire that spread almost as much desolation as witnessed during the battle of Francis-Atlanta, but Ziemer's artillery was in good and fierce display and laid low all the glandelinians who dared face their ravaging fire, and the fury of this cannonading could be heard nearly fifty miles away.

Ziemer's army had already made good progress and he decided to keep it up and not allow the enemy to rally and make a general counter assault of any kind so he brought up the Abbeismians under general Henry Dwyer and Aronburg Dwyer, and with all the strength they could muster these forces made fierce and heroic efforts to capture the glandelinian position, all of Ziemer's available guns were covering this great attack upon the glandelinian position. For a while so fierce was the christian artillery fire that the enemy were unable to reply but by making a sort of a driving counter charge of their own they managed by dint of reckless courage to repulse the mighty christian attack, but the christian line batteries were at once massed upon these valiant glandelinian forces, the Abbeismian cannon committing the most incapable damage ever heard of.

Seeing every single division into scattered fragments, then the main line repeated another heroic effort to of the christian line to capture the works, and came forward to keep them back, the Abbeismian cannon once again let go with a new shocking thunderous roar, the blasting artillery fire tearing and shattering the main line through and through, and then as the christian infantry moved in a fire of the great's greatest bite mally, the left grand division of the christian center, beaten and routed the glandelinian army and so far that the whole line of survivors was driven into the greatest panic and chaotic confusion, and in one desperate dash the Abbeismian captured millions of prisoners, sent the others flying in a pandemonium, and were in possession of the glandelinian works and artillery.

It took great efforts to accomplish this but nevertheless it was done in fine style and on account of the crushing up of the other portion of the main glandelinian army confronting Ziemer's general picknell had to give way, but one portion of the line at all held firm to cover his retreat, until their own right and left was turned, and exposed to a blasting artillery and was sorry fate, and then finding themselves unable to withdraw, threw down their arms and surrendered to avoid further bloodshed.

The rest of the Free Mason line was now giving way in great disorder, and general Johnston Jackson's men becoming apprehensive did all in his loyal power to stay the fierce christian tide of advance, but a scorching storm of cannon and desolation occurred, many of his men were seriously wounded in that fierce battle, and after making thirteen desperate counter assaults the glandelinians were also finally withdrawn and in pursuing the Abbeismians captured thirteen million more of the free forces and as usually glandelinian soldiers.

The upsurge of this conflict was something terrible indeed, the country vibrating with the din and commotion but never nevertheless the christian line had accomplished a lot.

At Ziemer's right grand division the opposing armies still lay encamped before each other the foe being in possession of a shattered stretch of woods which later in the day the commander on the right was ordered to take possession of himself.

The force of glandelinians at this point was quite strong and well entrenched, but nevertheless general Conscientious Aronburg thought it could be easily won and so he sent forward his forces to storm the glandelinian position. There in the faint light was the most solid glandelinian force a shattered stretch of woods behind them, and here silent still as death the whole glandelinian left wing was clustered.

As the christian christian forces were starting forward, the Abbeismian batteries, thousands of guns starting a riving fury of the heaviest firing, but the foe closed in great masses to their position resisting the torrents of christian troops as fiercely as demons, hurling the christian assaults back with stupendous losses, but the left of the line of christian assaults was still coming on, and though shot down by thousands per minute gained as access to the work and overcame the glandelinians there capturing a huge lot of glandelinians and routing the remainder.

Other portions of the Abbeismian line rallied and swept forward once again into that fiery storm, and though their foremost lines were swept to pieces, they captured and surrounded a large body of glandelinians who recklessly fought to the last in that fierce fiery storm of battle horror, falling in in such great numbers that they lay in hills. Again and again monstrous glandelinian cavalry rushed on on the christians in terrific counter charges only to be annihilated.

Millions of the Angelical horsemen rode against the glandelinians, while at other points of the line the christian cannon mowed men down in such frightful numbers that they lay in the most monstrous windrows.

The glandelinian forces were now starting to give way in confusion and in the direction of Zee Run Floridia the very heavens appeared to burst into flame as a great conflagration arose the very firmament seeming to be ablaze, the hilltops seemed on fire as the forests caught, the very distant atmosphere seemed to turn into fire, and the smoke rolled in clouds, the valleys were channels of fire, and everything seemed to be burning up as the victorious christians were setting fire to everything in their path.

Explosions terrific and fierce and heard for scores of miles seemed to wither the very garments of the earth, the fiery blast of far distant cannon broke loose to add to the terrific clamor and din, and exploding storm of shells made a din so terrific that it was awe inspiring but now the glandelinians were starting to give way from the positions at Gertrude Hoffmann and like ten shattering storm waves of men the Abbeismians pressed on, and like at Francis Atlanta a large body of christian cavalry divided a rallying force of glandelinians from the main body and closed them in, but folly was everywhere for these fools would not surrender for all this portion of the glandelinian force six million strong fought to the last man, as none would dare surrender.

The remainder of the glandelinian force at this section however still remained firm despite the battering storm of both the hammering christian onslaughts, and their ravaging cannon fire, and with their own cannon and musketry again and again cut down the christian hordes as the thrashing machine does the wheat, but the foremost Abbeismian columns finally swarmed over the parapets and falling upon the glandelinians with greater slaughter finally forced them from the works pell-mell.

...determined to start the battle along the main center of general ... line, and so he ordered general Phelan Johnston to make the assault ... duty. This big glandelinian column poured upon the christian center ... front force and fury, and also took the completely by surprise. The ... assault was the most desperate that the Glandelinians had ever made yet ... during the siege, for all of Phelan Johnston's Glandelinian forces ... attacked with almost irresistible force, and finally succeeded in throwing ... a good portion of the christian line into a pandemonium of confusion.

The battle at this point raged fully all day long without ceasing, and it took ninety-two counter assaults which were made by the same number of brigades to stop the onerous attack along this portion, and fifty-nine others to drive them back. Like before all the Glandelinians who made the assault were Zimmermannians, Ovarian Curdes, Kurdes, Ovarians, Gargolians, Mc-Hollesstinians and Condencenians, and at other portions of Evans lines the foe delivered fifteen other great onslaughts, which were at first considered successful, but they were failures. This terrible struggle again took a frightful toll of general officers and they numbered about about three hundred eighty mortally wounded, with eight hundred forty-four killed, and six hundred eighty-one severely wounded making a total of many hundreds altogether. It is probable that the whole Glandelinian force which made the series upon series of assaults, and tried in vain to repel the christian counter assaults numbered about 56,789,999 attacking a force of four hundred seven million, seven hundred eight thousand four hundred sixty six Abbieannians which consisted of Evans army, the most reckless attack the Glandelinians had ever made during the war.

The Glandelinian losses were severe in the extreme, and during the series of attacks the fire along the Abbieannian line had been so exceedingly fierce that the losses of the foe was frightful. Manley was struck by his severe defeat after having raged the battle all that night and day, but never hopeless was not discouraged, and barring any efforts to advance in that direction on the part of the christians Manley attempted another assault which almost threw back the christian forces, but during the respite a serious disaster had occurred with the seriously wounding of general Phelan Johnston, and so Manley saw that it was futile, and sweeping upon his lines the Abbieannians delivered throughout the proceeding night over eight hundred onslaughts of the most savage description. The struggle was fearful general Phelan Johnston on the side of the christians was killed, and his forces swept back like broken waves torn to pieces by the resistance of a solid breakwater.

The battle was resumed the next day with exceedingly great fury, and general Hanson Federal of the Glandelinians made a tremendous and most ferocious assault upon general Evans left wing, and after fighting of the most ferocious character in which the slaughter was shocking on both sides, Federal was repulsed, his own left was cut up and thrown into a pandemonium of confusion, and hundreds of his generals had fallen dead, worse wounded, mangled and bleeding, but after desperate efforts he managed to rally his shattered divisions, and while his whole line poured upon the christians a withering fire, he delivered another assault which continued steadily for over four hours, but the christian fire shot his line to fragments, and though he rallied division after division again and again the troops could not stand up before that merciless christian fire, and threatened with annihilation they withdrew in panic, their general Hanson Federal being mortally wounded, his horse like Raymond Richardson Federal at Francis Atlanta being blown to pieces by the explosion of a single shell of a ninety pound calibre.

The Glandelinian forces under general Pickmellian Hanson also had delivered a great assault upon general Evans center but his own whole command with the loss of all his officers had been cut to pieces and routed, and hundreds of thousands of his Glandelinians fell into Evans possession as prisoners.

Fearful firing also prevailed along Whilliamsburger Zimmermanns lines, as he assaulted the enemy to relieve the pressure of assault upon Evans and he delivered a terrifying assault that caused exceedingly severe results upon the enemy, and within four hours Zimmermann had captured another important position of the enemy and held it against repeated assaults. A curtain storm of shell fire threatened to lay low the stretches of forest in this battle field, the din could be heard throughout the whole region, and the battle raged with such fury that it was shocking to behold. Zimmermanns forces to aid Evans and prevent too great a force of the enemy from concentrating upon him, continued their attack upon the enemy attacking in all their force. Ten desperate onslaughts were made covered by the bravest artillery fire, and while apprehensive over the din of the two sections of the battlefield general Vivian started concentrating his own chain of batteries, which soon started with fire, pouring a barrage of shells upon the enemy's position, and the enemy tried to reply but they had been expelled so many of their guns upon Zimmermanns assailants, and so they were at a disadvantage and Zimmermann won his second drive before the enemy could rally, and while the Abbieannian cannon emitted fearful havoc Whilliamsburger Zimmermanns line rushed on closing with the retreating forces of the foe, tearing divisions after divisions and scattering the foe to the four winds. In the meantime whole armies continued their attack upon Evans until they were frightfully mangled, and as general Vivians batteries tore their assaulting columns through and through, they became confused and recoiled, and thrown into panic they finally gave up the contest once more and fled in the wildest confusion, and on after them dashed the Abbieannians capturing thirteen million prisoners, and taking their main line of positions and all the artillery they had abandoned.

Jacken Johnston's army of Mc-Hollesstinians alone still stood its ground, but Abraham Mc-Whirt's army was badly cut up and thrown into disorder, and so after holding firm for several hours, until both the left and right flanks were turned his forces also retreated, and the Glandelinians being exposed to a blasting artillery and masonry fire became stampeded and ran for their very lives throwing down their weapons so that they would not be hindered in their flight. The rest of the line then had to give way, and general Manley sending other forces to the rescue did all in his power to rally the panic stricken fugitives, and sent line after line with fresh artillery to stay the tide of christianity.

But in the seething storm of carnage and desolation, each line was torn to fragments, with their commanders down seriously wounded, and after striking the christian forces thirteen hard and decisive blows had to at last recoil, and then Manley had to give the order for a withdrawal and the forces of the badly beaten foe retreated slowly under cover of the night. It was the first lull in the conflict for over forty-eight hours, and the uproar of the battle all that time had been deafening and incessant. All night the hostile armies laid encamped before each other, and with the first dawn of day they arose again. Evans knew that he success was not complete for he had only captured a portion of the enemy's new position, and though general Vivian had shattered the stretch of wooded country in the rear of the foe, it did not dislodge them from their main position, for silent as the dead the whole Glandelinian army still clustered waiting for the resumption of the fray and evidently defying the christians to come on.

The Glandelinian forces were badly shattered, but nevertheless they were not daunted, and deciding not to wait to be attacked by the "Christian dogs" as they called them, came sweeping forward at nine o'clock, and though intending to attack Evans, swerved too far toward the north, and came head-on upon general Hanson's lines.

The fur of the attack was fearful, and despite the riving fury of scores of thousands of artillery which pounded the region into a seething hell of carnage, swept clean up to the muzzle of the christian guns, and in great masses, poured over the works, pouring upon the christians a fearful fire that tore their front line to pieces. For a time the christian line was in confusion, but general Vivian had soon which way the Glandelinian tide had struck and soon brought his artillery in full play upon the assailants, and either annihilated their front line, or hurled it back with shattered columns, and with stupendous loss in officers, until Hanson gained time to rally the christian forces that were in confusion, and had the opportunity to greet the enemy with an annihilating fire, as they rallied and resumed the assault once more. The uproar of the firing was ear-splitting, and excited Evans who watched for a movement on the part of the enemy along his own lines.

General Suetonius Putterfield at about ten o'clock made a storming assault upon Evans central lines, but after a bedlam of horror his force of 10,000,000 10,000,000 men was swept to pieces, and he with generals Bellen, Pickmell, Blasted, Blank, and Pickmell Manley mortally wounded. This Glandelinian force was caught on all sides during this frightful fiery battle storm, and though crushed as they were they charged sixteen times, in ten until they fell in such great numbers, that it would have taken ten years to write their names on the vast hills of tombstones made out for them. Again and again, and still again these monstrous Glandelinian columns crushed their way through Evans lines only to be vanquished with such terrible slaughter as to appall the survivors themselves. General Francis Scott on the side of the foe was killed, and so was general Agricollia and Carcollia Johnston, while general Galedina and Severus Henrysonia were severely wounded.

Manley driven to a fury of desperate sent a force of 13,000,000 cavarly supported by artillery to storm general Vivians lines, and these horsemen rode again and again against general Vivians thundering batteries, like a sweeping, screaming yelling cyclone of the infernal regions, suborning many thousands of the gunners every time they rode over the christian works, and through the christian infantry lines, but all that time and the dreadful carnage the christian machine gunners mowed men and horses down in such fearful wholesale numbers, that they were used by as breastworks by the fresh christian columns who came to their relief.

It was indeed a desperate struggle, the battle being so fierce that the noise became unendurable. As the glandelinian infantry swept upon general Vivians lines, the whole christian line appeared to burst into flame and din and the storm of death and despair destruction annihilated the first Glandelinian surge exposed to it, but while the firmament above the christian lines appeared to be blazing from the intensity of the christian fire, and while the woods and low hills became hidden in clouds upon clouds of smoke from the crashing fire of cannons, Manley brought up larger forces and while concentrating a most desperate assault upon Zimmermann, and Evans paired the remainder upon general Vivians position in the most fearful array, and just as they got within range general Vivians batteries opened up upon them in full sway and all about the reckless charging glandelinians the explosions of shells that galled them seemed to tear the fragments of the earth into hellish destruction, and as the fiery blast of cannons grew a surge and increased the din, the Glandelinians swarmed close to general Vivians lines, when suddenly the whole infantry became hidden in smoke there was a million cannon like crash as nearly ninety million muskets broke into an unceasing uproar, and torn and tangled with their many divisions all to fragments, the Glandelinians began to give way, and the christians began to press forward, there was a shattering storm wave of men along the foe in a moment, and reinforced by other portions of the main body the Abbieannians pressed forward victorious once again, while a foremost divisions of the foe fell to the last man as they would not surrender and so received no mercy.

The Glandelinians storming Zimmermanns lines went to it with great fury, but his army heedless of the battering ran like assaults, remained firm and cutting down the multitudes of Glandelinian waves like grass, the Abbieannians counter charged, closed with the enemy and sent them flying to their own position, which the Abbieannians speedily carried, and falling upon the still resisting glandelinians with great slaughter finally dispersed them also.

General Tamerline Francis was wounded in the eye as he led a charge upon the foe but he was not mortally wounded, though there was danger of losing that eye.

General Evans now learning that the forces of Zimmermann and Vivian, and Hanson were advancing first repulsed his assailants, and then ordered a general advance all along the line, and this great christian attack broke in full sway late in the afternoon.

To stand against this gigantic christian assault was useless. Fourteen counter assaults were made upon the christians only to be cut down or annihilated, and the whole Glandelinian force confronting Evans was compelled to withdraw leaving the field once more in possession of the christians.

One tenth of all the Glandelinian generals in service were either killed or wounded.

The total number of assaults made by each side during the whole battle as far as it already raged were about fifteen hundred. The Zimmermanns lost about one quarter of their number during the fearful three days engagement, nearly all the serving Quarians confronting Evans was annihilated, the Quarian guards, suffered such heavy losses they they could not take part in any further engagements for a while, and while the Kurds were completely annihilated, the Col Condencians, Mc-Hollestonians, and Gargolians suffered greater losses than ever experienced during the invasion of Glandelinia by the mighty christian armies. The Mc-Hollestonians had made about ninety two assaults, and were every time repulsed, and the Zimmermannians had made fifty nine.

There were fifteen onslaughts made by the Gargolian cavarly upon general Vivians lines and one hundred and sixty six which had been made by the Condencians. There had been about three hundred and eighty eight assaults made by the christian army under Evans alone, and Zimmermann himself had repelled eight hundred and eighty four great Glandelinian attacks, while general Hanson for those three days had repelled four thousand, four hundred and thirty four Glandelinian assaults along his lines within three days fierce fighting.

While losses of officers on the glandelinian side of all rank already were about fifty hundred two hundred twenty two of which were killed. It is probable that the whole Glandelinian loss in killed and wounded during those three days fierce fighting including those taken as prisoners were known by Manley but he refused to give out the reports. Severe as the assaults were in the extreme, and still more severe as were the losses Manley had not been daunted, and though the conflict had been so exceedingly fierce that his losses were either withheld or not correctly known, he nevertheless was bound for the sake of the preservation of Glandelinia cause to retrieve all what he lost, and started the resumption of the battle the next day along the whole of general Evans lines, making a series of most desperate assaults which finally threw the christian line into the greatest confusion, but the vigorous turning movements which he had intended had been observed in time by Evans who prevented a serious disaster by bringing up Hanson's Stacks divisions of Conventinians and Calverinians which checked the enemys advance for four hours, until general Huddle came up with a force of Abyssinians, and then the Glandelinians were thrown back with the loss again of a great commander, General S' Shephir sharpshooter.

Fourteen other desperate assaults as incessantly as charges of waves on the beach were delivered upon Evans whole line by Manley himself in person but the result was in favor of the christians who stood their ground to the very last, and raging the battle all along the line with the utmost stubbornness, and finally cutting up the whole of Manleys assaulting line and after throwing it into a pandemonium of confusion carried all before them, capturing a hundred Glandelinian generals, and shattering division after division again.

Simultaneously a great assault was again made upon the christian line under Zimmermann but all day long his whole line poured upon the series of Glandelinian assaulting waves a terrible fire so destructive, that it tore the whole Glandelinian surge, which though it rallied again and again had to finally yield and give way, and Zimmermann following with great fury cut up the whole force and routed it with the greatest stampede ever seen among the Glandelinians before.

The whole christian line kept up an exceedingly severe fire during the whole battle and again like at Francis At Lanta, had spread worse desolation than any typhoon could have done, laying stretches of forests into splintered wreckage, or setting the afire, and the firing could be heard for fifty miles very plainly.

Along general Vivians line the struggle was again exceptionally severe and sanguinary.

General Carnet had ordered his strongest force to storm general Vivians line, and this great charge he covered with every available battery he could bring to bear on the christian lines, and while general Vivians lines was under a perfect hailstorm of shells, and explosives, that made a bewildering din, the Glandelinian forces swept forward with all the force they could muster, but nevertheless though general Vivian could not man his biggest guns upon the assaults as he had to reply to the Glandelinian batteries, he nevertheless had been prepared for this. He gave the enemys batteries the hottest reception, and passed his chain of machine guns upon the Glandelinian assailants and this terrible fire ate its way through the surging Glandelinians, division after division coming on to the charge was cut to pieces, whole armies rushing forward to storm the works were tangled beyond recovery, and then as the main line came on to make the charge redoubled in fury, its massing artillery and masonry fire that plowed it through a charge, and reduced it until only one quarter of their number was left, and then the survivors recoiled in utmost panic, many throwing down their arms and surrendering, while the remainder sought safety for themselves in precipitous flight, the remainder falling flat on their faces to escape the horrible merciless fire of masonry and cannon. At another portion of the line however the christian army under general James Cannon general Vivians right, had been banded back to far by the pressure of the assault of the foe along that portion, that his whole army was thrown into confusion, and only the desperate dash of general Conventinian Aronburg army saved the day, and caused the Glandelinians to give way before day became possessed with such fury as to be beyond checking, they had been in possession of general Cannons artillery, but nevertheless they had soon been driven off and on account of the swarming up of general Gunders front line general Cannon had nevertheless held his lines together and stood firmly, and finally had turned the left and right wing of his desperate assailants, and opening a blasting masonry and masonry fire on both sides had finally forced the enemy to withdraw, and the whole

Glandelinian surge at this position was rolled up in great confusion. The rest of the glandelinian forces still attacking Gannon's line then had to give way or be annihilated, and General McFarther calling up with his forces rallied them and after standing his ground against thirteen onslaughts of the most savage fury tried all he could to recover the lost ground, and succeeding after most desperate efforts, stored general Gannon's lines, and was able to carry the position with great success, but amid the dreadful carnage he and General Gannon both together fell dangerously wounded. The Abbiecians made thirteen other desperate assaults in their efforts to regain the lost position, and so fierce was the assaults that in their desperate headlong dashes the Abbiecians captured a million prisoners at every assault, and finally drove the foe headlong from the works, with the loss of two other generals Clinton, and Gordon.

The firing along Gannon's lines had been something terrible, and again the ground for scores of miles had river liberated with the din and commotion. Jackson was also fiercely engaged. The glandelinians had not paid any attention to his line during the other days of the battle but today they swept upon him in overwhelming forces. The Christians with any fire tore them with fearful slaughter that was devastating, but the glandelinian survivors seemed to care nothing for the showers of Christian shells, and barrage of musketry fire, which tore over division to pieces, and though they were writhed back with stupendous losses, and with every column shattered they nevertheless swept forward again and again, storming vainly with greater fury the central line of Jackson's army, and though six Christian divisions fought to the last in that fiery battle storm, the survivors nevertheless held firm, and as the glandelinians again rushed there, vanquished them with the greatest massacre of soldiers ever seen during the invasion.

Millions of glandelinian horsemen were slaughtered during this fray in attempting to flank the Christian line, and when millions more rode against the Christian position with the speed of racers the Abbiecians cannon and musketry mowed men and horses down in swarms. It is seen that the cowardly dashed clear among the Christians but it did no good for they were threatened with annihilation and withdrew.

At one point of the battleline the Christian line had been forced to give way before the pressure of the wildest of all the glandelinian onslaughts, the heavens were aflame, with explosions, and burning foliage, a storm of death and destruction was pouring and swooping everywhere all along the line, again the glandelinian assaults were threatened with an annihilation, and as the very atmosphere seemed to turn into fire and the battle fields covered and hidden in clouds of smoke, and as the breastworks seemed to be cone channels of flame and smoke, and the living garments of the earth seemed again to wither and fly off before the drum drum artillery storm, and amid the terrific din that seemed to drive all men who heard it the foe still continued the desperate attack, in regular devilish style rain; once more their loud devil yells, until it seemed probable that they would carry all before them.

At the moment the Christian line started to give way before this shattering storm wave of Glandelinians, the foe thinking they were victorious started to press forward with exultant and derisive yells, but General Zimmerman had observed this great assault, and he sent all his fleetest cavalry to cut off the glandelinians who were moving around Jackson's flank, while he sent the infantry who soon rallied those who were giving way, and once more they faced the exultant foe, while Zimmerman's cavalry divisions surrounded the glandelinians who had been moving around Jackson's flank with the intention of attacking it, and massacred them all.

It was difficult however to drive the main body of the assaults back as yet, for the battering storm of Christian cannon could not daunt them, but Zimmerman put his own artillery in action once more with a fearful thunderous roar and while his guns cut down the multitudes of glandelinians like swaths of wheat, General Zimmerman moved a portion of his left wing forward, and closed down upon the left of the glandelinian flank, and drove it upon the bayonets of the Christians in front with great slaughter. Another glandelinian general was killed, and seeing that Zimmerman's forces was advancing Jackson ordered a general counter charge which was promptly made. This attack was successful, and later in the day the foe made fourteen other desperate onslaughts which were only cut down, before Manley resisted in his fierce efforts, and then he was compelled to withdraw his army doleful armies, and retreat nearer to the capital as action being closed in all the tighter, and the only rest he could see was through the city of Glandelinia if possible.

The field was again left in possession of the Christians, and thus went the battle of Tarentello Siciliano, where scores of millions again fell in that frightful war. All of the glandelinian generals in this army suffered from wounds, and scores upon scores of men-generals had been killed or wounded. Long after this frightful battle the war correspondents could see as at Florinla or Francis Atlanta the desolated fields, the countless hastily erected graves for the dead, and miles upon miles of shattered and burned villages and towns. The number of Christians engaged in this battle out of an army of 600,000,000 million closing on the city of Glandelinia was about 100,000,000. The total number of charges made by the glandelinian army all the throughout the four days battle of the third day four day alone was about one hundred and twenty three indeed a grand total to the one hundred and twenty four made by the Christian divisions. Nineteen assaults of the foe alone were slightly successful during the bloodiest battle of the invasion as it was.

Not long after fierce efforts was made by Manley to drive back the Christian army at Armeekarsch. It was another bloody battle especially for the size of the armies engaged, the battle starting along the left wing of the Christian line, and the firing seemed to tear the air from the tremendous din. The glandelinians made assaults upon Zimmerman in monstrous waves, the fury of the battle turning the whole field of strife into a volcano of flame and din. The firing on both sides roared like a thrilling cannon, as the Glandelinians assaulted Manonians Abyssinians, the attack being of four hours duration, and though the assault of the enemy for a time before so irresistible that a portion of the whole Christian line was forced from their works, the glandelinians were never nevertheless counter assaulted by the main body, and when almost annihilated and outflanked the glandelinians gave way. The timely arrival of reinforcements at this point checked the fearful glandelinian storm and the battle for the rest of the day raged with fearful fury at this section of the line, the Christians holding their ground to the very last until General Vivian came up, and repelled assaults of such tremendous fury that he had to concentrate all his available guns to stop their fifteen hundred maddened hammering onslaughts. All day long hundreds of thousands of cannon of every calibre was concentrated upon the glandelinian columns who continued the assault and committed such incapable havoc as never seen before since the recent great battle, whole portions of the main line of glandelinians being torn to fragments by the torrents of shells as they still came on and only when threatened with annihilation did they withdraw.

THE BATTLE OF LA BOHEIE.

Here at LaBoheie there staged another bloody battle another of the bloodiest battles of the invasion. So frightful was this battle that it would take too long to give it a full description, but General Vivian who assaulted destroyed the left grand division of Manley's army, with the deaths of the Glandelinian generals Twerline Hanson, and Federal Storning. Then General Vivian concentrated toward the left of the position in full force and the sound of battle now was very terrific and could be heard for a hundred miles.

Some of the most marvellous events occurred along the glandelinian center where the worse of the struggle raged in full sway, moral vivians center being the foremost engaged of the whole entire battle, and it was he who though his best and stern strongest divisions were cut to pieces and driven back in confusion stayed a thrilling tide of success for the enemy, and drove the enemy back time and again all crushed to fragments. The Glandelinian general Callahanna was responsible for a disaster along Manley's extreme right wing which caused the annihilation of thirteen divisions and captured Manley's strength a good deal. One of the bloodiest scenes of the battle was when a drum drum fire was poured upon a charging column of over 10,000,000 Glandelinians, which though crushed them to fragments, had he he massed upon another ten million which rushed forward for hours during that amazing assault before they were finally decimated and driven back in the wildest confusion. Then a third time a column of glandelinians the same strength rushed forward to storm the Christian line, but three hundred thousand cannon tore the main line to pieces and sent them flying back in panic to where they had come before it got into close quarters with the Christian line the hundreds of thousands of Anglo survivors retiring in fearful confusion. These scenes however were no the worse as more terrible ones occurred elsewhere. The battle raged all all day without the slightest intermission the cannonading being exceedingly terrific, and the very air had seemed to be thickly blasted from the din.

"It's doing it for their own good." Answered Hanson. "If they don't want to, well then I'll have to let them stay for I'll not force them." Hanson and Hargor then rode to general Evans headquarters and asked him what he thought was best to do.

"On what?" Asked Evans.

"On forcing the quick surrender of general Hanley and his whole army." Answered general Hanson. "There are fifteen other glandelinian armies at large and we fear that they would come upon us in the quickest time to save Hanley and his army from capture. If those fifteen armies come even one after another they may save him, though unable to whip him as feared, and the war will then have to be continued for probably another two ya years. And I'm tired of this darn war now."

In the meantime general Evans had received this message from one of the christian generals:

"Dear general Jack Ambrose Evans; Your little step-sisters were with me last night, after general Hanley's whole army became captured, surrounded, and I must have told you how they looked over the outcome of the series of great struggles at the Glandelinian capital. They saw everything that happened and I did not. Violet and her sisters missed nothing during the great conflicts from the rise of the curtain to its fall. As for myself I have spent most of the time watching them to night. They were sitting motionless for hours, their bodies at least were motionless--gazing at everything going on within our camp as it seemed to come. But their faces. You ought to have seen them. You should have seen the changes--start, laughter, awe and enthusiasm. I could never get it into my mind to begin to describe the emotions that we were sharing one another so frequently upon their pretty faces. During the time that there had come rumors that general Hanley had found his means of escape cut off they seemed to be still more changed, and still motionless, save but their eyes and their faces. That's it their faces and eyes were dancing with some strange delight, and when general Zimmerman's message came the little girls looked as if the little girls ought to look when they are safe in heaven. They were eight certainly. All of the soldiers around who were talking over the threatening downfall of general Hanley, and of Glandelinia turned their eyes to watch your little girls. Even a few sitting in front of Violet and her sisters turned around to look, but they took no notice of their glances, for they seemed to be up to some seventh heaven of childhood's bliss. These few children's faces. You had better come and see the little girls before their happiness slackens."

Your true friend;

General Beronette
True Commander of Richville Militia
why....

Evans then rushed off to find the little girls but to his surprise they were gone, and no one knew where they were. The real mystery was this:

The only city clock tower since the bombardment of Glandelinia had not been was striking half past five as general Hanley defected and his army turned into the only headquarters he could find safety in selecting. He had scarcely entered the yard when five windows of his selected private office, an unusual and most astonishing sight caused him to rub his eyes. It was a chilly cold day, but the five windows were open from the bottom all their way, and out of each were leaning with their heads stretched out as far as possible fifteen of his general staff officers, all of them seeming to be sneezing most violently, sometimes all at once, sometimes in unprovoked snorts and snivel and occasionally so as to sneeze in a snoring note. One sneezer or not each general wore a look of extreme distaste. Doubtless the sneezing of the officers' noses as he did could cause a headache in a moment. The windows of the little girls' room were also open and a unknown contribution to their sneezing was made by like stretched heads looking out of a rear door, he turned the knob of the door and, and the door opened, and out his face, general Evans entered. The room looking like an ordinary office had no look of any kind but a strong but a strong rope was fastened to the knob and tied to a chair in such a way that those inside were effectively type imprisoned. It was the work of a moment to unfasten the rope.

"Generals!" He cried sternly "What is the meaning of all this?"

"Your excellency!" began one of them and sneezed with a roar.

"Answer!" Said general Evans. "It was--sneezing."

"It was those darn Vivian--sneezing!" supplied general Roeder.

"Those little bilious--sneezing--balls!" Added general Tacko.

The whole thing was indeed incredulous to general Hanley.

"Do you mean to say..." he began "that those dodgasted Vivian girls, Violet and her sisters--sneezing, sneezing, as sneezing, sneezing, sneezing..."

"Sneezing, sneezing, sneezing, sneezing, sneezing. Chimed in the generals, in the relays of two and three.

"It is true that those Vivian girls forced you big generals into this room and--sneezing--sneezing--sneezing..."

"Sneezing, you sneezing, sneezing, sneezing, sneezing, sneezing, sneezing, sneezing..."

Went all of the generals.

It was apparent to general Hanley after he made an examination that Violet and her sisters had been there, and when after making his plans which he intended to use to effect his escape through the christian lines, they were discovered by the generals they had threw boxes of stuff right into their faces, and fastened the rope to the door knob and the bench so they could not get out of the room, and so had effected their own escape without even detection and pursuit. Realized the truth general Hanley though he almost laughed at the plight of his generals felt apprehensive nevertheless. He saw that he had personally made out of Violet and her sisters his most dangerous enemies, and he realized it too for many times when he had faced them they had looked daggers at him. Now he realized that his persecutions of those little girls had caused him a hell of trouble and even now when his army was threatened with disintegration and he himself threatened with only God knows what those little girls humiliated him still further by daring to spy on him again, and cause all this sorrow after making his plans and getting away. His accounts for general Evans not finding them later they came straight to Evans to his surprise and showed him to this astonished eyes what they had secured within the enemy's lines. After Evans heard of what had occurred, and then sending for the little girls he waited for them to appear, and then ordering them to come with him he hurried into his office, shut the door, and set the whole place shaking for five minutes with a clatter of laughing, while Violet and her sisters though not knowing what he was laughing about screamed out their own laughter because they could not help it.

"Violet and your sisters!" Said Evans at last "Do you little girls know that you can beat the most cynical humorist?"

"No Evans I did not know that." Said Violet still laughing. "What has the trouble been that you laughed so loudly and caused us all to join in without our being able to know what it was all about?"

Evans showed him the document stating of what occurred within Hanley's headquarters outside the captured city of Glandelinia.

"Did you little girls do this?" He asked.

"Yes yes." Admitted Jennie. "It was the only means to escape."

Evans again laughed, and then said:

"Pretty as you little girls are I believe for the Glandelinians you are worse than even the Sherburne kids. Worse than Charles Chaplin we have ever heard of."

Violet and her sisters did not say anything to this, and finally when Evans so troubled himself he said again:

"I believe you little girls have scared general Robertson still more, and if we capture the whole Glandelinian army soon the whole will be given to you little girls and no one else."

"But how can we capture the whole Glandelinian army?" Asked Violet herself. "We are not soldiers but only little girls."

"I did not say you little girls would capture the whole Glandelinian army." Answered general Evans. "You are the cause of it if it happens."

"Oh!" Was Violet's rejoinder and then after laughing Evans and thinking that they left to stroll the camp for a while before the passing of the evening. Three days had passed and general Robertson Jackson Hanley had made more fierce efforts to break through the christian lines in a terrific battle lasting three days at the point of the Glandelinian coast called the city of the Fair of the snows. For many times Hanley almost succeeded in pulling his armies through the christian forces and the most frightful slaughter of the war, but finally the Glandelinian armies were so badly reduced and so many officers had fallen that the survivors so far had refused to continue the slaughter any longer and were for their themselves up to the christians. The loss is all over it with. "Anley ran filled with brandy, and recoiled from the fiery christians lines with the aim of over 45,000, and he killed and wounded and pris him to that of the christians loss of 300,000 only 3,400,000. Two of "Anley's generals had surrendered their own arms, and one of the soldiers now said that the Glendalins' cause was really lost, time to desert in fold the numbers put on over to the christian lines to surrender themselves and to bat for more. General "Anley now realized that the cause was really lost. The other christian armies had been burned of the state, and of in outcome, and "Anley that the armies of Abbaquah in the south had made not forced marches that they had burned all approaches to Glendalins and no "Anley could not expect any help whatever." The Glendalins in the end a cannibals and body words and fled and deserted to to his fate, and there was no end, all this.

On seeing that there was no hope of securing the Christians decided to end it all, and three days later after defiantly refusing to surrender he went into his headquarters, and before his officers attempted to take Araratik but by desperate efforts they prevented him, telling him that it was "foll" and that he would not take it worse for him self in hell for he had a lot to pay for to "Abidg" God for all he committed during the four and a half war. The attempt to end his life was made over six times but a 1 the attempts was discovered and frustrated by his officers, and so seeing that he could not end it this way he decided to risk battle again even if it would cause the loss of his own life, and the destruction of his army. But his army were not fools and they refused to resume any actions against the Christian lines, the officers declaring that they did not wish to unite the army could decide because he wanted to do so.

So seeing every plan useless, he made preparations to bring an end of the error as possible through the Christian lines, and finally that night he met about 700,000 men gathered to escape through the circling Christian army, but was pursued by over a million Abh cannon cavalry.

"Now that General 'Bule' Manley was gone the commander who was in charge of the army decided to surrender. He sent this note to General Zimmerman who was in control at this point:

Genrl General 'ic'hon.

Phillipsburg or Zinner and received this note from Claudelinton messengers who were sent with it, and after consulting his officers he wrote back.

I for one would receive no surrender from any Glandelinian dog. If you wish to surrender as I proposed request General Hanson or General Evans to accept it. I for one will receive no surrender, and would not do so either if I was the commander of the world. So don't write to me again on the subject. General Hanson.

"The report" of our policy which to surrender our commitment to a workplace to avoid further alienation. Was the situation however.

"The young General has come to his senses at last but he doesn't want to surrender." "Tell them I'll call it true but he will have to surrender or else we're going to kill him." "We'll wait, no longer." "The sooner you surrender the better it will be for you, and the loss of your country will be devastated." "Tell him to come to my headquarters at eight o'clock at night and sign the surrender."

The two spokesmen then parted and the two grides lay more silent than they had ever been except that they were forming in two night-kill lines with crossed flags exposed in positions. It was the property for the capture surrender. The christian captives were all assembled together in "ransom headquarters, and violet and her sisters were there too to witness the surrender of General Mahood. At about eight o'clock the Gladiolus general with domestic eyes was seen approaching between the two drawn up lines, the Gladiolus general at one side, and the christian general at the other with presented arms. Behind the general came his officers to witness the surrender and another squadron with the flags and standards which were to be surrendered. He rode slowly and melancholy up to "ransom headquarters, dismounted, and strode up the steps, untill confronted by the great christ-ian christian general. Violet and I followed him in to the room where the generals were all assembled.

General Westcott was a doleful but handsome looking general fatherly in appearance, and as soon as he confronted General Benson he said: "Your excellency before I surrender I wish to submit that I never allow a child to die in the war, nor neither the soldiers under my command. I have proofs to show of this."

"It is true and I have discovered," admitted General Benson, mildly; "but your innocence of my crime does not exempt the military officer of the soldiers for 12 miles," General "Bunker" who like a monk deserted them in time of dejection which he has feared "to save Glendelinda from being possessed by Abi" Glendelinda the terms of surrender are:

"Prisoners will have to stop the remainder of child slavery. Second, all property in Calverda, in the northern section will be given over to us as our own for the destruction of Calverda and property during the remainder of the Month, and as many children as had been slain during the war. And the date of the war will have to be replaced by the children of your own nation orphans or not. And also a fine of one million dollars shall be paid for the destruction of property in Calverda which will be the highest fine we can impose as we shall keep all prisoners we have taken during the conflict to make them rebuild the ruins, fix up the farms and so on without pay until all work is finished and the scars of war are compelled to disappear. Then the prisoners will be allowed their freedom, and only those who can prove they never took part in the entire destruction of children's lives.

"These are the terms I would upon Ghanaian. If she wished wishes to have peace, and wishes to retain her freedom which we were forced to give her when she rebelled against us so long ago. Otherwise we will take possession of her country and make everyone our subjects and slaves for twenty years."

For a time the gladiolus general was silent as he pondered on this problem. Now, but there was no way out of it and the gladiolus general could see it too. So fearfully did the Galvianian country have desolated and only during the war that it was considered almost wiped out. As lives and property, Amvethin had also been horribly desolated, as many of their people died out so terribly that not over a million men survived out of all those that served during the three years of the war. So finally wished an hour's time to make his decision but General Hanson said:

"As I stated before I cannot and will not tolerate any delay any longer. You must decide at once, and at once it shall be. It is necessary for you to go as good as well as ours that there be no delay. We wish the both of you to see this war is finished and the sooner you accept the better. There will be some leniency shown by the fifteen years to me. The fine same.
And your action is so far that it cannot say that the fine cannot be paid.
If the fine is refused then the prisoners of war you shall give the life of the children who were in slavery under your wicked owner for all these fourteen three years, and therefore this will be in consideration of Abraham's life is given to me and is ended. The acceptance the surrender in Abdomin was not for Gola sake don't be a fool and delay it. If you are not so of the other women in you will listen to reason and would as soon as me wish."

"Will do so," was the answer, and General Wickham presented his sword which General Hanson very graciously returned as well.

"We do not wish to take your sword." "I don't want it." "We wish you to sign your name on this slip of paper." "This is the method we have for

...and enter the city and set up your silver standards, and then your standards
...and then your standards.

The defeated Glandelinian general took the city of Glandelin and reeling

"I heard 'Hickoo' as sure as I'm in the Glandelinian army, for only under the command of Hanley who deserted to the ... and the surrender is witnessed by three hundred Abbeannian commanders, the Vivian Girls, and my own officers. Signed.....

Finally signed his name with slow but sure and steady hand. Then he presented his sword to general 'Hannon who again returned it to him.
"It is I, I am not general. For you and your army the war is over.
"I'll allow you and all of your officers the kindness of freedom but the army shall be retained as prisoners until the city of Glandelin and children confesses themselves, and allow allow themselves to be slaves until all the havoc in Calverinda and Angolinda is atoned for. You may go."
Then the Glandelinian generals after placing their swords and pistols, and cartridge belts on the table withdrew in double file with down cast heads, and finally left the building, looking toward the army in gray with eyes so and not so noble that it touched the hearts of their own enemies and striking their bad shaven heads several times violet and her sisters saw the defeated generals led their horses away through the silent and profound respect of his christ i their christian enemies, and the respect and careful war worship of their own men who were filled before and among broken debris of wagons and runw and past skeleton horses and skeleton men. Then came the surrender of flags, artillery and firearms, and then of buildings and army tents.

It was the greatest surrender of a Glandelinian army that had ever occurred. It was reported that the number of men captured was incredible and of the provision and other things at all more incredible. The reports of the capture are as follows:

Glandelinian privates captured after surrender of general 'Hickoo;
177,999,999.
Artillery: 100,000 guns of heavily calibre.
Small artillery. 45,000 machine guns.
Field pieces. 10,000.
Glandelinian provisions trains. About forty. Wages about 10,000,000 wagons.
Rounds of ammunition. 800,000,000.
Muskets and pistols. 98,979,976.
Force of cavalry. 10,000,000
Surviving officers. 17, (17,962.
Artillery cases - caissons. 156,666.
Horses. 178,888,888.

It was indeed the biggest haul the christians had ever made. The armies not needed for further battle was detailed to guard these prisoners, in their northern march for Calverinda, while others were sent to help the distant christian armies to move against the remaining fifteen Glandelinian armies and 11 standing firm, while Evans, Zibermann, Vannon, and general Vivian proposed to go after 'Hannon and his one hundred thousand before he could retreat.

Soon after the great surrender general 'Hannon said "Forward"
The day he crossed the great Eridula, he said it to the armies operating against the fifteen other Glandelinian forces. After another battle south of Glandelin he said it again, and the last brutal report of howling down the southern battlements and sea wall of the Glandelinian struggle, was again well under way. Throughout those bloody days violet and her sisters was still with Evans, and Zibermann making a swift two weeks tramping march toward the men refused to intercept 'Hannon, and cut off from enemy though
'Hannon had managed to swell his scattered force up to a full million men. In January the city of Glandelin held by 'Hannon fell under the terrifying blows and in that same month violet and her sisters saw all of their recent conquests Glandelinian and everywhere after the battle of 'Hannon. Later in the last of January the Glandelinian Confederacy toppled at the western part of the 'Hannon line under Zibermann's blow at the battle of 'Hannon. So after many months, three more battles, and many a skirmish, the nation of Glandelin and the million and hundred

All the statements that was demanded upon Glandelinian could not be placed here, and would have to fill a thousand books twice the size of this story to describe the all. For every prisoner had been captured their number was withheld by the Abbeannians, but nevertheless they were already marching through Calverinda to its northern part for the internment a camp and work soon was planned in which the Glandelinians would have to do without pay for the havoc committed in Calverinda and Angolinda. It was fair to make them do it, for Glandelinian had ruined property of the christian countries and it was the duty of Abbeannia to make them repair it and under the lash too if necessary.

About four weeks after the surrender of general 'Hannon, general 'Hannon Vivian himself decided to march his own personal armies home ward bound, his brothers was to follow, but Evans and Zibermann and the others were to remain in Glandelinia until given further notice. Violet and her sisters was requested to follow but as general Vivian declined to leave Glandelinia as long as Evans remained, general 'Hannon decreed that his brother concentrate with Evans, and that Violet and her sisters were to remain until the purpose was started in which to pursue the rascally Glandelinian Eric 'Princes and Queens who had escaped at the approach of the christian armies.

'Hannon's armies and some others were soon on their way back through Calverinda by train, having passed on series of trains through Angolinda, and thence through Calverinda, and so complete was the victory of the christian nations that though they witnessed the ruins of the Glandelinian and Angolindian soldiers, the towns meant the soldiers only as a hymn and other songs, besides the very pieces sung in 'Meriv America as the "Red White and Blue," "The Star Spangled Banner, Battle Cry Of Freedom, and many others, as well as "Marching through Georgia. Also by Abbeannia in the meantime preparations were being made to relieve the suffering victims of the cruel war, ships laden with goods of all kinds, toys and presents and the like which had been interned in the Glandelinian ports for four years which were forwarded to all the nations that had suffered. The ships had been rushed by the thousands, so as to make the work as quick as possible and not allow another sad Christmas day come for the innocent children of the other christian nations.

It was indeed a great joy to these nations to learn that the mighty power of wicked Glandelinia had been crushed, and the rejoicing throughout the world was tremendous. All the suffering victims in Calverinda and Angolinda had also been fully aided even during the war, even when the Abbeannians first burst through the barrier on the boundary line of Abbeannia, where unnumbered tremendous battles had also waged until nearly a hundred more had been fought, and now all seemed more happier again.

The ruins in Calverinda however was fearful. The wreckage of cities in Angolinda was greater in dimensions also but not so severe as Calverinda which had been overrun a hundred times like Serbia in the great world war.

And during and after the war Glandelinia had been justly punished.
In fact the christian side suffered the most, but that was in the loss of property. The slaughter of soldiers during the war had been greater among the Glandelinians who had shocked the christian armies so frequently with their millions of tremendous onslaughts, and also a good portion of their own land had been frightfully devastated.

Their best leaders had fallen, nothing survived of any of their most abled bodied generals, except those who had resigned in the war, or general 'Hannon 'Hannon, who had been captured, and then forced to surrender. And worse of all their capital had been hammered into total ruins. The whole city of Glandelinia which would hold three Chicagoes, New York and London put together, a city nearly as large as Vivian
'Hickoo had been intirely smashed into fearful wreckage, and their capital building had been ransacked, and all its belongings carried off by the victorious christians and then burned to the ground. The kings palace had also been demolished, and about as one quarter as much forest as in Calverinda had been burned in Glandelinia. Great floods as predicted before had been let loose, drowning hundreds of thousands, and rendering scores of millions of per people homeless, and the losses in every other material had also been heavy.

The war had raged for those four years and seven months with such unspeakable fury that indeed it could have seemed as hundreds of millions of those Abbeannian typhoons had raged on every battle field, and every battle itself had caused more widespread devastation than any number of typhoons in a more certain point....

It seemed to me that the catastrophe struck not the world when it was launched but at the very beginning of the Christian faith. The Jewish nation was captured and fallen, and that general Herod was left with only a fragment of an empire and not the whole. The whole Christian nation was left to speak over the ruins. In every Christian until a few years were flowing, thousands of celebrations went on, "Millions of houses were built by thanksgiving in the Catholic church, and the children cheered and were once again happy for now a time all the western and eastern Catholics and Anglican reports were made, covered the Christian's Christian's horrors would come to over."

Abkhazians felt happier too, and their population was fairly wild over the news of Glendwinas fall, and celebrations were about as noisy today in Abkhazania as in the Glendwinian war was raging at her very doors. In Gvarkavia there was very little celebration as it was too desolate to cheer the surviving inhabitants, or returned wounded soldiers, but in Angulud Angulinda there was also some excitement.

7. It was as if the whole world was cheering at one time, and to many nations were joyful all factories in every city of the world closed for a week, and fire crackers were used so freely that the din of their explosions was terrific. The most remarkable part of the celebrations was of the numerous objection flags bearing from every window, or across the streets, in the cities of the nations, the flags on staff and of the school children in their own protest celebration, which made a scene which would have amazed and thrilled any one who could have observed it. So a week at these celebrations following at first that all their good news about the fall of the Glendalvin captives was false, but it was not until the news also came in that all of eastern and southern American Glendalvin was in possession of the children, and that very evening of the fire had been destroyed or captured, the whole world went wild with joy and excitement.

"Gloria! Gloria! Gloria!" they heard everywhere in the streets of Abbeville as they called themselves. "The war will soon be over. Gloria!
Gloria!"

Of the celebration mentioned Abbe's name was the noisiest. Her fleets of ships continued to fire shots over the offu occurrence, and all shore batteries also joined in, schools were closed for the celebration, and all the convents and hospitals, and other great institutions were dressed in the building and place of Abbe's name.

And so your flag flew from the windows that it made a very pretty sight and sometimes fell occasionally so that when thrown from every window and roof of the buildings that the houses at the distance of one hundred feet could hardly be seen, and the celebration took place in the area which was over three feet deep in ash, snow.

It certainly was indeed great news, and was a great cause for all the celebrations that were going on. Violeta, sister and Aunt who were then settled in Abbeinnia also took part in the celebrations, not only of the room next but because so many letters had informed them that their beloved little girl, Carlos was just as safe as if she had been in Abbeinnia with them all the time. Of all the excitement during the celebration, all of it cannot be told. The ten "border" or "border" soldiers who were wounded beyond chance of recovery in the to rejoice their work, were cheering with the rest as the train pulled into the station, and all the visitors, made an immense cheer. Great fires were even made purposely on account of the celebrations which had the firm departments on the trip, but nevertheless the joy was so great that it did not seem just to punish the men dancers, who anyway did fire to the silent abbeinn, and hence what other did not seem to punish or what were of no use to the owners, to not cause a wrong had no. The firm "border" men.

The brave stand of general Everette True and his routing the gladiolabium saved general Humsan with him from apparent disaster of a free - seriously jeopardized condition. And general picknell not being wounded at the highest fury of the fray along his lines his army could probably have made as great a success as Everette True did but with a good part of the assembling; and his line of gladiolabium had been frightfully shattered and torn and mangled and driven into confusion general picknell fell severely wounded while urging his men forward to make a further counter charge, and so his whole line gradually went to pieces, and only the main efforts of Everette True and his other commanders to resist that tide of gladiolabium managed to prevent them from winning from picknell's badly torn lines with a terrible fury that forward does upon a shattered army, until he had armed the remnants along his lines, and then forced them to retreat back to a counter charge, and the gladiolabium rear line, finally routing picknell's assailants like sheep a full forcing them to retreat without any hope for further reorganization so good the best to stop picknell and Everette True's lines. The bloodied battle that occurred in the center of gladiolabium. The gladiolabium before they had been slayed had mangled against picknell's badly crushed lines like the thousand horses of the Argentine army, the thing all day long coming and going, and still along like a million steam, the explosions by the hundreds of thousands and the main number of an unliking orptions by the hundreds of thousands, and the whole battlefront was a scene of the hideous and carnage. And the millions of the armed all general givem batteries around an ridges of mountains, and the columns of the Mt. Colerian line, the plains and mountains as if in conflagration and the ground was covered with a general all from the last terrific day.

At this critical moment General Phillippshurger Zimmermann had arrived with his army of Abyssinians and Calverinians, and observed the disaster to the christian army under general Hanson yivian. It was too late to rally them, and Zimmermann's army stood its ground all the rest of the day covering Hanson's retreat, and then held the enemy at bay until Hanson's badly crushed army could be reformed. Night closed the scene, and it was believed that general Zimmermann would change his position and withdraw his forces from the foe: Zimmermann did change his post positions that night, but brought his army so close to the enemy, that in apprehension they had to storm his lines most unmercifully during the whole second day. The battle had raged on that second day with the most frightful fury, but it was of no use to attack Zimmermann's army, which not only held its ground like grim death, but made such a storm of crushing counter charges, that general Hanley was glad to withdraw his army from the frightful butchery, and escape to save his army from destruction.

Phillippshurger Zimmermann was the most trusted general that Hanson yivian or even the whole nation ever depended upon. Even when his army even though victorious at the battle of Catherine Jackson, and also reduced to remnants and crushed was reported as annihilated and annihilated, and when the last stand of Christianity was on, he did not give up hope, but drew from Angelinia the many standing armies not yet in action, and when his armies were filled with reinforcements from the suddenly approaching Abissinians and Angelinian troops from Angelinia who had succeeded in breaking through the barrier near Calverine he crushed his way through every opposition and met from the enemy, proving a veritable human cyclone like Federal himself only worse and made such cyclonic attacks that he finally broke up for good and all the glandelinian invasion at the bloody battle of Gloria or Aronburg Run.

Even after the end of the war approached, Zimmermann was left in command of all the christian armies who were to remain in glandelinia with the intention of overpowering small bodies of glandelinians who may be still causing trouble, as all did not as yet surrender, and also to prevent any further uprisings from the main nation, and to suppress it should it occur. For all he had accomplished during the war Zimmermann was now trusted to this great work and his armies were as numerous and as strong as when the war was brought to a close. Other armies had also been left in glandelinia and also one was left to keep in possession of the wrecked and devastated city of glandelinia until the governments who had moved to the city of purkellin agreed to the fines which was imposed upon glandelinia for the brutal slaughters of children and damage done during the long and bloody war.....

Though all was quiet Zimmermann has had occasionally reported that heavy conflicts still occurred, with armies of glandelinians in small bodies which were still at large, and he had received instructions to run them down at no matter what the cost, and to use all the harshest measures possible. Violet and her sisters since they returned to Abissinnia, at the close of the war, and who were now in their old fashioned garden where they had kept the young plengiglomenean serpent, but which was full grown now felt happier than they had ever been before and during the war, not because the war was over, but because of their share of the fun and excitement they had during the strife itself. They had as yet not forgotten the scenes of the far war, the havoc committed, by the battles and the enemy, and also the great forest fires, several of which were still burning, but nevertheless it was the same as allowing by-gones be by-gones, and though they could never forget all these horrors, they nevertheless did not feel so bad about it any more and felt almost proud that they had been the chief heroic heroines of it all and done more than any soldier on either side, and went through more excitement also. They also thought of the young young plengiglomenean creature they had left in the garden and of the many they had seen during the war especially those they had observed attacking the wicked wicked glandelinians for their misdeeds.

Though the war was ended in glandelinia itself the foe had yet to be conquered in Calverinia. It was the purpose of the christian generals to crush glandelinia by an immediate driving invasion while her armies most of them were in Calverinia, and thus by weakening glandelinia render her too helpless to support the armies fighting the Abissinians and Angelinians in Calverinia. This plan had been carried out most successfully though already the war was in duration over four years. But the shooting of the two Manleys as had been reported had not been fatal after all. There were two other Manleys called John and Guebaum and these had conducted the defense against the christian invasion, while the other christian rascally Manleys had been operating their armies in Calverinia. Federal it is true was put out for good but there was another Federal still surviving by his very same looks though not so dreadful in his ways.

Violet and her sisters felt disappointed when they learned that they had never shot the two Manleys but then on other occasions they also felt glad as they felt sorry for them more than anything else and the little girls believed that this was a sign from God that their prayers for the conversion of the Manleys would soon be granted. General Hanson and his brother with Zimmermann and others had left the immense christian armies behind to guard glandelinia and her provinces while they went back to Calverinia to once more resume command and to help crush the glandelinians in Calverinia and end the entire war. The armies left in glandelinia were commanded by thirteen high generals and sixteen hundred other lower generals and so they were well supplied with good officers and did not fear that glandelinia could crush them out of their country and give more support to the fighting glandelinian armies in Calverinia so that badly depleted in the end the glandelinians would soon give in and Calverinia would be free.

The enemy it was learned under the three original Manleys were concentrating three large separate armies toward Mary Mc-Allister Run and Violet and her sisters desiring to see the outcome went there with some of the better christian armies, and with Jack Evans.

~~SECRET~~ B 313

Wang was not alarmed at the note and so was "Jolet and her sisters" who had been surprised at the fury of the old wife. She had fairly thrilled them to the heart's full of general Chinese soldiers had been excited when word of the distant foe forces threatened with demonstrations, and some spiritual enervating but nothing serious had occurred. Wang responded to Hsiao-mo's telegraphed note by telegraphing back:

"I have heard the fierce conflict all day yond yesterday and was surprised and so were the little girls that so fierce a battle should have been raging when we had hopes, all of us that soon the fighting would cease, and the war come to a speedy end. My lines a have been severely tested by the fire of Glandelinian batteries, and also we have been threatened by a portion of the Glandelinian army when I learned under general Ignorance Wickey, but no assault occurred any where, though I received constant reports that firing of heavy consequences was heard among the railroad lines of the Pandora and Ho-Hollerster east of Glandelinia.

It is true that I have escaped a general battle, and I believe it is wise that we do something to lighten the capture of the so called Manley before those other fifteen Glundelinian armies manage to break through the southern Christian armies, and crush us altogether.

I have heard that those two armies came from an unexpected direction, that they never came from those other fifteen armies, and were under two other generals whose names we know not among those fifteen armies. So it may have been some other Mandelintian armies, who had escaped the christian forces in the east, and rushed to the attack after arriving here in their fierce endeavor to rescue Hlan'ey and help prolong the war.

We can hope and pray your excellency General Hannon that the this will be the last battle of such horrible fury, that the war despite all the way it seems will have a speedy end, and not prolong too

Your friend and loving MOTHER

General Jack Ambrose Evans.

The next move on the part of the christians was intended upon Hanley. Hanley had a strong full foothold upon the neighboring hills, which though he had a mere handful compared to the size of the christian armies, was able to hold out for weeks if possible. Violet and her sisters felt disappointed at the slowness of the capture of this great glendellian chieftain, but then overhaste would mean disaster and they waited. They had decided to go and spy on the enemy, and see what general Hanley intended to do, but just now for fear that something might happen to o then, as the foe were ever more watchful general Hanson himself would not permit anyone to let them go, and so the little girls decided to wait circumstances, and see what would turn up. Demand after demand had been sent by wireless to general Hanley to surrender, but he had continually sent defiant refusal, and the only answer many a time was:

"Don't let me to surrender you dirty christ fan curs. Who in hell don't you come and take me. I'm ready for you an' thins." It was finally intended by the christian officers to make an assault upon those foot hills at all points at once, with as many divisions of Abyssian killans and Abhionnatus that could be spared. General Zee Rae was to lead those assaults. The assaults were ate attempted, an' their ends by the most overwhelming numbers was repulsed by the ononys withering fire and they fairly ran back to their lines leaving those hills strewn with myriads of their dead and wounded.....

Violet and her sisters had succeeded however in maintaining the position of ambush on the enemy, surrounded by the christian armies, and after having crept around the enemy lines unseen for some time without learning any information they were now aroused with a sudden start, and with a frightened sense that some one was near them, though at first they could not hear a sound except signal rockets which were then shooting into the sky. But being suspicious they lay very still in their hiding places, their hearts beating high—and so sure that their instinct was true that they were not even surprised when they heard a voice in a thicket above—a low voice but one they all knew perfectly well!!!!

"I tell you general Manley those Abbeinnian cavarly sent by Evans and who is commended by Wrigley is coming up the Brimnie River now. They are going to stay in the hilly region of planks to night, and those crazy Abbeinnian cavarly men will be coming through the hills tomorrow about the first streak of daylight by tomorrow or the next day sure. That christian cavarly leader has not a lot of men, but we can lawmy them fool in the cap and get away all right. We'll tothen like a most desperate effort to break through the christian line at their weakest point."

It was the fierce Glandelinian general Ned Dillon speaking, general Evans Dillon's brother answering:

"I don't want to kill anybody but that damned general Wrigley—Wrigley Buford as he calls himself."

"Well we can get him all right if you do as you are advised. Get another which the little girls recognized as Manley's voice. The heard that day they were a looking for us, and was going to catch us if they could. I'll never surrender and I'll make sure if possible that those christian dogs will never capture me alive...."

"I wish I knew that that was so!" said general Evans with a profane oath. "I have a one of those damned christian dogs would get away if I knew it was just so. But we'll get general Buford as sure as hell. You go tell the boys to guard the gap to night brother dear. The dirty christian dogs might come through before daylight."

And then the noise of their footsteps faded out of hearing, and the little girls rose and sped for the distance of the christian lines. They however sped quickly toward the direction of the gap. "Any times the little girls had to dart into the bushes while unknown men on horseback rode by them furiously, and once the little girls came near being caught by a swarm of Glandelinians on foot all hurrying at Manley's order to the gap through which the brave little girls must go."

Then the saddy road turned from the river, they went slowly along the edge of it, so that if discovered by any of the Glandelinians they could leap with one spring into the bushes. It was raining a cold drizzle that began to make the little girls realize the comfort of heavy rainstorm but it did not chill them as they could even on their naked bodies stand the heaviest cold. But once when Violet swallowed a fly it bothered her so violently so that she was half afraid that she might betray herself and her sisters. At the mouth of the gap it being now night the little girls could see fires on each side of the road in low struts, and could hear low talking, but being cautious the brave little girls had no difficulty in passing the fires on the other side. But on where the gap narrowed there was trouble. It might have been an hour before midnight, when they tremblingly neared the narrow defile of one of the gaps.

The rain having ceased, and as they crept around the boulders the little girls could see by the light of the moon between two black clouds sixteen sentinels beyond. The crisis was at hand now. The little girls slipped to one side of the road, climbed the cliff as high as they could and crept about it. They were past one picket now, and in her eagerness Violet's left foot fell or she slipped and she half fell. She almost held her breath and lay still. So did her sister sisters.

"I hear something up there in the briars." Shouted the second picket. "Wait!" The little girls kept still more quiet and the picket who had passed in laughed aloud.

"Going to shoot empty air are you." He said jeeringly to the second guard. "It was only a twig that fell." A moment later Violet and her sisters moved on. For another half hour they continued on their way near the top, and when they peered out through the bushes no one was in sight, and they leaped into the road and fled down the mountain. At the foot of the spur another picket saw a note the darkness in front of her or the little girls rather.

"Wait who goes there. Do not advance another step or we'll fire without warning."

"Don't aim shoot." cried Jennie as she recognized a red uniform among the distant bushes. "It's only the Vivian girls."

"Advance little Vivian girls then." said the picket astonished to hear the voices of little girls. And into the light of his fire eight beautiful half smiling little children, with wet clinging dresses, and masses of yellow hair surging out of their bonnets underneath stepped the little girls. The startled picket dropped the butt of his musket to the ground and stared as if he saw the colonial beings as it was his first view of Violet and her sisters.

"I want to see your general." said Violet.

"All right." said the soldier very courteously. "He's just below there and I guess he is up. We are getting ready to start now. Come along!"

"Oh no." said Jennie hurriedly. "We cannot go down there as we have important papers to take to our guardian general Jack Evans."

"All right." said the picket kindly. "Give me your messag message, little girls and I'll take it to him." He smiled. "You little friends of God can wait here and stand on guard."

Violet herself told him hurriedly how she and her sisters had come over the mountain, and what was going on over there, and the picket with a low whistle started down toward his camp without another word, and when he heard of it the christian general could not doubt the accuracy of the information—as the picket had names and facts.

"Those dear little beloved Vivian girls did you say?"

"Yes sir." said the soldier hesitatingly. "And they are very pretty little girls too." They came over the mountain alone, and on foot through this dark mess through the enemy's lines. And her sisters passed the Glandelinian pickets on the other side, pretending to be something else besides little girls. "I'm sure."

The general smiled. He knew that trick.

"Where are those dear little girls?"

"They are standing guard for me."

The picket turned at a gesture from the general and led the way. The general thanked the brave little girls for the information gave some information for Evans himself, and then bidding the general good bye and hoping him and his cavarly good luck the little girls fled up the mountain toward Evans' lines. Before daybreak she and her sisters were descending the mountain on the other side facing general Evans' lines, but along the same road thinking some sheep bells they found, and creeping past other Glandelinian pickets. It was raining again now but nevertheless in they did not mind it. As they passed the Ford below the Turner Run she and her sisters heard the splashing of many scores of thousands of horses, and they ran on almost frightened and wondering, the splashing of those horses being made by general Daniel Deener and his men guided by general Jerry Dillon.

As the little girls were continuing on their way they came to a ravine on the right, and a stone rolled from the bushes into the road.

Violet and her sisters immediately halted with their pistols drawn and stood motionless. A moment two crouching figures in gray, with long squirrel rifles slipped out of the bushes, and started noiselessly across the ravine.

Violet and her sisters knowing their wicked intention to shoot at them or at her and her sisters from a hiding place at once leveled their pistol and "Violet screamed loudly."

"Top where you two fellows are?"

The figures crouched more and turned a horrible screwed face toward the little girls. It was two Glandelinian officers who had been seeking the little girls in ambush having known that they were outside the christian lines, they being Dillon and Dillions.

"Oh it's you two fellows is it?" cried Violet. "All drop those guns and come down here."

The two Glandelinian officers arose leaving their guns on the road, and came down babbling.

"What were you two men doing sneaking around the bush?"

"Nothing." The first speaker had to make two efforts before he could speak at all. "Nothing just a hunting for christian soldiers who escaped Manley's line."

"Hunting christian soldiers?" repeated Violet. "She alone lowered her pistol and looked at the sorry figures silently."

"I know what you and your companions were hunting you two dirty rattlebrains." Understand you two are captives of the Glandelinian child slave searchers who go prowling after escaped child slaves. I believe you had something to do with the shooting of general Zimmerman."

The two Glandelinian soldiers shook their heads and fumbled with their hands. "If I and my sisters knew it we would kill you two where you stand now. But I've got one word to say to you though I am only a child, a mere strapping as you Glandelinians may call us if you please you two hell-japs. I hate to think of it, and so do my sisters, but if you make another attempt to shoot at us as it was your intention of doing I'm going to kill you -- she raised one hand to make the Almighty a witness to her oath! I and my sisters will kill you two if we have to follow you both to hell to get you down."

"There is no use in making threats they'll do it any way," said Jennie with a sneer. "We might as well take them prisoners."

"We will said Violet. Then turning to the men she said;

"Turn and march with us."

The two men hesitated.

"Turn!" cried Violet savagely raising her pistol. "In front of us and if you attempt to make any break we'll shoot you where you were sneaking around to plug us---In the back you two cowardly fiends. Throw down your pistols as you'll not need them."

Violet and her sisters arrived within Evans' lines with the two prisoners and the two packages of information toward evening.

Violet and her sisters by their timely warning had saved the camp from disaster and later in the day general Evans got this report from general Frigley;

"Your excellency general Jack Embrose Evans;
Of the army of Abbiennians;

"I've received word from your little girls that the enemy planned to ambush us in the gaps and so the foe really have tried it and we have fully wiped them out of the gap and have the Glandelinian forces still more strongly bottled up. I'm going to make my most desperate efforts to seize 'n 'anley if possible and end this hushhacking fight."

Yours truly
general Frigley.

Thus it proved that the mission of Violet and her sisters had been completely successful in that the enemy had been frustrated by the little girls themselves in their plans, and that also the little girls had secured important papers from 'anley and captured two generals of the foe who had intended to shoot the little girls in the back from ambush. Indeed 'anley himself was astonished that his plans should end so fatally, and as he had missed his aim he fully realized who had caused him to be so frustrated and he felt like killing himself once more, but something restrained him though what it was no one knows. Whether he felt apprehensive of his past deeds or whatever it was it could not be known but nevertheless he did not yield to the temptation and decided to fight it out to the bitter end, and not give up unless he was either seized by force or killed outright in the battles he intended to make. He felt fully safe in his hill refuge however and defied every command of general 'anston or Evans to surrender and finally sent this note by a courier;

"Your excellency 'anston 'vian;

It's only wasting your breath to ask me to surrender. Please do not do so again. I've told you before if you want me come and take me. It's the only time I'll give up. For I'll never give up while there is fighting blood in my veins.

General
Johnston Jackson 'anley.

Violet and her sisters were well informed of the statement of the stubborn and reckless Glandelinian general Johnston Jackson 'anley, and general Evans asked them whether they believed it would be right to annihilate his men or not. "Now Violet and her sisters were getting mighty tired of this long and horrible war, and for a time they hesitated in answering, and then Joyce said;

"For one am for the annihilation of the Glandelinians if the crazy boob won't surrender when he knows well that he can never escape."

Her sisters finally agreed, and so general Evans told of his purpose to general 'anston.

"You see your excellency that the Glandelinian general 'anley has set us so many defiant and insulting refusals and so it is my purpose to warn general 'anley for the last time, and tell him even what will come if he refuses once more. Violet and her sisters are more tired of this darn war than we are ourselves and so I think it is best to do so and not wait any longer."

"I think so myself," said general 'anston 'vian. "We got to end this war before it lasts forever as it seems anyway."

Evans directly sent this note to general 'anley;

"Your excellency general Johnston Jackson 'anley;
Of the besieged Glandelinian army;

You have told us not to write and ask you to surrender again as it will do no good. Well sir it will do good. We will not demand but this once more and you are a big fool to stand before us when you see how surrounded you are by such big armies. We do not wish to do it as it seems a pretty harsh measure, but if you don't comply with our demands, and send us another refusal we'll annihilate your army. This is surely the last time we'll ask you to surrender yourself to avoid further bloodshed. This war has lasted longer than necessary, your cause as you know yourself is lost, and you had to admit it to your soldiers as the 'vian girls who spied on you told us. So if you are not a fool you will surrender as demanded and avoid the annihilation of the small army you have. It is the last straw and we won't tell you again.

General Jack Evans;
Commanded by general 'anston 'vian..."

The messenger brought this to general 'anley by night fall, and 'anley realizing that general Evans would really do it did not know what to do. He did not wish to see the mere hand full of men slaughtered by the fierce Abbiennians. 'anley knew that next to general Phillamur Aronburg Zimmerman Jack Evans had long been the most notorious Christian fighter of their all, having never gave quarter on his expedition of personal vengeance when he caught the foe murdering children, and it was said that not even he knew how many Glandelinian child butchers he had killed, or how many Glandelinians his armies had slew in the many terrific battles he had fought even during the invasion into Glandelinia. Every one of the Glandelinian generals had heard of him, and he was greatly feared. One statement had even been made about Evans by the government of 'ormonia; "If that Christian general Jack Evans had not been placed in command, with the great 'Wrath of God Aronburg Zimmerman' helping him the Abbiennians themselves would have never won as far as they did before the frightful carnage at Francis Atlanta. It is a good example to see how he four or five times vanquished the mightiest Glandelinian armies pitted against him in the fearful battles along the 'o-collector Run, called the battles of Fazzan or 'arie Osborne wilderness woods. The main credit for the fall of the most important cities can be given to both he and Zimmerman who worked hand in hand at this time though at great distances from each other, and this gives rise that his excellency general 'anston 'vian did the wisest thing in placing these two main commanders in independent armies, allowing them to engage as often as possible and once for all or at the enemies of God at the battles of 'ronburg Run and also at 'o-llister Run.

anley decided that the best thing to do was to gather a small handful of cavalry, and have general "Ingdon surrender the army while he himself made his escape. It took some time for him to get this Glandelinian general to comply with his command, and so in the evening "anley disguised himself as some christian general and started through his own lines to the lower foot hills, while the general called "Ingdon made a parley with Evans, and surrendered the army. Evans at once knew the trick of general "anley and ordered the christian sentries to keep on the best watch.

"anley saw indeed that he could never break through the christian lines, at the southern section of the line,, and did not know what to do to avoid capture. It was dangerous to make a dash for a terrific volley would surely lay him low and he knew it. "anley had tried at many points to escape but saw in the distance solid christian batteries, and tremendous cities of tents and breastworks upon breastworks. But just when he had reached a point which had seemed clear he saw gleaming ahead of him a picket fire, and not thinking of anything he galloped on. When fifty yards off a cry came:

"halt in the name of heaven. Who comes there?"

"Friend!" "halted "anley retreating in. A bullet whizzed past his head as he pulled up outside the edge of the fire and "anley thinking they were some other Glandelinians as the soldiers were hidden cried: "Don't shoot you damn fool. I'm a christian officer and I have a message for general Evans."

"Oh all right come on!" said the x sentinel but his hesitation and the tone of the mans voice made "anley alert with suspicion. The other pickets about the fire had risen and grasped their muskets. The wind flared the flames just then, and in the leaping light general "anley saw that their uniforms were really gray but their style showed the soldiers were the fierce Calverinians.

"anley had almost gasped. There was need for quick thought and quick action now or he would be shot down.

"Over that rifle." He called out jestingly, and kicking loose one stirrup he touched his horse with the spur and pulled her up with an impatient "Thoa as though he was trying to replace his foot.

"You come on." Said the x sentinel but he dropped his musket to the hollow of his arm, and before he could throw it to his shoulder again, fire flashed under the feet of general "anleys horse, and the astonished Calverinian saw horse and rider rise over the fence. A storm of bullets went overhead as "anley and the horse landed over on the other side,, and the pickets at the fire joined in at a fusillade at the dark shapes speeding across the fields. A moment later "anleys mocking yell rang from the edge of the woods beyond and the disgusted sentinel split the night with on his.

"That beats the devil." He never to a touched him, and it must have been that "anley trying to make his escape. I swear I believe that horse had wings."

General Morgans Calverinians. The flash of that terrible news across his brain cleared the mystery for "anley like magic. Nobody but Morgans Calverinians could rise out of the ground like that, in the very midst of Abbiennians, when they were supposed to be hundreds of miles away in the northern part of the city of Glandelinia or its vicinity I mean.

Then within thirty yards from the sentinel line of Calverinians a purple coated Abyssinkilian suddenly rode out in front of general "anleys galloping horse and saluting said:

"You are my prisoner."

"Prisoner-----hell." "anley said clearly and skinned away like a bird while the men behind a hedge, paralyzed by his daring fired not a shot. Only general Deener started through the hedge and down the road in pursuit. "I'll get him!" he said savagely.

"Who was that?" Asked another christian general riding up. It was the Calverinian general "Oragan.

"That was a spy." Laughed general "unt. "Or maybe it was general "anley trying to make his escape."

"Why did you not shoot him?" asked the general.

"I don't know." He said looking around at his men who were smiling.

"That's the Glandelinian general who gave us so much hot times in Calverinia with his two sons." said a soldier. "It's general Johnston Jackson "anley."

General Deener in the meantime was gaining on general "anley now, and "anley in the middle of the field beyond the fence turned his head and saw the lone Calverinian officer in pursuit. Deliberately he pulled his weary horse in faced about, and wheeled. Then he waited.

He drew his pistol, raised it, saw that the Calverinian was general Deener, and dropped it again to his side, and four attempts to shoot the Calverinian down brought no success. Deeners horse refused the fence, and the Calverinian general in a rage pulled his own pistol and fired. "anley fired his own pistol just as Deener fired again, and ended fire once more himself. His time the Calverinian general "anley lurched in his saddle, but recovering himself turned and galloped slowly away, while general "anley---his pistol hanging at his side-----stared after him, and the wondering Calverinians behind the hedge stared hard at Deener.

Indeed it did seem almost impossible to capture the desperate Glandelinian general Johnston Jackson "anley. He had now only about 23,000 men with him but nevertheless he and these seemed to elude all of the christian pursuers, and it seemed possible that he would break through the christian lines. And by back he did.

It was early in the next morning that he managed to discover a sort of gap in the incrooling christian line, and taking advantage of it he passed through before he was discovered. Evans learned of his escape and decided to pursue in person. It was indeed surprising to him that general "anley managed to break through the christian line but nevertheless he decided that "anley must be taken. For if "anley remained at large he could in no time gather other armies and prolong the war for over another year. And all of the christian nations wished to see it end this very year if possible and Evans was bound to see that it did.

He gathered his whole entire force of cavalry and sent it out in separate squadrons, and then preparing his infantry also ordered these to join in the pursuit. Violet and her sisters wished to go along and so Evans seeing that they desired excitement decided to grant their wish, and the little girls were included with them.

It was first investigated in which direction general "anley had gone with his twenty three thousand men and so when this was found out, the pursuit at once began. General "anley however was still undaunted and soon learning that he was pursued by a whole army decided to gather as many men as possible and repel his pursuers. He was unfortunately ignorant of whom the pursuers were, and so did not make the haste as would have been made other wise, and which if he had done so would have enabled him to escape his pursuers. He learned vaguely that only a small body of christians with the Vivian girls along then were making the pursuit and so general "anley laughed haughtily to himself, and decided that instead of being the one captured, he would do his best to make every effort to capture Violet and her sisters.

Several times he halted in his swift retreat, and then on a final halt decided to investigate and see who his pursuers really were. He wanted to make sure so as to be on the safe side, and so taking a small party of officers with him he went out to scout. He could see nothing but he got in formation from a town that separate bodies of the pursuers were swarming from many locations, that their numbers were hundreds of thousands and that rapidly and surely he was again being hemmed in as the christians made all kinds of long circuits to catch him.

Then of course general "anley grew worried. He was already worn out with all his desperate efforts to escape his relentless pursuers, and he felt sure that suicide was the only escape out of the situation, but then he wisely overcame the temptation, and decided to risk capture, but that nevertheless he would never surrender. If they wished to capture him let them fight him first. He would never allow himself to be taken alive any how and he was determined to fight to the death if too closely pressed by his Abbiennian pursuers.

And on pressed the christian pursuers again after him. He made greater efforts to learn if really the Vivian girls were with his pursuers, and finally when he inquired through a small town which had observed the christians passing, he got word that it was sure that the Vivian girls called Violet and her sisters were with the pursuers, but who the commander of the pursuers were he could not tell, though they saw and heard that the christian general "uckwick Baldwin was the commander of the hard pressing cavalry. "anley kept on retreating as fast as possible and later encountered some of the christian cavalry and after sharp fighting managed to drive the off. Finally one night when his men were badly fatigued and he had to stop because they could go no further, for a while, "anley made more efforts to learn who the main christian commander of the pursuers were, and finally he got this answer from the small town of "Soldlocks:

"Our excellency general Hanley Hanley
 "fear all is off off. The king our beloved king in fleeing into Argolia has already been captured after he and his army of 70,000 men had fled for days before his one million pursuers, and now all hope is a lost for our cause." On your excellency and your men are pursued w by at least a whole army of Abbieannian, and Conscientian cavarly, and by infantry.
 The cavarly is mainly commanded gen by general Jack Evans, and Baldwin commands the pursuing infantry and other portions of your pursuers. "We advise you to try to make for the town of Spearasin where some good sized force of Co-llentinians will await you. They are not a large force but then they are enough to help you hold out untill one of those fifteen armies which are now advancing hastily can come to your aid. Hurry and try to reach them before the christians reach that town or all will be off. The christians are after you a-tearing like a roaring ripping cyclone of yelling yelling demons."

A friend.

Hanley was dumbfounded when he received this report and nevertheless taking the advice which had been given him he retreated swiftly toward that town mentioned and decided it was the best plan to follow out. But genera general Hanley's days were reckoned now. God's fearful vengeance was about to be hurled upon him. As he was reaching the neighborhood of the town, he got word from another telegrapher;

"Too late your excellency, the christian dogs have gotten ahead of you and your escape is totally out off. The Abbieannians are closing on you more and more and it does seem impossible for you to get away. The force of Co-llentinians there which were about 700,000 in number however have escaped the christians as they came dashing into the town, and may reach you yet if they are not overtaken by their pursuers."

Hanley at once realized this, and so he waited untill those Glandelinians came up. Ward the next day they appeared about one hundred and fifty in number, and now Hanley sped toward the direction of the great "rubbie" Han River. It seemed his only chance to escape his pursuers. Several times he had fancied that he could see them in the distance, and several times he almost fancied that he heard the shout of their fierce voices and also the cheers of Violet and her sisters. Once a party of Abbieannians on horse back did see him and at once dashed upon him but his force had overwhelmed them and the pursuers so small in numbers were readily dispersed hither and yon.

But nevertheless Hanley felt that he would be captured. He knew that Evans was bound to capture him no matter what comes. As for general Evans when questioned by Baldwin on the way Hanley kept the pace Evans only had answered;

"I'm going to capture that general Hanley and his band if I have to erase him to the very uttermost depths of hell to do so. He keeps his distance from me but nevertheless I'm going to capture him. I have warned Hanson to watch for the advance of any one of those fifteen Glandelin linian armies still free so that they would not come upon us and pre vent our capturing Hanley. So I'm sure nothing unusual will happen to prevent his capture."

It was evident that Hanley was hoping anxiously for the coming of one of those remaining fifteen Glandelinian armies, and this was the reason he had been fleeing in that direction as to bring his pursuers closer to danger, but the cavarly had intercepted every movement Hanley made, and so Hanley felt that the great "rubbie" Han River was the only means to afford his escape from so relentless an army of pursuers.

Now many were pursuing him no one knew but nev nevertheless he was pursued by a whole army and he knew it.

B 317

"I believe you are about down to the buried a package now." Said the colonel. "But goodness I smell the war myself. I indeed wonder what it is!"
 After the men had worked for another minute the one who was lowest among the bay cried out;

"This odor is terrible. We gotta work fir fast of we'll faint."

Then another said;

"I Ah I feel the package now. FIEEW"

Then with a exclamation he produced the package and held it far from him at full length while a peculiar odor as if something dead came to Evans.
 "PHOOEY!" Cried the man who had the package. "There must be a dead cat in this package."

Evans quickly took the a a package and opened it and then looked astonished and said;

"What do you mean dead cat? It's limberger cheese. I was the thing buried by the fool so it would get ripe enough no doubt to make a strong offensive odor to disfigure the ylvian girls. Thor Throw it in the fools face."

This was done by the soldier who then with the others left the scene enraged over the joke that had been mostly played on them.

It was not long after this that general Evans himself received this note from a strange mysterious place;

"It is requested that your excellency general Jack Evans, will look into the affair of a said general Henry J parger that worked at St Joseph hospital Abbieann about seven years ago, whose wife had died leaving him two little babies which through his foolish grief he has neglected and left them at your institution. They are as we have found out two little girl child ren of pretty style, and we advise you to notify the sister superior at St Joseph's hospital in Pandora Abbieannia and see to it that he is made to take them back which if he will refuse, and returns them we'll see to his immediate arrest. If you do not know the children he does and you had better see to it that he sends for them, for he can describe them as he has their pictures. We are two detectives who are writing this. We'll give him about two months to recall them or he will go before the court."

Detectives Fox and West....

Evans was indeed surprised at this letter and did not know what to do. There were sixteen general Henry pargers in his army and he did not know which one this note was addressed to. He showed it to first many of the christian generals in his own command, but none of them knew anything about it, and when all the pargers were asked about it they did not know what he was talk ing about.

"We have children of our own and wives too." Was their answer. "The
 "There are no dargers in your army your excellency that would desert their own children and then w the guilt on their soul serve the christian army like we are doing. We have to do that all we say is true. That note must be about a certain Henry J parger who is serving in general Hansons army. But none are."

Evans showed the letter to Violet and her sisters and then Violet said;

"I heard a lots about this man. He is a Glandelinian general served with Hanley. As long as he is protected by the higher Glandelinian authorities no one can prosecute him for his misdeeds. He will not be cannot do anything as he is not in our ranks."

"I'll send the letter to the main headquarters, and have the w writers informed where to send this." Said Evans. "The matter is off my hands and so the matter is dropped..."

A Glandelinian army under general Franklin Hanley was already besieged at Plattenburg in Calvernia and general Evans was immediately dispatched to go and see if he could capture this one Hanley and reduce the number of Hanleys for the Glandelinian army.

317

When another great army, and while general Brantlin was besieging the wicked
"Landelinian" confederacy at the city of Landelinda and Plattenburg, by opening the gates of the great Erminie gun, and general Francisushman was preparing to fight the for at Anglerland, Evans and Baldwin still continued the chase. Manley and the remainder of his army, who even though pursued had gathered a horde and larger body of glans for his last daring venture to cross the great Erminie, and strike the pursuing christian armies in their own flanks, and thus give the Abbieamians a little taste of what the Landelinians had long known from border to border. Permeated by the fierce abbieamians general Manley succeeded in getting across the many bridges over the wide river and his officers waved a farewell to the pursuing christian enemies on the other bank and were off to receive bigger armies from the eastern part of Landelinda.

of all disasters to the christian armies this is the worse/

For all the time that he had been pursued o e million one hundred thousand Abbieamian cavalry consist consisting of lancers, the same number of Abbieamian infantry and twenty three million other Angelinian cavalry were still after him and his one hundred and ten thousand devil dare devils. Evans men cut down trees behind him, blew up bridges, and ravaged the co' country behind, flanking Manley and his small body of "Landelinians, always getting on his front, but on the "Landelinian general went, un caught, and spreading terror for a thousand miles, while behind him for six hundred and eighty two miles other christian armies coming up lined the dusty roads and farms singing "Hail round the Abbieamian flag boys!" and howling out fried chicken and Jack perry pies to his pursuers. Wounded in a general battle was Manley gave serious and sanguinary resistance and inflicted severe and most blood losses upon his pursuers, and it seemed apparent that he would have been apprehended, but the coming of a heavy rainstorm which fell in such torrents as to make a work like a heavy fog, made the Angelinian forces miss the crossing of the mainline a second time, and for the further reason that the first rise of the river in that month for two years made it impossible for the christian troops to cross, and the enemy had destroyed the bridges just as soon as they themselves succeeded in getting across. Other glandelinian armies arrived, the Angelinians themselves were co p completely surrounded, and Evans and his for es fought fiercely for two weeks and hill locks, dens and ravines, and in wooded country forming deadly ambushes, and inflicting the heaviest heavy losses upon the fiercely attacking "Landelinians until their el entire ammunition was gone. Many of the Angelinians did manage to escape in the series of the conflicts, but the christians who were surrounded received no quarter and about three million troops were massacred and general Evans was the only one who managed to escape. He swam the wide river on his horse, followed by a negro servant on another, and he turned deliberately in the middle of the stream, when it was plain that his hard batt' ng command could not escape destruction, and made for the Erminie shore to share the fortunes of his beloved officers who were left behind out of reach of the pursuers. It seemed evident alright that general Evans could not escape. "Any A "Landelinians rode in after him covering him with their pistols and a "Landelinian general by the name of Baldwin followed and was shot for his rash at attempt upon Evans.

Soon w all was over in the country of "Landelinda. disaster had followed disaster for every christian army there, and within another month Manley had obtained a new more immense series of armies h and had cleared the whole country of "Landelinda of christian forces, and had sent them flying back through Angelinia and even to galverinia in the most disasterous of any routs ever known inwar before.

After being driven to Calbrinia the first of the big forces of christians to be rallied, were reformed, and made up positions at a town known as Mary Mc-Allister gun to withstand the advance of the foe. at that point. Thus as seen in next volume comes the bloody battle of Mc-Allister gun, which if it had not been a christian victory after such series of disasters just past would have enabled the foe to win the entire warright then and there.

CAPTURED AND RESCUE.....

IN THE resulting adventure with the fiercest of all the wicked glandelinians known as Scoddlers because they are too faced and are treacherous, Penrod through some mishap had become separated from the Vivian girls he was escorting to General Hanson's lines and though they escaped after an exciting conflict in which sixteen glandelinians were killed and forty injured he was captured.

The rebels brought him to their camp and to prevent him from escaping tied him to a large tree and even to use extra precautions placed two watchful guards over him.

Though they themselves had escaped capture through such desperate efforts as almost using up their ammunition in shooting it out with the glandelinians poor Violet and her sisters in one day around after the battle, from found themselves cut off from escape to the Christian lines for they were surrounded by more than two thousand rebels, a thousand perils seemed to be staring them in the face and for a time they were bewildered and did not know what to do.

Yet as we all know that the Vivian girls are determined Angolians and also of a most stubborn nature and who would not let anything whatever frighten them they refused to give up or lose hope, for they knew from their many recent adventures and experiences that they never failed in anything they tried to accomplish yet.

Even in spite of all the tremendous odds against them the brave little girls had resolved not only to escape at any cost but also to rescue Penrod from the Glandelinians or die in the attempt.....Knowing near how near these temporary rebel encampments were Violet herself went forward a little distance to do some scouting of her own using her field glass to view the more numerous glandelinian encampments in the far distance with more better results. Finally in looking over the others surrounding her and her sisters she was able to see Penrod plainly.

"My girls

"My gosh how I do hate to let any of these Glandelinians especially the Scoddlers get their hands on me," she said to herself nervously. "And I wonder why some of those Glandelinians are carrying so much wood for."

Then suddenly the horror of the situation dawned upon her, she realized that the fierce Scoddlers intended to burn her boy friend at the stake, she then grew determined.

"Well," she decided, "if I can help it they won't harm him if while I and my sisters are alive. I'll see what we can do." She went a back to her sisters and told them what she had seen. Joyce herself then said:

"These Glandelinian Scoddlers believe we have escaped or that they have killed or surrounded us or something. Or they may know that we are hiding. These glandelinians though fierce are perfect strangers to us and therefore do not know who we are. Therefore they would never dream that we would ever risk danger to rescue Penrod alone. I heard one of the glandelinians say that we look more timid than the most cowardly child. Well let them think it is true. We will be cowards in a way they will be sorry for. If we can only sneak into their camp while they are asleep we can surprise the two guards, and set Penrod free. Then we will hide in the dark woods till the Scoddlers give up searching for us."

For a few minutes her sisters hesitated not knowing what to do and wondering if they would have the nerve to dare this attempt or not. Then Jennie herself said:

"Before we start across the open ground, I'll find out if there are any glandelinians lurking around." The old fashioned trick of sticking this hat above the defense works will fool them I'm sure. If there should be rebel watching for us they will fire at the hat. That is if they are not used to any such trick."

Putting the action to her words she approached the bulwark of six foot rocks and placing her hat on the muzzle of her small rifle raised it far above the top of the rocks. There was however no result and therefore she first took the chance of going above the rocks and seeing no glandelinians in sight went back to her sisters and told them it was safe to proceed. Then she and her sisters took the chance of jumping from their shelter but they saw to it nevertheless that their rifles and pistols were fully loaded. From their new point of observation the forest lay in view and they looked over these scenes cautiously for several minutes. ...

"If we can reach that thick wall of undergrowth yonder we will make ourselves a more harder for the enemy to locate than a pin in a haystack," said Angolino. "But to insure our safety we must make a dash for it with our guns at the ready, and run as fast as it is in our power, and we can hope that none of the Scoodlers or other glandelinians see us. As it is so dangerous I feel pretty scared and so may you as those Scoodlers are too serious to be trifled with, more dangerous than rattlesnakes, but we will not hesitate on that account."

With that, she cautiously led the way, and her sisters quickly followed. It was a painfully long distance to the wall of underbrush and to violet and her sisters as they dashed across it seemed a hundred miles. Yet with their small rifles at the ready they dashed madly for the underbrush and fortunately they reached it without encountering any of the enemy. As they rested and stood behind some trees for several minutes, violet thought to herself:

"If we ever get back to dear old Abbionnia and tell all the children in school and elsewhere about our adventures with the insurgents, I'm afraid they will never believe us even though we are the Princesses of Abbionnia. Gosh, how I do wish I and my sisters were safe with our father and mother. How indeed I would like to make up in my little white bed at home and find that this awful war was nothing else but a terrible dream."

After resting for several minutes they slowly continued on their way toward the long distanced rebel camp but keeping themselves between the trees for fear of being fired at from ambush. They traveled this way for quite a while and then as they continued on without meeting any foe they all must have thought this altogether to themselves.

"Why I think how nice poor Penrod has been to me I feel ready to risk my life a thousand times for him. He had helped me often through the greatest of dangers and saved my life when I had been injured or pursued or nearly slain and when we all fell off the steep bank of a large stream unknown to us and almost as sunk under quick sand he threw a plank across and saved the risk of being caught himself drew me out with ropes at the risk of his own life--I and my sisters will just have to save Penrod, that is all there is to it."

For an hour they plowed through the thick undergrowth and woods without any adventure with the glandelinians so far and had just reached a large clump of trees when they began to be conscious of a strange stealthy noise like someone creeping upon them from the rear. For a time they did not pay any attention to it but as the little girls reached grass taller than themselves, nay taller than even the tall oak--an strange noise grew louder and louder. Finally Jennie whispered to Catherine who was by her side:

"I wonder what is that noise? Is something or some one is crashing their way through the underbrush. I could hate to meet a fierce Scoodler or even a fiercer Zimmermanian glandelinian here."

The little girls quickly placed themselves behind the trees and awaited the approach of whatever was causing the strange noise. Presently presently a squad of wicked looking glandelinian soldiers crashed into view. They were not Scoodlers at all but the fierce Zimmermanian soldiers known as the gargoylian guards. Violet and her sisters believing they would be soon were ready to open fire on the instant but fortunately the insurgents did not look there way and therefore they were not seen. However violet and her sisters watched until the rebels had passed--out of sight before they emerged from their hiding place.

These glandelinians saved their own lives as well as ours by not finding our hiding place or by seeing us," said Daisy. "If we would have been compelled to fire a single volley the other glandelinians in the distant camps would have heard it. When a whole force with no blood hounds would have been on our trail trail and our chances to rescue poor Penrod would be lost."

It took the brave little girls until it was nearly evening before they came within sight of the very edge of the glandelinian encampment. The vivian girls hid themselves behind some rocks and took a good look at the rebels and their many hundreds of tents. Then violet said to her sisters in a loud whisper:

"I wish we had some way of letting Penrod know we have not deserted him. The easy things look we cannot do anything to help him until it grows dark. Gosh I hope it got's good and dark to night and even a storm break breaks out. In the confusion of the tempest we may be able to accomplish our purpose. That stake is right in the center of their camp. One false move on our part, or any noise now, means death for all of us for all these Scoodlers are crackshots, and we are out here in the open."

They did not find voice for answer but took a long searching look of the rebel camp and observed where the stake and Penrod was. It was however a very long time before the darkness of night finally settled down and nearly fifty times violet and her sisters had nearly been discovered by passing squads of glandelinians either on foot or on horseback.

It turned out to be very dark indeed as huge dark clouds were overspreading the sky and there was no moon. For a long time violet and her sisters hesitated to dash forth hoping and waiting for the time when most of the glandelinians would be asleep. And it was pretty close to midnight midnight before the vivian girls started to leave their hiding place behind the trees. There was a large stretch of tall grass and scrubby before the rebel encampment and as the little girls worked their way through Catherine said to Jessie in a low whisper:

"Oh, gosh, I do hope none of the Scoodler glandelinians are still awake. If you if any of their sentries catches us trying to rescue their boy captive we won't have any more chance for our lives than seven little lambs in the den of famished lions."

All through the sack cloth darkness of that gloomy woodland night and surrounded by countless dangers one of the brave vivian girls while her sisters remained aimed on guard on the edge of the camp crept silently onward into the rebel camp knowing full well that to be discovered means capture and a most ignominious death for herself and her sisters and Penrod too.

Golding her breath and fearing the loud beating of her brave heart would catch her downfall and the capture of her sisters, brave little Jennie crept nearer and nearer to where Penrod stood bound and helpless in the midst of the sleeping scoodlers. She had a distance of nearly five hundred feet to creep on her hands and knees. It took her a long time to reach him and many times she feared for her life. Finally she reached her goal. She cautiously drew her sharp knife from its sheath and within a few minutes time had without detection cut the boy free. Then noiselessly and cautiously she led the boy to where her sisters were hiding and together they all made their way into the deep recesses of the big woods beyond. Here they sat sure the enemy would not find them too soon. And here they remained until the approach of morning being kept awake by all myriads of sounds which all night long filled the forest. As soon as it was day light Penrod himself climbed a tall tree to see how their situation was. The tree was forty eight feet high. From that high point he saw that scores of handsomely uniformed glandelinian soldiers were coming from every direction through the woods. He hastily descended, warned the vivian girls and they all hastily climbed to the top of the same tree which was thick with foliage. It was evident to Penrod that he and his most beautiful companions were besieged by the infuriated glandelinians who positively knew who had rescued him and that hence they were hiding in the woods, and therefore they were scouring the forest with a vigilance that was even unusual for them.

The glandelinians were extremely determined that their fugitives should not escape from them and therefore were doing everything in their power, even risking any dangers to prevent it. For a long time the children hidden in the treetop continued to remain very still and then Penrod feeling very grateful to violet and her sisters for rescuing him from the rebels said:

"I shall never forget how you brave little girls risked your priceless lives to save me from the clutches of those fierce Scoodlers. Yet I cannot see why you did it, knowing that I am a very common person compared to you brave little Abbionnian Princesses."

"You are not a very common person," said violet almost indignantly. "No matter what we are, you are just as good as we girls are, and maybe maybe not better. And we are more than glad to have a chance to help you, because we know that if the time comes you will do the same to us again, and though you are not of our country you are always nice to us, and respect us for our own character more than for our old beautiful faces."

"That may be true," replied Penrod. "But even now if the glandelinians ever get us into their possession I guess we might as well say good bye to the world."

"It is said however," admitted Jessie frankly; "that a brave man can conquer a thousand foes single handed providing he knows how to do it and has the strength and means. And the spirits of heroes have driven away harm and dangers from the pathway of the fearless persons. God loves the brave and spurs the cowards."

There was now a few minutes stillness, neither one of them speaking. From that height they could see a long way and therefore they kept a good watch for what the crafty glandelinians might do seeing they have escaped. Below them the glandelinians were swarming as gray flies on the body of a dead horse and Penrod looking carefully down from his high perch said:

"Gosh, violet, the way it looks down there, there must be more than a million of them in the woods below us."

Violet and her sisters smiled at his exaggeration.

"If there are a million of them below us then we are tread for a month," said violet. "If you will look down carefully Penrod, you will see that the woods are not even large enough to hold one hundred thousand soldiers. You are so excited my dear Penrod that you exaggerate too heavily."

"When the great African Lion roars, the brown dogs soon tremble. Now suppose there were a million glandulins in the woods below us. It is well known that one row of swiftly working scythens will now do countless swaths of grass in a single day," said Johns.

"I was busy who spoke first this time."

"I know how we can fool those glandelinians," she said.

"My ear shall not refrain from listening to the wisdom of those o your inspired words or those of your sisters," said Penrod. "what is yo r your plans I pray?"

"Wc girls can work our way slowly from tree to tree when close together like the monkeys do," she said. "I mean from tree top to tree tops. But Penrod can you do it too?" he afraid not."

she explained it in careful whispers and he listened attentively. "It's a good idea and I'm sure I can do it," he admitted, "and it is better it should be said 'here we retreated' than 'here we were slain'."

"Well with rage when w they find we have escaped them."
 "But we will have to be careful," said Jiao as they all started. "It is written the pack of wolves may howl but the moon remains as steady as before."
 In the single minute they had reached another tree by working their way from branch to branch like monkeys do swinging from one to another. The rebels not looking upward had not detected them as the tops of the trees being poplars were very high and thick foliage covered or hid every branch.

"Never mind we will soon approach the end of the woods," said Perrod. "If they do see us they will have to follow us in the same way, and I don't believe they can, and if they catch up after us we can sink them off again."

"We could shoot it out with them up here to a good advantage, but we will probably get away while the glandslinians are busy watching the interior of the woods. would it not be swell if we should find a force of christian troopers looking for when we dropped at the edge of the woods, would

It was indeed dangerous and most difficult work for them to perform this stunt but after four hours of it between resting and hundreds of narrow escapes of falling from that height to the ground they at last reached the last tree and seeing not a single glanduliferous hole they hastily climbed down and had just started forward when Peinado suddenly exclaimed excitedly:

"They must have been waiting for us to appear. I never saw such rotten luck before."

violet and her sisters went first, Pemrod covering their retreat. Indeed followed by the fierces glandelluAn horsemen from the open the fugitives made a desperate dash for the forest they had just left hoping also to elude the cowboys who also were in the forest. they hastened onward being resolved to die fighting rather than to surrender to these cruel foes.

"It is written, those who would have no trouble in this world must not be concerned in it," declared Jennie. "If we seek adventure it is our own doing. We placed

The giardinian horseman seeing that the fugitives were reaching the woods loosed a volley of shots but violet and her sisters or their boy companion were not hit. As they reached the edge Penrod said::

"We cannot call the tiger to chase any the dog," said Violet. After some desperate climbing almost beyond their exertions, Violet and her sisters reached the selected tree without being seen and when the glandelinian horsemen came up on the gallop and then halted suddenly not one of the heroines or their boy companion were in sight. To the glandelinians who observed the tops of the trees they appeared to be free of every one but the crafty glandelinians knew that sheltered by the friendly branches of one tall popular tree were the fugitives hidden even from their sharp eyes and knowing they were hidden in this fashion the rebels belonging even the outskirts of these woods sent many of their companions to climb all the trees possible, to continue their entire search for them and with a band of them and savage bloodhounds, and with loudly beating hearts the beautiful ladies were perched among the branches of their trees secure, being to even breathe as they knew only too well that discovery meant torture and death in the most horrible form.

It seemed impossible however for them to think of such good luck. All day long in the hot sun they were forced to remain there tortured by thirst and almost burned by the hot sun.

Indeed with no protection whatever from the burning rays of the hot sun which beat pitilessly down upon them hour after hour during that sweltering day the eight little fugitives were dead then alive, suffering from the terrific heat remained hidden among the branches, not daring to move, even to sway a branch, with swollen lips, and parched tongues, they could only wait and pray for the night to come and bring their torture to an end. Fortunately none of the gladiolusians who had been sent to climb trees in search of them reached their tree yet.

In the meantime general Vivian had sent soldiers out for his missing friends but they had not found any trace of them. Finally general Vivian summoned the German officer general parzer, when the latter arrived general Vivian explained what he wanted him for. Then parzer summed his officer and soldiers.

"Thank you general," said the chief commander. "Your friend and assistant shall earn my ever lasting reward and friendship, and the loving gratitude of the Vivian "Know the nature of the Glandelinians? I know them all right, and I can tell you the lie, sir, I was prisoner among them for many days, and if I don't know the rebels you may allow me to be called the greatest liar in the whole world."

I am burning with the greatest anxiety," said general "Vivian." Violet and her sisters mean more to me than life even though only dear friends. How soon will you be ready to join us in our search for them?"

"How soon? These minutes, and the quicker if you say so," said Vivian.

I am indeed glad to find you a man of instant action," said the general. "I'll inform the troopers now getting ready to be prepared to start immediately. You shall lead them in person. Every order will be yours until they are found."

"I'll find them sir," said the colonel.

"I believe you have done a most wise thing to trust this Mexican," said general Parger. "In spite of his queer clothing or uniform which he insisted he wanted to wear only, and gruff manner of his speech as he can not talk our tongue hardly you will find him honest and capable and as daring as any one of us."

"I have the utmost confidence in him," said general Vivian. "I believe he will help us find them. Then turning to the cojole colonel who was about to leave with general Parger he said:

"If you find the Vivian girls and their boy friend and bring us to their rescue you can name your own reward. No price shall be too high. Anything that money can buy will be yours for the asking, and in addition to any reward you may ask you shall have my undying gratitude and also theirs. They mean more to me than life to me. I am like a father to them and they like daughters to me. So spare me no effort to find them."

The Mexican first saluted, then made his old-fashioned profound bow and then withdrew.

Indeed Violet and her sisters with Penrod were trapped and besieged in those woods for a full week. They had been forced to remain in the high tree tops to escape the fierce Glandelinians who while out on a forage had discovered their presence in the woods near their camp and finally on the following morning they discovered that the Glandelinians for some reason or other unknown to them had vanished and their hearts filled with thankfulness they prepared to leave the woods and if possible return to the Christian lines.

"Gosh, gosh I'm certainly glad those Glandelinians have left the woods," said Penrod when he was the last to reach the ground. He looked around cautiously then added: "I'm tired of remaining in the trees like if I was a bird only depending on those frequent rain storms to supply us with water for drink and almost facing starvation."

"I do certainly rejoice to know that the degraded rebels have gone," answered Violet as she decided to lead the party. The party stole cautiously through the woods for a certain distance stopping once in a while behind the trees to shield themselves from any unseen foes should there be any. Violet herself saying:

"We don't want to take any chances here. Some of those dreadful scoundrels may be still hiding in the wooded woods."

"It is written that he who does best must always be gentle," said Jennie. "We have seen ourselves that patience in very bitter, it's but its fruits are sweet."

"I was afraid we would starve or die of thirst while we were hiding in the tree tops," admitted Penrod. "All I could think of was good things to eat."

"My mind sees what my heart desires," ejaculated Hattie. "We have secured water. What we want now is to reach the spot where we had securely hidden our provisions. I hope they are not gone or that they did not spoil; still moist."

After a short time of following through thick tangled brush and high grass, and clambering over fallen logs and trees and looking out for swarming and crawling branches they reached the spot where their horses and provisions were hidden. These fortunately had not been seen or molested by the enemy. For a few hours they remained here enjoying a hearty meal having not hardly hesitated much for a week. Penrod said:

"You beautiful little girls were wise to think of hiding our provisions here for a time of need. And I am so hungry too."

"Those who come not must hunger in time of famine," said Jennie. "What advantage God offers us we must receive with utmost thankfulness."

"And I can hardly wait to mount our horses after leaving them here there no longer. It's a good thing there was plenty of grass here," said Emma. Evangeline.

"I was hoping all through the week that they did not starve, or the enemy take possession of them."

"A good hope is always better than a poor possession," said Catherine.

"Once we mount our horses we can ride away, and keep on riding till we find the Christian lines or some column of National Guardsmen," said Violet. "And I'm glad we did not lose our guns. If the Glandelinians should attack us from ambush after we are riding out of this place our weapons will come in handy. We don't want to be captured by the Scoundrels if we can help it."

"He who has once been bitten by a Rattlesnake lives by doing so - nothing for it on time, fears every snake hereafter," declared Evangeline.

"I thought we would never escape those Scoundrels," said Penrod musingly on a piece of bread. "So exciting was our adventure that I guess we must have had a million narrow escapes in the past week but we always found a way to fool the Glandelinians."

"It is written that while one door is shut there is always some other door open," said Catherine. "But let's get ready to make a start."

"Oh boy!" said Penrod mounting his horse. "I can see ourselves riding forth now. I'm glad the rebels didn't come here."

"I feel no good I could dance with joy to think we were lucky enough to escape the Scoundrels so far," said Daisy. "Won't they be surprised when they come to the woods again and find us gone?"

"Saying farewell to these woods will not cause us to shed tears," declared Hattie.

They all had mounted their horses, with the provisions on behind and then rode slowly forward. Most of the way in the woods that was open before them was covered with tall grass and ferns and flowers. Through the whole they urged their horses slowly. They had traveled for about two hours and a half when they finally left the outskirts of the woods altogether. But now before them was a large open plain also covered with high grass and in the distance appeared high hills and most dense woods. Over and over as this plain they traveled but more swiftly. But happy and unsuspectingly they rode into the trap set for them by the ugly Glandelinians. Glandelinians. About a moment's warning a horde of armed Immammanian soldiers appeared suddenly from their very hidingplace in the tall grass. What could they do now surrounded as they were by the Glandelinians. The winds of death seemed to flutter near them.

They now found themselves prisoners in the hands of the cruel Glandelinians and Penrod himself feared that at any moment their enemies would at least destroy him. However not understanding the character of these fierce Scoundrels Penrod believed they would fear to harm Violet and her sisters as they knew that they were the very daughters of Emperor Vivian, and that if they were harmed, and he overthrew the rebellion, Glandelinia would pay dearly for it.

They were brought into the temporary rebel camp and compelled to go separately into eight tents, and guards were placed over each one.

"I wonder what they intend to do with us," said Penrod to himself.

"They surely won't keep us in this all camp forever. It is too far away from the main rebel lines. Anyhow the plans of these wicked and unworthy Glandelinians are beyond the perception of my own intelligence, and we were each put into a separate tent. I wonder why that is, and if only our friend the Rattlesnake boy with his scouts would only come. I'll bet he would make these Glandelinians very sorry for what they have done."

It was only a few minutes later, when a tall soldier entered his tent and ordered him to come out immediately. Penrod seeing no way out was compelled to obey and stepping out of the tent, he saw the Vivian girls under a strong guard waiting for him outside.

As he came out one of the soldiers said:

"You and your girl companions are to appear before our general at once."

"I'm not afraid of your general," said Penrod defiantly. "My general's army could lick dozens like yours," and Penrod stood up straight.

"You spoke up clear and loud my courageous boy friend," said Violet proudly. "It is bravery that makes the wicked tremble with superstitious fear."

"But up the two of you," demanded the officer in charge. "Forward march."

This small force of Glandelinians had broken up their camp and with their prisoners in their midst started toward the main lines far in the distance. As they were marching on Penrod said to - close who was nearest to him:

"If that bone-headed Glandelinian captain thinks I'm afraid of him he is greatly mistaken."

"But these Glandelinians are very dangerous," she answered. "And who can tell what will happen to us tomorrow? We are as helpless kittens in their possession."

One of the nearest of the rebel officers overheard them and said:

"You may converse secretly among yourselves but nevertheless we are to take you all before our general and you will all die as spies you dirty Christian dogs."

"It's that so? Well let me tell you something," retorted Penrod. "The Vivian girls are my best friends. They once saved my life. And if you insulting pussy cats harm them their fathers and the whole nation will do all in their power to destroy you and your nation."

"That may be probable if he wins the war," answered the officer sneeringly. "You seem most amiable and fearless for a boy of your age. But you need not think your words have shaken me in the least. I fear Emperor Vivians terrible anger as much as much as I fear that of a baby. We soldiers will take you to our general and let him decide your fate."

There was silence for a while now and as they continued on Violet said to Penrod; "The girls offer you thanks for defending us. But we warn you not to say too much to these Glandelinians. They are exceedingly dangerous."

"We have to stick to our defense," declared Penrod. "If we can trick the insurgents by giving them any argument everything will come out all right."

"Yet it is written, they who ride the tiger or lion are afraid to dismount," exclaimed Violet.

"Anyhow I wish I knew where they are taking us," said Penrod. "I wish a force of Christian troopers would come up. I do not like the looks of these Scoodlers. Their action and manners are like the meaning of their names."

They continued their journey to their unknown destination. They were now wondering what would become of them. Far beyond the Christian encampments help- less prisoners in the hands of fierce Glandelinians their situation was enough to cast a shadow of fear in the hearts of the bravest persons.

It was now a week and three days that Violet and her sisters and Penrod were missing from the Christian lines. Colonel Cotyknol and many others had large scouting forces out searching for them, combing the whole region for them, but no trace of them or even of a scouting Glandelinian force could be seen. General Vivian himself who led the search in person could not sleep nights from worry worrying over them and their safety. However he was by this time and day sitting again by his table in his headquarters and he was thinking to himself;

"My goodness but this suspense is terrible, even unbearable. It seems to be that they were swallowed up by the earth. I would only be too glad to give all I have to hold Violet and her sisters safe in my arms again."

About half an hour passed, and then general Varger himself appeared and learning that the Vivian girls were still missing felt very bad about it but nevertheless felt sure that they would be traced, or would succeed somehow in escaping, knowing that they had succeeded in doing so very often before, and therefore he said;

"Never give up your hopelessness, Violet and her sisters and the boy will be found safe and may even escape or my name is not general Varger. They have often escaped from the enemy you know."

"You have such sturdy faith that it renews my ardent hopes," said general Vivian. "If my searchers do find the party of royal children and their boy friend there is no gift no reward however costly that may not be yours for the asking."

"I do not ask for rewards," answered general Varger. "It is my duty to find them and I will do so at any risk."

Just at this moment an officer appeared and saluting said;

"The woods colonel Cotyknol mentions have been located sir."

General Vivian arose from his chair and exclaimed;

"Are you sure?"

"Yes sir."

"Well have my horse brought to the entrance at once captain Shepard. Maybe they have discovered the right woods at last."

The captain went out to obey the order to have the horse brought, while general Vivian getting ready advised general Varger to take charge until he returned.

Mounting his horse general Vivian started out with a very large force of more than forty thousand heavily armed cavalry men for the woods mentioned by the captain who was to show the way. It took them about an hour and a half to come within sight of the woods. General Vivians direction a movement of the troopers was made to surround the forest while the general himself scanned the woods with his powerful field glass. After a few minutes of close scrutiny he said;

"There is a sign signal flag either of distress or of a trick flying over the tree tops. I'm surely hoping our search is now at an end. I can hardly wait to reach the glen. Also the woods seem to be entirely deserted but maybe this dense forest has prevented the beautiful royal children and Penrod from seeing our approach. Or maybe rebel are hiding the re in ambush. If anything has happened to Penrod or Violet and her sisters my heart will break and I'll massacre all the Glandelinians taken prisoners in battle and make the whole nation pay."

"There is a small entrance into the woods at the left," said the captain.

"There don't appear to be any rebels hidden in these woods."

"We are on the right to a trail," said another officer. "We will find them if they are still in these woods. Some of my men are like bloodhounds. We will just follow them."

General Vivian gave the word forward and into the woods they went. They had ridden into the woods for some distance when the densest calms halted anyone of the soldiers dismounted and picked up something from the ground. The captain at once rode forward saying;

"Hold fast there comrade and tell me what that slip of paper says."

He handed it to the captain who looked it over carefully and then bringing it up to general Vivian said;

"This is a written code code that says that the lost ones have been recently besieged in these woods for a week but that the Glandelinians have not caught them yet. Everything is as clear as print to me."

The general put it away and ordered with the search continued. They traveled a long time through the woods hoping that they would soon come up with them and being determined not to give up hope while life lasted. They finally came to a tree to which a note was fastened and it read thus;

"Who ever finds this note please notify general Vivian that Penrod and we the Vivian girls are captured by Scoodlers and taken to their small or main camps. They ambushed us when we thought we were easily escaping and are taking us to their lines and before their general."

Violet Vivian."

This now started the search in a new route.

"Do you think we can find the camp?" The general asked.

"Safe and sure. If the Glandelinians think they can outwit us they are mistaken. Never fear we will find them. Just keep a brave heart," said the captain.

Ever since Violet and her sisters and Penrod were missing the entire country had been scoured for them, but after searching every section outside of the enemy's encampments for more than a week and two days the other searching parties telegraphed reports that they could not find any trace of the missing ones or any signs of scouting Glandelinian parties. The search in the woods had been abandoned for the night by general Vivian and his troopers while guard parties were stationed at all parts of the woods to prevent the escape of the Glandelinians should there be any trying to get out.

General Vivian declared he was positively convinced that strong forces of Glandelinians were in the woods but there were so many hiding places that an ambush was probable. All that day they had strove to force the hidden foe out, tear bombs and smudge fires being used in the efforts to drive the rebels out of their probable hiding places. It was later said that some hidden marksman fired a shot at general Vivian. Following the ineffective shooting the would be assassin disappeared into the darkest portion of the woods. The troopers believed it was one of the Glandelinians who had threatened to get general Vivian if his search for the Vivian girls and Penrod was as vigorous as he had intended it to be. One of the guards was on duty at the edge of the woods and suddenly saw a strange man trying to slip past him.

"Halt what do you want here?" he quickly demanded.

"I'm a non-combatant and I'm lost here," the stranger answered.

"We'll get out of here and get out quick or I'll shoot you and call the officer of the guard afterwards," the sentry said to him. The stranger ran back into the woods and so on the officer of the day was notified. More sentries were therefore placed on duty, the officer of the guard having been informed that another sentry had been assaulted in the dark and the assailant escaping when captain Varger and squads of soldiers from the camp hurried to the scene. Furthermore he reported he had seen six men dash down a road and disappear into the woods. That was sufficient to satisfy general Vivian that many foe spies were lurking around the camp.

In the meantime a hundred guards had reported being fired on from the distant part of the woods. That added to the consternation already serious. On the following morning general Vivian's first move was to place strong forces all around the woods, then telegraphed to the main lines to send an extra division of troops. They soon arrived and a large force was therefore assembled to move into the woods.

This was recognized as one of the most dangerous tasks the forces of troopers had ever undertaken. The woods even in day light was dimly lighted.

The woods even at midday was dimly lighted and was filled with ravines and dark nooks in which any force of Glandelinians could lurk in ambush. In fact general Vivian at first hesitated about sending troops into the woods.

through the woods," he explained. "A hundred men could be slain at many points before we could get finally however it was decided there was no better methods and the troops began to work their way through the woods, armed with grenades, rifles, pistols and tear bombs all setting out in diverging paths through the woods, with the orders to take no chances whatever, to shoot first and ask questions later. Yet the woods apparently seemed to be deserted. Not a Glandelinian could be seen, not even an animal of any kind. Half an hour after they had entered the woods, sixteen rebels suddenly appeared, and opened fire with the purpose to shoot down general Vivian who was leading the Angelinian soldiers slowly through the forest. The Glandelinians yelling like demons and uttering cries of defiance fairly emptied their rifles at the general but missed, bringing down his horse instead when they began a quick retreat....

General Vivian did not like the looks of these wicked Glandelinians but nevertheless he ordered the troops to press on and capture them if possible. The pursuit continued through the woods for over a mile. After this, reaching an open glen the pursued rebels made movements as if they were trying to double back on the Glandelinians then suddenly halted apparently intending to place themselves behind the trees. The pursuing Angelinians were right at the very heels of the retreating Glandelinians and one of the Christian officers shouted an order to them to surrender immediately.

Not another shot had been fired since the beginning of the pursuit. As the foremost of the Angelinians dashed up a swarm of fresh Glandelinian soldiers appeared, and all of them started firing like mad at close range. It was a sudden deadly withering fire. Captain Algo Turner fell from his horse fatally wounded, Colonel J. By Geranna collapsed shot through the head and two other officers fell dead. Three scores of Angelinian soldiers were killed at the sudden blast of rifles and over a hundred of them foremost were wounded all of them fatally. General Vivian though far in the lead was not hit. Though he was exposed to the enemy general Vivian with his revolver in his hand went for the nearest of the rebels, the other Christian troops following.

The Glandelinians though increasing in number fired now at random for several minutes and then slowly at started retreating. The first swarm after fire firing once more fled through the glen while the other columns quickly separated, firing incessantly as they rushed forward the Angelinians went after the Glandelinians. One of the Glandelinians then halted for a few moments and poured in a murderous fire mowing down another score of Angelinians. A number aimed at general Vivian but missed.

After a quarter of a mile of this the foremost of the Glandelinians dived through the thicket planning to seek refuge in the thickest portion of the woods the others going toward a large ravine. The Angelinians following them did not hesitate. Though now they could not hardly see the numbers of these wicked and furious Glandelinians and the rebels presumably had the drop on them, the Angelinians were in the same spot yelling like demons. But at this moment these Glandelinians had not stopped to fight it out. They went past the ravine and into a series of fenced fields of small and large size. The pursuing Angelinians were at their very heels as they ran across another long fence of barbed wire stopped the retreat of these rebels who numbered two thousand one hundred and thirty five Scodlers and some Gargyllians.

With savage snarls they whirled about, threw up their muskets and pulled the triggers with the muzzles almost in the faces of the foremost of the Angelinians. Very shot told as many men fell as were shots fired. At first the surviving Angelinians were horrified but the remainder of the Nationals opened fire with more murderous effect many of the Glandelinians dropping dead. They all fell fighting to the last. The survivors of these Angelinians left these Glandelinians lying there without a seconds look and went off to join their comrades in the pursuit of the others. But another portion of general Vivians squadron beat them to it. Hearing so many shots and ten thousand of them were fired before the first column of rebels was destroyed, Major general Michael Giovanni and two regiments had raced from an opposite direction toward the scene of the battle.

They got to one part just in time to see an enormous platoon of rebels with blood dripping from some of them race through high brushwood. In a minutes time these Glandelinians were captured. Colonel Stepton of the rebels killed two Angelinian officers, wounded two in this desperate battle before he himself was shot dead in the end by the lone survivor of a platoon of Angelinians he and his Scodlers had fought. Lieutenant Hermann a young Angelinian officer downed him with a shot as the rebel officer flung his empty pistol at the lieutenants head. His Glandelinians were forced to surrender to a fresh Christian force a little later as they fled toward a ravine after annihilating the first Christian column.

It appeared, that knowing the Angelinians would be looking for the Vivian girls these Glandelinians had remained in the woods in a strong force with the purpose to take revenge on the searchers and if possible prevent them from locating Vivian and her sisters. They killed many of the Angelinian officers in that deadly ambush and wounded a score and killed more than two thousand Angelinian soldiers it being one of the most spectacular and bloodiest skirmishes ever occurring in a woods or during the war so far as it was. Also two of the best Glandelinian officers fell dead, three of them generals of high rank and four colonels in one major and other of lower rank. Three thousand of their soldiers were killed and forty two captured and six hundred wounded altogether. And yet in the meanwhile the other parties of the Angelinians were hunting through the west end of the woods for many other Glandelinians believed to have been wounded in the battle, but to have escaped. Three colonels more two captains and a major and other officers on the Christian side had been killed by the desperate fire of the retreating Glandelinians. Acting general Peter Scuncio commanding the front line of the pursuing Nationals was so seriously wounded that it was said he would die. The main Glandelinian leader killed by general Vivian was not known as the surviving rebel had carried him away. Two Glandelinian officers were captured and being Glandelinians of most dangerous character were ordered held under heavy guard.

"These Glandelinian ambuscaders got my unfortunate officers quick," said general Vivian "but we got them quick too. I will this minute if necessary lay all other searching aside and clear these woods of all other Glandelinians. These woods must be cleaned out before we can locate the Vivian girls and their boy friend Penrod. And that also must be done as soon as possible. And as this was an ambush I will assist the Army Tribunals to convict all these Glandelinians captured of murder in the first degree. Their evidence will be taken before the court Marshall as soon as the can be ready. The wheels of justice will be grinding exceedingly fast and exceedingly small in this case."

Immediately word of the battle in the woods reached Colonel Colina and therefore he ordered the rest of general Vivians command to break camp and move into the woods with the purpose to get every Glandelinian there dead or alive. The second force armed and ready to shoot to kill started forward. Major Devana and Captain Depero Lieut. George Caruso and Sergeant Francis Marcellio incensed by the ambush fire of the rebels and the killing of so many officers and Angelinian soldiers immediately sprang into the woods with their men declaring also that the woods must be cleared of the enemy if it takes war to the death to do it.

"We are going to clean out these woods and find the Vivian girls if it costs us life after life including ours," one of them said.

Indeed this tragic battle followed a fierce and sanguinary attack by the rebels believed to have been a part of the same force which had seized upon the Vivian girls and brought them to camp while this force remained behind in the woods with the purpose to hinder the advance of the rescuing party of the Angelinians.

In the meantime Colonel Colinas force of Angelinians had reached another portion of the woods when suddenly to their surprise a large force of Glandelinians sprang out into the open and started a heavy fire upon the Angelinians. Two officers and a score of men fell but wounded fatally or not it was not to be learned as they rose and disappeared to the rear.

As the Angelinians nevertheless pressed on the rebels recoiled and ran knocking down the Angelinians who caught up with them and tried to stop them or capture them. The Glandelinians who had been wounded in this fray staggered dripping with blood into a large glen and crying curses and threats of death if they were in any impediment in their retreat disappeared. The other Glandelinians continued their retreat in another direct direction the Angelinians now giving chase pursuing them through the west end of the woods. Tearing in and out among the trees, through brushwood and crashing through vernal brush in their mad flight these Glandelinians came also upon a barbed wire fence six feet high and here being stopped the cornered Glandelinians wheeled as the pursuing Angelinians drew up and opened fire mowing the Angelinians down like corn. Coc Colina gasped and sank to the ground killed instantly. The Angelinians blazed back now as fiercely fiercely but these Glandelinians had things their own way this time and Marcellio and Devana lurched to the ground and a quarter of the Angelinian force was also shot down. Another officer had his jaw shattered but he raised his arm and returned the fire of the desperate Glandelinians and hit one of their officers in the left leg. Many of these Glandelinians also had fallen two of their officers wounded in the abdomen.

By this time this part of the woods was in a terrific uproar, the wounded shrieking frantic soldiers yelling and cursing as they fought hand to hand, a tumult of shots and the yell of other troops tearing to the scene. The Angelinians still pressed on facing the fierce Glandelinians who were frantically jamming their rifles and loading and firing as fast as they could in an attempt to shoot down all of the Angelinians.

The Glandelinians then turned and fled in another direction the Angelinians after them their hot rifles still spitting a tempest of bullets after them as they retreated. Some of the Glandelinians dashed across a small stream to another glen and dived in among the thick high brushwood. The Angelinians raced after these and soon speedily captured all but one man, who raised his gun and yelled some blasphemies at the Angelinians. But his gun did not go off and the closest Angelinian fired at him and then chased him as he ducked and ran. He darted across another small creek and toward a small wooden house in the woods and dived through a window there carrying the smashed pane and fleeing with him.

This lone Angelinian fired again as he reached the window and the rebel received a bullet in the back and was killed instantly. Without waiting the Angelinians raced back to his comrades who were not after the other Glandelinians. They finally captured all of these Glandelinians forcing them to surrender but not until every one of the Glandelinian soldiers had used up all his ammunition. One rebel officer however was treacherous and drew a concealed weapon and it took five Angelinian soldiers to knock the gun from the frenzied rebel's right hand and another lunging out to give him a crushing blow on the jaw that felled him to the ground. The Glandelinians who were captured were brought to the main Christian lines by a large squad of armed soldiers, the many prisoners being black and blue from the beating given them by the infuriated soldiers who almost tore them from the hands of their captors when brought into the camp. One soldier jumped high into the air over the captors and screaming curses at the rebels and denouncing their cause smashed the teeth out of the mouth of one of them with a blow of his fist.

One of the Glandelinians it was noticed wore a ten carat diamond earring as he walked into the Christian lines with his captors. Every one of the prisoners were subjected to a fiery barrage of questioning concerning the where whereabouts of the Vivian girls and the boy, under which the Glandelinians repeatedly flinched and demanded fiercely to be let alone.

"Apparently," general Vivian said when he succeeded in getting his rage at his loss under control, "these Glandelinians were at least a part of the force that captured Penrod and the Vivian girls and tried to stop us from locating the camp to which they were taken. After their attack upon us they split into two main sections one covering the retreating of the other. My loss is fully four thousand four hundred killed, and nearly six thousand wounded a thousand fatally."

The general as he regretted his force clinched his fist and muttered curse upon curse upon these rebels and it was then that he gave the order to clean out the woods entirely. That witnesses who reported the rebels to be "Hollers" might have been mistaken for it was probable that they were Scoodlers or Gargoylians. The confusion aroused by the battle had not died down before more troops from the main line arrived and the officers were working furiously, furiously fast checking every angle of the two battles. The main army did not have to wait for the return of scouts to learn of the conflicts. News of the battle leaped like flame throughout the whole main army, even through the neighborhoods, and by noon the many generals were besieged by calls asking if the main Glandelinian army was advancing to make a general attack upon all parts of the Christian lines.

"I'm worried terribly more than I can ever explain," said Gertrude Angelina who was returning into the Christian lines with her party of girl scouts.

"Worried about what?" asked her friend Jennie Aronburg.

"About the Vivian girls being gone so long. It has me all upset and also scared. This anxiety is worse than even a terrible nightmare."

"Ave we girls usually wogry over nothing?" said Angelina Aronburg. "I dreamed last night that I and the Vivian girls were witnesses to the entire overthrow of the Glandelinian rebellion. And yet I woke up to find it all a dream."

"But their peril is to realize realistic," said Angelina Aronburg. "and they have been gone for three days longer than a week and general Vivian has searching parties out looking for them."

"If you did not worry so much you would have more confidence in them," said Mildred Maxwell.

Angelina Aronburg produced some pictures of Violet and her sisters.

"Just look at these," she said. "Just take a good look at their dear little beautiful faces. Their sweet little lips. How could the Glandelinians have the heart to be so cruel to them?"

"Well that does not matter to the enemy," said Jennie. "They are unusually beautiful no body being able to match them not even in their ways, but the wicked Glandelinians care no more for them than if they were ugly worms. It is a good thing they took after their brave daddy or they would not have been able to stand the horrors of this awful war. They will grow up to be very beautiful queens."

"If anything should happen to Violet and her sisters while they are gone so long I would never forgive myself. I should have gone with them. Their boy companion is not enough. The Glandelinians are afraid of me and every one knows it."

"The only thing that can happen to them are good adventures and no harm at all while God is watching over them," said Mildred.

"Their dear little horses are still within their stables," said Angelina Aronburg. "When Violet and her sisters come back they will be glad to ride them again."

"When they go a back they will have more time giving information to their generals of what they discovered than of going horseback riding just for fun," said Angelina Aronburg.

"I know but I cannot help worrying," continued Angelina Aronburg. "When I looked at their beautiful horses I could imagine hearing their little hoofs clattering on the road and see them riding forward dressed like little Princesses. I surely hope nothing has happened to them."

"Now Gertrude dear," said Jennie Aronburg encouragingly, "cheer up and remember how many times they have already outwitted the enemy and saved and rescued so many girl and boy slaves and even us from the enemy."

"Oh if they were only here just to ask us to go out on a tour with them," cried Gertrude.

"If there are any scouting tours to be done leave it to us," said Angelina Aronburg.

"Going on a scouting tour with them would be like eating ice cream. If you feel no blue about them Gertrude, why not all of us tour the region in search of them. We have girl and boy scouts in our own regiments who could watch out for them like an eagle watches its nest. If Violet and her sisters are real y in danger general Vivian will send out in search of them every member of the Gemini in the world."

"But suppose we discover they are prisoners of the enemy," Gertrude argued. "And in the heart of the enemy's lines. What should we do?"

"Prisoners of the enemy-- don't make us laugh," said Jennie. "I'll bet they are in Hanson's lines somewhere and suffering suspense because each day has not fourteen hundred hours so they could have more time to go out and seek information concerning the actions and intentions of the enemy. I know they have not told us anything before they left general Vivian's lines a week and three days ago, but remember how busy they may be. You know as they are Princesses they are bent over studying maps, in plans, reading important letters or giving advice to the generals and directing where to scout on the enemy next. Why just scouting around the enemy's positions would take lots of time. When they come back to general Vivian's lines they may have lots of very important information for him. Well we will all be glad to see them again. I always loved Violet and her sisters since the first day I met them. I always desired their company. Let's search for them Gertrude and perhaps we will have an exciting adventure and you will forget your worries."

The girls first returned to camp to get all their scouts and the whole force then started out. If these three girl heroines only knew that Violet and her sisters and Penrod were captives in possession of the foe the fierce and treacherous Scoodler Glandelinians what desperate plans they would think of to effect their rescue.

Violet and her sisters were now in the enemy's lines for over twelve hours. They had been in the possession of the Glandelinians many times and had been prisoners of various kinds but it was the first time they ever had been captives of the strangely uniformed Glandelinians called "Soodlers." These Glandelinians are very savage in character, crafty, and usually two faced in nature, and as treacherous as wildcats. Most of these soldiers however did not look as bad as they really were, but Violet and her sisters knew them well. To try to escape them when once in their possession would be suicidal for all these soldiers were crack marksmen and could shoot a small object throw up into the air. They were closely guarded by a number of bob haired Scoodlers with bayonets two feet long on their guns. They were as watchful as eagles and refused just now to talk to the prisoners under any conditions.

"I know those mean old Scoodlers are going to make a lot of trouble for us," said Penrod to himself. "If their general believes we have been spying on his army we will be out of this world in a jiffy. Our pathway since the war began seems to be the road of a thousand perils a day. I have heard that it is written that he who rides a tiger is afraid to dismount. We are in that kind of a situation it seems. The Scoodler officer who took us to the camp told us or told their chief executive that we are taken as most dangerous spies and demands that we are to be put to death for if we escape we will bring all kinds of ruin to every one of the Glandelinian armies. Yet the evil tongue is never at rest. But I know it is said that the wicked are often burned by their own worthless fires." He had just finished speaking when he and the little girls found themselves before the general who looked very much like Andrew Gump in the comic pictures of the Chicago Daily Trib Tribune. The Scoodler captain spoke to the general for more than half an hour and then the general turning to the prisoners said;

"You are said to be spies, especially you seven beautiful little girls and therefore sentenced to die this very hour. Forward men with them to the execution grounds."

A large squad of Mandelintian soldiers came, placed the prisoners between them and off they marched almost at the double quick. There were about a hundred Woodlarks behind while the prisoners were between thirty of them. "Oh Boy!" said Penrod again to himself. "I surely wish we had stayed within the Christian lines. Any one who knows Mandelintian scouting parties are so numerous should never leave the protecting camps, and who can escape these fierce Woodlarks or Pinnernians. Then he said to Violet in a loud whisper: "Farewell my beloved friends."

Violet only smiled.

"Don't give up hope yet," she answered. "I saw a big force of Abbieannian cavalry approaching in the distance. They will save us yet."

They had not gone very far when all of the prisoners heard a roar as if a tornado was suddenly striking, and the Mandelintians who were escorting them as suddenly drew off and opened fire their crash of rifles being like one explosion.

Then with one accord they turned and fled. In another moment a wave of lavender uniformed mounted cavalry men came up and swept into and through the camp with a speed and fury that nothing could resist. Another minute and a part of the camp burst into flames while a wild conflict raged. The Mandelintians who were strong in numbers fought like drunken madmen though evidently they knew that resistance was in vain.

"I'm glad they did not come too late," said Penrod as he viewed the savage battle in the camp. "Before the Mandelintians who are overwhelming in numbers recover the camp and repulse the attackers we will escape the rebel lines. And I shall praise the one who led the force to the Mandelintian camp."

They had only run a block when Violet halting said;

"There is another squadron of Abbieannians coming like the wind. There seems to be a myriad of the soldiers at this time. The Blessed Virgin has at last smiled upon our most unworthy efforts. Now my look at them come."

"See I hope it is general Vivian's," said Penrod.

It was general Vivian's army of cavalry alright and Violet and her sisters and Penrod were now with the soldiers of Christ once more leading the troopers to the very attack themselves.

"This is the happiest moment of my life," said general Vivian clapping them one after another to his heart when the conflict was over and the enemy had fled.

"Safe at last. Thank God! I should wish to never let you little girls out of my sight again."

"Oh general. We are so glad to see you again," cried Violet. "How did you find us out?"

As they were on their way back to the Christian lines general Vivian told them everything.
